The Wards of UA

by FeckedSpectrum

Summary

27's throat tightens, as if any words he could have thought to say are trapped there. If it weren't for Memory's nails digging into his wrist, he would probably have stood there all night, trying to understand what they wanted him to do.

Use his quirk on a child. A tiny, frightened child.

He kneels down, trying to get her to look him in the eye, to make some kind of connection. Anything to try and make her answer. "D-do you want to go away? Do you want to go somewhere safe?"

Her eyes open, slowly, and the sobbing slows enough that she isn't shaking with it quite as much. Her hands are lowering from her mouth.

Her voice, so small and hoarse, is all he needs. He feels the quirk trap around her mind, and her eyes fade from red to white, hands dropping slack by her side.

This work is based off of The Last Resort, written by coldandhotsoba. In this AU, after Shinsou Hitoshi is sold to The Miasma, The Miasma sells him to Overhaul to fill the role of "The Mediator" for Eri. Even after the raid on the 8 Precepts, the wards are haunted by their pasts, but the ghosts in Shinsou's mind are anything but dead.

Updates weekly.

Notes

For those of you who have not read The Last Resort, please do! It is a fantastic read, and I personally have read it 4 times over before sitting down to write this story.

Just as a summary of TLR, Shinsou Hitoshi was sold by his mother to a criminal organization named The Miasma when he was 4 years old, after his quirk developed. The Miasma muzzled, tortured, and trained him, naming him '27' as the members of that organization are called Numbers, with the exception of the higher ranked members who go by Boss, Memory, and Bug. 10 is the dedicated healer of the organization, and someone that Shinsou is close to.

There are other characters and plot lines from TLR that I borrow throughout the story, and I cannot state enough how highly I recommend that you read it.

Also: Trigger Warning for Dissociation, Bugs, Bleach used in torture, and Tattooing. If there's anything else that you would like me to tag, please let me know in the comments.

What is Your Name?

“Well, little brother, I hope you make a good impression,” 127 says, stretching his arms over the passenger seat. “Very few get sold, and very few get sold so quick.”

Memory glares at the road as she drives, but doesn't scold 127 for referring to 27 as a person, a 'little brother' as he liked to call him. 127 was the only protection available tonight, and Boss must have been offered a substantial amount of money to showcase the merchandise at the buyer's location. He had never heard of a Number being sold, as it happened so rarely, but 10 had told him that when it did happen, it was usually at an auction at The Miasma's compound, or a secondary location close by.

10 also told him to be sure to impress, just like Bug, Memory, and especially Boss had. He couldn't afford to screw this up.

His nerves were rattling from the backseat, and he wished that Memory had told him anything about the buyer. He didn't know if he was supposed to be protection, distraction, a flashy quirk. Even on the few missions he had been on, he was told something to expect. Some role to fulfill.

The drive is long and quiet, and it's hard to keep awake, but 27 busies himself by counting streetlamps. If he dozes off like 127, Memory may decide to turn around and tell Boss that he's not good enough to showcase.

When Memory finally slows down and parks the car, the nerves rush to his head, and he busies himself with tapping the scars on his arm. A knife wound across his knuckles. 47's claws inside his elbow. Two grooves from his wrist, twisting in some places, ending at the bicep, the shoulder. Touching them reminds him of the sunken scars on his stomach, his gut clenching at the memory it brings up.

Bug's quirk, used on him 3 times. Longer each time. He had two more rounds with her before he would start to show wear and tear. Start to break. Start to be less useful.

Whatever they asked him to do, he would do it. If 50 was alive, he imagines she would tell him the same.

Memory doesn't turn to face him, but he knows she's talking to him. “The buyer is the head of a very powerful mafia organization. It will be useful to show what you've learned from Honzo, to prove you aren't uneducated in how a syndicate operates. He wants your quirk long-term, and will expect a demonstration.” She turns to level an icy glare at him, and he turns his gaze to not quite meet her eyes to avoid it's chill. “Don't get smart when the mask opens. You will not like the consequences.”

He nods, quick and decisive, just to get her eyes off of him. He knows the consequences. He knows that Bug could do so much worse than she has. He's been under Cherry and Blossom twice, and he'd do anything to avoid them again.

Memory slides out and opens the door for him, as the closest building's door opens to reveal a man in a hooded cloak and long-beaked mask. No one speaks as they enter and follow him down a long dark hallway, even 127 following behind 27 is silent.

The hooded man opens the door at the end, and he sees this room is lit, but mostly empty. Dark wood paneling, old couches and the heavy smell of cigarette smoke and beer makes 27 think this is the backroom of a gambling parlor. Perhaps the mafia that wants to buy him are part of the gambling side, like Honzo.

When Memory steps to the side to reveal him to the buyer, he certainly isn't what 27 pictured. The man is much younger than Honzo, with short black hair and somewhat feminine eyes. He also wears a pedestrian kind of jacket over a button up shirt and tie, something Honzo would never do, as he always wore every piece of his expensive suits. The man sits on a wooden chair that doesn't seem to belong with the older, stained furniture in the room, his posture lazy to denote that he's too powerful to care about appearances, something a lot of his clients do, but this man seems to actually mean it. Instead of looking at 27, he's glaring at something between his gloved fingers.

"This place is filthy," the man grumbles behind the beaked mask, brushing his thumb against his fingers to get rid of whatever piece of dirt had offended him. "So is the product," and 27 finds that glare directed at him, eerily golden eyes dissecting him bit by bit.

He hadn't even done anything and he's screwed up.

"My apologies," Memory says coolly, bowing. She doesn't correct him by saying that 27 had indeed been showered before being loaded into the car, and even been issued a clean outfit for the first time in years.

"I require it, unfortunately," the buyer says, his glare tapering off as he glances away. "A filthy, but useful quirk. I need it to control a very important asset."

An asset. A person like him.

27 ignores the sinking feeling in his stomach. This would be a very easy job if that were the case. With his quirk, he was the best fit out of any number in The Miasma, and with all his training, he could probably control a single person almost continuously. Being bought would save him from Bug, would save him from the risk of outliving his usefulness. It would probably mean he would be treated better too, at least allowed to bathe more than once a week if he was reading the buyer right.

He was the only Number used to wearing a mask all the time too. Perhaps that could sway the buyer even further into making the purchase.

"A demonstration, then?" Memory asks, pulling out the remote. The buyer snaps his fingers, and she releases the mechanism that had been holding his jaw shut. 27 fought the urge to open his jaw too visibly, fighting the habit of loosening his clenched muscles. He needed to seem like a professional, like a tool completely unphased by what conditions it was under, and what it was meant to do.

But he couldn't stop himself from clenching his jaw tight when he saw who the asset was.

She was tiny. He couldn't remember the last time he saw a person so small, made even smaller by the second cloaked and masked person she was hiding behind. She had long white hair, a tiny horn on her forehead, and bandages wound around her arms, poorly done by how they unraveled and trailed on the floor.

Her wide red eyes matched the blood flowering under those bandages.

The buyer stood and walked over to her, placing a hand on her head in a way that couldn't be mistaken for anything other than oppressive. He had to lean over her to do it, casting a shadow over her tiny figure, and when the shadow fell over her already frightened face, tears began to well up in her eyes.

“This asset is extremely precious to me. But she is at a difficult age, and acts out irresponsibly,” the buyer says, speaking to them, but his face was directed at her. “I require someone to make her behave.”

27’s throat tightens, as if any words he could have thought to say are trapped there. If it weren’t for Memory’s nails digging into his wrist, he would probably have stood there all night, trying to understand what they wanted him to do.

Use his quirk on a child. A tiny, frightened child.

He’s done a lot of things he’s not proud of, and some that he knows he shouldn’t be. He was sure that he would do anything if it meant he could be bought, if he could leave The Miasma. But he wasn’t expecting anything like this, anything like her.

He forces himself to walk forward in slow, measured steps. He’s as quiet as he can be, trying not to spook her, but when the buyer shoves her forward roughly, she stares at him with her fear-stricken eyes, and begins to cry.

He hates it. He hates the sight of her hands clenched tight against her mouth, and the sound of her sobbing, because even though she’s shaking with the effort, she barely makes a sound.

It’s how he used to cry.

But he swallows the sorrow, the hatred, all the confusing ugly feelings deeper into himself. He’s a professional. He can’t afford to screw this up.

He kneels down, trying to get her to look him in the eye, to make some kind of connection. Anything to try and make her answer. “W-what is y-your name?”

She opens her eyes just for a moment through her tears, but doesn’t answer. He can feel Memory’s glare on his back, can almost feel Bug’s quirk working its way under his skin. He can’t do this, can’t make this child listen to him, can’t make her go blank in the face, can’t face the terror that would work its way back into his mind.

He clenches his teeth and swallows it back again. He needs this.

He can convince himself that she needs it too.

“D-do you want to go away? Do you want to go somewhere safe?”

Her eyes open, slowly, and the sobbing slows enough that she isn’t shaking with it quite as much. Her hands are lowering from her mouth.

The buyer’s hand tightens in her hair, and he growls, “What are you-”

Her voice, so small and hoarse, is all he needs. He feels the quirk trap around her mind, and her eyes fade from red to white, hands dropping slack by her side.

He doesn’t dare look away though. Doesn’t want to see the anger on the buyer’s face, doesn’t want to risk seeing Memory’s either. He makes himself look at what he did, the way he stole the last bit of life from that girl’s eyes, and tries to convince himself it was the right thing to do.

“27, explain yourself to the buyer,” Memory demands, her tone crisp but promising punishment if he messes up even more.

“I-I needed her to ans-swer,” 27 says, fingers digging deeper into his fists with each stutter. Clients never liked that, buyers probably less so. “S-she seemed scared, and pr-probably wanted to get away from that feeling. I thought i-it would make her t-talk.”

The buyer hums, neither angry nor amused, and it’s better than he hoped for. “Make her walk to the other side of the room.”

“W-walk to the blue sofa,” 27 orders, pointing to the furniture just to make sure the command wouldn’t get confused. “And don’t bump into the table.”

She started carefully walking as he commanded, bandages trailing on the floor behind her.

“Why mention the table?” the buyer asks, and 27 wants to look at his face, but can’t bring himself to do it, too afraid of insulting him.

“If the person under 27’s control gets injured, they are released from it,” Memory answers. “But bear in mind that this is only a limitation that 27 has now. 27 is 12 years old, having been trained for 7 with us, and its quirk capabilities are likely to grow.”

It takes a great deal of effort not to react to Memory’s words, as he knows she’s lying. Bug herself said that he would be able to control more people, maybe even reduce what he needed to activate his quirk, but exercising his control after an interrupter like pain was a hard limit.

The buyer hummed again, walking back to his original seat. “Not exactly what I was hoping for, but we still have restraints. If it can be trained, all the better.” He snaps his fingers again, this time at 27. “You answer this time. You can make her walk around. You can manipulate her without any hand holding from me. You can kneel on the ground like a dog, and be loyal only to me, right?”

27 looks over his shoulder at Memory, but her impassive face betrays nothing, no hint of which way he should answer. He tries to look at the buyer, but can’t bring himself to look any farther than his feet, knowing that the pause he’s already given is asking for too much leniency. “Yes,” he answers, and hopes he answers correctly.

“Bark.”

It’s a power play, and a good one, but if 27 had anything left to lose to humiliation, he had lost it long ago. “Arf.”

The buyer hums, and this time he’s clearly pleased. “I like him. I’ll even pay that ridiculous price, plus 20% if I can have him in three days.”

“It will be done,” Memory says primly over the stuccato of her heels, and though her words seem pleased, the nails that dig into the back of his neck as she guides him to stand tell him she’s not pleased with him. “Miasma is pleased to do business with you.”

“Miasma deals with information,” the buyer says, and 27 can see from the shoes he’s still staring at that he crosses his legs as he speaks. “I’ll trust that nothing in this room goes on the market, but when we meet, I’ll make sure Miasma has the proper incentive to keep it that way.”

“I’ll inform the Boss myself,” Memory answers, even happier with the promise of more money.

27 waits until they cross the first doorway to release his hold on the little girl, still standing in the corner, because as selfish as he's become, he dares to avoid the sound of her silent crying just once, before it becomes his job.

"Cherry and Blossom are going to miss you, you know," Bug sing-songs, finishing up the restraints on his ankles. "But you're giving them a real treat to remember you by. Disloyal little Numbers are the tastiest ones to them."

It was a mistake to answer to the buyer, he knew that when he did it, but the deal was done. He had one last session with Bug. He could get through it easier than ever.

"You're going to remember not to do that ever again, won't you, 27? And you won't be stupid enough to tell this Chisaki anything about Miasma. You won't tell anyone anything about Miasma, right?"

Bug knows he can't do more than nod, but he does so as vigorously as he can. Maybe she will go a little easier on him if he can convince her he's contrite enough.

"You won't, because you'll remember spending 12 hours with Cherry and Blossom anytime you think about barking about it to your new owner."

She doesn't give him time to sit with that number, already letting her first maggot chew into his wrist. The longest he had gone was 8 hours, and that was the trails that went to his shoulders. They could go to his neck if he wasn't lucky, could even go into his head.

He grits his teeth in front of the scream, but knows he will only make it through a few hours like that. Maybe he could pass out, 88 said he did that once and it helped.

He hopes he passes out.

He hopes he doesn't die.

He hopes that girl's red eyes don't remind him of Cherry and Blossom the next time he sees her.

The 8 Precepts of Death are much bolder than Miasma is, being based in a mansion out in the open, but that fit his new owner - Chisaki Kai - perfectly. 27 had no idea what his quirk was, but he knew it had to be powerful, as the mafia boss radiated power from his very core.

The negotiations must have gone very well for Boss, who smiled and clapped a hand on his shoulder as the 8 Precepts members formed a 4 man barrier around him to guide him out of The Miasma. He had no idea how much Boss had gotten out of this deal, but knew if he breathed a word about the 112 thousand yen he was really worth to his new owner, it wouldn't end well.

The car ride to the mansion and the walk inside had been deathly silent, almost purposefully. 27 knew nothing about the men who were surrounding him, but knew they were cowed by just the threat of Chisaki's name, too much so to be too high up in the chain of command. Still much higher than him, as a new member and not even a volunteer.

He was led through several hallways and down two flights of stairs, and he committed each step to memory. He wasn't four years old anymore, and wouldn't let himself get lost in a complex as he did in The Miasma, even if he intended to do well here. He couldn't waste the opportunity to know where he was.

Chisaki was waiting for him in a spartan Japanese style bedroom, tatami mats and all. A door to his right was open to reveal a bathroom, and the steam seemed to promise a bathtub unseen, with a luxury he hadn't had in years. Hot water.

“Kneel.” His first command as Chisaki’s property. He collapsed into a proper sitting position, legs tucked painfully underneath him.

He bows his head down to show respect, but also to hide his eyes as he glances around the room. Three elaborate tapestries are hung on the wall to the left, with a low table set with dried fish and salt. Just as he suspected, he would take Sakazuki to complete the transfer of ownership from The Miasma to the The 8 Precepts of Death.

Two underlings place another low table in front of him, this one set with two scrolls on each end, in kanji so stylized it's nearly unreadable, written in what looks to be blood. The sake set looks old, the rough ceramic denoting an artist's hand from a time before manufacturing became common place. Maybe they're not gamblers, but peddlers, with a history impossibly distant.

He becomes aware of a person standing behind him the split second before he grabs the outstretched wrist above him. He had been thrown around during training enough times that protecting the straps at the back of his head were pure muscle memory. Panic floods him as he looks beyond the hand to the face staring back at him from a beaked mask. This person doesn't have to wear goggles or a hood, just like Chisaki doesn't. They must be a higher ranked member.

“Protective of your muzzle, aren’t you?” Chisaki states, just the slightest bit amused. “Hari is going to take it off. Put your hand down.”

He obeys, turning back around and trying to keep his posture perfect, despite the blood rushing in his ears. He feels the person - Hari - pulling at the lock, and the click as a key opens it. One strap falls past his face before the entire thing is pulled away.

“Hm, we didn’t ask for a tracking device, did we, Chisaki?” Hari drawls with a light and airy voice.

“I expected little else from those low-lives who call themselves peddlers,” Chisaki answered. “It was a pain to get a signal jammer, lose the detail, and take their insurance poli- What are you doing?”

The sharp tone draws his hands back to his lap and he nearly tips over as he bows with his head pressed against the mats. “I-I’m s-sorry. I-I-I’m s-s-s-”

He couldn't help himself from touching his face, to feel the weeping scabs where the metal was digging in. He hadn't touched that skin in 7 years.

Chisaki grunts, annoyed that 27 can't force the apology out of his mouth, still stuck on one consonant. "Your hands are filthy. If you get sick, you're useless. Stop whimpering."

He bites his lips together, rising slowly. His eyes remain on the low table.

The man walks to the side of the table and begins pouring the sake, Chisaki's cup first, a rough black ceramic piece with a single white, broken circle left of the design, but more of it had probably faded with age and use. It is filled to the very brim, and 27 imagines it would be difficult to move nevertheless drink it. 27's portion is placed in a cup that doesn't belong to the set, smooth and completely black but for the white kanji at the bottom that says 'dog.' His portion only covers the kanji, not that he will protest. He doesn't want to choke like Honzo's initiate had.

"This sake is my blood, this initiation the birthplace of your new family. I will take you under my wing, and guide you stray, and reward you when you obey. In return, you will be my unshaking hand and the bearer of my will," Chisaki recites, and drinks without spilling a single drop.

"Please take this lowly kobun into your esteem, and do with me what you will," 27 answers, noticing that Hari's mouth opened and shut quickly in surprise. "My body, heart, and spirit is yours, to do with as you wish."

He picks up the cup with both hands, bowing his head three times, then drinks, trying to hide the wince that even the few drops he was given brings as it burns on his tongue.

Before he can place the cup back on the table, Chisaki raises a hand. "I'm not drinking after a dog," he says with disgust. "Even a well-bred one who knows the way of the Yakuza."

Hari snickers, hand raised to his mouth as he tries to stifle it. "I wonder if the mutt will drink the bathwater to get the taste out of his mouth. His face was so amusing."

Chisaki waves a hand in answer as he rises, and the underlings that were stood against the wall move to take the sake set away. One grabs 27's cup and hands it to Hari instead of him. "Make sure he is clean and call for Nemoto to get rid of the tags on his arm."

Hari hums thoughtfully, watching Chisaki walk away. "Should I ask what design he's getting?"

"No," Chisaki answers as he opens the door and shuts it behind him.

Despite the playful air he had with his owner, Hari levels a glare at 27 before ordering him to stand up and follow him to the bathroom. His clothes are stripped away with unnecessary aid from the longer haired man, and 27 hurries through the process just to keep his hands away from him. The steam in the bathtub looks inviting, but a sweet yet unpleasant smell suffocates the room and makes his previous excitement as bitter as the alcohol still on his tongue.

He waits until he's told to sit on the showering stool, then Hari rinses him down with a more familiar cold spray for a few minutes, before ordering him into the tub. The cold rinse only made the water more biting, he thinks, until he lowers his hands in and pulls back with a hiss. The scabs left where Bug had placed Cherry and Blossom burn as though they were lit on fire, and he stares as the skin around them gets puffy and reddens.

"Oh, the dog has some bug bites, doesn't he?" Hari jests, but the wicked tone to it fills him with dread. "The bleach will definitely sting, then."

He barely has time to close his eyes before Hari pulls him under the water by his hair. His face burns, he doesn't need a mirror to know exactly where his wounds from the mask are because he can feel each one from where the pain is fiercest. They hurt more than the wounds from Bug by far.

He's allowed to pull up for air, gasping desperate lungfuls, but the air on his wounds hurts even more before he's pushed back down again.

He loses track of how many times it happens, pain under the water, fire above it.

Loses himself in trying to breathe.

When he's pulled out of the tub, his limbs are shaking, the agony set in so deep that he can barely keep his arms from collapsing and spilling himself fully on the cold tile. Hari makes the pain worse as he drags a towel over him roughly, chuckling all the while about what a silly dog he is, but how nice and clean he is now. He notices that some of his purple hair is matted to the towel when it's tossed against the door.

He's grateful that Hari pulls him back to the bedroom by his arm, not able to trust himself to carry his own weight across those few steps, before placing him in front of a very tall man wearing a bowler hat and a mask that covers his eyes. "You took too long, Hari. Lashing out at the new member because he's so close to our most precious asset?"

"Shut up, Nemoto," Hari hisses, walking to the folded up futon in the corner where a woven basket sits on top. "This is why no one likes mental quirks, you can't help yourselves from using it."

Nemoto chuckles, turning to 27. "I can't exactly make conversation with him now, can I? You made such a mess of his mind that I can barely see the shadows from the storm."

Sometimes, 27 slips out of himself.

He falls asleep while standing up, but finds that his body was doing things while he wasn't there. It happens during training, sometimes. He thinks it happens when he's in the Red Room, but there's no way of telling without a clock, or a way to move his body.

Sometimes he can feel it begin, a numbness setting in that can sometimes terrify him right out of it. Other times, it's like a thunderclap, 98 grabbing for his head one moment and 58 dodging his kick the next.

Nemoto was right about the storm, because this time it's a long, thunderous night.

He looks down and sees that Nemoto is working a row of needles attached to a long wooden stick in and out of his arm around his number. He blinks and the black splotch is bigger. Blinks again and Hari is saying something, his tone light and airy again, but the words turn to noises that he can't begin to process before he slips out again.

Nemoto wiping an oil over his arm, a huge black band with 'Dog' written where the ink isn't with his pale skin, turned further to his side than the '27' was.

His cheek tacky with blood when he tries to raise his head off the tatami mat, a burning on his back tells him he's getting a tattoo there too, at the base of his neck.

Cold water being thrown in his face, a sour taste in his mouth and the smell of vomit in the air. Hari muttering that the dog is already sick, and Nemoto says "The pain threshold is high, but still there. It's been 20..."

Hari pulling him down a long hallway, and he looks down and realizes he's been dressed in a black tank top and loose pants. The pants feel soft, softer than anything he's ever worn, and he manages to stay a little longer, stumbling in his steps, thinking about how soft they are.

He's laying on a bed, and this too is softer than the one he had at Miasma. The smell of bleach sticks in his nose, and he tries to stay, tries to lift his head to look around the room. Even the feeling of a blanket being dragged over his shoulders should keep him there, someone so close to him that he can hear them breathing should alarm him enough to stay.

He tilts his head to the right and sees the little girl as she leans down to meet his eyes. Her face is blank in a different way, in a calm and curious way, and he knows it's his job to be awake now. To keep an eye on her, to control her.

He wants to ask her what her name is.

He manages to raise a hand to his mask, even though it's shaking. He can feel that this is a new mask, plastic cover where there was metal, but he doesn't have the strength to run his fingers across it, to find out what it looks like. He moves the mask around to see if he can, to see if it's looser than the other, and what he finds stills his hand.

It's soft against his face. Thin foam padding where there was harsh metal before.

Chisaki is kind, he tells himself, numbness settling in slowly.

It's a good thing he was bought.

A Day in The Life

Chapter Summary

49 days after 27 had been purchased by The 8 Precepts of Death, he's beginning to get used to the routine. He's begun to make new ones to keep himself sane.

He's beginning to get dangerously attached to the asset he's supposed to control.

The foam padding lasted 17 days before it wore out, and the metal sank back in.

He's been at the 8 Precepts of Death compound for 49 days.

Every morning he wakes up to the click of the automated mechanism in his mask opening up. It's placed right next to his ear, even closer than his old mask, and is meant to serve as his alarm clock.

Most mornings, Eri has wet the bed. Some of those mornings, he can manage to shift her sleeping body onto an unsoiled blanket so she can sleep a little longer while he bleaches the soiled futon in the tub, keeping the evidence away from Chisaki if he decides to visit. Others, she rubs at her face and follows him, silent as a ghost.

She gets a bath afterwards, and he always makes sure that the bleach is fully rinsed away before settling her in. The water doesn't do much by itself, but bleach is all they have. Even the sink has a bottle of it instead of hand soap.

He dries her off and dresses her in one of the 37 white dresses she has in her closet, and changes out the bandages on her arms and legs. The constant pressure of the cloth has left spiralling impressions long ago, and scars ripple around the ever-present scabs like the rings on a tree trunk. By the time he finishes, someone has delivered breakfast to the room. If it's an underling, he knows he can change her into a set of pajamas, and she always brightens at that. Even if she doesn't speak much, she'll babble more often, and even try to dance as she rocks from one foot to the other.

If it's Hari, or Chisaki, the dress stays on. It means she has to go to The Chair that night.

Breakfast is better on those days, though. Instead of oatmeal, they get cereal or a side of soup, some kind of meat mixed into rice, and a serving of jello as desert. She throws a fit none-the-less, and he's learned to bite down on his bitterness as he coaxes her to eat bite by bite, spoon feeding her as she cries. She may never have lived through hundreds upon hundreds of gruel servings every day, but he didn't have to go through hundreds upon hundreds of injections either.

Today, she didn't wet the bed, and he's glad he took the time to take her to the bathroom three times the night before. He makes quick work of the bath and bandages, even gets to start combing through her hair before his owner comes in with two plates of omurice and green jello.

She leans back, trying to get closer to him as if he could offer any protection at all. The hand he rests on her shoulder and the polite "Thank you, Boss" he gives his owner is the best he can do. Even those simple words have to run through his mind a hundred times before he can manage to say them without stuttering, but he's learned that if they're both quiet, Chisaki will make conversation, and stay longer, making her fits worse when he leaves.

“Her marrow wasn’t fully recovered last time. Make sure she eats every bite today, or I won’t have enough minerals to restore her afterwards,” Chisaki states, placing the tray on the floor as he carefully avoids touching the germ riddled ground. “Did you forget how to force feed her, Dog?”

“No, I will do it, Boss,” he answers. Eri dares to fidget, pulling her knees in closer in a bid to avoid shaking, but it’s too much motion nonetheless. His owner looks at her, and though Dog has never been able to read that look on his face, it never fails to make her tremble and cry.

They’re lucky this morning that Chisaki just turns away and leaves. As soon as the door closes, Eri starts crying, and he bites back a sigh.

It probably wouldn’t have taken 2 hours to get her to finish her food if he force fed her, alternating between pinching her nose shut and covering her mouth to get her to swallow. His food might have still been warm if he did that, or if he put her under the quirk, but he never does.

He never quirks her unless it’s to walk her to The Chair.

He doesn’t let himself wonder why.

After he’s done eating, he gathers up the dishes and places them outside the door to be picked up by an underling. The door is always unlocked, but they don’t venture outside unless summoned. He’s never even managed to attempt it.

She’s lying on the bed, face down, too exhausted to cry but unable to distract herself from the anxiety of waiting. He picks up one of her favorite books, out of the ten that they have, and lays down next to her to read it aloud.

When he makes a silly, high pitched voice for the children arguing over the kitten that thinks its name is Snot Stew, she rolls herself over and sighs heavily. He reads the book twice over before she’s finally settled down fully, curled up against his side with her head against his arm.

“3,” she says, hoarse from the crying.

They count up to 20 together twice, then it’s her turn. 3’s and 8’s are hard to remember, but she makes it up to 12. It took her three weeks to get to 5 on her own.

He sets her up with her crayons and picks a page from her coloring book for her to work on. There’s 19 pages left, and he doesn’t know if his owner will get her another one when it’s finished.

He makes sure she’s fully engrossed in scribbling the cartoon pony pink before he dares go to the bathroom to wash himself up, knowing he can’t take too long. If it wasn’t a Chair day, he could probably take a bath, but knowing the mood she’s in, he grabs a wash cloth to do the job instead. His armpits stink, despite the fact that he didn’t even train last night, and he thinks it has something to do with the hair that’s begun to grow there, like purple fungus. He has to use a little bleach, diluted in the sink, to cover up the smell. He’s learning how much bleach is too much, which leaves little white patches of dead skin that are too hard to scratch off.

He tries to run a comb through his hair, but the big fist-shaped matt at the back of his head stops his progress after a few inches. Hari still drags him away for a bleach bath on occasion, and he hates how unpredictable it is more than the pain. His purple hair is definitely getting lighter, and it feels like straw when he touches it. He avoids doing so now, avoids reminding himself that his soft hair used to be one of the few comforts he had at Miasma, especially when he was younger and still being trained to know his name.

His name here still doesn't fit right in his mind, but he always makes sure to answer to it. He feels like he'll always be 27 to himself.

He's pleased to see Eri humming to herself, not only unaware he had left but in higher spirits than he hoped for. He pulls out a pair of black pants and the one long-sleeved shirt he's allowed to have, and dresses himself quickly in the bathroom. Eri likes to poke at his scars from time to time, and much to his chagrin, the ones from Bug were her favorites.

She didn't know any better, and he couldn't bring himself to blame her, tiny fingertips tracing the curves and grooves, even humming a little from time to time. At least he's never slipped out of himself when she does that. Electric nerves still scream inside his head, but the rare sound of her quiet happiness keeps him there.

He sits next to her, and only has to coax her a few times to color the entire page, asking her to draw him more pretty pictures. He can't afford to give her a second sheet, because he doesn't know whether they are going to get more paper, and if they don't then their schedule will be disrupted. He doesn't know who that would upset more, Eri or himself.

After that, it's time for another story, and after he reads it once through, he tries to get her to read it to him. He's pretty sure most of the words she 'reads' are what she's memorized, as she says Spot digs under a fence when the picture clearly shows him going to bed hungry for being a naughty little puppy.

He's grateful that 10 gave him these kinds of lessons when he was at Miasma, though he didn't have the luxury of reading aloud back then, and the books he read from were medical textbooks and a beaten yellow-paged thesaurus. Without the structure of these little lessons, they both might lose their minds in this concrete room.

It's rinse and repeat after lunch, fish on a bed of rice with vegetables that have an odd, bitter taste to them before he swallows. He's been trying to get Eri to eat by herself on her good days, but today he wants to dote on her. He just cuts the fish up into tiny pieces and places each bite in her mouth, smiling to himself as she babbles. He can pick out a few words that she's learned, like 'pokey puppy' and 'supper,' and mentally moves the book up from her 4th favorite to her 3rd.

He reads another book. They count. He reads another book. They count.

Sometimes she gets distracted by one of her 'games.' She'll look at him for a while, working up the courage as she squirms, then tries to order him to do something. She's still learning to speak, so the games can be challenging sometimes.

"Ag oh baff ge bed."

"Go to the bathroom and get the bed?" he asks, and gets a happy hum as he checks if the futon is dried yet from where it was hung over the side of the tub.

It's silly, being ordered around by a 3 year old, but it's the only control she has in her life. He wants her to have it.

His quirk rises to the surface of his mind every time she answers with a 'yes' or 'uh-huh,' a string pulled taut that he only has to tug on to pull her under. He lets it slack every time.

Then, the door opens. Dog sees Eri stop dancing and shrink in on herself, even if she's turned away from Chisaki. Dog walks over to her and kneels down, just like the first time they met. "Are you ready to leave, Eri?"

"Uh-huh."

He's learned this is the best question to ask. His owner doesn't like 'go away' or 'go somewhere safe.' Eri's eyes well up with tears if he asks if she's ready, especially if he asks if she's ready to go to The Chair.

She always answers, though.

Dog has been around her long enough to know she knows she could stay quiet, and it wouldn't work. It would be bad if she didn't, mostly for Dog, and he doesn't want to think about why she still answers.

It's a long walk, but it's made even longer by using his quirk. Not because it's hard to control her, he's never gotten the slightest headache from it. It's the emotional reverb he gets, and every trip to The Chair, it seems to get stronger.

He feels her inside his mind like the small flame of a candle, but the fear drenches him to the bone. He's found his hands shaking sometimes, while hers were limp at her sides. He knows he's not going to get hurt when they reach that door, when he tells her to sit in The Chair, but sometimes he gets flashes of pain when she thinks about it. He feels needles burrowing through skin and flesh down to the bone, so clearly he can almost hear the bone crack with the pressure.

He can't escape it. He can't get out of it unless he gets out of his own Brainwash.

It's bad today, she keeps thinking about the bone cracking, and awful feeling of marrow being sucked out. He almost believes it's happening to him, doesn't trust his legs not to give out because surely, they've been broken by that awful machine.

He can't even bear to look at it when he orders her to sit in The Chair. Can't look when Hari starts unwinding the bandages, or when he starts putting on the restraints.

"Rikiya, walk my Dog," Chisaki tells the monster of a man leaning on the doorframe. "He should be all worn out in 3 hours."

Dog takes his time walking the few steps to Rikiya, counting the click of metal buckles behind him. After the 8th one, he looks over his shoulder to Eri and drops his control.

She shakes, bound up so tight that she couldn't thrash if she wanted to. Her eyes are wide, begging him to free her, but this is all he can do. He can take her pain for the time it takes to walk to The Chair and back. He can make sure he looks her in the eye when he drops his quirk. He can try his best to care for her in the quiet spaces in between trips to The Chair and visits from Chisaki, but they both know Dog is just selfish and manipulative.

There's no safe place that he could take her to.

Just this place.

The Dojo room is back down the hall, to the right, and has four sliding doors but Rikiya likes to use the second one. Dog begins stretching once he enters the room, counting the number of underlings that are talking amongst themselves, relaxing outside one of the marked off sparring courts. Five underlings, two more than last time. The new ones aren't wearing their full-face masks, and he knows that's a problem. They might not be powerful enough to be one of the 8, but they seem to think Chisaki would hesitate to kill them for spoiling the air with their germs.

Powerful or stupid, he needs to keep an eye on them.

He's pretty sure the other three are the usual opponents. Obvious Strength Quirk has incredibly swollen hands, The Whistler has an unnaturally high pitched voice when she talks, and Tentacle Fingers has a sticker of a cartoon ball with white sauce, green specks, and some kind of thin stick impaling it stuck on the front of his beaked mask.

"Takoyaki, are you telling me this is the little shit that had you pissing your bed?" Unmasked Goon 1 asks Tentacle Fingers. "He looks half fucking dead!"

"He threw me into Rikiya-san! I wasn't scared of him, I just didn't want to embarrass myself by passing out at one of the 8's feet!"

Dog weighs his options. Unmasked Goon 1 has an unnatural crease in his forehead in the shape of a V, with two reddish flecks on the sides of his nose that could be markings or divots that expose his sinuses. Probably poison breath or something, with how snake-like his appearance is.

Unmasked Goon 2 doesn't have any visible quirk, in fact he looks like the blandest man Dog has seen since 58.

That's exactly why Dog wants to take him out first.

He walks over to the weapons rack and picks up his daggers. He's not in the mood to try something new, as he won't receive any formal instruction like he did at Miasma. He twirls them around, frowning to himself about the weight disparity. They aren't part of a matching set, one is smaller and lighter, meant for throwing, while the other is heavy with a serrated edge near the hilt and a wickedly curved tip. He holds the throwing one in his left hand, intentionally handicapping himself a bit to use it primarily as deflection when the blade is too small for the job, but he's not going to risk actually throwing it. Seriously injuring the underlings during these training exercises was not a good idea.

Dog turns back around and sighs heavily, cocking his head to the side as he sizes up Blandy. "You want to go first?"

His target smirks, jumping up to his feet a little too enthusiastically. "Fine, what do you got, kid?"

That . Dog spun the throwing knife idly, looking at the man now under his control. The usual trio were watching, but Unmasked Goon 1 hadn't seemed to notice what had happened, just as he hoped. "Show me what your quirk is."

Blandy raised his arm and made a fist, and his forearm split in half, but the skin remained intact where a V-shaped canyon now separated the new limbs.

Dog was a bit disappointed. Sure, dodging one or two extra fists would be difficult if he activated that quirk when all five were in the ring, but Blandy hadn't gained any muscle mass or hardened his skin.

He should have gone for Unmasked Goon 1, but Blandy activating his quirk on command was clearly out of character, as the snake faced underling had shock written all over his face.

Couldn't hurt to try. "Hey, Hissy Fit, is your quirk venom related or is your face just ugly?"

Shock, flash of confusion, rage. Hissy Fit had a bad temper and a low IQ, his favorite type of opponent. "The fuck ar-"

And two .

The two consciousnesses settled easily under his control. He had been working with three at Miasma, but there was no way he could trick the usual crowd. He was a one trick pony, and he knew it.

"You dumbasses let him get to three on three," Rikiya grumbled, arms crossed over his chest.

"Since Dog is acting all feisty, just go ahead and give him a brawl."

"You fight the tentacle quirk. You fight the strength enhancement quirk. Avoid injuries," Dog told Blandy and Hot Head, setting his sights on Whistler. She always had a baton hidden somewhere in her cloak, as the only one to bring a weapon to these matches. Her quirk could also interrupt his control from a distance, and judging from her deepening breaths, that was exactly what she was going to do first. He'd have to take her out first, and take her out himself.

"If you can't keep him out of my hair for at least 2 hours, I'll kill you," Rikiya promised, hand already twitching towards his phone so he could play whatever game he was addicted to. "Start!"

Whistler was not on her game tonight, too busy trying to use her quirk that she couldn't fully dodge his knee to her solar plexus. Before she even started coughing, he wrapped a hand around the back of her head and pulled her face into his knee, hitting the middle of her forehead rather than the padded mask or the sharp goggles that could have injured him. She might have been concussed at that point, but he pulled his fist high and ensured it with a blow to the temple.

Rikiya swore as Whistler slumped to the ground and didn't get up. Another point for Dog. 8 more points and he would have earned 100, and would get to request an item from Chisaki. His reward for 50 knock outs had been any take-out food he wanted, and Hari had laughed and called him a moron for being unable to name a single restaurant. Luckily, Chisaki had been pleased by the results of The Chair session that night, and the following night, he was taken to a dining room and given fried chicken.

The underlings around had told him it was a special treat, and it did taste good. His favorite part about that reward was the loud hum of pleasant surprise Eri gave him when she bit into the drumstick he had hidden in his pocket. She asked for 'shicken' the next two days when he tried to get her to fall asleep, and knowing how much she liked it almost made up for disappointing her. He could get more rewards for her.

He could ask for a coloring book, or maybe a stack of them. Maybe the underlings could get him enough points to get the reward tonight. Maybe his owner would be in a good mood tonight.

The sound of a body hitting the floor and a scream of "Little shit!" warned Dog that Snake Face had woken up from his control. Obvious Strength had probably picked him up and dropped him, which was his favorite thing to do.

He had enough time to spin low and tackle as he heard Snake Face take a deep breath, a weird series of clicks sounding deep from within his throat. Before Snake Face's back hit the mat, Dog smelled and heard the plume of fire that came from his opponents mouth.

Dragon face, then.

Dog stood up with a quick kick in the head to the out of breath Zippo Lighter, who luckily went limp. A quick pat to his bleach-burnt hair verified that it hadn't been singed either. He was pretty sure if a single spark had landed on his head, the whole thing would have gone up in flames. Probably purple or green ones, too, with all the chemicals soaked in it.

The fight goes on for a while. Dog tosses the knives away, seeing as they're more trouble to keep in hand when he doesn't have an opportunity to use them. The underlings are just bad tonight. If he goes low, they guard it next time and leave themselves unsteady or their head vulnerable. When he inevitably goes high, they leave their middle open.

That isn't to say he's unscathed. Obvious Strength is hard to take down just because his limbs are too swollen to properly grapple, and Whistler and Zippo are both trying to get vengeance.

By the time Rikiya calls it, Dog feels the pleasant burn in his limbs and a few blisters on his hands. "So, the pup's got 99 down and just one more to go, huh."

Dog twists his head from side to side, trying to distract himself from giving away his plan. Picking at his sleeves would have been an obvious tell.

"Whatcha gonna ask for, huh? Beer, clippers, pocket pussy?" Rikiya's head, completely covered by his mask, cocks to the side as he puts his hands on his hips. "After that, you've got to hit 200 to hit up a conbini with one of us."

He's never been in one, but he's heard they have a lot of snacks. He could get some for Eri, maybe something sweet.

"Then 500 and you get to go out all on your own."

He doubted he really would be on his own, but if he was, he could buy soap and shampoo. Be able to properly wash her.

"1000 and you get your own room."

Didn't need it. He didn't want to be separated from Eri. Couldn't leave her alone at night.

"But to get out of that mask, you've got to beat all 8 Expendables and Chisaki."

"Don't want to," Dog said. He didn't want to know if he was lying.

"Seriously?! These things are fucking stifling," Rikiya groused, picking at the seam of his mask with a finger so he could fan air inside. "This some kind of kink for you or are you just fucked up?"

"I've been wearing one since I was 5," Dog answered with a shrug. "Pretty sure I'm fucked up."

Rikiya laughs at that, and settles into a loose stance. The conversation worked, and he's in a good mood. More likely to hesitate. Even sloppier than usual. Dog was the only one who really took these exercises seriously anyway, but with the reward in sight, he really wanted to take him down.

Right now, these sessions were a far cry from training with Bug, but he could keep from losing his edge too much. Keep sharp enough that when more of the 8 entered the ring, he wouldn't get too injured.

Rikiya swings an arm forward, and Dog dances back. The next swing, he dodges to the side. He's closing the distance more cautiously than he has to, but Rikiya isn't worried. The huge man had taken his shirt off, and if Dog missteps and gets caught in a bear-hug, he'd be passed out in seconds with all the skin-on-skin contact.

Or he would, if he didn't wear his long-sleeved shirt.

Dog tugs the sleeves over his hands and waits until Rikiya overextends himself, then ducks under his arm and throws himself on the man's back, arms locked around his huge, meaty neck in a sleeper hold he can barely form.

Rikiya grabs Dog's leg and tries to pull him off, but it's so painfully telegraphed that his other leg has hooked into the man's side before he makes contact. He tries to get at any kind of skin contact, but his arms are covered and he wound bandages around his legs up to the knee. Rikiya slaps at him futilely, growing weaker, before he throws a huge hand over Dog's face, blocking his vision.

He can't pull Dog off by his head with the way Dog's arms are locked around his neck. Instead, he shakes his head violently, making him dizzy and nauseous while the weakness grows stronger, his vitality slipping away. It's all he can do to keep the pressure on Rikiya's neck, shaking from the effort.

He's lucky that Rikiya's raised arm isn't doing the huge man any favors, and finally, his knees buckle and he falls to the ground.

Dog gets up shakily, hardly able to walk a step or two away before he too crumples to the floor. He rolls onto his back, breathing hard as he looks at the closed doors and empty dojo.

Out those doors, straight to the staircase. Up two flights. Through a door. Straight, left at the 3rd intersection. Up two more flights. He could either go right then straight through the main hall, or left and pass the dining room towards the backdoor that leads to the garden.

He closes his eyes and tries to recover his strength, and hopes that when Rikiya comes to, he won't have any plans for vengeance.

Luckily, he doesn't. Dog feigns sleep so well that the mobster just shakes his head and pulls out his phone, only tucking it away when Chisaki enters. "Dog cleaned the house tonight, Boss, even cleared the reward. He passed out doing it, but protected himself from my quirk well enough to get one over on me."

"Stop going easy on him, then," his owner grouched, and Dog flinched at the tone. He regretted it as he felt Chisaki's presence get closer, before the man crouched over his head.

Dog opened his eyes, looking at the key dangling between Chisaki's fingers. He was meant to look at it, the mafioso holding it just a foot away from his face.

The key to his mask. The reward after beating Chisaki's entire organization at least once, then the man himself.

What Chisaki wanted him to want.

It was Chisaki's game. He wanted Dog to keep from wasting away physically, cooped up in the same room day after day, and to keep him from wasting away mentally. Dog needed a purpose, a goal. Eri's care was just a task, but he needed something to work towards. Something for himself, with tangible results.

A meal. A gift. A taste of freedom. Another taste.

True freedom.

It was all worthless to Dog, but he played along. Just like with Eri's game, he just needed to figure out what he was supposed to do, sorting through the misdirection and hidden meaning, and act his part. Walk to the corner and stand on one leg. Sweep a man's leg so his fire breathing quirk lights another underling's cloak on fire.

There really wasn't an end to either game, it was just supposed to seem like there was.

Chisaki eventually pockets the key, having surmised whatever he wanted to find in Dog's transfixed stare. He's ordered to stand up and get a move on. He does so on shaky legs, and the entire walk he stares at the ground and thinks about falling forward and falling asleep.

The needles are still dug into Eri's limbs when they arrive. Her head is slumped over, as much as it can be against the restraints, and her long white hair obscures her face. He doesn't know if it's going to be a Crying night, where she'll scream herself hoarse when she finally works up to it, or a Blank night, where she'll be as docile as she is under his quirk. Not even tears will come, she'll just curl up in her bed and stare at the wall until she falls asleep.

He would do anything to avoid seeing a Blank night again.

Hari flips the switch to pull the needles out, and Chisaki walks forward, pulling off one of his gloves. His hand rests on her head for a few minutes, then he quickly puts the glove back on. "She ate it all. Don't let her slip up again."

"Yes, Boss."

Eri's bones and tissue have been restored, but the skin is left open. His owner must consider it too much effort. Or good practice to test the terrifying limits of his control.

Chisaki steps away, and Dog moves forward, kneeling down. He can't tell for sure, but Eri's face promises a Blank night, her big red eyes too wide, focused on absolutely nothing. She doesn't react at all at his approach. "Eri, are you ready to go back?"

"Uh...hun." She answers weakly. He pulls the string tight. If he missed it and had to ask again, she might not even have the strength to answer.

It's become his job to undo the restraints, as Hari and Chisaki get together to discuss the results. He undoes the buckles, pulls the leather straps away gently. Catches her arm as she starts to fall over.

Shit. She's too exhausted to hold herself upright. Her thoughts are just blank in his mind as well. She won't be able to walk the entire way back to the room, and if his owner saw him carrying her...

He looks over at Chisaki, his gloved finger tapping his beak thoughtfully as he looks at the tablet in his other hand.

He has to get him to notice that they're waiting to go to the room, but keep him engrossed in the data he's pouring over. Get permission to leave while Chisaki stays. Has to figure out how to ask without asking, because if he ever became stupid enough to ask Chisaki a question, Dog would become nothing but a deconstructed puddle before he could even say 'sorry.'

Can we - no.

The room - no, too curt. Could be seen as rude.

Eri is tired - 'Don't impose your judgements on other people's things,' he can already hear Chisaki say.

Eri leans even further, and at this point, he's worried she'll break out of his hold by falling asleep on him. His eyes are begging Chisaki to notice now, but the minutes drag on like hours with the mafioso focused completely elsewhere.

Hari sighs loudly, running a hand through his hair. "Do you really need an invitation, you stupid mutt? Take her to the room already!"

He can't even hide his relief, too exhausted himself, as he stands her up and gently orders her to follow him. He just needs to walk her past the door. Once they're out in the hall, he can pick her up and carry her.

"Where are you going, Dog?" His owner asks, his tone chilling. Dog stops too quickly, and feels Eri bump into his leg, breaking his quirk's hold. His hand goes for her shoulder, and he's lucky he catches it, as her legs give out immediately. His grip on her is the only thing to keep the illusion that she's still standing.

"My apologies, Boss. Hari-san dism... told me to take her." He doesn't have to look to know that Hari's murderous glare cooled a bit when he changed his wording. Even Hari couldn't get away with dismissing him now that Chisaki had noticed.

The boss grunted, irritated. "Fine."

He waited a minute, but there was no further instruction, the silence simply stretching on.

A power play. A good one, as always, and as always, he'll lose.

Eri gulps, threatening to start crying right there in the doorway, and he starts walking her into the hallway.

Every hair stands on end, and he drags her a few steps further than he wanted to because he's sure Chisaki is right behind him, waiting to catch him not only leaving without dismissal, but carrying Eri to her room. Unnecessary contact. Sick behavior.

When he finally pulls her up into his arms, she buries her face in his shoulder. She just squirms as the tears run down her face, too exhausted to work herself into a full sob. He nearly runs back to the room, nerves still singing even after he closes the door.

If Chisaki knew what he'd done, he'd be furious .

He tries to settle Eri on the bed so he could grab her pajamas and get her taken care of before he collapses himself, but she refuses to let him. Her tiny fists have just enough strength to hold his shirt tight, and she shakes her head back and forth. "Eri, please," he begs, quietly.

"No, " she says, anger even in her trembling voice. Her entire body is shaking now, and he's seen plenty of her melt downs, but this one is going to be the worst. "No, no, no, NO! "

She kicks at him, and she's weak as a kitten but it hurts .

She never tells him no.

The sobs have started up, but she's too tired to properly do it, just hiccupping and whining. He tries to soothe her, to rub circles on her back, but she just jerks away from him, splayed out on the bed. She manages another kick at him, and he sees the motion has opened up one of the scabs on her leg, blood weeping slowly.

"No!" She yells, and through the tears, he sees hate in her eyes, before it gives way to pain and terror.

It hurts .

His shoulders are shaking with it before the tears finally fall, and he weakly tries to turn away, to pull his knees to his chest.

It hurts and he's tired. He's so tired. He's tried so hard to keep her happy, to keep her well, and he's just a fucking idiot for believing he made a single bit of difference.

He's so tired and everything hurts and he just wishes, just wishes that 50 was here. For one minute. Just one fucking minute where the world could just stop, that he could stop scheming and worrying and counting and just feel 50's hand on his head. To feel her arms around him, pulling him into her lap. To feel small, yes, and scared, of course, but also safe .

He misses her, he misses everything about her. He misses feeling safe .

He feels a small tapping on his shoulder, and he looks over, surprised that Eri was able to even sit up at this point. Her lips are wobbling, tears still running down her cheeks, but she's still reaching for something. He leans closer, meaning to wipe her tears away, but her fingers touch the bit of his cheek that isn't covered by the mask.

She tries to wipe his tears away.

Even though she's small, and weak, and tired. Even though she's bleeding, and hurt, and angry. And scared that she's angry.

She wants to comfort him. The person who drags her to The Chair every time. The person who can't do a damn thing to protect her from Chisaki.

The one person who could try to get her away from this place, who knows the route to take, but is too damn scared of getting caught . Scared to die trying. Scared to fail.

He wipes his own tears away, picking her up and settling her gently in his lap. He rocks back and forth, muttering over and over that it's okay, keeps muttering long after she passes out in his arms and until the mechanism clicks his jaw shut for the night.

It's okay, you're safe - no, she's not.

It's okay, I'm here - it's not a comfort, Chisaki means his presence as a threat.

It's okay, we're going to get out of here . It's a pipe dream. He can't promise that. Not when Chisaki needs her so bad he would burn down the whole damn country to get her back.

He's a scared kid with a weak emitter quirk and a habit of falling out of his own head.

But he's not saying he won't try.

He just knows he can't make any promises.

The Raid

Chapter Summary

After more than 3 years at The 8 Precepts, 27 knows his time is running out. But his luck hasn't quite yet.

Trigger Warning: Dissociation and Panic Attacks

He's sitting on the floor of the bathroom, bleach bottle in one hand and cap in the other, when he comes back. He knows he left because Eri is dressed in her white gown, not her pajamas, curled into a ball with her head resting on his thigh. She's shaking, and even as he mentally stumbles through the fog, he sees his hand drop the cap and trace the edge of her shoulder.

Shit , she's shaking. Something happened.

Her eyes meet his, terror-wide, but she's not crying. Her small hands move quickly in their secret language, 'Away. He came.'

He fights the fog, swallows the guilt. "What happened?"

She sits up, pressing herself into his open side. He curls his arm around her, she's still so small . "He took me outside. Said it was a special treat. It was scary," Eri says, pulling on his shirt. He hadn't even changed out of his night clothes. "There were heroes."

The fog is gone, and his hand tightens on her shoulder. "Did he see them? Did you talk to them?" Let them be alive, let them know about her, let them see.

"They were gonna take me, but he came. He let them go 'cause I left with him," Eri said, and he could hear her frown deepen, her chest hiccuping as a warning before the sob. "I'm sorry-"

"No, Eri, you did good. You did so good," 27 says, hope rising in his chest. They saw, they saw! They know now, they could do something.

"Was gonna leave you, Twenny," she cries, fingers twisting in her guilt. He pulls her closer, pulls her in and runs his hand down her back, up and down.

"You did what you were supposed to, Eri. I'm bigger, remember? If a hero finds you, you go with them and tell them everything. Everything that he does that's bad. How he's a Yakuza, and he hurts you. The heroes will come and find me, and then we'll both be safe." He lies, and the words taste like bleach on his tongue. But he lies so easily to her, and she believes him because he's the only thing she believes in.

He doesn't know what his owner thought when he came into the room while 27 was out of his head. He must have been out for hours, sitting with the bottle of bleach in his hand, staring at nothing. Showing how broken he was.

His owner knew he was breaking. He'd noticed the cough that hasn't left, despite the months that have gone by since he got sick. Noticed that he gets unsteady on his feet when the dizziness hits, that he tires out during training matches more easily, gasps for breath far before it's over.

It's a good thing Eri made contact with the heroes. 27 was on borrowed time.

"Did they look big, like Rikiya? Or did they have horns or big eyes?"

Eri shakes her head, sniffing. "The smiley guy was big, but not that big. He had a littler guy, kind of like you. The littler guy had bunny ears, but they looked like a hat, kinda."

One is a mystery. The other is a speed quirk, maybe. Pretty pedestrian, but heroes had agencies to back them up. To investigate. There was no telling what kind of heroes would descend on the 8 Precepts in time.

"The little guy didn't want to let me go. He was like you, but his mask was see-through." Eri reaches up, pressing her fingers against his mask. "Their mouths move a lot. They make shapes like in the books, but I don't always know what they mean."

It was hard to teach her about facial expressions with only books and pictures. She was equal parts confused and enthralled during those lessons, having forgotten everything that happened before 27 had been bought. Lived so long in the 8 Precepts compound that she forgot what people who didn't wear masks look like.

"What does your mouth look like, Twenny?"

"Scary," he answers. Hari had a habit of kicking him in the mask, knowing that the skin would burst and hurt far longer than any other target. His scars probably rippled like hers did, so huge he didn't have much unscarred skin left.

His Precepts mask had a screen where it opened, the slot so small that he could hardly stick a finger in the gap. It made eating a slower process, and brushing his teeth difficult, but looking in the mirror easier. The Miasma mask would have shown his lips, and probably the edges of a few scars.

Would have made it easier to show her what smiles looked like. "Eri, did lunch come while I was..." he raises his fingertips to his temple, then flutters it like a bird falling out of the sky. 'Away.'

"Mm-hmm. He watched me eat. Had to eat faster, and my tummy hurt."

No food for 27 again, and he hadn't even been able to decide that for himself. He skipped meals from time to time, knowing it was stupid. Knowing The Miasma's 27 would kick him in the throat if he knew. He didn't even understand why he did himself, as his present self. Sometimes Dog, sometimes 27.

He was Twenny with Eri though, always. And Twenny should get her started on her lessons, distract her from thoughts of The Chair and the heroes for a few hours.

"Let's practice our hand-letters, Eri. Then we can go over some math."

Her math workbook had 12 more pages left unfinished. Maybe Chisaki would let him go out in a couple days to get another.

Chisaki ignores him. It makes it hard to get permission, which was already a near-impossible puzzle. He has to telegraph boredom for days sometimes, let himself stare off and freeze during training matches, as if distracted. Slump his shoulders and furrow his eyebrows a little, like he's a pouting child. When the mood strikes, his owner would tell him when he could go out, and Dog would let his mood lift, gratitude and unworthiness pouring off of him in waves.

Hari puts up with it for ten days before he snaps, asking Chisaki to let the mutt run around before he drives him up a wall. Chisaki just shrugs, until they reach the end of the training match.

Dog is worn out, his lungs ache and burn like he's been held underwater for too long, but he's forced each Expendable out of the ring in turn. No quirks, just hand to hand, and he knows they're going even easier on him thanks to the dour mood he plays up. Even Hari scuffles for only a minute before letting Dog shove him past the boundary.

He feels the cough in his throat, keeps swallowing it down. If he coughs in his owner's presence, in a match with him, he'll pay dearly.

His owner pulls on his gloves again, making sure he's protected against Dog's filth, and swings a fist forward.

Dog adjusts so it will hit the side of his head, not the mask, which could injure his owner. He feints weakly with a knee he knows won't make contact.

Chisaki grabs his mask and throws him to the ground instead, groaning his frustration. Perhaps it was a bit too much.

His owner looms over him with a deep furrow in his brow. "9 o'clock. You'll have an hour, but it will cost both meals."

Dog closes his eyes, and though Chisaki can't see it, he forces a wide smile on his face, knowing it will come through his voice. "I am unworthy of your kindness, Boss. Thank you so-"

He's interrupted by a kick in the face, and Chisaki storms off out of the ring.

"Thank you so much," he says, and means it. The tantrum allows him to get away without trying to lick the mafioso's shoes.

He can't believe his luck holds the next day. Eri is usually inconsolable on the days he secures a trip outside, as she fears being without him more than the dark, perhaps more than Chisaki. But he signs another false promise, 'heroes' and she lifts her chin and promises to behave.

Then, his non-escort is Rikiya, who pretty much guarantees this is actually an unescorted trip.

He had won his reward to go out unaccompanied over a year ago, but as he suspected, that just meant he was escorted at a distance. He could still tell who would tail him, as they would be collecting their spending money from a servant when he was allowed to exit through the front door. Rikiya was the best case scenario, as he would visit his girlfriend as soon as he made sure Dog went to his usual haunt.

It was a second-hand bookstore, squeezed between a clothing shop and a combini. Both stores on either side were twice as big as the bookstore, which might explain why there were stacks of paperbacks and magazines stacked on the floor to the ceiling when the shelves overflowed.

The shop was claustrophobic, barely space to walk between some of the aisles, with the smell of mildew pervading from the old stained carpet when the owner didn't light her usual incense.

She had today, so much of it that the shop was smokey as though part of it was on fire, and even though it triggered an awful coughing fit, he just held the scarf looped around his mask and smiled. He liked scent she chose today.

He made his way to the far right corner, the Hero section, ignoring the mountain of comic books and memoirs to get to the giant phone book still balanced on top of a side table, its two missing legs replaced by All Might biographies. This book listed every hero and agency active in Japan, along with hero rankings and any publicly available information. Some heroes were listed only by numbers, not even wanting their hero names to be published. Others had excerpts of their biographies, other jobs they had and where people could find them when they were off duty.

It was a wonder no one had ever taken out Present Mic during his radio broadcast.

Most had their hero name, agency affiliation, quirk and headshot on their entries. 27 poured through the book quickly, stopping at every speed quirk he found. Most speed quirks did have headshots, but out of the three with rabbit ears he saw, two were real ears and the other didn't have a mask.

It was a long shot, as the book was due for its yearly update soon, but 27 still had 20 minutes before he had to leave to be back at the compound before his hour was up.

He picked out the next math workbook in the series, along with a few more cat-themed kids books. They still had plenty of lessons in the JSL handbook, and the English workbook. The science handbooks were pretty much untouched, as Eri got too frustrated being unable to understand them. How could 27 explain what a caterpillar was to someone who had never seen one? What grass was? Or rain?

A quick scan of the child development books made him frown. He had gotten lucky when he found one marked down to clearance, as the prices for these made the thought of stealing them unbearable.

It was the same in the literature section. He had a few giant tomes full of English plays and pages so old they broke instead of bending, but The Goat's Egg, a best seller with a colorful cover page, was ten times as expensive as anything he would allow for himself.

Next to the counter, the owner had a few baskets full of soap bars she had made herself, and again his luck held out. The white and tawny bar that Eri liked was marked down to half price, and again, he had to smile. She liked its warm, sweet smell, and would go to the bathroom just to smell it sometimes when she felt a fit coming on. He had taught her to do that on the instruction of one of his child development books. Maybe with this bar, he could let her have a tiny piece to carry around with her, to help her soothe herself even quicker.

He placed his items on the counter and waited for the owner to appear, as she was probably doing something in another section, hidden in the shadow of a corner he didn't have time to explore.

The man in the suit, who had been wandering the shop before 27 entered, walked over to the soap basket to smell a few items. A huge stack of All Might books were tucked under his arm. Other customers were unusual, especially ones so clean cut, but he must have been an extreme All Might enthusiast, on the hunt for older volumes.

The owner made her way from the Hero section, a few comic books with crumpled and ripped pages in her hand. She smiled at him, the wrinkles on her face deepening, signing 'Hello' and a long string of other words. When he didn't respond, she pointed at the baskets, speaking with her usual slurred and stilted tone. "Yu can takeh anotha soahp. I'm hahving ah sahle."

He nodded, picking through the basket farthest from the man in the suit. When he first started coming to this shop, the owner tried to make him leave with a big white bar that had creamy pink swirls. She said it would be really good for his hair, which he knew looked terrible. Huge white matts full of dead strands tangled up at the base of his neck, and sometimes his hair looked and felt wet for days on end. When she had reached up to touch it, he flinched away, barely able to keep himself from slipping out of his mind, and ran back to the compound.

She must really want him to get that soap, he thinks, fingers turning it over and over in his hands. The price was outrageous, but she wanted him to have it. He wasn't worth that much, but she wanted...

"Excuse me," All Might Enthusiast said, his big boney hand resting too close to his neck, right on top of 27's scarf. Panic rose sharp in 27, every muscle tensed as if he could just hold onto himself that way, keep him from falling away. "Do you know what this scent is? I can't quite place it."

He was holding Eri's favorite soap, and as soon as 27's eyes locked on it, he waved it closer to his own face. 27's gaze fell naturally to the man's eyes, and the world seemed to freeze when he saw the black sclera with a mechanical purple iris.

Sir Nighteye.

When Honzo's old group had made the front pages a few months ago, busted up by Sir Nighteye's agency, he had dreamed of this moment. He read Sir Nighteyes comments over and over again, 'I used my quirk on a criminal who was running errands for that group. With that single encounter, I knew the location of every warehouse and office they were operating from.'

Now it had happened. Sir Nighteye knew everything, where the compound was. Where Eri was.

What he did to Eri.

He swallows the guilt as soon as it comes. He knew he was a criminal. Best case scenario, Eri would be taken away and he could serve his penance in prison. Every trip to The Chair paid back in days and years.

Sir Nighteye pulls his hand away, hand on the soap lowering. His expression is unreadable, but after decades of dealing with criminals, he must know how to guard his anger and righteous fury.

"He knows you're coming," 27 whispers, as quietly as he can. "He can run. Please save her."

The hero reaches out for his arm, and the next thing 27 knows he's in the back of a car, and Rikiya is waving his hands up and down, talking with an unnaturally calm tone.

Shit, shit, shit, shit.

He wonders if he can stay in this panic, but he becomes aware that words are falling out of his mouth, and he doesn't know what they are. He tries to breath, tries to focus on how Rikiya is breathing, deep and full breaths.

An awful coughing fit barrels out of his chest after he finally figures out what he was saying, 'Don't touch me,' over and over so fast that the words jumble over themselves at times.

He can work with that, he thinks, his face turning red as he lets the coughing fit continue. He sits up when he's ready, thankful that Rikiya never shows his face.

"Okay. The hell happened out there, Dog? You were running around in circles on the sidewalk like a crazy person."

"Sorry. Can't go to the bookstore, sorry I'm sorry-"

"Breathe kid, for the love of god," Rikiya grumbles, a hand running over his long beaked mask. "Just tell me what happened."

"S-she wanted me to buy soap," Dog said, hiding his relief with panic as he rocked back and forth. "Not supposed to, tried to touch my-my-my-" he let himself reach up towards his hair, letting his hand shake. He noticed the bar of soap was still in his grip, and he didn't need to play up the panic as he let it fall out of his hand. "I'msorryI'msorryI'm-"

"Fuckin' Christ, calm down," Rikiya groaned, picking up the bar of soap. "Everyone fucking knows you steal soap, kid. It's kind of hard to notice when a kid smells like vanilla instead of ammonia piss. It's fucking fine."

Dog ducks his head, biting his lip. He should have dotted her dress with the cleaner to cover that up, that was stupid on his part.

"You finally got one for yourself? Fucking finally, man. Can't fucking stand getting that in my nose when you go in for a chokehold," Rikiya says, picking up the white and pink swirled bar from on top of the stack of books he didn't mean to steal.

Shit, he really stole them. Didn't cover his tracks this time. "Didn't quirk her. Can't go back."

"Fine. We're probably leaving soon anyway. Boss thinks it's getting too hot," Rikiya says, sniffing the soap in his hand. "Nice, that's, like, pure shea butter. Hey, if we get to go to America, I'm gonna take you to this real nice shop. It's got bath bombs and natural ingredients and shit. Makes you feel like an oiled up porn star, but it's fucking delightful."

He doesn't know why, probably drunk on luck and relief, probably because he trusts Rikiya far more than he should, but honesty falls out of him. "I'm probably not, though." Rikiya picks at one of the workbooks. "Boss knows I'm sick. Eri behaves better-"

"Kid," Rikiya sighs, his hand flaps towards his shoulder but it doesn't land. "Just... Don't think about that shit, alright."

Well, now he knows.

And he does what Rikiya tells him to, he doesn't think about it.

Not until Eri is fast asleep, curled up on his arm. The room is dark, his jaw is wired shut. He runs a hand through her hair and only lets the tears fall, breathing deep to keep himself from shaking with it.

He just wants to save her first. That has to be enough.

Hizashi can't help but keep glancing over at Shouta, his head resting on his arms, ostensibly watching Hizashi cook dinner. But he knows that quiet too well to trust it, and it's a bit much for the usual pre-mission nerves. "Worried about how the kids will do?"

Shouta doesn't look up, but he lifts his head to rest his chin on his hand. That's a 'no' if he ever saw one.

He makes it easier for his husband, setting the soup to simmer lower and walks over, close enough for Shouta to press his head into his side, like a cat begging for attention. He threads his fingers through his hair, wanting to wrap him up in his arms but he knows Shouta won't tell him what's going on if he doesn't let him say it.

"After Kamino ward, I moved a few cases off of my docket," Shouta says, and Hizashi encourages him with a hum. Shouta had worried over the decision for days, but between being there for his traumatized students and a few low-level investigations that could turn out to be duds, there really wasn't a choice. "Rough looking kid was stealing from a bookstore with his quirk. Voice activated emitter. The owner was completely deaf, so it didn't work. She reported it because she was worried he was being abused or neglected."

Shouta pulls away from him, and Hizashi lets his hands fall to his husband's shoulders. Shouta can't look him in the eye, staring at his stomach.

"Sir Nighteye looked into it, for the case. Cracked it wide open, in fact. The kid is the girl's caretaker, and the 8 Precepts use his quirk to control her."

"He's not a member?" Hizashi asks.

Shouta sucks a breath, his head leans forward but he stops himself from seeking comfort. Blames himself. "Sir Nighteye used Foresight on him. Not all of it was in the report." Had to punish himself. "It was too gruesome to let the students know. They will torture him, and Sir Nighteye said he didn't react as if that was new. Then Chisaki uses his quirk..."

"After the rescue..." he asks, because he has to know. He has to make Shouta show him where it hurts the most.

"...He doesn't make it."

Hizashi doesn't care that Shouta flinches away, he pulls him close and wraps his arms around him.

"If I just-"

"No," Hizashi stops him. "What if you did and Bakugo had a breakdown? You know it was touch and go for a while, and any little thing could have made the difference. What if you did, but the 8 Precepts caught him? Shou, you know there's only one man with a quirk that can see the future, and even he doesn't trust it."

Shouta doesn't answer, and Hizashi doesn't expect him to. He'll carry the weight until the mission is over, and Hizashi hopes upon hope that Sir Nighteye is right, in that he can be wrong.

"Worrying about what a fortune teller says when the fortune teller himself says it might not be true isn't very logical, Shou. Now, I'm going to finish up this soup, and you're going to eat it. Looking after the problem child is hard enough, but the kid is so fired up about it, he'll probably run into a wall and break all of his bones right out the gate!"

Shouta groans, collapsing fully into Hizashi's embrace as he imagines it. Hizashi laughs and ruffles his husband's hair.

He hopes all the kids come back safe. Every last one of them.

But he adds another to that list.

The heroes descend before Chisaki expects them to. It's both good and bad.

Eri clutches the collar of his shirt for dear life, and she doesn't understand. Doesn't understand why Chisaki is letting Dog carry her, why they are running away from the heroes. He didn't have time to explain it to her, but whenever it looks like she'll ask him, he signs to her 'danger', and she stops. Just like he taught her to.

The anxiety of waiting had been too much for Hari. Dog had been dragged out of bed last night for another unpredictable training session, but to start it off, he'd been given a bleach bath. He'd been able to avoid them for almost a year, but apparently, Hari needed it last night. Needed to douse and burn him, holding him under for almost too long.

The training afterwards was a joke. Rikiya went a few rounds, but by that point, Dog was shaking too hard to do much more than deflect, and the 8 refused to continue, saying the fumes were too much.

Chisaki wasn't happy with that.

Dog doesn't remember a lot of the night after that, but he woke up with the familiar ache in his bones that told him he was used as quirk training.

Unmade and Remade.

He doesn't let himself think about it, not when Chisaki is right in front of him, guiding him through a convoluted escape route. Can't let himself think about anything, but he does.

Where are the heroes? Will they find us? Will they make it in time?

"Excuse me."

He doesn't recognize that voice, but Eri moving to peer over his shoulder soothes the agony in his limbs for just a moment.

"I'd like to talk to you a bit more, after all," the blonde man says, red cape billowing behind him. 27 is transfixed by the sight, because he's seen only seen a few heroes, but this one isn't just a quirk user with a fancy name. Just looking at him makes 27 think Hero.

"You," Chisaki growls. This one is definitely one of the heroes Eri met. The ones that set the mob boss on edge. "You shouldn't have been able to get here so quickly."

27 slips up, glances to the side before he catches himself, but luckily Chisaki isn't looking. He knew Deidoro and Nemoto were going to be the vanguard after they were the ones to collect them from the room to bring them to Chisaki. After Chisaki told them to stay close, 27 made sure they didn't, wrapped under his control thanks to a couple of nervous questions concerning what was going on.

Chisaki does notice, though, when he gives the signal for the two to attack and nothing happens. Nothing but the hero changing his stance, charging forward, then slipping into the concrete floor.

Flashy quirk. It works entirely too well for 27.

"Boss!" 27 yells, playing up his fright. He curls an arm around Eri's shoulders, trying to make sure she doesn't get caught in it.

The hero reappears behind Chisaki, throwing an elbow that should have hit his face, but Chisaki bends backwards to dodge.

"Boss, I need to get Eri out of here!"

The hero keeps Chisaki on the run, throwing blow after blow before he slips back into the floor. He feels the anticipation ramp up, but he's not even in the fight, so he knows that this is the moment to risk it.

"Boss, what should I do?!"

It's a mistake.

The hero jumps back out, but he's far from his target. Chisaki's sights are locked on 27, eyes blazing. Hand outstretched.

27 throws Eri, hopefully towards the hero. He hopes, he hopes.

He closes his eyes.

There's a familiar nothingness.

"Eri, are you going to leave me here?"

It's his voice but not his words. It's the only thing left in this nothingness.

"Or do you want him to be killed? How many times do I have to say it?"

The Adoption Process

Chapter Summary

A month and a half after the raid, 27 is reunited with Eri. A lot has changed during that time, for both of them, but while Eri is adjusting well to her new life, 27 has just been waiting for the inevitable.

Trigger Warnings for: Blood, Self-harm by scratching, and Dissociation.

Chapter Notes

Thanks to randomnessquid for pointing it out, but I wasn't able to find a place to really explain why Sir Nighteye was wrong about Shinsou dying during the raid. Basically, Sir Nighteye saw Chisaki do that CRONCH thing when he absorbed Shinsou into his body, and assumptions were made at that point.

And for fans of TLR, Naomasa can do a lot in a month and a half's time, if he's given the resources that he has in this AU. Poor boy has had it rough here, but he's certainly not the only one.

Also, I absolutely STRUGGLED to not write the words 'DJsona' into this fic, and I hope you guys appreciate that.

"And he was like 'fwoosh!' And I was like 'waaah!' It was really amazing, Mr. Detective! And then I ate candy apples, and they're really tasty!"

Aizawa tries not to grin as Eri recounts the highlights of the Cultural Festival for what could honestly be the hundredth time. It happened over a week ago, but from her enthusiasm, it might as well have happened five minutes ago.

Naomasa just smiles, the weariness that had been on his face softened as Eri's audience. "Wow! I'm jealous, Eri! It sounds like you had a lot of fun!"

Eri nods, but Aizawa can predict the change in mood as she begins to pick at the hem of her dress. She shrinks in on herself, rocking back and forth on her feet. "Mr. Detective, where's Twenny?"

And there it was.

He was surprised she was able to ask. She didn't like asking questions from people she didn't know were safe, and the only people she considered safe were the heroes that rescued her. Even Present

Mic wasn't on that list yet.

But everyone wanted to know where Twenny was. Hizashi asked, Mirio asked. Eri asked at least 10 times a day, and usually had a crying fit no matter what he answered her with.

Aizawa wanted to know too, and from the look Naomasa gave him, he was going to find out today.

"He's safe now, Eri, and we're all hoping you can see him soon! In fact, I was hoping you could sit down with my friend Hanajima and talk to her about Twenny again! Is that okay?"

Eri nods, sharp and determined. It wavers when she sees the dark haired psychologist approach, but after a cheerful greeting, she follows, only glancing back at Aizawa twice before they go into the kid friendly interrogation room.

"Let's go to my office," Naomasa says, as though it's a normal occurrence. The detective preferred to talk in the bullpen or outside of an interrogation room unless it was about a case with a highly classified rating. That shouldn't be the case for who Aizawa suspects is a good kid who fell in with the worst crowd, but it would explain why any information about him went dark over a month ago, before the kid even regained consciousness.

Aizawa frowns when he's not just led into Naomasa's office, but through a second door with two locks and a fingerprint scanner. To the All For One office.

He's been here twice before, to give his report about USJ and the attack during the summer training exercise. He doesn't like the implications here, nor the way half of a wall has been cleared up with strings leading from the pictures of the Nomu production facility to a group of photographs depicting number tattoos. The discolored green skin surrounding 388 suggests it's a picture of a Nomu, but the others are clearly human.

Dead humans. 44, 50, 61, 102, all in black ink with a tell-tale blue tinge at the edges.

But 27 was different, a bright neon purple hue cast over the picture, turned darker in a rectangle surrounding the number. The person who had that tattoo was alive.

"To start from the top, Twenny's name is Shinsou Hitoshi," Naomasa says, pushing forward a missing child's report on his desk. The grinning child with a missing front tooth has darker purple hair, but it's definitely the same kid he last saw comatose on a hospital bed. "His mother reported him missing 11 years ago, after he didn't return home from school. There were no leads, and his file went cold 6 years ago. The father had passed a year before he was kidnapped, and the mother moved to France afterwards. When the local police made contact with her two weeks ago, she didn't react well. They lost her trail shortly after."

Aizawa frowns, looking at the kid's picture again. The rings under his eyes are deep, eyes that he thought were wide with excitement could have a tinge of fear in them, now that he looks for it. He doesn't like what he begins to suspect, but a mother that runs from her long lost child and succeeds in evading the police doesn't paint the best picture.

"The 8 Precepts didn't kidnap him. They kept meticulous records of their finances, even if most of the transactions are encrypted, but their purchase of '27' wasn't well hidden. The receipt states they paid 28 million yen for '27,' 12 years old according to the notes, 3 years and 8 months ago."

A receipt. For a child. Aizawa wishes that was a new one for him.

"It was the only human trafficking transaction we've found so far from the 8 Precepts. Since the timeline seemed to add up with Shinsou's age, and 'Twenny' could be a nickname for '27,' I invited a tattoo expert to look for a trafficking brand that might have been covered up, to find out who had him beforehand, and we found that number under the black band on his arm. The ink in the number has a unique composition, and matches the other cases you can see on the wall.”

“Including the Nomu?” Aizawa asks, even if he truly doesn’t want to know. He’s suspected that human trafficking rings were supplying the ‘parts’ for Nomus for a while now, but to know that a kid that had been so important to Eri had nearly been turned into one unsettles him.

“Including most of the Nomus we’ve encountered,” Naomasa answers, confirming that Shinsou Hitoshi’s missing child report certainly belonged in this room. “We haven’t been able to gather much about this Nomu Organization. We know that they must have two sides to their business, as the humans we recovered have the same ink that the Nomus do, but every Nomu has a number that begins with ‘3.’ Eri told us that Shinsou belonged to ‘a bad place’ before he was bought by the 8 Precepts, but she couldn’t give us much more than that. She might have been told not to talk about it.”

"What makes you say that?" Aizawa asks. Eri being uncomfortable talking about certain topics was, quite understandably, nothing new. Especially about Twenny, who by all accounts seemed to be the only positive influence in her life. Her only anchor, now missing, and she didn’t like to remember the void he left.

Naomasa shifts his feet, unsettled. "There have been two attempts on Shinsou's life since he was rescued."

Aizawa was rarely shocked, but to hear that Naomasa's team had failed to protect a witness under their protection twice? It was almost impossible to believe.

"An hour after I filed my findings about the tattoo, a security guard caught a nurse trying to inject air into his IV. She escaped, but records show she wasn't an employee. We still haven’t been able to identify her, despite her having unique quirk features. We had to take him to a juvenile facility at that point, where we could keep eyes on him at all times. That's where we found out how deep this runs."

Naomasa taps on a screen mounted on the wall, security footage of Shinsou and a female police officer in an isolation cell, frame frozen, before Naomasa hits play.

" Well, this is your room, Mr. 27! Just hit this little button if you need anything! " The dark haired officer says with a cheery tone, as she fiddles with the box over the panic button mounted on the wall. The kid jolts, staring at the officer as she exits.

"She locked it," Aizawa mutters to himself. He knows that shade of blue hair. He's never worked with her or exchanged more than a polite greeting, but he's seen her around the station since he became a hero. She had been at the station for years before that.

It runs deep .

Frames of the kid move quickly, showing him pacing the cell, running a hand over his arm over the gray prison jumpsuit, before he finally sits on the bench, staring at the door as the hours tick by on the top of the screen.

Then, the door opens to a crowd of prisoners barrelling through. Strength quirks, projectile quirks, all of them flooding in.

The kid reacts like he would, rushing forward to maintain the advantage of the bottleneck from the doorway. He uses the number of opponents to secure human shields, grapples and throws around attackers twice his size.

Completely unarmed and without an offensive quirk, the kid holds out longer than he thought he would. Then, while the kid tries to joint lock a fire breather's arm, he drops, clutching the side that had been vulnerable while his arm was outstretched. Blood pools on the floor quickly, quickly enough for Aizawa to recognize what it was.

That wasn't a lucky hit. Stabbing a major artery around the kidney was the move of a master assassin, and it happened during a prison riot no less. Aizawa looks for the two projectile users he spotted, but they were being dragged out by the rioters who were retreating far too calmly.

" Shh, shh, it's okay little bro."

Shinsou was the only person in the cell.

" Man, the Precepts did a number on ya. Look at what they did to your hair," the voice continues, as the matted nest of hair lifts up by an invisible hand

" No...no," Shinsou whimpers, fingers pressed desperately to his side.

The other voice sighs, his voice turning oddly despondent. " I didn't want to be the one to do it, you know. But Bug fucked up, and the police are catching on. And trust me, you don't want to go home, we're mixed up in some awful stuff now. Just..." The fabric of the uniform moves, like a hand is smoothing out the sleeve. " It's gonna be alright. It's all over, all the messed up shit you went through is done. You're just gonna close your eyes... and fall asleep."

The kid went limp, as if on cue. Anger rattled hot through Aizawa's chest.

" Shit, why did I tell you... so unprofessional," the voice sniffs, then changes his tone. " Well, it's clean up time!"

Naomasa pauses the video. "If the guard that found him didn't have a minor healing quirk, Shinsou would have died. Officer Nagoa wasn't so lucky."

Aizawa won't be crying over that anytime soon. "Where is he now?"

"Here, at the station. We put him in an interrogation room close to the barracks and only the people I trust are allowed near it. We have eyes on him at all times, while we try to sort out a wardship designation." Naomasa runs a hand over his hair, and Aizawa realizes how dark the circles under his eyes are, suspects that he hasn't left the station in days. "The Commission is willing to approve just about anyone with the right quirk, considering-"

"Considering his tattoo matches the ones on the majority of the Nomus we've come across," Aizawa growls. "Since this mystery organization was able to place two hits on a witness in police custody, they're extremely well connected. It's possible they are a branch of All for One's empire that thrived where others didn't. That makes getting information on them from Shinsou critical."

Naomasa's frown deepens, but he doesn't refute it. The Commission didn't deal in compassion cases. They wanted intel, and Shinsou's best interests just happened to coincide.

"Midnight does well with her wardship cases, and I know she's available. Why hasn't she been contacted?"

"General anaesthesia doesn't always work on Shinsou, so we can't know if her quirk is 100% effective, if it would be necessary," the detective answers, then sighs. "Ms. Joke has a vocal emitter quirk, so he would be able to avoid it. I've been through the shortlist and the long list, and the best fit is a long shot."

"All Might?" Aizawa asks. Even if he doesn't think Naomasa is completely blinded in the choice, as the staff dorm at UA seems to be the only safe place left for Shinsou, he still doubts it. He's not sure if Toshinori is even certified for wardship cases.

"Present Mic," Naomasa answers. "Of course, that would just be on paper. Principal Nezu agreed to change the records to show Present Mic's address as the dorm room he was assigned, but I don't expect him to actually move in to it. Since Present Mic is deaf, it's possible that Shinsou's quirk wouldn't be able to affect him. But we both know that the arrangement is just to give The Commission enough plausible deniability to ignore two wards living together."

His eyebrows raise. "That policy is in place for a good reason. Eri needs constant supervision due to her quirk, not to mention what living with a reminder of her time at the 8 Precepts could do to her mental state. There has to be someone else."

"No one I can trust," Naomasa admits, gesturing around the room. "Very few heroes know what you know, Eraserhead. You're one of the most insightful heroes I know, which will help tremendously with the investigation. Your quirk is the perfect counter for his, and on top of all of that, I know you care."

Of course he did. Any hero should, but more than he was willing to admit, more than he should considering his responsibility to Eri, he did want to be the one to take Shinsou in. Despite what Hizashi said, the case he pushed off of his docket stayed stuck in his mind.

"Hanajima is evaluating Eri right now to address the concerns we both have about the two of them living together. If she gives us the clear, both of you can meet with him today. Seeing them interact is the best indicator we can have, and if Present Mic is available, that's even better." Naomasa glances at his phone after it pings, nodding at the message. "She cleared it. If you refuse, I understand. You know Eri better than anyone. But if you agree to meet him, to see the situation with your own eyes-

"I'll see it, then," Aizawa agrees warily. "Let me call Mic."

"Before you do, though...."

Aizawa watches Eri through the observation window as she combs through a doll's hair, still oblivious to the fact that her former caretaker was only a few doors down the hall. He wonders what her reaction will be when she sees him, whether Hanajima had been convinced to look away from a warning sign due to the urgency of the case. If Eri will freeze up at the memories they've tried to shield her from, or if she will truly be relieved after all of her desperate pleading to see Twenny.

He doesn't know if this is a good idea, but to decide that, he needs more information. There are other concerns he has apart from Eri's wellbeing.

"Shou, I thought we were going to bring home a cat next, not a teenager," Hizashi laughs through the phone. "It's kind of a leap, but you know I'm on board! What kind of hero would I be if I refused? "

"It's going to be a lot tougher than Eri," Aizawa warns. "He's been in that world a lot longer, without a single anchor as far as we know."

" Except for Eri ," Hizashi says. " These things have a habit of going both ways. It could be good for both of them. "

Eri smooths the doll's dress, looking around the room for her next target to play with. Aizawa forces himself to ask, for this Shinsou's sake. He doesn't want to, but Hizashi knows about it far better than anyone else he could look to. "Zashi, during that time in middle school... What helped?"

Hizashi is quiet for a long time. He doesn't like talking about that. " ...He has a voice activated quirk... It's no wonder, but... you know how bad that is for him, right, Shou? "

He knows. Hizashi has told him enough to know. "I know. We're supposed to meet with him soon. To see how Eri will react. I'm still not convinced it's a good idea, but I don't want to put him through more stress than is necessary either."

Hizashi breathes in, and Aizawa can picture his determined nodding. " Just, don't try to make him talk. Give him some other way to answer if you really need to ask him a question. Maybe try to reign in Eri if she tries... The expectation of talking is just the worst, you know? "

"I'll talk to her," Aizawa says, releasing a breath he didn't realize he'd been holding. "There's more, a lot more. I haven't even read the whole file. We need to properly talk about it before we make any decisions."

" I know, Shou. If Nemuri didn't make me be the dorm mother today, I'd be there with you. So since I can't, get Eri to give you a big ol' hug from me! "

Aizawa smiles, refusing to let the offer tempt him. "I'll let you know how it goes."

" You better! Love you! "

"...Love you."

27 digs his fingernail into his wrist, eyes focused on the door. Wouldn't make that mistake again, wouldn't start to doze off, blink and miss it.

Lazy. Complacent. Tried to keep his edge but look how that turned out.

Tried to forget about The Miasma. The Miasma hadn't forgotten about him.

The police kept giving him food and water. Didn't trust it. Couldn't trust it, he knew what Memory liked....

27 shakes his head, digs the nail in again. He was getting lazy. Complacent. Dozing off in an unsafe place.

He had let them take his mask. Take his cough. Take the patches of bleach-burnt skin. Take the wound that should have killed him. They took what they wanted when he wasn't looking. Despite all of his efforts to stay alert, stay alive, he kept falling out of his head. Falling asleep sometimes, and he would wake up to even the familiar ache and heaviness in his limbs stolen away.

8 plates of food had been placed in front of him. When he doesn't touch the next one, they'll wheedle him for a while, what feels like hours. They'd promise that the food is safe, and that he should eat, eat before they had to do something they didn't want to. Lies. They were getting tired of the process, though, and it showed on their faces. Quicker to give in and begin. They'll use the sedative, restrain his bad hand and inject it. It won't knock him out, it's not supposed to, it just makes him weaker.

Strapped down. Pinprick of another IV. Plastic ring in his mouth, to keep him from refusing the tube down his throat. They mutter assurances, more lies, until he gets too foggy, forgets how to decipher the words from the sounds.

He'll feel full afterwards. It will last a day before he doesn't anymore.

He wonders when they'll force him to sleep, too. He knows he hasn't lost more than a few hours each time it happens. He must have forgotten how to really sleep. Falling out of his head is the only thing he remembers how to do.

'Away.' 'Away.'

They said Eri was going to visit him. That was a new one. A new lie, and they're getting better at their tactics. This one hurts more than anything else they've done. He thinks this will be the thing that kills him. They've tried pretty much everything else.

27 watches the door. He hears the latch click.

He stops breathing when he sees her.

He forgets how to.

She's safe .

He almost doesn't recognize her, because he never really let himself imagine what she would look like when she was rescued. She stands at the doorway, eyes wide and searching. As soon as she sees him, she runs to him, red dress and white tresses bouncing with the movement. "TWENNY!"

She's warm, she's so warm. Warm and alive and clean and safe, pressed against his side so tight he thinks she might fuse into it. He almost wants her to, selfishly. He watches his arm curl around her, feels the warmth there and tightens his hold.

It isn't until she looks up, a furrow working into her brow, that he realizes he's crying. Warmth spilling over his cheeks, his chest tight and aching with a breath he hasn't taken since he saw her.

"Sorry-sorry Eri," he says, his throat is raw with the effort, voice rough and broken, but the pain is nothing compared to the worry he's caused her. "Happy to see you. You-you look so pretty."

She is pretty. The smile in her eyes when she saw him is the most beautiful thing he's ever seen.

She pulls herself into his lap, and presses a hand to his naked cheek. He flinches despite himself, despite it being Eri, and wants to pull his collar up to hide his scars, but he can't risk startling her. He just lets the shame boil in him. "Scary, right? W-without the mask?"

She shakes her head, kicking her feet in offense. She breathes in and bares her teeth with her eyes shut tight, grimacing in an effort to do something, something she really wants to do, before her face drops, and she tucks her head under his chin and snuffles.

"Eri, what's wrong?" He asks, running a hand down her back. He doesn't want to make her cry. He doesn't know what he did, but he'd give anything to undo it.

"...smile. I c-can't smile." Her hands fist in his shirt, and she's going to start sobbing soon, frustration boiling over. "Wanna smile at you b-but I ca-an't!"

"I always know when you smile, Eri," he soothes, managing to pull her back enough to wipe away her tears. She blinks at him owlishly and leans into his hand. His throat stings, but he bears it. "When you smile, your eyes get really big, and your eyebrows get up to right here," he says, tapping at her brow. "You have a little happy dance, too. You know, when I first met you, you couldn't talk yet, but I knew what you wanted to say by how you hummed. And you still do your happy hum, sometimes, when you're really happy."

She hums, still sniffing, and it's nowhere close to the happy hum, but he smiles at her all the same. "You smiled too, back when we were in that room," she says, her voice small and worn out. "You got a crinkle here." She nearly pokes his eye as she points to his tell, but her words soothe him.

She always knew. Even behind the mask.

Her head darts to the side, hands fisting in his shirt possessively. "Zawa, can Twenny come home with us? Please?"

27 startles when he realizes there's someone else in the room, a tall lanky man with dark hair, scruff on his chin, and a crescent scar under his left eye. He would be very intimidating if he didn't also seem startled by Eri's question, or if he wasn't holding a sparkly pink backpack with a cat face pocket.

"We'll talk about that, Eri," the man says, more softly than 27 thought his voice would sound, as he sits in the chair opposite to 27's. 27's arms tighten around Eri reflexively, but the man doesn't seem to notice. "My name is Aizawa Shouta. I'm a hero who was a part of the raid on the 8 Precepts compound. I am also Eri's guardian."

You're taking care of her? The words stick to the roof of his mouth as he opens his mouth and closes it.

It was still happening.

He had begun to think parts of himself had been mixed up or lost from when he was fused into Chisaki, but he was surprised the words fell out so easily with Eri. Under this hero's stare, they withered away again.

The hero takes a pen and a pad of paper from the table, setting them in front of 27. "If you would rather write than talk, you can use this. I can also read upside down," he says, pulling away.

27's hand shakes just thinking about taking up the pen. The one that had been Unmade the first time, and wasn't Remade right. He wasn't sure what the hero's game was yet, didn't know what angle to play, but showing his damaged pieces, the parts where he was a little less useful... That was dangerous.

He's distracted as he feels Eri's tiny fingertips press against his throat, worry widening her eyes. "Twenny, are you sick?"

He shakes his head, and the words shake out again. "No, my voice..." he winces at how painful his throat is now, his voice breaking into a hoarse whisper. "Just thirsty."

Eri takes the ever-present glass from the table, offering it to him as he shakes his head.

"That's okay, Eri, but thank you," he says, signing to her with tiny movements. ' Bad. Danger. '

Her eyes get wide with panic, but she doesn't question it. Just like she was taught. She just curls her arms around his neck and tucks herself close to his chest.

Guilt settles right beside her.

She was happier before she saw him. On the other side of that door, she has a place where she's safe and cherished. Where she knows what smiles mean because people smile at her.

In here, he just makes her cry. Makes her frustrated and confused. She worries about things she shouldn't, worries about him.

He shouldn't have made her come here.

"Eri, would you like to share some snacks with Shinsou?" The hero asks. Eri's head pops up, watching the man open up and dig through the backpack, placing a multitude of plastic packets and a red apple on the table.

"With Twenny?" Eri asks, and the hero nods, pulling a part of one of the packets out then inserting the tiny white thing in another spot. He hands it to Eri, who angles the little tube to his lips.

If it's a ploy, it's a good one. With her eyes so bright and determined, he couldn't refuse her. He sips at it, sweetness shocking his tongue. The pain in his throat flares then soothes, and he risks another sip.

It should be embarrassing, to be fed by a child, but Eri looks so proud of herself with every gummy and sip he takes, humming happily. If it allows him to hide his shaking hand, all the better.

He refuses the apple by saying he's full, eyeing the white sleeves of her dress that would surely get stained by juice. This reminds her to tell him about the candy apples she got to eat, and how she wants to give him one too. How she went to a festival with a lot of people and heroes there, and how she was scared but big brother Mirio was there, and Izuku too, and even though she was scared she knew she was safe because her heroes were with her.

He doesn't let it hurt.

He tells himself it's enough.

"Big Brother Mirio wants to meet you too! He said you were really brave when they rescued me, and he couldn't have gotten to me without your help! And he hopes you're okay now," Eri starts shrinking, kicking nervously. "'Cause after you threw me, he... he ate you... and you were talking inside him..."

"I'm sorry, Eri," 27 says, holding her closer, pressing her against his chest as the guilt rushes through him. "I'm sorry I scared you. It wasn't my words..."

Not my words but it's my voice.

It's my voice it's quirk it's my voice it's my quirk stop using my

"Twenny?"

'Away.' His hand shakes but his nerves don't ring as sharply to him. He fights the fog, concentrates on her warmth in his arms. He doesn't risk looking at her face, not yet. "Sorry, Eri. I'm really glad you saved me." He plays with the ends of her hair, even if his hand doesn't feel quite real yet. "I could feel you reaching for me, and it woke me up, like I was coming out of a bad dream.... You're my hero, you know. You saved me."

She smiles.

He has to fight not to cry, because she smiles at him. It's small, and wavering, and she's a little bit embarrassed when she notices, but it warms him all the way through.

He hadn't even realized how cold he felt before.

She saved him.

And that was enough.

Shouta is the most reserved man Yamada has ever known. He's not cold or callous, despite what some expelled students might swear, but just incredibly hard to read.

It's made living with an adorable child like Eri a real treat. Especially during moments like this, where Shouta walks through the door to find Mirio clipping a towel around her shoulders as she holds up a length of toilet paper wrapped around her neck to protect it from being torn.

Because if Mirio insists on dressing her up as a hero, then she needs her own capture scarf, of course.

Shouta honest to god blushes and has to turn his head away from the sight to regain his composure, and Yamada doesn't blame him. He knows one day he'll find Eri with a comb and tub of hair gel, trying to get her hair into a perfect 'swoosh', and he'll probably die right there on the spot.

"Sensei, doesn't Eri look like the cutest hero you've ever seen?!" Mirio gushes, lifting her up effortlessly. "It's Super Eri! Savior of Twenny's and kitties all around the world!"

Eri grimaces in determination, a pretty adorable imitation of All Might, raising her tiny fist high. Yamada doesn't know how Shouta is still standing in the onslaught of this cuteness.

He manages to ruffle her hair affectionately, ducking his head ever so slightly to hide his soft expression. "She's my favorite hero, obviously."

Eri doesn't quite smile, but Shinsou was right, it's always been hiding in her eyes. Yamada tries to save his husband before he passes out at the sight, dramatically pouting. "I'm not your favorite hero?!"

Mirio turns her around, and he's nearly blinded by the full-force of her blushing embarrassment. "Sensei, this is Super Eri we're talking about!"

"Ahhh, you're right! Super Eri is my favorite hero too!" Yamada gushes, watching Shouta make his retreat to the kitchen, to Yamada's side. Mirio catches the look on Shouta's face, and tells Eri that they should practice her flying abilities as part of her hero training. With an excited nod of agreement, he heaves her up over his head, running through the hallway with exaggerated ‘whoosh’s and ‘fwoosh’s for effect.

“Nezu gave me a few blueprints to look over, for us to decide how we want the remodel to look. He said he can have it finished before the school day ends, so Eri won’t have to be moved,” Shouta says, placing a folder on the counter.

“It feels a little weird to pick how it will look when this place isn’t really ours,” Yamada says, flipping through a few layouts. “Kinda scary, especially from our boss. Maybe it’s one of his psychological tests.... Did he say anything else about it?”

“He thinks it’s a good idea for Eri,” Shouta answers, but the corner of his mouth pulls down, unconvinced. “Specifically, he said that traumatic bonds are like a knife wound. You can’t just yank it out without anything to treat what’s left behind.”

Yamada doesn’t quite like with the wording, but the sentiment seems accurate.

“He also said the timing is right for Eri, as she will probably have more difficulties now that the shock is wearing off. She’s...” Shouta stops, folding his arms. “Really different with Shinsou. More open than I’ve ever seen her before.”

“Well, there’s a lot of trust between them,” Yamada says, taking a sip of tea. “They were kept in the same room for days on end, surrounded by violent gangsters on the outside. He was pretty much her parent, picking up books on child development, teaching her how to read and write and speak. She’s advanced for her age in those areas thanks to him. She kept him sane, and he protected her as much as he could.”

“He used his quirk on her,” Shouta says, neither positively nor negatively. Just logically. “I don’t think he ever wanted to, but that’s something that he did, time and time again. Traumatized children crave control, and with his quirk- ”

“That’s why it has to be you, Shou,” Yamada answers with a shrug. “You’re the only one who can redirect him if it gets to that, but I don’t think that will happen anytime soon. When vocal quirks become mute...”

He pauses, and takes another sip before he continues. He knows Shouta catches it, but he doesn’t exactly hide things from him. He just knows there are some things he doesn’t have to say.

“We’re rejecting our quirk. Out of anyone, he probably has the most reason to.”

Mirio ‘fwoosh’s into the living room, spinning around as Eri gives a quiet little “waaah.” After he realizes the atmosphere is still tense, they ‘woosh’ back away as quick as they arrived.

“I think we should do this, Shouta. I want to do it.” Yamada says.

If he thinks of a blonde haired middle schooler who kept crumpling up his UA application, torn between the hero he wanted to become and the villain he thought he was to have deafened his own parents, he doesn’t say it. He knows he doesn’t have to.

Shouta leans against him and sighs, relieved though he would never admit it. “You should probably rescue Eri before Mirio tires her out, if you still want to take her with you.”

“Of course I do! I want to see my cute little bean hang out with her favorite friend, Twenny!” Yamada says, a bit louder than he needed to, but two sets of running feet answer him from down the hall. “Maybe we could go on a shopping spree afterwards, if we’re feeling up to it.”

Shouta smiles, small and fleeting, and it almost makes him want to take him too, forgetting why he's insistent on doing the shopping instead of his husband.

Because he learned his lesson, and Shinsou does not deserve to have to walk out of the police station covered head to toe in pastels and cats.

Shouta told him what to expect, but words really couldn't do it justice.

The kid huddled in on himself in the interrogation room looks rough, but that word doesn't really begin to describe it. His skin is too pale, stretched too taut for someone so young. The scars on his cheeks and jaw are hardly the only ones he has, but the police academy sweatshirt hides the worst of them. One of those long grooved scars peeks out over his collarbone and ends right before his neck, reminding Yamada that the report couldn't quite determine what caused them. His damaged hair starts as a light purple near his scalp, but fades off in shades, with matted bunches at the back of his head not just white with dead hair, but clumps that have fused together and stick to the mess.

His eyes are the most haunting part. There's nothing in them.

As a hero, he's seen dead people walking. It's something he got used to after his first year, because if you really look, you can always find something. Sometimes it's shock, a veil that falls away in shades over time, and he's seen plenty of that. Other times, it's pain, it's fear, it's anger. There's always a speck of something, even if it's hidden and fleeting.

There's nothing there, until Yamada opens the door and Shinsou sees Eri.

Shinsou breathes in, and his eyes light up. Hope, relief, happiness, all in equal measure. Even the mask of his blank expression cracks open, a smile tugging at his lips as he opens his arms to give Eri a hug, and lets her climb all over him to nestle herself against his chest.

That falls away when he sees Yamada. He doesn't have the time to go completely blank, not after Eri cracked him open, but the kid is good at hiding his fear. It's still set in the wideness of his eyes, now hard with suspicion, and the firm line of his lips.

Yamada gives him a cheerful wave. He can prove he can be trusted. "Hello listener! I'm Yamada Hizashi, it's nice to finally meet you! Eri's been an excellent hype man for you, though!"

"That means I tell people how great you are," Eri says, curled up under Shinsou's chin. "I told Mirio and Izuku and everyone so when you get to come home, they know that you're really nice, and they treat you really nice too."

Yamada doesn't think Eri's ever spoken this much in his presence, except to tell him stories about her day or about the festival.

Shouta was right, she really was different. Open.

Shinsou is not. He's extremely wary, the line of his shoulders tensed. He's studying Yamada while avoiding his gaze, trying to assess his threat level. He hopes the casual gray turtleneck, his 'hipster' glasses and braided hair comes across exactly as he wanted - completely non-threatening.

"I-it might be a while before I do that, Eri," the kid croaks, his voice completely hoarse. It reminds Yamada to dig into Eri's backpack, packed with twice as many snacks as usual with a couple of Shouta's protein jellies thrown in. "S-so you need to make sure to behave for the heroes."

Shinsou really didn't believe it was happening, then, despite Naomasa telling him before they entered. Instead of evaluating Yamada's threat level, he was probably looking for a reaction to confirm whether Eri was telling the truth, but Yamada missed it. He plasters on a smile, preparing a juice box since Eri still had trouble with the straws. "Oh, it won't be long at all! In fact, we were thinking of buying a few things today so we can have everything ready when we pick you up tomorrow evening!"

Eri takes the juice box and holds it up for Shinsou, but he doesn't react. He just blinks, the corner of his mouth downturned as he thinks. He accidentally meets Yamada's eyes but glances away quickly, and takes a sip from the juice to distract from his nervous reaction. Maybe Yamada's gaze was making him feel a little scrutinized.

"It would be super helpful if you can write up a few things you'd like, since I'm pretty forgetful. Why, just yesterday I went to the store for one thing - just one thing! - and I came back with apples and hairspray and eggs, but not that the thing I wanted! I had to make another trip and take Eri with me to remind me to get lightbulbs!" Yamada rambles on, keeping his eyes on the jelly packet he's opening, but he notices the way Shinsou is glaring at the pad of paper in front of him.

There's something there that he can't quite put his finger on. Naomasa's file definitely said Shinsou was capable of writing. He had given his full and enthusiastic statement about Chisaki that way. Naomasa noted that his handwriting was pretty bad, but the police wouldn't have brought that up to the kid or shamed him for it. His hesitance didn't make sense.

Eri noticed Shinsou's pause, and pulled the pen and paper into her lap, juice placed a bit too close to the edge of the table for Yamada's newly developed paternal instincts. "Twenny needs books! You really like books, right, Twenny?"

A fond smile picks at the edges of his mouth, so quick he nearly misses it, before it fades back into the worried expression he had before. "I don't need books, Eri. Books can be expensive sometimes."

"That's true, books can be expensive," Yamada says, but before Eri's face can fall, he adds, "But I'm a teacher! An educator! I'd be remiss in my duties if I didn't foster education for young people that desire it! We can - no, we must buy you some books! For my sake, at least."

His rambling way of talking like a DJ seems to make Shinsou more relaxed, surprisingly. He's still wary, nervously glancing up at Yamada, but he takes the pen from Eri and starts writing on the paper still held in her lap.

"Twenny wants clothes too!" Eri says, reading off the paper as though she knew Yamada couldn't see what Shinsou was writing from that angle. Shinsou jolts when she says it, and Yamada nods aggressively to try and reassure him.

"Of course! Make sure to write down any favorite color or style. Eri will probably want to dress you up in everything that has a cat on it, and while that is super cute, it shouldn't crowd out your own style, you know?"

The corner of Shinsou's mouth pulls up again, and this time it stays for a while, a shy half-smile on his face. Yamada reminds himself to get a lot of cat themed clothes.

"Long sleeves?" Eri reads, frowning a bit in confusion.

"It's very cold right now, little bean! You wouldn't want to be walking around with snowflakes sticking to your arms! Brrr!" Yamada explains, hoping to distract Eri from making Shinsou uncomfortable.

He didn't want to remind her that she didn't like wearing short sleeves herself. He made that mistake once, just once, with a cute little mint green romper. She twirled around, happy with her new clothes as she always was, but when she caught sight of the scars on her legs and arms in the mirror, she started crying. It was the fastest her mood had ever changed, and she was inconsolable even as Aizawa muttered assurances to her, walking her up and down the hall as she sobbed in his arms. She only calmed down when she had completely exhausted herself, falling asleep against his shoulder with her fists still knotted in his hair.

"What kind of books does Shinsou like to read?" Yamada asks, as Shinsou continues to write.

Eri perks up, poking her cheek thoughtfully. "He reads a lot of books about cats to me, but I know he can read really big books when I'm studying or coloring or asleep. There was one that had a bunch of words that mean the same thing, like how 'red' and 'crimson' mean the same thing."

"Crimson," Shinsou corrects, smiling softly all the same. "But that's a hard word to say. You did a good job."

"And you had a book that you didn't finish, 'cause it had a lot of different stories in it. Some of them were in English, so you had to read another big book to know what it said," Eri says, kicking her feet excitedly as she looks at Shinsou proudly.

"Really? I teach English at my school! ' It is very difficult to learn! ' " Yamada says, lapsing into the language. He tries to use the smallest, most commonly known words to see if Shinsou recognizes them, and the way his eyes catch his for a moment tells him he did.

Then, Shinsou's mouth opens and shuts, and his gaze turns downwards with a glare. Yamada nearly swears at himself. Shinsou seemed like a smart kid, and of course he would want to answer to prove that he could. Despite everything he told Aizawa, he ended up as the one to pressure Shinsou into talking.

"You know, if you want to keep translating that story you were working on, you can write down the title of it! I'm sure I'll be able to find a copy!"

He gets a nod as a response, and though Shinsou doesn't look up from his writing, that's quite a bit more than he was expecting. Aizawa said he wasn't acknowledged at all except for Shinsou's wary gaze, but he ended up winning a nod!

"Oh, I'm also fluent in sign language, if you've ever wanted to learn that! It's pretty useful, and a lot of fun!" Yamada says, signing the entire time.

Eri's eyes brighten, but before she can answer for him, he sees Shinsou sign-whisper ' danger ' in small and practiced movements.

Shouta was right. They did know JSL, Shinsou probably more fluently than Eri, but that was meant to be kept a secret. A way of communicating when someone else was in the room. A way to keep Eri from doing something that could get her hurt.

Eri stops immediately, and doesn't even pout. She just looks at the pad of paper with a tiny frown, far more obedient than a 5 year old should be.

Shinsou glances at him, and tries to make it seem casual by looking at the door right after. Yamada keeps his wide smile, trying not to let him know that he saw.

Shinsou could keep his secrets until Yamada proved himself trustworthy.

“You know, the thing I like about sign language is getting to make up your own names for people,” Yamada says, rambling.

He’s not sure if it’s a good topic, wincing when he remembers that according to Naomasa, Shinsou had been called things like ‘Dog’ and ‘27’ for so long that he hardly responded to his own name. But, he can’t quite backtrack now that the words have flung themselves out of his mouth.

“It would get pretty tiring to spell out every letter of someone’s name, especially something like ‘Toshinori’ or ‘Tamajiki,’ so once you get to know someone, you can take a sign that kind of fits them and twist it around, usually with a few letters from their name thrown in.” Yamada idly signs ‘lavender’ with ‘Sou’ thrown in the middle, but it doesn’t quite feel right.

Shinsou notices though, eyes locked on his hands, widening a bit when he recognizes the words. He was a bit more advanced than Yamada thought.

"I haven't figured out a name for Eri though. I was thinking something like 'E' and then 'beansprout,' but what if it doesn't fit when she gets older? It's the same with 'kitten,' but something like 'white' or 'cute' isn't unique enough. It isn't Eri enough, you know?" The name signs still feel too awkward in his hands as he spells them, frowning to himself.

"What about this?" Eri asks, her fingers in a V-shape above her head, imitating the protagonist of an anime that Izuku had marathoned with her a few days ago.

Yamada feels tears well up in his eyes, not because it's a fragment of so many different signs that the name would be technically meaningless, but because Eri asked him a question .

She had never done that. She always danced around him nervously, asking Aizawa what Yamada was doing or why Yamada’s hair looked like that or if Yamada could teach her how to braid. He was waiting for the day, and here it was, right in front of him, in this very moment.

"That's perfect, Eri! It's so cute and fitting and just like you!" Yamada says, desperately trying not to squeal. He swears his quirk wants to act up at the worst times, but he manages to keep it under control.

It still might be a bit much, as Eri shrinks closer to Shinsou with a blush rising up to her ears, but Shinsou pets her head, hiding his own smile behind her hair.

Maybe Yamada had proven just a little bit how much he cared for Eri. That was the real key to earning Shinsou's trust. If Eri trusted them, then slowly but surely, Shinsou would as well.

Welcome to UA

Chapter Summary

27 leaves the interrogation room, placed in the care of the heroes that have been taking care of Eri while they were separated.

Trigger Warning for: Dissociation. There's also the vaguest implication of Childhood Sexual Abuse, but I want to be clear that has not/never will be something that occurs in this fic. An explanation is in the Chapter Notes below this.

Chapter Notes

Minor spoilers about this chapter, just in case you need more information about that:

Shinsou mentions others joking about him and Eri sleeping in the same bed, which is something that will come up a few times during the fic. It really wouldn't make sense for some characters to be accepting of a teenage boy and 5 year old girl who aren't related to each other sharing the same bed, and though I argued with myself over including that, I'll always put up a thorough warning beforehand.

There's a game with a teapot that is specifically left vague, and the phrase 'Eri already traded for his sake.' Those two points will be explained later down the line, but as much as I want you guys to wonder, I don't want those musings to lead to something that could be harmful to think about.

Shinsou still doesn't seem to believe it when they arrive the next day, panic swelling in his eyes as Eri pulls out a couple of outfits from the shopping bag they had brought for him to choose from. He doesn't touch a single thing, even as Eri tries to make him feel how soft the lavender turtleneck is, or how nice the sweatshirt with a cat playing in a bowl of ramen smelled.

Smell, it turned out, was a big priority for Eri, as she shyly admitted that she liked how her new clothes didn't smell bad or hurt her nose. Even if Hizashi turned a few heads, pressing his nose against every shirt or scarf before throwing it in the shopping cart, he couldn't be bothered to care. It was important.

Shinsou's eyes kept wandering to an oversized hoodie with a purple and black galaxy design behind a giant cat playing bongos with smaller cats' heads. It had been a slightly risky choice, as Hizashi wasn't sure Shinsou would be comfortable wearing something so 'out there,' but it seemed like the kid had a surprising fashion sense.

Shinsou ends up walking out of the bathroom wearing Eri's favorite, the soft turtleneck, and a pair of cool gray jeans. Shouta shoots him a quick Take note of that look, but Hizashi isn't sure if his concern is about deferring to Eri's choice rather than making his own, or the way Shinsou keeps picking at the collar like he wants to pull it over his face.

As soon as the bullpen comes into sight, busy as ever with police officers and heroes coming off of patrol, Shinsou's anxiety becomes palpable. His shoulders rise up to his ears, and his eyes move around at first in panic, then much more focused. His mouth becomes a firm line, scanning the room for danger in a practiced manner, and he moves from beside Eri to slightly behind her, hunching over a bit. Protecting her from the left and the rear.

Yamada digs out a dark brown leather jacket that he knew was a size too big, and offers it to Shinsou. There were bigger and softer 'comfort jackets' at home that he forgot to bring, but this was the best choice for now.

Shinsou puts it on at his insistence, but keeps himself hunched over Eri, his hands shaking more with every second they're stopped.

Luckily, Naomasa keeps his farewell brief, waving cheerfully to Eri when he wishes them a safe trip home.

Shinsou seems to shrink when he jumps into the backseat and closes his car door, but the tension leaving him all at once while he busies himself helping Eri buckle up. The drive home is filled with Eri excitedly telling him all about the remodeled dorm room, how all the rooms got bigger while they were away at school and now they had a room just for Twenny.

Shinsou doesn't speak, not that Eri gives him much opportunity to. Sometimes he'll glance out the window, but he quickly flinches back, as though he's afraid of seeing how big the world is, now that he's free from the cramped spaces he must have been living in for years on end.

Yamada hopes that's not a persistent fear. He knows that UA will feel enormous at first, but over time it should start to feel less intimidating.

They're lucky that the campus seems to be deserted when they arrive, all the students and teachers preparing for the midterm exams that will be closing in on them in a few short weeks. Even Toshinori, who is usually enjoying the cool autumn air on a bench outside, is absent, though Yamada thinks that might be due to the talk Shouta had with him in the staff room earlier that day.

Shinsou looks ready to pass out when they finally make it to the dorm room. His eyes still scan the room, but his eyelids seem to be getting heavier. Eri does her best to distract him by giving him the grand tour as Yamada and Shouta let her take control.

"This is the couch where we sit down and read books. It's really comfy because it's old!" Eri says, patting the worn-down cushions. The small couch makes the newly expanded living room feel barren, and Yamada reminds himself to be on the lookout for furniture sales in the near future. The couch should have been thrown out years ago, and the impending redecoration seems like a great excuse to do so, but Shouta insists that it's the perfect size for him to collapse on after an eventful patrol. "And that's a TV! It can show you pictures that move really fast, like it's happening in real life! Did you know that they can do that, Twenny?"

"Yeah," Shinsou says, finally speaking as he manages a tired smile. "I used to have a TV when I was little."

Shinsou seems too tired to realize it, but that was the first time he had ever talked about his life before the 8 Precepts, according to Naomasa. It certainly wouldn't crack the case against the human traffickers who had taken him away, but it was surprising nonetheless. Promising.

Yamada brushes his hand across Shouta's shoulders, tapping him in as the supervisor while he headed to the kitchen to start making dinner. Hopefully Shinsou would be conscious enough to eat something hardier than gummy snacks and protein jellies, which was the only thing he'd eaten in four days.

He was making the first real meal Shinsou would eat after a month of being force fed.

Yamada knows he can't hold it against Naomasa. They couldn't exactly let him starve to death in police custody, but the anger shakes him deeply nonetheless. The kid should have been safe after the raid. He shouldn't have had to go through that.

The Grand Dorm Tour only stops by the kitchen for a second before Eri grabs Shinsou's hand and leads him down the hallway, her voice announcing the bathroom - Zawa and Yama's bathroom, Eri is much too proud saying. Zawa and Yama's office is announced and the door is quickly shut, since it's so boring and stuffy. Their bedroom and the laundry room is similarly introduced and promptly dismissed, because they're coming closer to the best parts.

They turn the corner of the hallway, crossing the boundary where the dorm had once split in two, and Eri is very proud to show off her room. Yamada really wishes he was there, to see Shinsou's reaction. He wanted to know if he approved, if he thought the nest of blankets on her bed kept her warm enough, if the gigantic mountain of stuffed animals that Mirio kept shamelessly adding to were cute enough. Shouta would surely tell him, but he wanted to see it so badly.

"And this is our bathroom! There are so many soaps for us! This one even smells like the one you got for me, and it's my favorite!"

It had taken literally two hours for Eri to find a soap she liked the first time they went shopping together, but once she picked up the warm sugar scented body wash, she refused to put it down. He'd even seen her run to the bathroom just to smell it from time to time, something that was a mystery until Shouta got Shinsou's file.

Shouta had stayed up all night reading it, and even snuck out to check the items still held in evidence at the station, thumbing through the ear-marked sections of a book titled Big Quirks and Little People: How to Manage Quirk-Troubled Children. The section suggesting aromatherapy had 'soap' scribbled in the margin, written in crayon with an unsteady hand.

"And this is your room, Twenny! Zawa said you needed your own space, but it's okay if you want to share mine. I promise it's a lot better than the room we had before!"

Yamada's eyebrows raise as he listens to Eri's manipulative little words. To say she had been unhappy after Shouta told her that Shinsou would be sleeping in his own bed was an understatement. She pouted for hours and refused to help put the bedding together or sort away any of the little odds and ends she had so carefully selected, finally exploding into a fit when she collapsed face-down on the floor and kicked her feet in a violent flurry.

But as soon as it started, it ended, and she curled up into a little ball, shaking as she looked around, waiting for someone to be mad at her. For something awful to happen. Shouta muttered soft words of 'it's okay, Eri' and 'we're not mad' over and over before she risked getting up, still shaking as she apologized. After a big family hug and a nap, she was back to being his favorite little helper, but Yamada was still a little shaken by how scared she was after her first tantrum with them.

Yamada puts the knife back down on the cutting board, arguing with himself. He knows he shouldn't go in there and crowd Shinsou if he's having a spell. He knows that Shouta can handle it.

“Twenny, is the cat scarin-”

“Sorry,” Shinsou blurts, and there's a long pause where he knows the kid is trying to hide the panic that had gotten to him. “T-the cat is really cute, Eri. I like it.”

The kid sounds absolutely shaken, but he knows Shouta won't bring it up. They need to wait until Shinsou is adjusted. They need to let him get comfortable, build up any sort of trust they can, and in the meantime, use anything that slips out to start putting together the puzzle.

Shinsou liked cats, or at least wearing things with cats on them, but the fluffy gray stuffie that Eri picked out for him touched on something painful. Did he like pictures of cats but was scared of cats themselves? Was it just gray cats? Did he once have a cat that looked similar to the stuffie?

“Yama got you a lot of books, Twenny,” Eri says, her previous enthusiasm gone, but he can tell from the way her voice is a little muffled that she's curled up against someone's shoulder. He's willing to bet it's Shinsou's. “They have white pages like mine, and they don't smell weird either. Is that okay?”

“Yeah, that's really great, Eri,” Shinsou answers, laughing under his breath. “Your books were really cheap at the store I used to go to... Mine were too, but that was because they were really old. I like having books like these.”

Even with everything he had been going through, Shinsou had made sure to steal discounted books. Jean Valjean, eat your heart out.

"Hizashi should be finishing up soon, but I know he'll need help picking out which plates to use," Shouta says, so quietly Yamada's hearing aids can barely make out his words.

"OH NO! There's so many colors and sizes and I don't know which ones to pick!" Yamada cries, opening and closing the cabinet doors for effect. "If only my favorite little helper were here!"

"Twenny, I've got to help Yama make dinner, but I'll be right back!" Eri promises, her footsteps thundering down the hall at a quick step.

Shouta enters after Hizashi lifts Eri onto the countertop so she can start planning who gets to eat off of what. It's a very serious business, especially now that she's picking for Twenny.

The look on Shouta's face tells him the talk with Shinsou went as expected. Shouta had assured the kid that everything in the house was available to him, and if he needed anything, anything at all, he could write a note or let Eri know, as she'd be sure to make sure he's taken care of.

That the campus housed 20 pro heroes in their very building, 160 heroes in training, and one of the most sophisticated security systems in Japan.

That he would be safe here, even if it didn't feel like it at first.

And Shinsou wasn't likely to react much to those words. Probably wouldn't believe them. But Shouta didn't have that guilty heaviness in his shoulders that he would have if Shinsou had been overwhelmed with panic from Shouta's presence and Eri's absence.

It was a good sign.

27 didn't know what to think about his new owner.

Eri liked him, that much was clear to see. She wasn't afraid of him at all, tugging on his shirt when she needed his attention or to ask him a question. She could look him in the eye and call him by name. She was almost as comfortable with him as she was with 27.

But 27 couldn't afford to be naive. Even if the man was a hero, all that meant to him was that he was trained in combat. That he had a powerful quirk. 27 didn't know what quirk he had, and that ignorance was dangerous. He needed to find out before it was used on him. Hopefully it would be something he could minimize the effects of, like a combat enhancer he could deflect, or something that required a trigger he could learn to avoid.

The man was hard to read. His tone, his words, even his facial expressions were muted, neutral things that left no trace of his true intentions.

27 didn't like that. He needed to figure out which angles were safe to play, how to lose at the game while he won. How to keep himself and Eri safe.

At least Yamada easier to read. He was full of tells, the way his hands would flutter into signs when he was unsure of something, or how he would wince and hesitate if he said something he didn't want to. Luckily, Yamada was close to his new owner, in the same way Hari was close to Chisaki or Memory and Bug were close to Boss.

But that also meant that 27 couldn't risk getting too comfortable with Yamada. The right hand could hit the hardest. Since he was a teacher, not a hero, his quirk may not be as powerful or useful, but Hari had never needed to use his quirk to dole out a punishment.

He didn't even know what punishments he would be given with them. Training was certain, and he'd long since learned to appreciate the variety that new and unpredictable opponents gave him. Simple beatings weren't too different, though it was more mentally challenging to figure out how to end them without making the person who dealt them angrier. He could get used to the burn of bleach again. He could lick boots and bark on command, bow and simper like it was second-nature now. Wearing a mask would honestly feel like a reward, now that he felt so naked without it.

Hunger was a constant. Sleeplessness a friend.

He could deal with anything less than Bug or being Unmade.

But maybe, if Eri was kept safe and happy, he could even learn to handle those better. He could even learn to handle something worse.

Because she was so happy. Her eyes glowed when she handed him the bag full of clothes, picking out the ones she liked, the ones she chose for him. And she was right, they felt nice, and they smelled good. Nicer than anything they had at the 8 Precepts compound.

But what he had at the 8 Precepts compound was better than anything he had at Miasma.

It was a power play, and it wasn't even a good one.

27 didn't need nice clothes. He didn't need books. He didn't need a bigger bed or better food on occasion. He had long since learned to live without those things, and that was one of the few skills he could thank Bug for giving him.

But if giving him those things distracted them from knowing where his real weaknesses were, the fulcrum from where they could push him do anything, that was all the better.

Even when he was proven right, that their living conditions were improved with the new owner, he wasn't prepared to see them.

Despite how massive the building was, one out of many on the giant estate, the rooms they would spend most of their time in made him unsettled. He felt too raw and yet too tired to process all of it, but he tried to keep up with Eri's excited explanations.

A TV. He hadn't seen one since he was Eri's age.

Other than Mocha, his TV had been his best friend. It showed him all kinds of things, like the documentaries that made him seem really smart at school, or hero cartoons that made him wish he had another quirk.

It distracted him from the way he had been driving his mother insane.

Now that he looks back, knowing how easy it was to slip into Eri's mind after doing it over the years, he feels sorry for his mother. He had been a stupid little kid who wouldn't listen, who didn't notice how she had started to look at him coldly, dangerously. How she locked herself in her room for days on end.

He had no idea what would happen back then. He couldn't afford to not know anymore.

He tries to keep up with Eri's tour, tries to scout out the places where his owner might have weapons. Places that could be used to punish him. The places he suspects are the exact ones that Eri dismisses, and he can't even get a glance in before she shuts the door, but something in her tone is building up to a giddiness he's never seen in her before.

She opens the door to her room, and he's glad he's too tired to cry.

It's soft.

Every space is filled with comfort and softness. Things that he could barely scrape together for her at the 8 Precepts, things that they lost every year when Chisaki had the room emptied out of all its possessions so that everything could be burned, purged for accumulating the filthy germs he hated so much. They all pale in comparison to what she has now.

He tried to keep the two scratchy blankets and white futon they had clean, burning white patches into his hands when she had an accident. Now she has a puffy pink comforter, a fluffy gray blanket and three other, smaller blankets piled on top of a western style bed. There are pillows on her bed, at least five of them, when Chisaki didn't allow them to have one. A sheer pink curtain drapes over the bed from the top, lit up by tiny white lights.

They look like stars, and he never even showed her what stars look like.

She has pictures hung on the wall, clearly portraits of people she liked. He could never get her plain drawing paper, only coloring books, and he had to hide the pages he kept, folded up in his books.

She has a little pink desk with a stack of coloring books and one of the super-sized crayon packs that he could never bring himself to steal for her. There's a little tea set sat on top of it, and he knows she doesn't have to use it to play that awful game Chisaki made them do.

He was so proud - so fucking proud - when he found a ragged little teddy bear in a rain gutter on one of his trips outside. It was missing an eye, one of its arms was ripped off, and it was filthy and stained, but he was able to clean the worst of it off after several washes. She had watched him scrub it clean, dancing and humming the whole time, and as soon as it dried she held it so tight half the stuffing popped out. He smiled every time she fell asleep with it huddled close to her chest.

Now she has a mountain of stuffed animals in the corner of her room, hung in a little white net. Bears, dogs, cats, horses, unicorns - she has things that he never even taught her existed. All of them are new, fully intact. None of them smell like bleach or have sharp edges where the fur had become too brittle.

He looks at her, spinning around in this bedroom fit for a princess, and hardly even recognizes her. He only knew that tiny little girl, too skinny and too sad to belong in this kind of room. The kind of girl who hadn't seen sunlight in years, who only knew concrete walls and bleach and pain.

This is the kind of room Eri deserved, one he could never have given her.

Then she shows him his room. He knows he doesn't want it, still doesn't want it. Chisaki tried to give him one, but he turned it down, and bore the odd looks and the disgusting jokes from the underlings every day for it.

But then she opens the door, and the air is knocked out of him.

It's not his room.

It's the room 50 would have given him.

He can't even hear what Eri is saying over the crushing weight of everything that had been swirling inside of him since he stepped foot into this place. Everything he tried not to think about, tried not to name.

50 was supposed to live. She was supposed to work until she paid back her brother's debt, and then she would have bought him.

They would live in a quiet little place where no one bothered them. No one told them what to do. They'd make noise if they wanted, they'd eat whatever they wanted. They could sleep in warm and comfortable beds all day and Bug couldn't grab them, screaming that they were wasting Miasma's time and money.

50 would take off his mask.

She would ask him questions he could actually answer. She'd listen and he'd tell her things.

She never even knew what his voice sounded like .

She'd give him those little pastries shaped like fish every day. And they'd be fresh, and he could eat them as soon as she gave them to him. They'd be hot and crispy, and back then, he couldn't even remember what hot or crispy food tasted like.

She had 7 years left when she died.

That was 7 years ago.

And Mocha.

He doesn't even feel his hands shaking when he reaches out for him, he only knows they're shaking because he can see them, wading through the dream.

"You won't have to hide your little friend," 50 promised him, her big hands engulfing the battered stuffie's torso. "In fact, I'll get him a lot of friends. So many little stuffies that you could make a bed out of them!"

He never even told her Mocha's name.

There were so many things he never got to tell her.

"Twenny, is the cat scar-"

"Sorry," he blurts. The words don't feel real. Nothing feels real. "T-the cat is really cute, Eri. I like it."

He never told Eri about Mocha, and he told her far more than he should have.

He won't tell her, not even if it's Eri. He can't let anyone know. Even if he knows it's irrational, even if he knows he has so much more to worry about than a stuffed animal that had been burned to ash years ago, been burned by his own hands.

He won't let them know. He'll keep this. Mocha is the only thing they won't know to take from him. He can't let them take him again.

He puts the stuffed animal back down on the bed, convincing himself that he doesn't care about it. Because if he shows it, if his owner knows, they can take it from him. They will take it from him.

Eri tugs at his sleeve, and he pulls her up into his arms. He holds her close and lets her head drop on his shoulder, and for a moment, the guilt sinks so heavy into him that he feels like he'll collapse under its weight.

She was so happy to give him this room, but he let his broken mind trample all over that. Let it scare her and disappoint her at the worst time.

"Yamada got you a lot of books, Twenny," Eri mutters from his shoulder, pointing at a black bookcase at the foot of his bed. He hadn't even noticed it, hadn't taken note of anything else in the room before he saw Mocha and nearly dropped out of his own head. "They have white pages like mine, and they don't smell weird either. Is that okay?"

He laughs, and he feels ridiculous for it. His mood shifts so suddenly underneath him, but he can't help it, and just allows himself to drift in the warmth that Eri brings him. "Yeah, that's really great, Eri. Your books were really cheap at the store I used to go to... Mine were too, but that was because they were really old."

He wonders if the hero standing in the doorway behind him knows he stole those books. That he stole so many things, some that he needed, some that he didn't. Eri needed her books, she needed an escape he couldn't give her, needed to learn to read and write so she would have something to strive for, something to be proud of.

He didn't need books. He just felt like he did at the time. He couldn't stand the itching under his skin, the swarming he felt in his head when he realized he had counted how many times he counted their possessions that day.

When he saw the thesaurus, that was one thing. It was only 50 yen. And Japanese Sign Language From Beginner to Advanced served them well. But his plays, his classic literature, the English to Japanese dictionary, those things weren't needed.

But he wanted them. And he wanted to open those books on his shelf, even if just to run his fingers over the pages and see if they stained. Wanted to bend them to see if they cracked. Smell them and see if they smelled like rot and cigarettes. They didn't look like they did. "I like having books like these."

He doesn't mean to say it, but he does. He lets another thing slip out, another thing they will take from him. Or force him to pay back.

He needs to stop. He needs to get control, and keep it. The heaviness in his limbs does him no favors, even if this isn't a fight with fists, this is the most important fight he'll have with them at first.

He can't let them know what to take from him, because they will take it. And it will hurt.

When Eri is called to the kitchen, he lets her go, and schools his face against it. Against the disappointment, the ugly loneliness and the ache in his chest and the cold chill in his arms when she's not there. When he sees her running down the hall, running away from him, and she's happy about it.

When he thinks she might stop running to him, he has to stop himself. If he thinks like that, he'll break, and his owner is watching him now.

His owner takes a couple steps further into the room, and for a moment he thinks he'll close the door and do something terrifying, something so terrible he can't even imagine it, but he doesn't. The man just looks at him and stares.

This must be the part where his owner tells him what his job is. 27 makes himself stand up straighter, fights the urge to tuck his bad hand into his pocket because he can't draw attention to it.

It's the perfect time for this, because he knows what the man wants the moment he sees him turn his head towards the door, towards the direction Eri ran to.

His owner wants him to control Eri. And he'll tell him to do it when 27 can't even tell him he'd rather die.

27 had told himself he didn't know what his owner wanted, but he knew. The thought of it was just so horrible that he let himself be naive, let himself be stupid. But there was no changing the reality of his situation.

Eri had a powerful quirk. A quirk that people wanted to use. If Chisaki wanted to make bullets that destroyed quirk factors, the heroes must want that too. But until Eri could control her quirk, 27 had a purpose. He had to control her.

He hated it. He hated it.

At this point, he'd rather give up. He'd rather stop living, just stop, than ever do that again. To ever make her eyes go blank, especially now. There was so much life in her eyes now, she smiled so much .

He couldn't do that again.

"This place is very different from the other places you have lived," his owner begins, and 27 hopes he's not secretly a ranter. If he had to hear about the bubonic plague one more time, he'd snap. "UA is a school for heroes in training. Most of the students are around your age. They live in the other dorms you saw on the way to this one while school is in session. You will see a handful of those students often because, as Eri has implied, they spend a lot of time with her."

Heroes his own age. A handful he'd see often. Those students would probably be the opponents he'd see the most often during training. At first, he thinks having someone so much younger than his usual fare might be too kind, but as heroes, they must have powerful quirks. They would be challenging, but 27 found himself looking forward to it.

"There are also no less than 20 pro heroes on the premises at all times, and they all live in this building. Each one has fought every type of quirk or villain imaginable, and made a name for themselves in their specialties."

20. 20 skilled fighters with strong quirks to back them up. 20 sets of eyes watching him at all times, waiting for him to slip up, to even look like he's doing something he shouldn't.

"UA also boasts one of the most advanced security systems in Japan, developed and constantly improved by the Support department and Principal Nezu. If a person who is not registered in the system is detected, the school will go on lock down, and both the hero staff and Nezu's army of robots will be deployed."

27 has never fought robots before. He hopes he's in the system. He's pretty sure robots don't answer questions.

"I understand that this will be difficult to believe, but you will be safe here. The people from your previous organization may be skilled and well connected, but they can't touch you here."

27 knows it's the wrong thing to do, knows it's the stupidest thing he could do right now, but he looks at his owner. He looks him in the eye.

There's something in his expression, something he can't name. There's a hardness there, in the firm line of his mouth and the subtle clench of his jaw, but there's also something in his eyes, something that makes 27 disregard all the clear signs his owner is angry, and makes him think he's something else.

He doesn't know what it means, and that should scare him more than it does.

"Naomasa will be continuing his investigation into the organization pursuing you, and I have no doubt he will find them." 27 knows better than to believe that, better than to think The Miasma would ever fail to find him. "You may see him from time to time, but you won't be transferred into his custody again."

27 doubts that. The police wanted information he couldn't give, and they were determined to get it. If he wasn't so well trained against their tactics, they would probably have it by now.

His owner's lips twitch, possibly a tell. Something he wants to say but thinks better of, keeping it hidden. "If you ever need anything, you can write us a note, or tell Eri. It's plain to see she's eager to make sure you're taken care of."

He couldn't do that. It would be stupid enough to let them know things he wants, things he cares for, but if Eri gets involved, she would get hurt. They could make her trade things just like he had to with Chisaki. A fight for a meal. A meal for a trip.

She already traded for his sake. Let them take something from her, something he wouldn't have allowed her to. When he got sick, she had to-

"Shinsou."

He looks up and his owner has moved closer, his hand falling to his side and half-clenching before it's forced to relax. 27 wonders why the man is so full of tells now, what they all mean.

He feels his own hand fall to his side and swallows his panic. Away.

He signed it, purely out of habit. Maybe his owner didn't notice, but Yamada would. Yamada would ask, but he wouldn't have to. Even if it was a unique sign, one not quite like the official one, it was recognizable. Yamada knew unique signs, had told him that he knew.

He had to stop that. Had to stop falling out of his head. They took things when he was away, and he couldn't let them. Couldn't let them take Eri.

"Dinner will be ready soon. You can wait here and get more familiar with the room if you would like, or check on Eri. But it's important that you eat something."

His owner leaves, leaves the door open to see if 27 will follow. A test.

It's one he knows he passes. Even if he wants nothing more than to see Eri's face, to know that she's fine since the scant few minutes he saw her last, he counts his new possessions instead.

A gray bed. A side table. A dresser and closet half full of clothes.

They could take these things.

A desk. Three pencils and two pens. Two blank notebooks. A chair. A lamp. A row of five ceramic cats waving to him with their open paws.

They could take all of these things.

A string of lights on the wall. A bookshelf. 23 books. Their white pages bend.

He wouldn't let them take Eri. Not a single piece of her happiness.

It made the game harder, but he couldn't afford to lose.

Stay At Home Mom

Chapter Summary

27 isn't entirely at ease with his new environment, finding it difficult to know what to expect. Yamada has a project for him, and he doesn't know what to expect of it either.

He's never eaten food like that before.

There was so much of it. So many flavors and textures and smells. His gut clenched at the sight, and at first, he didn't think he'd be able to eat a single bite, wasn't sure if it was safe to.

But then Eri handed him a ball of rice, molded and decorated to look like a sleepy cat, and told him she made it just for him.

He eats it. He eats everything she puts on his plate, and he finds he can feed himself with his left hand pretty well, even if it takes longer.

By the time he's eaten half of his serving, he feels the exhaustion he felt before double. He can barely keep his eyes open, can't hope to follow the conversations his owner, Yamada, and Eri are having. He starts to worry that he's been drugged before he realizes the only thing that they didn't share that they could have tampered with was the little onigiri Eri had made him.

He couldn't even begin to doubt Eri, doubt anything she gave to him. It was irrational, because he had made it clear she was his weakness already in a way he could never take back, but he just refused to believe it.

Yamada is lying when he says he's tired after such a great meal and long day, but he appreciates it. 27 is able to drag himself to the room he was assigned, even if Eri has to be distracted with promises from his owner to read her favorite stories to keep from crying when she realizes he's not going to her room. He'd have to explain it to her later, tell her how they might have softer beds but they had more eyes watching them. They had to obey, that was the only angle they could play right now.

He doesn't plan on falling asleep, knowing that he needs to take inventory of the situation. Weapons and punishments and any little piece of information he could glean would be ripe for the picking at night, while his owner and Yamada slept, not yet as watchful and disciplined as they would be later.

He doesn't even remember laying down on the bed, knows he didn't mean to sleep because he wakes up in the same clothes he had been wearing when he was taken from the police station, on top of the blankets instead of under them.

Eri is curled up next to him, dressed in soft pink pajamas with Mocha held tight in her embrace. She's so deeply asleep that a little drool drips from the corner of her mouth, onto the leather jacket he was still wearing.

He can't help the smile that pulls at his lips at the sight, even though he knows he'll have to scold her for disobeying the heroes. She squirms, turning over onto her stomach, and the change in pressure brings his attention to the static feeling in his arm, as the limb had fallen asleep.

He lifts his hand to run his fingers through the knots in her hair, wondering if one of the many soaps she boasted about were one of those liquid shampoos that came in bottles that were too hard to hide. He freezes when he realizes there is someone peering in from the open door.

Yamada straightens up immediately, tucking his phone away into his jeans. "Good morning little listeners! Looks like a little cuddle bug invaded your room last night!"

27 jolts up, disturbing Eri, who whines grumpily. He knows what Yamada is implying, knows he was going to take a picture to show his owner. Even if the mere thought of it makes him want to vomit, he knows he's always been too close to Eri for anyone to take it differently.

Eri lifts her head for a moment, but when she sees who is at the door, she sighs in bold frustration. "Yama, it's too early," Eri whines petulantly. "Zawa said Twenny needs to sleep."

"Mhm, and he also said you should sleep in your own bed so he could do that," Yamada answered, kneeling beside the bed to tickle Eri's sides, turning her grumpy pouting into a fit of giggles.

She slaps his hands away, and 27 freezes in panic. She's acting far too bold, he's taught her better. He's never thought he'd have to teach her not to do that, to attack one of their keepers.

"Ugh! My little bean is so grumpy today, and I was hoping someone could help me with a really important job!" Yamada says, grinning widely even as he pulls back to sit on the floor. He doesn't look like he'll retaliate this time, but 27 puts his hand on Eri's back, ready to pull her out of the way if he does.

Eri pops up, shaking her hair out of her face. "Grading papers?" She asks excitedly.

"Nope! A job for you to help Twenny! If you're up for a little project today, of course," Yamada asks, but the way he says it doesn't sound like a question.

27 nods, quick and professional though he has no idea what this job could be.

He hopes it's not quirking Eri. He knows that's coming, knows that they probably want a demonstration before they trust he can do it, but seeing her so warm and peaceful this morning makes the thought even more unpleasant.

"Great! Why don't I grab a shirt you can change into, and after breakfast- well, lunch, really - but after you eat, we can get started!" Yamada says, pulling himself off the floor with a clap before he leaves. 27 has barely pulled his jacket off, nose wrinkling at the feeling of his sweat soaked sweater, when Yamada runs back in with a gray bundle in his hands, while his pocket screams with an obnoxious ringtone.

"Ah, I've got to take this. Think you can take care of Twenny, little bean?" Yamada asks, and grins at Eri's serious salute. "Here, it's got a few product stains already, but it's so comfy. Hey Jeanist!"

27 takes the shirt, waiting until Yamada leaves the room to place it on the bed so he can change. He doesn't want to risk offending Yamada by treating his uniform with any kind of disregard.

"No, you can't come over, I'm serious! I know, I know exactly what you're feeling, but I just wanted to ask... No, that's not an option right now, seriously, it has to be just toner. Even if it has streaks, it's fine! No- lifting product!"

Yamada blurts out the last two words in frustration, like he wanted to say something else.

"Later, maybe. I can't really tell you anything right now.... Yes, it's.... I know! That's why I texted you! Apogee Super Apology, 40 developer, Wella permanent- well, that's why I... Okay, cut it in half.... Really?! I thought that was just good sponsorship! Of course! Thank you Jeanist!"

27 realizes that he hasn't changed yet, and throws the sweater off of him with quick and panicked tugs. He doesn't even look at the uniform he was given, doesn't notice the short sleeves until he feels the cold air hit his arms.

Eri pokes at his Bug scars, tracing them idly with her little finger. Despite not wanting to spook her, he claps his hand over the black band on his arm when Yamada runs in.

He sees the man freeze then wince, but it lasts only a second before he's back to his usual excitement. "Let's get some breakfast, kiddos! I know my brain definitely needs a wake up call!"

The noodles are cold, but they might be meant to be served that way. There are far fewer dishes than last night, but still more variety than he or Eri ever received at the 8 Precepts.

Eri kicks her feet under the table, nibbling happily. She watches him pick at his food so proudly, and he thinks this habit of serving him food might be a good ritual for her. She hasn't pointed out that 27 is eating with his left hand, hopefully she's never noticed which hand is his dominant one. "Yama, why did Zawa go to school today?"

"Because his kiddos would get into too much trouble if he didn't," Yamada answers, staring at a machine as it drips liquid into a cup and gives off a really nice smell. "Luckily, he agreed to glare at them during my classes, so hopefully they'll actually do the worksheets I assigned. If Toshinori covered me..."

The man shivers, and 27 takes note of the name. This Toshinori must be a terrifying individual to earn such a reaction from even an ally. Perhaps he was similar to Nemoto. Incredibly useful, but with a truly awful personality to match.

"But I get to play hooky and spend time with my favorite kiddos for a while!" Yamada says, grinning at them.

The job must be something awful if Yamada is so eager to get to it. If only 27 recognized the words he had used on the phone, he'd know what to expect. Some of them sounded benign, like 'Apogee Super Apology,' but then again, maybe it wasn't. Maybe it was a kind of healing cream, something to use if 27 got too injured during this job to do the next one.

Yamada sips from his mug, now filled with whatever the machine had made. 27 knows he glances away when 27 looks, but Yamada had been staring intently at him all morning.

Eri ignores the danger of the situation, humming around a steamed bun.

"Oh, sorry, I should have..." Yamada mumbles, panicked as he scratches behind his ear. "I wanted to give you a haircut today, that's all! The way I said- or, actually, I didn't say anything, wow, that came across way scarier than I wanted it to!"

27 pulls at the strands close to his ear, though they don't come loose. All of his hair was pulled tight into the matted mess at the back of his head, and every inch that grew just made the matts bigger. He had thought of using the knife a few times in training to hack away the worst of it, but he knew that doing so would just inspire Hari to mess it up even more.

A haircut would be really nice.

It must have shown on his face, because Yamada smiles at him differently, in a kind of soft way 27 hadn't seen before.

"I know hair is really important for me, myself," Yamada says, twirling the ends of his loose braid. "I don't really feel right unless it's fixed up right, you know?"

"Yup," Eri agrees, pushing away from the table. "Cause you have a braid when you're Yama, and it's all swoopy when you're Mic! You can't be a swoopy Yama or a braidy Mic."

Yamada laughs. "You're right, little bean! A braidy Mic just wouldn't be loud enough! Shouta says the same thing when I take too long getting ready. I'm sure he's even told you so."

Eri nods, and 27 wonders what 'Mic' means. Wonders if Yamada was given a name that became more than a title. If 'Mic' called up something different inside the man, the way 'Dog' made 27 cower, or 'Twenny' filled him with a comforting warmth.

If 'Mic' was someone he should fear, in the same way Hari called Chisaki 'Overhaul' during quirk training.

"Twenny, can I braid your hair after Yama fixes it?" Eri asks, pulling at a matt so full of dead hair he doesn't feel the tug.

"It feels pretty gross right?" 27 asks, then freezes.

He feels the string pull tight anyway, and the effort to drop it causes a headache to bloom behind his eyes. But Eri doesn't notice, doesn't have time to go still and blank. He breathes a sigh of relief as she tugs at another knot.

Yamada didn't notice either, busy putting away their dishes. "Well, let's get to fixing that! Eri and I will have you feeling like a new person after we're done!"

"Yeah!" Eri cheers, eager to get started.

They crowd into Yamada and his owner's shared bathroom, 27 sitting on the rug while Yamada pulls out his tools and Eri seems to just get in the way, too excited to stand still. 27 reasons that pulling her into his lap is more for Yamada's sake than his own increasing nerves.

He tries to prepare himself when Yamada steps around him, clicking the scissors a few times as he does. He tells himself what Yamada will do. He'll take a piece of his hair and cut it off. The bathtub isn't full. The room doesn't smell like bleach. It will be okay.

But when he feels Yamada's hand brush against one of the matts, the fog sets in.

It's not the usual fog, he never quite slips out into a space where he doesn't really exist. He just feels small and out of place, disconnected from what is happening around him as memories pervade his mind.

Hari pulling his hair. Dunking him under. Burning. His face burning. The smell. The smell burning him from the inside he's not pulling him up he can't breathe he's going to die can't breathe-

Eri's arms are wrapped tight around his neck, her still uncombed hair in his face. Strawberries . Her hair smells like strawberries.

He comes back in pieces, with every breath he takes. Yamada is off to the side, clicking his scissors nervously, and he noticed . 27 doesn't remember if he signed, but he noticed the slip.

"Shinsou, do you...." Yamada shuffles awkwardly, sitting behind him but as close to 27's field of vision as he can with the counter in the way. "Can you nod for me if you want Eri to cut your hair? And shake if you'd rather stop? Either way is okay, it's completely up to you!"

He knows it's not okay, with how Yamada's fingers keep twitching around the scissors when he glances at 27's hair. It's a test, but it's easy enough to pass with Yamada's tells. He nods.

Eri gets up and leaves him, leaves him colder, but when she grabs a clump of hair and makes the first clumsy cut-

He's fine.

As it goes on, Yamada pointing where to put the scissors and Eri snipping away, his head begins to feel lighter in a different way.

His shoulders relax, her little hand resting on them at times as she moves around behind him. It takes longer, probably far longer than it would with Yamada, but he doesn't care. He doesn't even realize that Yamada is the one holding the clippers until after he finishes buzzing off a long stripe at his nape, before going back to directing Eri to trim up the ends.

It feels oddly nice.

Yamada hands Eri a comb while he begins mixing up the purple color, and even though his hair still scrapes against the plastic teeth loudly, he relaxes even further.

Maybe there's enough of it left for Eri to braid.

"Okay!" Yamada says, shaking a little bottle between his thumb and forefinger. "Now you can take a shower, get all those little stragglers washed away, then use this as shampoo. It should put the color back into the most damaged parts, and hopefully come out evenly. Don't let it get in your eyes, though!"

Yamada tells him which way to twist the knob for hot and cold water, and points out a few bottles of soap he could use, which 27 appreciates. He wouldn't have been able to risk using them otherwise, and he has no idea where they store the bleach. After he starts the water, Yamada picks Eri up, promising to brush out her hair and put it in a pretty braid.

27 tests how hot the water can get, and the answer is beyond scalding, then adjusts it to just below that. He strips and washes, trying to ignore how coarse and uncomfortable his hair is at the brittle ends, or how much of it gathers in the drain.

He picks up each of the soaps he was offered, unsure which one he was really supposed to use, until he found one labeled 'Sugar Beach Surge.' It's incredibly close to the one he would steal for Eri, but with a more muted, somewhat muskier note in it. He lathers it thickly, watches his scars hide away under the foam before he washes it away, wondering what he would look like if the scars washed away as well.

When he steps out of the shower, he has to force himself to towel off before he looks in the mirror. He's all at once eager and afraid of what he'll see, and his hands move quickly when he realizes Yamada must already know he's done showering.

He looks before he puts the shirt back on, and that becomes his undoing.

Not because he looks human . When he looks at his hair, he's surprised how much it changed his appearance. He thinks it's how he used to have it when he was at Miasma, maybe even before that. Even if it still doesn't feel right, it looks right, with no white clumps or off-color streaks to be found.

Then he looks at his arm, lifted up as he flips his wet hair around, in awe of the solid hue, and his gaze is caught by a flash of color above and behind his elbow.

A blue oni's grinning face stares back at him, with patches of black ink and tiny maple leaves scattered around it.

Nemoto.

That was Nemoto's tattoo.

Not his .

He didn't know what happened in the nothingness, when his voice wasn't his voice and his quirk wasn't his quirk, but there was someone else there, Nemoto was in there, and he didn't come out right. He lost some things, walked away with some parts that weren't his.

Nemoto had part of his arm or

Chisaki had part of his arm .

All three of them muddled up, lines between their bodies so messed up and blurred. What parts of him weren't his, what parts were stolen from him.

Not my voice not my words not my quirk stop using my-

"Twenny!" Eri sing-songs, knocking at the door. "I wanna see it!"

"Just a minute," 27 says, numb enough that his words come out even though his core is shaking.

He couldn't let Eri know. She saved him. If he came out muddled in the end, she couldn't know that. He knew he could fix it, already a plan forming in his head. He couldn't trample on her happiness again, not with something so awful, something he could fix himself.

He pulled the shirt on, and looks in the mirror, forcing the wideness from his eyes and the clench of his jaw to relax.

He opens the door, and Eri's mouth drops in shock. "It's so pretty, Twenny! You look pretty!"

He finds himself laughing a little despite himself, rubbing the nape of his neck where it's buzzed short and soft. "Yeah, you made me look really pretty, Eri. Now I don't look like such a mess."

"The color came out great!" Yamada says, eyes wide with surprise. His hand twitches upwards but he jerks it back to his side quickly. "Now all that's left is the hair mask. It'll take a while to set in, so I was thinking we could watch a movie while we wait."

"Movie! Movie! Movie!" Eri cheers, her wispy braid bouncing with every jump she takes, more energized than 27 had ever seen her. "Twenny's never even seen a movie, Yama! We have to pick a really good one!"

He sees Yamada open his mouth, probably to correct her, but 27 decides to lie a little. "You're right, I've never seen a movie. They must be fun to watch, though. I'm excited."

Yamada stares at him, and for a moment 27 realizes he made a mistake. He feels how wide he had been smiling, how loose his posture had become. How relaxed he had let himself be.

Before he can correct himself, stiffen into something professional, Yamada turns to Eri, fists curled in front of him as they pump in determination. "Eri, we have to pick THE BEST movie! Come on! This is the most important decision we'll make all day! All week! In our LIVES!"

The pair run off towards the living room, and if Yamada wasn't so tall, it would be hard to know which one was actually a child with how they were acting.

27 follows slowly, frowning to himself as he tries to get the ringing in his ears to go away.

Voice amplification quirk. That was odd.

Aizawa was dead tired by the time he was able to leave work. Covering Hizashi's classes cut deeply into his designated nap times, and several members of class 1-A seemed to be under the impression that Present Mic's absence would excuse them from the class entirely. Kaminari's panic in particular when he hunted them down made the effort almost worthwhile.

Yamada warned him to be quiet when he returned with a picture of Eri tucking a unicorn under Shinsou's arm while he slept, curled up in a corner of the couch with his hair covered in white gel. He saved the picture to the Eri folder without thinking too much about it, then scrolled through the other updates he had been sent throughout the day.

Hizashi sent him a selfie where the man was huddled up in their bed, blonde hair spread messily over the pillow with a caption - 'So nice to sleep in :).' Another selfie after Hizashi had gotten dressed, wearing a soft gray henley with his hair braided to the side, his fingers in a peace sign - 'Stay at home mom look :p .' A blurry picture of Eri opening the door to Shinsou's room, dragging her Hello Kitty blanket behind her - 'She didn't even check on me! Too busy BEING NAUGHTY.' A picture of Shinsou, still wearing the clothes from yesterday, and Eri curled up on the same bed, Eri's head resting on Shinsou's arm. Shinsou's face, relaxed in sleep, makes him look younger, and the scars even more painful to look at. 'Shinsou caught me and got a liiiiittle panicked, but nbd! Eating lunch now! DON'T JUST EAT JELLIES SHOU.'

Another text pops up while he's walking, and he stops to wait for the picture to load.

Shinsou is smiling nervously, his purple hair, now shorter and healthier, fluffed up in every direction. His toothy not-quite-grin matches Eri's heartfelt attempt at one. They both hold up peace signs, with cat ears and whiskers drawn on both of their faces. 'Had a nightmare I think, but Eri wanted to show him the cat filter! He likes it!'

Aizawa stops and smiles before he catches himself, a moment too late. "Ah! Sensei got an Eri picture! I wanna see! I wanna see!"

He looks up to see UA's Big Three walking towards him, Nejire barely restrained by Togata's hand on her shoulder, though he knows Togata will ask to see it too, just more politely. Even Amajiki's eyes are widened with interest, peering over from behind Togata's shoulder.

Aizawa sighs, unsure whether he should swipe to an older picture or tell them about Shinsou now. "You've only gone one day without seeing her. I'm beginning to worry that she's become a distraction for the students of UA." Or an addiction, if their stricken faces are any indication.

"Too long!" Nejire pouts, crossing her arms petulantly.

"We're just worried, Sensei!" Togata says, rubbing the top of Nejire's head in calming circles. "Did she come down with a cold?"

"No," Aizawa answers, then turns to face them. "This information is only known to the staff for now, but as nearly-fledged heroes entrusted with her care, I will trust you to act appropriately with it." He turns his phone to the Big Three, knowing full well the emotional whiplash they will have upon seeing the picture.

Nejire cracks first. "Cute! Who is he? Is he Eri's brother? They look so similar! Why does he have sc-"

Togata places a hand over her mouth, his smile unwavering. "That must be the famous Twenny! I'm glad he's doing better, but I can't help but ask what his situation is now."

Still sharp as ever. "He is under Present Mic's care, in a traditional wardship designation," Aizawa answers.

"Despite the fact that Eri is your ward," Togata states, while Nejire vibrates in his grasp.

"He has information that could be critical in another investigation," Aizawa states, knowing that out of anyone, he could trust Togata to understand. "Due to... a number of factors, he will be living with Eri for the foreseeable future. The arrangement is beneficial for both of them."

"An emotional support toddler," Amajiki mutters, before he notices Aizawa's stare and presses his head against Togata's back. "What I mean to say is-"

"That is the situation," Aizawa interjects, musing to himself how accurate the term was. "Eri acts more confidently in his presence, and Shinsou is reassured by hers."

" 'Shinsou,' huh," Togata wonders aloud.

"Shinsou Hitoshi," Aizawa replies. " 'Twenny' is short for '27.' It was a name he was called before he came to the 8 Precepts."

Togata's smile falters into a grimace, and Aizawa wonders if he said too much. But Togata's chin lifts, as does his mood, as he asks, "Can I meet him tomorrow? I can watch them so Mic-sensei doesn't have to miss another day."

"You have class," Aizawa states, eyes narrowing.

"Quirk training," Togata says with a laugh. "Ecto-sensei already gave me permission, as long as it's alright with you. If I can't improve that area, I should work on others, like providing comfort for victims of trauma!"

Aizawa knows that's not why Ectoplasm signed off on it, but he sighs and agrees anyway.

"Toshinori will also be there."

"A team up with All Might! How lucky!" Togata exclaims, removing his hand from Nejire's mouth to clap his hands together in excitement.

The other members of the Big Three notice, eyes lowering.

Those were bitter words hidden under all that cheer.

Aizawa trusts them to handle it, departing with a wave as he continued his walk home.

"Twenny! That's not the way it goes! You have to do this!" Eri wipes her arm against her brow, miming a sigh of relief.

"Sorry, this part is different than the one I learned," 27 apologizes, fully aware of how ridiculous he looks, dancing to a children's song.

He's also aware that Yamada is filming it on his phone, but if he thinks 27 can be manipulated by blackmail as tame as this, he has greatly underestimated 27.

Eri peers up at him, eyes wide in wonder and 'Baby Shark' forgotten. "Is it the one where you die and go to hell?"

27 startles, shocked to hear those words said in such an innocent voice, while Yamada cackles behind him. "Eri, who taught you that word?"

"Kirish- well, Bakugo taught me that word, but not really, he just says a lot of words I can't," Eri explains, then returns to her previous excitement. "But Kirishima knows the bad version too! Were you friends when you were little?"

"No," 27 answers. "A lot of kids learned that song, probably in every school."

"But what if you were!" Eri exclaims, still mesmerized by the idea. "What if you were friends in school but you don't remember, but he remembers you, like in the movie? And you become friends again?"

"I didn't have friends at school," 27 shrugs, then tugs at the skin below his eyes. "I looked pretty creepy with these bags under my eyes, and... a lot of people didn't like my quirk."

27 thought he had forgotten all of that, but vague memories came back clearly when he watched the movie. He remembered eating his lunch alone, watching other children play games. Being included just to play the bad guy, then abandoned as soon as the game became less fun. When he proved to be too good at it.

"They used to tease me, because it was a 'villain's' quirk. I'm pretty sure there was even a villain in a cartoon who had the same quirk as me. And... I couldn't really control it back then, so that made it worse."

It made a lot of things worse.

It made his entire life worse.

"But," Eri says, curling her toes against the carpet nervously. "I can't control my quirk, and it's a cursed quirk, so it's worse than yours. But I have friends!"

27 smiles at her, putting a hand on her head so his thumb rubs little circles around her horn, the same way he used to when she had trouble falling asleep. "Your quirk isn't cursed, Eri. Chisaki was wrong, and you proved it when you saved me. You have a heroic quirk."

She looks up at him, peering at him cautiously.

"And you're way cuter than I was as a kid."

"Am not!" Eri protests, but the quirk of her lips tells him what game this is.

"Are too!"

"Are not!"

"Snot stew," he completes, as she giggles, throwing her arms around his legs.

He jumps when he hears the click of the doorlock, staring as his owner enters. Eri parts from him, running towards the man as she yells, "ZAWA!"

His owner kneels on the ground, his arms wrapping around her as she hugs him briefly, pulling away to babble excitedly.

"Zawa, we fixed Twenny's hair! I got to cut it, but Yama helped me! Twenny looks really pretty now, and his hair is really soft!" His owner glances up at him, and 27 straightens, hoping the embarrassment doesn't show on his face. "Then we watched a movie, and it's the first movie Twenny's ever seen, so we had to pick a good one! But Twenny fell asleep, and he missed the part where they find out the cat is a ghost, but then we played with Yama's phone and danced the Baby Shark dance! Can Kirishima be Twenny's friend?"

His owner puts his hand on Eri's head, ruffling her hair. It might be a way to distract her from his slight avoidance of the question. "It sounds like you had a busy day. As for Kirishima, Shinsou would certainly be a good influence for him. Kaminari got him into trouble today."

"No! It wasn't my class, was it?!" Yamada asks, still sitting on the couch with his phone in hand.

"I believe Kaminari's argument was, 'If Present Mic isn't here in 15 minutes, we're legally obligated to leave.' Very convincing. Perhaps I should expel him so he can focus on his career as a lawyer," his owner says.

Yamada laughs. "That's one of their memes, you know! I know you hate them, but the translation project I assigned last semester improved everyone's grades too much to argue!"

"Kaminari can be your friend too, Twenny!" Eri says, turning to him. "He's really funny, and kinda goofy, which makes Zawa mad sometimes, but I think he's really nice!"

27 nods, not quite sure how to answer her. He's not quite sure what his owner would want him to say.

"Can Twenny go to school with us tomorrow? He needs to make friends! He didn't have any friends when he was little, so he needs a lot of friends now!" Eri demands, jumping up to prove her point.

She really shouldn't be acting like that, but something has emboldened her today. Something dangerous. His owner's eyebrows raise, and 27 panics, thinking Eri has finally gone too far, but the man just keeps petting her head. "School can be a little overwhelming, Eri. Especially with all the friends you want Shinsou to make. It would be better to start off smaller, like spending the day with Toshinori and Togata-

"Mirio!" Eri yells, as though she had forgotten about him, running into 27's legs to tug on his pants. "Twenny, Mirio is going to be your BEST friend! He's my best friend too! He gets me toys all the time, and he plays all sorts of games and-and-

"Eri," 27 says, putting his hands on her shoulders. She was too worked up over something, acting far too bizarre.

"And you can help me fix him!" Eri says, her fists tightening even further. "He got hurt and lost his quirk when he saved me, and I'm supposed to save him, but I can't! I don't know how to use my quirk, but you do!"

"Eri," 27 tries to stop her, signing ' Danger ', because even if they see, even if they know, they couldn't know this. This was dangerous.

She ignores him. "You did it before, Twenny! You made me go away but you could use my quirk while I was gone, just like he wanted you to, and you could-

"Eri!" He yells. He doesn't mean to, he just wanted her to stop, to stop telling them what he knew they wanted to know. What was dangerous for them to know.

His heart lurches when he looks down.

Her eyes are blank.

Blank and white.

He feels their stare anyway. He feels all of them staring at him, he knows that they know.

It's stupid, it's the stupidest thing he could do, but he's too panicked to think, his blood rushing in his ears and his stomach clenched so tight he feels sick.

He drops the control and runs , shuts the door and sits in front of it, knowing they'll come, knowing they'll come for him because they know.

The only thing keeping him from floating into the fog is the sound of Eri's crying.

Chapter End Notes

Bonus chapter because my week was just a super long Monday, another one is still coming this weekend.

So, Eri's Rewind isn't exactly perfect in this fic, especially considering how absolutely insane Chisaki's quirk is to be able to merge living human beings into his own body. Shinsou was basically human soup, and Eri didn't quite fish out all the parts that were his.

Oh, and don't worry, all of you who are fans of Shinsou being extremely paranoid and distrustful. Despite what Baby Shark is trying to tell you, this is just a honeymoon phase.

Family Night

Chapter Summary

27 faces the consequences of his previous panic, though it only confuses him further. Later that night, he puts his plans into motion.

Trigger Warnings: Dissociation, Suicidal Threat, Panic Attacks, and Intent to Self-Harm (more on that in the notes)

Chapter Notes

Minor Spoilers for the chapter, which may be necessary if self-harm or suicidal threats can be a trigger for you.

Suicidal Threat: Shinsou threatens to bite his tongue off if he's forced to use his quirk on Eri.

Self Harm: Shinsou intends to use a knife to burn part of his skin, but this act doesn't happen. The conversation that follows may be distressing to read for those who have had a parent or guardian catch you during the act of self-harm.

"It had been a really good day," Yamada says, offering a cup of tea to his husband.

The exhausted eye roll told him this had just been par for the course.

"He didn't ask her a question," Yamada pries, and hopes Eri, as upset as she had been, had offered some insight while Shouta calmed her down.

"He stopped requiring it last year, for her at least," Shouta answers, turning the cup in his hands. "He had used his quirk on her so much by that point.... It must be a side effect of repeated use, but that's far better than the usual one."

Yamada frowns, unsettled by the reminder. Most people affected by the overuse of mental quirks simply went insane.

"He still asked her," Shouta says, glaring at his tea while his shoulders stiffened. "Every time he had to take control of her, he asked her a question. He only slipped up once, and even she noticed how much it distressed him."

"If that was any indication," Yamada says, head tilting towards the living room. "It would be pretty hard not to. Even for a child."

"He can use her quirk," Shouta mutters, frown deepening. "This situation has become a lot more dangerous."

He knows Shouta is just stating the facts, taking inventory of everything that had changed in those scant few minutes, but he bristles at his words. It wasn't logical to dismiss everything that had come to light, but Shouta had only seen the worst parts of the day.

The kid had relaxed. He had smiled, widely and without fear behind his eyes. He played games with Eri, and even as ridiculous as he looked, a teenager being bossed around by a toddler less than half his size, he had been happy.

"He might do it, if he's pushed enough. But anyone would react against their nature if they're pushed enough." Yamada looks towards the hallway, the direction they really should be heading to so they could take better stock of the situation. "He clearly didn't want to."

Shouta nods, taking a sip of tea. "I think it would be better if it was just you, but considering..."

Yamada raises an eyebrow, earning an exasperated sigh.

"Zashi, the kid is terrified of me. You saw the way he reacted when I came home. That's not just a startle response. Considering the way he has lived, what he expects..." Shouta glares at his tea cup, but they both know the people he was really angry at. "He thinks I'm the new Chisaki."

"Shou," Yamada says softly, draping an arm over his husband's shoulders. "Eri thought the same thing too. It took over a week for her to trust you, and even then, it was probably because you were taking 'Twenny's' place in her life."

Shouta's shoulders relax, and he leans closer to Yamada.

"It will be really hard, Shou. I don't think Shinsou remembers what a caretaker acts like, if he ever had one. He might have only known Chisaki's, but..." Yamada stops, running his fingers through the ends of Shouta's hair. "He will recognize that you're different. It just takes time to prove it."

Shouta doesn't answer, but the tilt of his head means he's considering his words. Trying to make a plan of action, how to move forward with their theory in mind.

"So, what does that make me?" Yamada asks, finger pressed under his chin. "Sometimes he startles, but he's also way more relaxed than I really expected."

"Obviously, you're my lackey," Shouta says, with a cheeky grin. "Or maybe you pull off the 'Stay at Home Mom' look better than you think."

Yamada sputters. "Shou! I thought we went over this! If I were a villain, I'd be independant like Gentle and La Brava, but with better editing and way more followers."

"I'd follow you," Shouta mutters, tucking his head under Yamada's chin. "But to hunt you down, and bring you to justice."

"You're such a stickler for police procedure," Yamada says, his voice dropping to a whisper. "I mean, you'd have to frisk me. Really thoroughly. Never know what I could be hidi-"

The sound of a door opening makes them freeze, listening for the sound of Eri's quiet snuffles.

Instead, the door shuts, almost soundlessly.

They wait a minute, listening for footsteps, but there's only silence.

"It sounded like Shinsou's room," Shouta whispers, pulling away from their embrace.

They walk down the hall to investigate, as quietly as they could so as not to startle either of their wards. The hallway was empty except for a piece of paper, folded neatly in front of Shinsou's door.

Shouta picks it up, eyes scanning over the message. His fingers crumple the edges when he finishes, before he shows it to Yamada.

'If you want me to control her, you might as well kill me. I will bite my tongue off first.'

It was written with a steadier hand than the note Yamada had received before the shopping trip, possibly because Shinsou had a great deal more time to write it.

'Sign to talk?' Shouta asks after tucking the note into his pocket.

'Unsure of dialect. Might be PSJ. Not my best language.' Yamada replies with a frown. With the two signs he's seen from Shinsou, it was hard to tell, but he hoped that it was standard JSL. That would be far easier to teach.

Shouta raises an eyebrow. 'Your mom uses PSJ.'

'Too loose. Signs can mean different things,' Yamada answers. 'This is too important.'

Shouta nods. 'Laptop.'

They retrieve the laptop from their office and return to Shinsou's door. Hizashi hesitates while Shouta knocks, waits a moment for a response that's unlikely to come, then enters.

The kid is stock still when he sees them, his hands shaking a little where they hang stiffly at his sides. He's standing in front of his bed, though he was clearly sitting on it before due to how the comforter had an imprint. Everything else in the room looks exactly as it was before Shinsou even arrived.

"We need to talk," Shouta says, barely looking at the kid while he starts setting up the laptop on the desk. "I want you to use this to type out what you want to say."

The kid doesn't move, but his eyes are fixed on Shouta, only glancing at Yamada a few times. Shouta was right, the kid was terrified of him.

Shouta notices, hand curling into a fist momentarily, before he remembers himself and relaxes. "Sit down in this chair."

Shinsou moves without hesitation. Familiar with following orders.

"Have you used a keyboard before?" Shouta asks, and though his even tone disguises it, he's worried that this won't work either and they'll be forced to use paper, which could distress Shinsou further.

'Yes.' Shinsou types. His hands rest on the keyboard, typing rather than finger-picking. That was a promising sign, a sign that this would be a better way to communicate from here on out.

"We received your note," Shouta says, pulling it from his pocket to place it on the desk. The kid glances at it, shaking, before he turns his gaze back to the screen. "I'm glad that you wrote it. That's exactly what I want you to do when you feel uncomfortable with something. Let us know, and we will change it."

Shinsou's eyebrows move together for a moment, confused, before he schools himself back into the eerie blank look he wore when they first entered.

"We don't want you to control Eri. I know that was your role at the 8 Precepts, but..." Shouta pauses, considering his words. "The only time you should ever use your quirk on her is if she loses control of hers, and I'm not there to stop it. Is that understood?"

'Yes.' Shinsou's fingers twitch over the keys after he's done, but he doesn't type anything else.

"I'm not sure if you remember Togata, but he remembers meeting you briefly during the raid. He is an extraordinary young man who cares deeply for Eri. He wouldn't want her or you to suffer any kind of discomfort, even to regain his quirk."

Shinsou's fingers twitch again, and he glances at Yamada first, then to Shouta, who nods.

'Does he-' Shinsou erases, then types again. 'Blonde hair, red cape?' He deletes the question mark as soon as he types it, shrinking in on himself.

Trained not to ask questions. Not even written ones.

"He has blonde hair, but he usually wears T-shirts and jeans when he isn't in uniform," Shouta answers. "I imagine he will wear something of that nature tomorrow when he visits."

Shinsou glances at Shouta, still avoiding his eyes, before he turns back to the keyboard. 'Not' then erases, repeating the action a few times. 'Not angry' finally comes out, no punctuation attempted.

"I'm not angry, Shinsou," Shouta says, as softly as he can. "There are very few things you could do that would make me angry, and I don't think you would ever do them. I wouldn't be angry if you asked me a question, or if you were having fun with Eri. Even if you did make me angry, we would sit down and talk about it."

Shinsou doesn't relax much. He probably doesn't believe half of what Shouta is saying, but the half he does believe makes a difference. It takes a while, his lips thinning while he thinks, then he types, 'Is Eri okay.'

Still no question mark, but it's a start. "She calmed down a while ago, but I think she's worried that she upset you," Shouta answers. "She told me that you always asked her a question at the 8 Precepts, even after you found out you didn't have to."

Shinsou notices the pause, the unasked question, frowning before he answers. 'She needed the routine, and as much control as I could give her. I didn't want-' he erases, tapping the key while he thinks. 'I don't like-' erases. 'It's easy to slip up now. I won't let it happen again.'

Shouta looks at Yamada, and he knows what he wants to do. He knows it's risky, but it might be the most effective solution right now.

Yamada nods, and Shouta breathes a sigh of relief, turning back to Shinsou. "Shinsou, I'm going to demonstrate my Nullification quirk on Hizashi."

Shinsou's eyes go wide with panic, and Yamada quickly realizes that this might be a bad idea.

“It won't hurt me! Shouta's done it before, a lot, actually,” Yamada says, drawing Shinsou's gaze to him, his expression shifting from panic to pleading concern. “I have a Voice Amplification quirk, so when I use it, I get really loud. And I'm going to use it now, but you should also look at Shouta while I'm using it. BECAUSE HIS HAIR STARTS TO FLoat and his eyes turn red.”

Shouta's hair settles back around his shoulders and he blinks hard, trying to get moisture back onto his irises. “My quirk neutralizes the quirk factor of anyone I use it on while I'm looking at them. It isn't painful for the target.”

“If you slip,” Shouta says, and Shinsou's shoulders jerk when he does. “And you can't break the control yourself, I can use my quirk. It won't hurt you, but it will break the control you have over someone, and allow you to regain control of the situation.”

Shinsou looks at Shouta, his expression blank, but for once, that's a good sign.

“Maybe we could have told you all of that first, instead of making you worry so much,” Yamada says, elbowing Shouta's arm playfully. “But Shouta secretly has a little complex about how he looks when he uses it.”

“It's not a complex,” Shouta grouses. “I'm simply aware that seeing someone with glowing red eyes and levitating hair can be startling. In certain cases, it can work to my favor, but in others, it requires awareness .”

Yamada smiles, remembering how timid Shouta had been to show his quirk to Eri, since he had been too far away for her to have seen it during the raid. When his hair settled down, he could barely look her in the eye, softly asking, ‘ Did that scare you? ’ Eri had shaken her head, hand reaching out for his hair, though she jerked it back as soon as she realized it. ‘ Your hair...looks pretty. ’

Shouta had nearly died on the spot.

“So,” Yamada starts, and though Shouta sends him a wary look, he's a little too excited to hold back. “I really like the computer set up, but it's a little cumbersome to carry around all the time. I noticed you used sign and- and I'm not angry!” He blurts, hands waving as Shinsou's eyes become panicked again. “I'm excited, actually! I think it would be a good way to communicate if it was an emergency, or if we didn't have the laptop nearby. Or any paper.”

Shouta's glare fades. He didn't want to give away that they know the handwriting situation is no longer the best avenue. Shouta must have noticed something that he didn't.

Shinsou looks down, chewing his lip nervously. ‘ Sorry. ’ He pauses, hands shaking. ‘ Not great. Want to learn. Not hiding. Dislike . ’ His eyes glance around, fingers tapping on the chair.

“Dislike to sign?” Yamada asks, signing as he does.

Shinsou signs an emphatic ‘ No ’ then turns back to the laptop. ‘ Don't want to offend. ’

“Ah! I see! That's this sign,” Yamada says, demonstrating it in slow movements. Shinsou copies him without prompting, his fingers out of place the first time, but he frowns and repeats it better the next. “And I wouldn't be offended if you missigned, Shinsou. You're learning. I would be a horrible teacher if I was upset you didn't immediately know every sign, especially for JSL! It's a very messy language, you know, kind of like English. Some signs mean different things in different areas, some signs are just made up to be shared between two people. A lot of signs were just made up when someone meant to say something, but found there wasn't a sign for it!"

'Names similar,' Shinsou notes.

"Very true! And Shouta - oh, this is my name sign for Shouta," Yamada says, 'Sho Sleep.' "Shouta knows JSL as well! I taught him myself, in fact, so he can tell you what a wonderful teacher I am."

'He rambles,' Shouta signs. "Hizashi is a very patient teacher. And very knowledgeable."

'You're rude! Don't teach him that!' "So you can ask me to show you how to sign anything, Shinsou! Maybe we can even find some signs that need to be made," Yamada says. "I still haven't found your name sign, but if you have any ideas for me or Eri or Shou- or anyone! - I can help!"

'Thank you,' Shinsou signs, using the most formal one. 'Will learn.' The corner of his lips pull into a small smile, and he sign-whispers, 'Excited.'

Yamada beams, warmth filling his chest. Shinsou was excited to learn, willing to sign to them. He was nearly overcome with the urge to teach him as many signs as he could think of, when the door slowly opened, and Eri's head popped in.

Her face was still red, eyes puffy from crying, but her nervous expression broke when she saw Shinsou, and she started to cry again, running to bury her face in his stomach. " 'M sorry Twenny!"

Shinsou pulled her into his arms, hand rubbing circles against her back, worry working into his voice. "No, no, I'm sorry Eri. I'm sorry I scared you, I'm really sorry."

Eri cries harder, kneeling him in the side as she jerks in frustration. "Don't-don't-don't go-o away-ay Twenny! I-I'll be go-ood so do-on't!" Eri sobs, unable to speak under the pressure of her terror.

This is a bad fit, one that even Shouta would need an hour to calm her down from, but Shinsou stands up, and begins walking in slow circles, humming so quietly that Yamada's hearing aids can barely pick up the sound. Even that much turns her breathless cries to peaks and waves, and Yamada is impressed to see it.

Shinsou just keeps humming, walking her in circles until she calms down completely, still grasping onto him as though if she relaxes a single finger, he'd disappear in her arms.

"Bad nightmare," Shinsou mutters, avoiding any hint of questioning in his tone.

Eri nods, squeezing him even tighter. "I was bad in the room. I talked to him and told him he was mean, and you got mad. And you left, like you were going to get books, but you didn't..." She squirms, kicking a leg against his side. "You didn't come back. And he told me that I was bad. I was cursed so you left. So you could be happy. But his voice was.... Was your voice. Like back then. And he started to look like you. And it scared me."

Shinsou holds her tighter, pain naked on his face. "Those... are really scary dreams. When someone changes.... I think it helps if you look at them, look at the person who changes in that dream. Here," Shinsou says, guiding her to let go, pull away from where she was tucked so firmly into his shoulder. "You can look at me, and remember what I look like."

Eri traces his scars, then reaches up and tugs at a lock of his hair. She shakes her head, then looks at Shouta.

The world tilts from under him when Yamada realizes that Eri only looks .

She doesn't seek any assurances or affection. She wants to remind herself what Shouta looks like . That he isn't a part of whatever monstrous amalgamation of Chisaki and Shinsou that had haunted her dreams earlier, taking pieces of those she cherished and mutating them with the person she feared most.

Shouta stiffens when he realizes it, and walks over to them slowly. "Eri," he says, when he gets close enough, and that's all he has to say. Her tiny hands tremble when they reach for him, but she touches his jaw, fingers running over the scruff. It starts to distract her, and she giggles weakly.

"Feels funny," Eri whispers, then lays her head back on Shinsou's shoulder, exhausted from the fit now that she's fully comforted.

"He looks funny when he shaves, though!" Yamada cuts in, noticing the increasing tension in Shinsou's shoulders as the kid notices how close Shouta is. "His cheeks are so soft, and he doesn't look as scary when he glares. I think that's why he doesn't shave. It keeps the students in line, thinking he's a wild man with nothing to lose. Not even a razor!"

Eri giggles, turning her face towards Shinsou's chest. "Don't leave Twenny," she whispers, fingers twisting in his shirt.

"I won't," Shinsou says, running a hand over her back, then smiles. "I can't, really. There's a scary, crazy wild ma...." He stops and freezes, but Yamada won't let the panic take over.

"He sassed!" Yamada cries, working every bit of excitement he can manage into his tone. "He sassed you! Finally! The sign of a healthy teenager!" He forces an exaggerated laugh, slapping his knee as he realizes Shinsou still didn't appear to be breathing. "Shinsou has a great sense of humor, right, Shou?"

"You two," Shouta says, a bit too gravely for his taste. "Are the only ones who can sass me. Hizashi isn't allowed to."

Eri perks up at that, head tilting to the side. "How do you sass someone?"

"You just mutter something under your breath about them, usually," Hizashi explains. "Like, 'Would be nice if Shouta learned to cook for himself,' or 'I sure was cold last night after someone stole the blankets.' "

Eri purses her lips, her eyebrows furrowed in thought. Then she looks at Shouta with determination. "I wish Zawa would let Mirio live with us!"

Shouta smiles and ruffles her hair. "I spend too much time around teenagers already."

"That was a good first sass, though! I'm sure that being surrounded by teenagers all the time will make you a sass-master in no time!" Yamada says, knowing that it's one of Shouta's greatest fears.

Shouta's glare promised retribution, but Yamada was on cloud nine for the rest of the night.

Shinsou sassed!

27 glared at the ceiling, ears trained for any noises from the hall. It had been quiet for hours, but he had to be sure. Had to be careful.

He had been so reckless .

The effect Eri had on him was becoming dangerous. He would forget about anyone else in the room, forget that his owner was there. He wished he still had his mask, something, anything to stop such stupid words from pouring out of his mouth, so reckless .

In the end, nothing happened. But something would. They were going to ease him into it, let him become comfortable.

He could not become comfortable here.

He had allowed it, though. He slept through the best night to scout for information, and now he was at a disadvantage, needing that information now more than ever.

He let his hand rest on the doorknob, gathering himself. He needed to be a professional. Call up every last bit of training that he had ever received from The Miasma. This was too important to mess up.

He lifts the handle as he opens it, and the door is silent, thankfully silent. Slowly, he makes his way down the hall, keeping close to the wall where the floor will be less likely to creak, his torso angled away so that his shirt can't brush against anything.

His first target is the laundry room. It has the least amount of risk involved. He doesn't open the washer or dryer, knows there's likely nothing of value there. Detergent, softener, dryer sheets, bleach - he doesn't even touch it, tells himself the bottle is too big to hide anything behind it - lined up on a shelf. There's a bottle marked specifically for cleaning up blood stains, and despite himself, 27 frowns.

Of course there is. He shouldn't have thought any different. Shouldn't have let himself become soft and stupid.

The big black duffel bag catches his eye, and though it takes ages to pull it from the shelf, he barely makes a sound. He places it on the floor, finger pressed against the zipper to muffle the noise.

There's a lot of black jumpsuits, similar to the one his owner was wearing today, along with a few pairs of yellow goggles with vent-like screens positioned over the frames. Hides which one he's targeting , 27 thinks. It's clever.

It's interesting.

Interesting enough that he finds himself tucking a pair into his pocket.

He knows he shouldn't, he should have broken this stupid habit long ago, it's a stupid thing to do and he needs to be professional .

But he does it, and continues searching through the duffle bag.

Settled at the bottom, he finds what he was looking for, and he sags with relief when his fingers wrap around the handle. It's a good knife, a standard issue military blade with serration close to the hilt and a well-maintained edge when he tests it against his finger. It's not the most balanced knife he's handled, but he likes the sheath and clip it comes with. He wouldn't have to risk injuring Eri when he carries it.

He tucks the clip to the outside of his sleep pants and pulls his T-shirt over it, frowning as he realizes it's barely hidden. It's the best he can do for now.

Next is the office, which becomes the most challenging area. The laundry room was at least partially lit by the nightlights lining the hall, probably set up so that Eri could find her way to the bathroom without having to struggle with a lightswitch, but the office is too big for the light to fully penetrate.

He tries his best in the dark, but all the papers stacked on either desk are unreadable in these conditions. There's a closet on the left wall, but it's even darker, though he can tell that it's full of leather and cotton fabric.

The light above the stove is left on in the kitchen, which 27 appreciates greatly. The cabinets are full of kitchenware and a few machines 27 can't name, others that he can. He doesn't want to risk disturbing anything he doesn't have to, especially since his work has only begun.

He could use his knife, but the blade may be too short, and there's always the risk that it could become damaged, unusable. He finds another one in one of the drawers, nearly a foot long, wide with serrated edges. It's perfect.

He rolls up the sleeve of his shirt, twisting it up into a point that he holds between his teeth. The pressure on his arm isn't enough to really cut off the circulation, but at least the fabric can serve as a gag.

He's learned not to scream for something as tame as this, though.

The burner ignites with a small click, and he waits for any sound from the hallway for a while, before he settles the tip of the blade over the flames.

He's not sure exactly how hot he needs it to be, but he figures that it's better to be too hot than not enough. He doesn't want a blister that would only disfigure the tattoo. He wants it burned off.

He needs it to be burned off.

He doesn't even want to look at it, when he checks the position. The blade is starting to glow after several minutes sat as close to the base of the flames as he can manage, orange creeping around the edges. The smell of ozone is starting to seep into the air, but he knows the kitchen will start to smell much worse in just a few more minutes.

The smell was sometimes worse than the pain, if it was done right.

Right as he decides the knife is ready, he hears a door open.

EriYamadahisowner-shit.

27 looks at the knife, and his hand is shaking so badly he nearly drops it. He doesn't know what to do-

Sink.

27 flicks off the burner and starts setting the knife in the sink, as quietly as he can, but as soon as it touches the metal basin, it screams out a hiss.

Shitshitshitshit

He drops it with a loud clatter. He hears footsteps in his direction down the hall, and he turns on the water to try and hide what he was doing. The loud hiss and cloud of steam that blows up just makes it worse, there's no hiding this, he can only hope it's not-“Shinsou, what-” his owner stops, and 27 doesn’t have to look to know that his eyes are scanning over the room, that he’s already figured out what he was doing. His owner knows .

Damaging yourself as a number was just begging for Bug’s attention. When 47 did it, no one knew if he was trying to die. 47 couldn’t tell anyone, because 47 didn’t come out of the Red Room the same way he was when he went in. It was like his mind was trapped there. Like Bug decided that if 47 was going to do something so stupid, she’d just hollow him out so he couldn’t.

He doesn’t know what his owner was going to do.

He knows he made him mad. He made him angry. He tried to damage his property, forgetting that his body wasn’t his, it never had been, and he had the tattoos to show it.

“ Sit ,” his owner orders sharply, pulling out a chair from the dining table. 27 obeys, he’s not stupid. He knows it’s going to be bad. He knows .

His owner leaves. 27 keeps his eyes on the floor. He knows he’s getting something. An implement. A tool. A punishment. It’s going to hurt.

Don’t let Eri hear it don’t let her wake up don’t let her see the blood

The laptop is placed in front of him.

His owner pulls it to the side as he types a few things, tapping something, then turns it back to face 27.

27 doesn’t move. He knows what his owner wants but he just thinks he knows. He’s a tool. He shouldn’t think for himself. If he does, his owner will hollow him out.

He waits for an order.

His owner sits down, running a hand through his hair while he sighs.

He’s mad and 27 doesn’t know what to do . He doesn’t know the angles, he doesn’t know anything. He’s not being told anything.

His owner stands up and walks over to the stove. There’s a click of the burner, and though 27 knows he shouldn’t, he looks. He wanted to know if his owner was turning it back on, but he wasn’t.

He was turning it off.

27 looks down, but he knows that his owner saw. His owner doesn’t move, just standing there, but 27 can feel his stare.

If it’s a powerplay, it’s a good one, because 27 would do anything just to get it over with.

“Shinsou,” his owner says, now sitting in the chair again. He slipped out of his mind, but his hands don’t lift to sign. Even though they’re not his hands, they obey him for once. “Shinsou, what were you trying to do?”

His hands lift towards the keyboard before he forces them back down. He was asked a question, but not told to type it out. He has to answer him.

His chest is too tight. He can barely open his mouth, but his throat refuses to open, he can’t even breathe how can he talk he can’t breathe he can’t breathe the words are stuck in his throat he can’t answer he can't breathe

He sees a hand shove the laptop further up the table, he's being turned around, his owner is looking at him. His owner is saying something, he doesn't know the words, he doesn't know what the sounds are, he can barely hear them.

His owner is miming something. His hands are going up and down. He's breathing deeper. Inhales as the hand rises. Exhales as it lowers.

Like Rikiya.

27 tries. He tries to breathe in, his chest is so tight. He breathes out, there's not enough air.

It starts to get easier. He can hear the words now, they're soft. His owner is speaking so softly to him now, it's a trap.

"Good, Shinsou. That's good."

It's a trap but the words sound nice. He's too tired to fight them, the way they're said.

"Good. Are you back now? Can you understand me?"

27 nods then stops. Why can't he control himself he wasn't told to nod.

"Good, good. You're doing good, Shinsou. I want you to..." his owner stops, testing to see if 27 will look to him.

Why can't he just get it over with?

"Shinsou, I want you to turn and face the laptop." 27 complies, catching his reflection in the screen. Why is he crying? "Good. I'm..."

His owner stops again, and he hears him sit down in the chair again. "Shinsou, I'm not angry. I want to talk to you because I need to know what you were doing, and why. If you would rather talk to Hizashi, I can get him for you."

27 shakes his head. He's loyal to his owner. He can't show preference to an underling.

"Then, I want you to type out what you were doing, and why you were doing it."

27 obeys, his hands shaking on the keyboard. This might be the worst precursor to a punishment yet. 'Took knife from drawer. Turned on stove. Held knife over fire. Put knife in sink. Turned on water.'

He can see his owner nodding out of the corner of his eye. "Okay. Tell me why you did that."

27 bites his lip. He knows he's angry, and his tone tells him that it will boil over soon. His punishment might not be as bad if he obeys. 'Tattoo on elbow. Not mine.'

27 clenches his teeth, his hands shaking so badly that he can barely type, but he continues, barely meaning to. 'Won't do again. Won't damage self. Knew it was wrong. Won't happen again. Wante-'

He erases the last word, but knows it was too late. His owner read it. "What did you want, Shinsou?"

‘Wanted’ he stops, he tries to make himself stop, but his hands move like they’re not his own. ‘It off. Not mine. Nemoto’s. Nemoto’s tattoo. From fusing. Not mine. Not my skin. Don’t want it. Want it off. They have my skin. Don’t want theirs. Want it off want it off want it off.’

“Okay, Shinsou, breathe. Breathe with me,” his owner orders. 27 obeys, becoming more aware of himself as he does, falling back out of the fog. “Good, okay. Good.”

His owner stares at the screen, and 27 wants to erase all of it. All the words that spilled out of him.

“You were going to burn the tattoo off with the knife. Is that correct?”

‘Yes.’ 27 answers.

‘Wouldn’t. I don’t. Learned not to.’ 27 types, tapping a key nervously. Perhaps he shouldn’t have given that away. Now his owner knows he has a high pain tolerance.

The silence drags on, and he knows he can’t look. Knows he can’t look but he wants to.

Just get it over with.

His owner pulls the laptop to face himself, tapping something then typing in a few short words. He turns the screen back to 27, and he sees a business listing has been pulled up. “This is the tattoo expert that Naomasa contacted to evaluate your tattoo while you were in the hospital. Naomasa gave me their information in case you wanted to have those tattoos removed.”

27’s hand curls around the band on his arm. To remove that.... He doesn’t know what he feels about it.

“I can call them as soon as they open tomorrow. The procedure is nearly painless, and safe.” His owner pulls the up the program he had been using to type with. “I will try to get an appointment with them as soon as possible, but in the meantime, you cannot attempt something like this. Are we clear?”

‘Yes.’ That’s all 27 needs to say, that’s all that is safe to say, but he has to curl his fingers under his palm to stop himself from typing more.

“Eri knows where all of your scars are,” his owner says. 27 glances at him before he can stop himself, startled by the soft tone. “She’s very observant when it comes to you, and she would know.”

27 nods. He doesn’t trust himself with the keyboard right now, not with the weight settled in his stomach, full of feelings he knows would spill out. How stupid had he become? She could have found out, found out she didn’t save him right, she would blame herself-

27 takes the marker, trying hard to keep his hand from shaking. It had to be the bad hand. Even if the tattoo was somewhere convenient to reach - and it’s not - he doesn’t trust his coordination. Things that required tiny, accurate movements like eating with chopsticks or writing were difficult after he had been Remade that time, and he hadn’t realized how much it affected him until he was taken from the 8 Precepts. How hard it was to hide.

His owner takes the marker back, frustrated that he was taking too long. “Would you like me to do it?”

27 isn't sure how to answer. His tone is too even, it doesn't have a mocking edge that would fit those words. It's a test. It's a test and he doesn't know how to answer. He's taking too long to decide.

“Nod if you would like me to help you,” his owner says, again in that tone he doesn't recognize.

27 risks it. He nods. If it was a mistake, then at least the punishment could begin.

He feels calloused fingertips underneath his elbow, guiding him to lift his arm. He can barely feel the touch, but he jerks upwards in surprise. His owner pauses, then presses the tip of the marker over his skin.

He's not sure what he's writing, or drawing. There's a circle, he thinks. Will it be his new tag, his reminder of who he belongs to?

His owner snaps the cap back on, placing the marker on the table. He pulls something out of his pocket, something 27 can't see without turning his head. There's a flash behind him, then his owner shows him what's on his phone.

It's a cat.

It's big, and nothing more than a circle with pointed ears on the top, but he likes it. It doesn't remind him of what's underneath. Instead, he remembers trying to teach Eri to draw that same shape, and how the margins of her coloring books were filled with her attempts. She still draws it in the corners of pieces that she's proud of, even on the ones hanging in her room.

It should put him on edge, it should make him more wary to not know what he means by that, but 27 finds his hands moving before he can really stop himself. ‘Like.’

His owner kneels down, and 27 glances at his face before he turns away. The man has a small smile, and his eyes look soft. He looks like he does when he looks at Eri. His hands are angled to where 27 is looking, slightly to the side. ‘Good.’

27 knows this is probably a training tactic. A word, repeated enough, in the same context to pull something out of him. He should be used to it.

“You should try to sleep. Eri will be very excited by Togata's visit tomorrow. You would be surprised how much energy they have, it's exhausting to watch.”

He nods, still avoiding looking at his owner. It feels odd to be dismissed like that. It feels like a weight is hanging over him, ready to drop. Perhaps Yamada is waiting in his room, or prepared to jump out at him. Dealing out what would dirty his owner's hands.

But Yamada wasn't waiting in the hallway. His room was empty.

It takes a while for him to risk it, his hands shaking when he reaches for it, worried that Yamada could still be hiding somewhere, waiting for him to get comfortable.

But he pulls the covers from his bed, and pulls them over himself. Nothing happens.

He turns over on his side, and waits. Nothing.

He reaches for Mocha, arguing with himself. It would be bad if he were seen like this, if he showed any kind of favor to the plushie, they'd know . But he wanted....

He needed to sleep. His owner told him to.

Holding Mocha made that more efficient.

Good Morning!

Chapter Summary

27 meets three new faces, though one of them isn't exactly new.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: None! A nice fluffy chapter for you guys!

“Shou-chan, my sweet, loving husband,” Hizashi croons, as Shouta refuses to open his eyes. When he makes the effort, he sees that Hizashi hasn’t even put on his jacket, and his hair has only been backcombed and hair-sprayed, creating the form but not the hold that gel would provide.

“Too early,” Shouta grumbles. He knows he doesn’t need to wake up until Hizashi has finished his hair at least.

“Shou-chan, why is there a scorch mark in my sink?” Hizashi coos, his sweet tone attempting to hide the vengeance soon to come. “I thought we agreed that if I’m not there to supervise, you should stay away from the stove.”

Shouta grunts. It’s far too early for this. “Shinsou had a bad idea. Stopped him. Luckily.”

“What?! What bad idea?! Shouta, don’t fall asleep on me!” Hizashi pulls him up by his shoulders, unconcerned by Shouta’s glare.

“Handled it. Tell you at school. Coffee,” Shouta groaned, slumping forward against Hizashi’s hold. He could probably fall back asleep like this. “Signed at me. Good.”

“Shouta! You can’t just tell me he signed at you - he signed to you - and fall - ugh!” Hizashi gave up, allowing his husband to fall sideways onto the bed, already asleep. “If you weren’t so cute when you sleep...”

Aizawa disregarded the intense burning behind Hizashi’s green eyes, taking the offered cup of coffee. It was his super dark blend, so strong that it had been banned in 4 countries. His favorite.

After he drinks half of it, he manages to look around the dinner table to check on his wards. Eri was nearly bouncing in her seat as she wolfed down her breakfast, still caught up in the excitement of Togata’s visit. It was unusual for her to be so energetic, especially this early in the morning, but Shinsou's effect on her appeared to be a strong one.

Shinsou appeared to be in the same boat as he was, but without the aid of caffeine. His head was propped up by his hand, as he slowly chewed a piece of toast, smeared hap-hazardly with jam. Prepared by Eri, no doubt.

He was still eating with his left hand.

Aizawa could tell he wasn't practiced with it. There was a slight hesitation when he picked up a piece of food or cutlery, and the movements afterwards were clumsy. He also noticed a subtle clench in Shinsou's jaw when he made a fist with his right, something approaching a habit when he felt he had done something he wasn't supposed to.

Perhaps more things didn't come out right after he had been unfused from Chisaki.

Shinsou felt the need to hide it, and to a point, Aizawa would let him. Taking away all of his secrets now would leave him too vulnerable, leave him in the exact kind of position that the people who had abused him before created. In the short term, he would cleave onto them more, obey every word they said and each one they didn't. They may even be able to close the investigation faster. But in the long term, he might never recover.

Darkly, he wonders if Naomasa knew that. If, at certain points, the urgency of finding out how and where Nomus were being produced allowed him to overlook something he shouldn't have.

Aizawa shouldn't throw stones, he thinks with a grimace. He had been convinced to look away himself.

His phone buzzes with an incoming text, and though he fumbles with it a minute, hands still uncoordinated with the lack of sleep and coffee, he sees that Toshinori had texted him instead of knocking, as he requested.

He chugs the rest of his coffee, then heads to the door, closing it quickly behind him since Toshinori had decided to stand right in the doorway, not fully comprehending the need for the text message.

This would be the first time that Shinsou would be left with someone other than Hizashi and himself, and there was no room for error in the introduction. Especially after last night.

Togata was standing next to the wall, like Toshinori should have. Aizawa tampers down the urge to pat the overgrown teen's head, rising out of habit from spending too much time with Eri.

"Thank you both for agreeing to come here today. Naomasa already told you everything, right?" Aizawa asks Toshinori, earning a bloody sputter from the man.

"I- well, yes. Since it's connec-"

"Togata doesn't know," Aizawa interrupts, glancing at the teenager in question. "And he shouldn't be read into it. I'm going to report my findings so far to Naomasa today, but I trust that you won't do any digging of your own, Toshinori."

Toshinori frowns. "I wouldn't attempt it. I know very well that I don't have the proper training for that, or talent, as teaching has shown me. Did Naomasa give you the impression that I would?"

Aizawa realizes how hard he had been glaring, and forces himself to relax. Last night had rattled him a bit too much. The instinct to protect was a requirement to be a hero, but he let it affect him in a way that wasn't becoming to that title. He had given enough lectures on the subject to know better. "I haven't been given official clearance to discuss it with you, so we'll leave it at that. Do you both remember what I've told you about the situation so far?"

Togata nods, then begins rattling off the instructions he had been texted yesterday. "Call you if there's an emergency, Nemuri-sensei if you don't answer, Principal Nezu if she doesn't. Eri's quirk doesn't have a specified trigger, but the size of her horn is a precursor. Call if there's a noticeable increase in size. Shinsou's quirk is Brainwashing, if you answer a question he asks, he can take control of you, but he seems to be unable to speak to anyone but Eri, and based on your observations, unlikely to use his quirk on her."

"There were a few new developments," Aizawa says, as Togata pauses to take a breath. "Shinsou doesn't need Eri to answer for his quirk to activate, but the reluctance is still there. It's highly unlikely, but in the event that he becomes hostile and takes control of her, you should evacuate. He can use the quirk of the person that is under his control. Likely originating from that person's body, but it hasn't been observed."

"Was it a quirk slip?" Togata asks, but his eyes are hard with suspicion. The teen knows that's the likely answer, but due to his protectiveness for Eri, he's set on edge by doubt.

"It was. If it happens again, call me immediately, and keep watch over him, as an S-1270 situation." The falter in Togata's smile reassured him he wouldn't have to say it.

Togata nods. "He's averse to being touched by anyone but Eri, and has reacted violently to it before. Unlikely to eat anything she doesn't give him. Eri herself has become more expressive and excitable, which poses a risk for more frequent quirk slips, but that hasn't been observed. Avoid asking Shinsou questions, and give him a paper and pen if he needs to communicate something, but," the teen pauses, pulling out his phone. "I wanted to offer this instead!"

Aizawa's eyes narrowed. That was the same phone brand Aizawa himself carried in his pocket, albeit several generations ahead. But Sir Nighteye's agency was far more likely to invest in improved features than government agencies did for their heroes.

"Bubble Girl insisted I keep it, but I really don't need to keep two phones. I lose track of my personal one enough!" Togata says, laughing. "Of course, she has the SIM card, so it can't make any calls to blacklisted numbers, if that's what you're worried about."

He sees Toshinori twisting his hands nervously out of the corner of his eye, but Aizawa certainly doesn't think his input is necessary right now. Any bold declarations of hope or heartfelt connection would fall off of Togata's smile like water off a duck's back.

He was still hiding it.

"Yamada and I are more than capable of getting Shinsou a phone, though the thought hadn't occurred to us. It would be more useful," Aizawa states, still staring at the phone.

"Well, of course you could, but I really don't need it. Helping Shinsou with it is far better than just letting it collect dust in a drawer. I already downloaded a few games he might like, and a text-to-speech app!" Togata says, typing on the phone.

" It's no trou-ble sen-sei ," the phone speaks, in a feminine yet eerily mechanical voice.

Aizawa grunts, hiding how amusingly different the voice was from Shinsou's shockingly deep timbre. "If you're certain that's what you want to do, I won't stop you. Though I'm surprised you didn't bring your usual offering for Eri."

"I couldn't find any she didn't already have," Togata admits sheepishly, scratching the back of his head. "But the cashier said they're going to have a new line of giant mochi plushies coming in next month! They're so big and cute-"

"We're running out of room as it is!" Hizashi yells, as he throws open the door, closing it behind him. "Seriously, Togata, you're the only gift you need to bring for Eri and Shouta knows it, he's just bad at teasing you. And Shouta, we're going to be late enough! Good morning, Toshinori!"

"Good morning to you, too," Toshinori answers, seeming shocked that he was addressed. "Please, don't let us keep you. I understand the situation far better now, and if I should have any questions, Togata is here to defer to."

"Wha-no, sir, All Might sir, I didn't mean to-" Togata sputters uncharacteristically, waving his hands frantically.

"My boy, I know Aizawa well enough to recognize when he trusts someone. He certainly places a great deal of trust in you, especially with someone as dear to him as Eri," Toshinori placates. "I hope you'll take care of me in this endeavor."

Togata seemed to combust with the sight of Toshinori bowing so formally. "I. It's not- Please take care of me as well!" He exclaims quickly, answering with his own formal bow.

"Good! Briefing over, 'Mission start off' !" Yamada yells, slipping into English.

Aizawa sighs, and opens the door, ushering Toshinori and Togata inside with him. Eri takes one look at who it is and bolts, hurtling herself towards Togata's arms. "MIRIO!"

"ERI!" He answers, sweeping her off her feet.

Shinsou stares, the subtle clench in his jaw the only break in his masked expression, as he watches Eri and Togata's greeting. Aizawa sighs, knowing that this really went as well as he should have expected. "Shinsou, this is Togata and Toshinori. They will be here while Yamada and I are at school-"

"Shou, I went through it because you were taking too long," Yamada grumbles, tugging on his arm. "Shinsou, are we good?"

The purple haired boy's face slips into a more neutral calm, and he gives two thumbs up, then signs, 'Bye Now Music.'

Before Aizawa can even raise an eyebrow, he's pulled out the door by his husband, who is mumbling that half of his homeroom is legally obligated to leave now.

"Now Music?" Aizawa asks, hoping that would explain Yamada's frantic mood.

The blonde stops, sighing. "I'm being bullied in my own home."

27 opened his eyes to see Eri's face close to his, their noses were nearly touching.

"Mirio's coming," she whispered, pulling the comforter towards herself with a gentle tug. 27 sighed, trying to force himself to wake up.

“Excited,” he asks without asking, around a yawn.

Eri pulls the comforter over her head, and that wasn’t exactly the response he was expecting. 27 forces himself to sit up as best as he could, since her head still trapped his arm. She squirms into a little ball, and he shakes his head, collapsing back onto the bed to pull the covers up over his own head.

She looks at him nervously.

“He doesn’t have to,” Eri says, picking at the bedsheet beneath her. “If he makes you mad, I won’t be his friend anymore. I promise.”

“Eri,” 27 says, giving her a half-smile. “I’m sorry that yesterday was scary for you. But that doesn’t have anything to do with today, rig...”

“I know. I’m sorry,” 27 answers, running a hand over his hair. “Yesterday was...scary. For me. I don’t want to use my quirk on you, ever again. So now I have to be careful with how I talk, at least until I get better control over it.”

Eri pouts, holding herself tighter. “But you’re big. You can control your quirk. I’m only cursed because I can’t, but Zawa said that’s okay because I’m little. And when I get bigger I’ll be able to control it. Was Zawa lying?”

“No, he wasn’t. It’s just...” 27 pauses, looking at the blanket stretched over their heads. “If someone has to go through a lot of things - a lot of bad things, they can start to have problems, like me. They aren’t as us- as able to control themselves. And that might be happening to me, a little.”

Eri’s eyes widen in concern, the corners of her mouth twisting down. “Did bad things happen when I was with Zawa?”

“Not- no, they didn’t,” 27 bites back the truth, for Eri’s sake. “Before I met you, some bad things happened. And I guess I was able to ignore them until now. Now I have these problems, but I don’t want you to worry about them. They’re problems for big people like me.”

He’s the only one who knows he’s talking about both his quirk and The Miasma, but Eri relaxes a little, staring up at the blanket then looking up to him with big, pleading eyes. “Mirio’s big. He could help you. I promise he could.”

27 smirks, hardly able to keep from rolling his eyes. “Well, I really can’t hate a guy who you like so much, Eri. I know you only know good people.” She squirms, not sure how to take his playful words, and he rests his hand on her side. “Eri, I’m sure I’ll like Mirio. Even if I seem kind of scared at first, I don’t want you to think I don’t. I just get scared sometimes. After all, Mirio’s a hero.”

“He’s the one that caught me when you threw me!” Eri says, her nervousness forgotten in the face of an opportunity to talk about Mirio’s good points. “He gives me plushies all the time, every time I see him! He helped me pick out the cat I got you, that you like so much. Maybe he’s like the cat, ‘cause the cat scared you at first, but I know you like it because you were holding it!”

27 notices that Mocha was now laying in between them, and he bites his lips nervously. “I think he is kind of like that, but Eri...” Maybe he shouldn’t, maybe it’s stupid to ask her, this is Eri after all. “I don’t want you to tell anyone I like the plushie. I know it sounds weird, but for someone like me, who’s older, it’s kind of weird and embarrassing.”

Eri squirms again, her brow furrowed in confusion.

“If you promise not to, I’ll tell you his name,” 27 bribes, even if he feels a little sick saying it. “And I’ve never told anyone his name.”

Eri’s excitement lessens it a little bit. “I promise! I won’t tell! Is it Smokey? That’s what it said on the tag on his ear, but I don’t like the names they get on their ears, I think they should get their own ones.”

27 smiles, wondering if he thought the same way as a child. “It’s Mocha. And my mom used to....”

He didn’t think he remembered that.

His mom used to drink something she called a ‘Mocha’ all the time. He always wanted to try it, and she always refused to let him. He thought that if she liked mochas so much, then maybe if he named something he liked ‘Mocha,’ she would like him a little more. She’d like him like she used to.

“Twenny,” Eri calls, holding Mocha in her hands. “I don’t remember my mom. ‘Cause she gave me to him. But that’s ‘cause moms do that. And that’s okay, ‘cause I have you. And you have me, okay? So don’t be sad.”

27 pulls Eri into his arms, and he feels her tighten her hold on Mocha. “Yeah, Eri. It’s okay. I’ve got you, and you’ve got me.”

“And we got Mocha!” Eri cheers. “But I won’t call him that anymore,” she promises, shaking her head fiercely.

“You can call him that, but don’t let anyone know that I call him that,” 27 said, running a hand over her hair to find it was full of knots. “You need to get ready for Mirio to come over.”

“Yama helped me pick out my clothes, but I didn’t want him to do my hair,” Eri says, shaking her hair. “I wanted you to do it.”

27 smiles to himself. “I can’t braid it, though. You’re going to have to teach me how.”

“Yay!” Eri squeals, kicking off the comforter and bounding out of the room, racing back in with a comb. “I’m going to get braids from Twenny!”

In the end, 27 could only manage what could loosely be called a braid. He forgot which way the locks of her hair should go, and couldn’t find the right balance between pulling the hair too loose or too tight. Too tight made Eri whine in pain, so he erred on the side of safety. It looked bad, but Eri claimed she liked it.

“Now I have to get ready,” 27 said, stifling a yawn. Eri quickly bounced onto his bed, standing up behind him to start combing his hair. He wouldn’t protest if this became a ritual for her, it was oddly soothing.

“It does that,” 27 answered, barely able to keep his eyes open. “My head is really hot, if you touch it.” A tiny hand pressed against his scalp, then ruffled the hair there. “I think it makes my hair floofy.”

“Kotatsu,” 27 corrected, smiling. “If your hands get too cold, you can just put them in my hair. Like a kotatsu.”

“Zawa’s hands get really cold,” Eri explained. “He could-”

Eri jumped down to kneeling, wrapping her arms around his neck. “Mine!”

27 was pleased the distraction went so well. He put his hands under Eri’s knees and stood up, carrying her on his back to glare at the contents of the closet.

There were a few pieces of clothing that had some utility to them, with large pockets or parts that could be rolled up to serve as a make-shift one. Most of them did have long sleeves, but there were a few T-shirts thrown in as well, in the very back as if they were supposed to be hidden.

27 didn’t know what he should dress for today. Training was unlikely, but not impossible. He had no idea what he was really allowed to wear, what his owner would allow him to.

Chisaki never cared, as long as it was completely clean and free of any wear. He learned that condition the hard way when Eri had knocked a bowl of soup he had been spoon feeding her, and some of it spilled on the hem of his shirt. He had forgotten to change before Chisaki came to collect her that night, and Chisaki made sure he never forgot again. That beating was so brutal that Rikiya let him have a free knock out at the next training session.

“Yep,” 27 agrees, relieved. She pulls on a deep purple sweatshirt that had a gray cat’s face on it and a pair of black pants, and he thanks her for her help before telling her to brush her teeth.

After 27 dresses, he folds his nightclothes and places them in the growing stack on the inside of his closet door, then makes his bed, placing Mocha in the center, just as he had been when Eri first presented the room.

He walks silently out of his bedroom, just in case he wasn’t supposed to leave yet. He wouldn’t have risked it otherwise, but he needs to keep an eye on Eri. He finds her in the bathroom, struggling to open a bottle of mouthwash. After he opens it, and she gargles and spits, she watches him brush his own teeth. It seems to make the scars on his face more interesting to her.

27 picks up the bubble gum mouthwash skeptically. “I think this is your mouthwash. I don’t really need-”

Eri shakes her head vigorously. “Don’t want to get sick!”

He’s long since learned how to pick his battles. If his owner is keeping track of how much mouthwash is used and faults him for it, the punishment would be far better than having to worry Eri with the possibility of him getting sick.

Eri pulls him to the dining table and begins fixing his plate, while he fights the sleep that threatens to take hold of him again, now that he doesn’t have a task in front of him. Something about this place was too comfortable, it made it hard to stay awake. He had even fallen asleep in the living room, and he had been trained far better than that.

He looks to see if Yamada is in the kitchen, but what he sees he nearly writes off as a hallucination.

Present Mic is grumbling to the machine that made the delicious smell from yesterday, as though that was a perfectly normal occurrence.

Present Mic.

Blonde hair, green eyes, weird mustache, similar build.

A hero.

Yamada?

Present Mic catches him staring, and smiles that unmistakable smile, even though it's a bit more manic at the edges. "Good morning, Shinsou!" he says, signing as he does, fingerspelling his new name.

27 waits a beat too long before he manages to reply. 'Good morning.'

Present Mic definitely noticed it, laughing a little as he pulled at the collar of his ridiculously impractical leather jacket. "It's definitely a new look to you, right? Kind of shocking to see in the flesh."

27 ignores him, feeling his lips quirk while he thinks, though he tries to stop it. 'Now Loud.'

"Right! Well, the exact signs are a little more like this," he says, signing 'Present M-I-C,' the 'Mic' fingerspelled. "But some of my fans also use this!" 'Present Microphone.'

27 stares at his own hands, knowing that he should probably copy those signs. But irritation boils up from his chest, and he feels his lips frowning even as he tries to stop it. 'Present Mic. Present Microphone.'

"Wow, you pick things up so fast--"

'Present Noise. Now Sound. Today Sing.'

"You sure know a lot more signs than I thought," Present Mic chuckles, voice strained. "But I actually picked out my hero name as part of my training at UA! I wanted something that was cool and easy to sign, and it took me quite a while to--"

'Now Music. Today Noise. Present Loud.'

"Shinsou, are you..." Present Mic pauses, and he knows that he should probably stop. It was a reckless thing to do, but even if Present Mic was an underling he could bully a little and get by with it, it's becoming a little less playful.

He still can't quite hide the way he's glaring at his hands, even as he tries to.

He hears a loud smack and turns, frightened that he's really done it, he's made Yamada angry, but instead he sees Present Mic covering his face with his own hand. "I really didn't tell you, did I? Wow! And I look so different, no wonder, it's..." He pulls his hand away, straightening. "Shinsou, lay it on me. I deserve it."

27 raises his eyebrows, not sure why signing different variations of his hero names is such an ordeal for him. But he was given permission. 'Today Music Equipment. Present Loud Stuff.' He taps his fingers on the table, having run out of signs that he knows. 'C-u-r-r-e-n-t-R-a-d-i-o.'

Present Mic slouches over, sighing. “Current is usually just ‘Now,’ but this is ‘Radio.’ ”

27 repeats it. ‘ Radio. Now Radio. ’

“And I’m not mad! You’re allowed to sass me,” Present Mic declares, pulling himself up. “I just really like my hero name!”

‘ Present Loud. Speak. ’ 27 signs back. He doesn’t know why, but he wants to test this.

27 isn’t sure if the hero is talking to himself, but he ignores him in favor of breakfast regardless.

His owner enters and takes a cup of that really nice smelling drink from Present Mic, looking half-dead. He sits and sips on his mug for a while before looking up, and 27 makes sure that he’s eating and looking elsewhere when he does. He doesn’t want to attract attention, especially if last night had anything to do with how bedraggled the man looked this morning.

His owner looks at his phone, then walks across the room to the door, opening and shutting it before 27 could turn around to see what he was doing. He seemed angry.

His owner was angry. There must have been some reason that he didn’t punish him last night, but the desire to must have remained. Perhaps he didn’t have the right tools, or the right person. Yamada had a voice quirk, but perhaps it was difficult to use for punishment. He could probably make 27’s ears bleed, but then 27 would have hearing damage. Perhaps they needed him to be able to hear for his jobs.

Present Mic walked closer to him, also staring at the door. When their eyes met, the hero pulled a frustrated grimace. “Ugh, that man! I swear! Not that I can talk, but...” He stops, taking a deep and audible breath. “Shouta is talking to Togata and Toshihori outside, to remind them what I know he’s already told them yesterday. Togata is - well, you know what Togata looks like. Toshihori looks a little scary, I guess. He has black instead of white eyes, with blue irises, really damaged hair that he should definitely see someone about, and he’s really skinny. But I promise he’s a lovely person! Very proper and has a kind of grandfatherly way about him! I think this is the first time that he and Togata have spent time together, but I’m sure that they’ll take good care of you two while Shouta and I go to school.”

You two .

This could not be happening. Not Eri. Not Eri.

He knew what Toshihori would do. He was feared, even by Yamada. Perhaps Yamada had even been punished by him before. Why would Yamada do this if he knew? Why would he let-

27 looks at Eri, who tilts her head at him in confusion. “It’s okay, Twenny! Mirio’s really nice! Toshihori is kinda nervous a lot, but I think he’s nice too!”

Maybe not Eri, at least. There were very few people who would stoop to that, and Eri hadn’t done anything wrong. Mirio was there...

To distract her.

That was fine. Whatever Toshihori did to him would be fine. As long as Eri didn’t see, as long as she didn’t know. She had always been kept out of the rooms it happened in, only once did Chisaki show her, but he meant to do that as punishment for her. And as bad as that was, it could have been worse.

He could do this. He could bear anything.

Present Mic gets frustrated when he checks his watch, pulling at his hair. “Oh, we’re going to be late, why is he like this?! I’ll be right back! And I’ll tell you so because I’m a decent person in the morning!”

He stops at the door for a moment instead of opening it, and then presses his ear against it. He hears something he didn’t like, because he then throws it open and closes it behind him.

His owner is the one who opens the door, guiding two men in behind him. Eri recognizes the hero and runs to him, shouting his name, and the hero kneels down with her name yelled in answer, hugging her tightly.

27 bites down on something ugly, something he doesn’t have time for, and looks at the other man.

He is thin, far too thin. 27 knows that he’s not one to cast stones in most cases, thanks to too many days without meals, but this man is dangerously thin. His hair looks only slightly better than 27’s did, but Present Mic was right about his eyes. They are startling.

The red sweater that hangs off the man might hide a blade, but that seems a bit pedestrian for the reputation this Toshinori has built up. His pants only appear to have two pockets, and though he’s far away, he thinks they only contain keys, phone and a wallet. Just as 27 suspected, the man must have a quirk well suited for punishment.

His arms are too skinny to be the same quirk as Bug’s, and Chisaki’s quirk was so powerful that it could only appear in one man.

He’s aware his owner is speaking to him, and shifts his gaze back to Mirio and Eri. He tries to ignore the ugliness again, knowing that he has more important things to worry about, but it flares up in him all the same.

“Shou, I went through it because you were taking too long,” Present Mic whines, grabbing his owner’s arm to try to pull him outside. He stops, turning to 27. “Shinsou, are we good?”

Well, he really has nothing left to lose. He throws two thumbs up, then signs to Present Mic. ‘Bye, Now Music.’ He thinks that’s the one he hates the most, and the way his mustache twitches tells him he’s correct.

Present Mic drags his owner out the door and shuts it, leaving Eri and himself to the care of the underlings.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: None again!

But if you, like me, have lived through the dark ages of the 2000's Internet, the excessive use of the word 'cookie' might bring to mind several cursed memories. But, an homage to The Last Resort was rather necessary here.

Aizawa hated using his phone at school, even if it was allowed in the rulebook. It always felt extremely inappropriate, in a way that a well-earned nap didn't. But he reasoned that since he was planning on taking a nap during homeroom anyway, he could make an allowance.

"Are there any questions regarding the new ward?" Aizawa asked, in a tone that he hoped would sway his students to not ask questions.

Ashido raised her hand, but upon noticing his glare, decided that she wouldn't be called on. "Why do we have so many more rules with him than with Eri?"

Because I didn't think to give you rules before I brought her to the classroom, and it was a disaster. "Different circumstances." Midoriya wavered under his gaze, but his hand remained up. Aizawa sighed. "Midoriya."

"If the new ward is who I think he is, he has a voice related quirk, which means that difficulties in communication are a sign of very serious issues, but is he considered a vocal type emitter if his quirk factor hasn't been determined to be—"

"Midoriya," Aizawa repeated, his voice far more gravely in irritation. "A question."

"R-right, sensei. Is that person who I think he is?" Midoriya finally managed to ask. Aizawa glanced around the room, and too many students looked interested rather than confused by the question.

Aizawa sighed. "The new ward is Shinsou Hitoshi. He was rescued from the 8 Precepts of Death alongside Eri. Don't interact with him, he is unlikely to speak to any of you. That is all the information you need to know, and you will not inquire further."

Asui raised her hand, and Aizawa felt the cold sting of betrayal. He couldn't even manage a glare.

"Asui."

"Would he recognize those of us who were part of the raid, kero?" Asui asked. "I'm not sure if one of us bringing it up would be distressing, or if we should avoid him more overall, kero, but his state of mind at the time makes the possibility...unclear. Kero."

At least she had a good question. One that Aizawa hadn't even prepared for. "I would like to remind you all that you should avoid approaching Shinsou at all, but for those of you who participated in the raid, simply leave it at that. His state of mind at the time remains unclear, but he would be unlikely to remember you."

Aizawa needs to remember to pull Asui and Uraraka aside later, to gather more information about what happened during the rescue operation. He hadn't been present, but based on what Asui said, Shinsou wasn't unconscious. He may have said something that could help the investigation.

"Now, I need to step out of the room for a few minutes. As you are all aware, any destruction or injuries that occur while I'm gone will result in severe discipline on my return." After staring down Bakugo for an appropriate amount of time, Aizawa steps out and dials Naomasa's number.

"Good morning, Eraserhead! I wasn't expecting your report so early, but that's a good sign," Naomasa greets him, and he hears the closing of a door in the background.

"I need an appointment with the tattoo expert as quickly as possible," Aizawa stated, checking the hallway as he made his way to a nearby conference room that he knew would be empty.

"I didn't expect that to be needed so suddenly, but I'll make the call after this one. Any time in particular-"

"Yesterday would have been preferable," Aizawa answers, closing the conference door behind himself. "Shinsou tried to burn off a tattoo that he gained after being fused with Chisaki."

"I'll pull as many strings as I have." Naomasa says, and his tone leaves no room for doubt. "Is he still unable to talk?"

"He can speak to Eri, and he knows sign. Not much, but the basics of communication are there. We've also used a laptop, but I suspect something is wrong with his right hand. He becomes distressed when asked to write something. Is that news to you?"

"I'll talk to Sansa, but when I supervised part of his statement, he didn't seem distressed. I did suspect an old injury, but we didn't give the hospital much time to do a thorough investigation. Perhaps Recovery Girl could shed some light on it."

Aizawa frowns. "Naomasa, do you remember Bearclaw?"

He's surprised that Naomasa says yes. The case was closed years ago, a villain who had killed 25 people by tearing them to pieces using his Bear-quirk. When he was apprehended and brought in for questioning as to his motives, suspected to be a member of a crime syndicate, he refused to talk. He had gone stock still and silent, just staring at the wall. But when Naomasa brought in a keychain sized teddy bear that had been in his affects, Bearclaw broke down. He made a full confession, right there, interspersed with pleas to have his keychain back.

"Why did you take off Shinsou's mask?"

Naomasa doesn't answer for a while, almost long enough to confirm his suspicions. "Aizawa. This has become the most unfortunate case I've ever handled. There are many things I wish I had done differently, but I had to remove the mask. It was rigged to Chisaki's vitals. The moment it was taken off, it opened, and if it was still attached, Shinsou's jaw would have been torn from his skull. We believe that was the moment when Chisaki's hands were destroyed."

"You took it off before you knew that," Aizawa states. You stacked the deck against a child before you even knew about the Nomu organization.

Naomasa doesn't disagree. "I would like to give Shinsou a bugged laptop. In the privacy of his own room, he may type things or search for terms that could be helpful in the investigation. It would be the least invasive way of gathering information."

As much as Aizawa would like to refuse, he knows that he can't. There's no logical argument against it. "I or Yamada will pick it up when it's ready."

"Good. Unless there's anything else -"

"I want direct access to what the keylogger finds," Aizawa interrupts.

"Of course, I'll make sure that's available. And I'll let you know when the tattoo removal appointment is." Naomasa says. "For what it's worth, I'm glad that he's with you, Eraserhead."

Aizawa hangs up, glaring at the wall.

He could try to say that being taken off of his patrols for the immediate future was having an effect on him, or that he was simply running on too little sleep, but he knew better.

He hated how much Shinsou was afraid of him. He hated that he had been taught to fear someone that much.

He hated that he had taken advantage of it too.

Eri looks up from her coloring book and frowns. It's probably the hundredth time she's checked on Shinsou and found something that disappointed her.

Mirio looks up from his own coloring book to see Shinsou sitting on the couch, ostensibly reading a book about JSL. But he only signs once every four or so pages that he flips through, and he turns each page slowly. His eyes aren't focused on the book now, they're turned to All Might, who seems oblivious to the attention as he reads his own book at the dinner table.

Mirio cups his chin with his hand, wondering what All Might's strategy was. When they first arrived, a hands-off approach seemed like the best method. Shinsou was extremely agitated, which was to be expected with two basically unknown intruders entering his home. He needed time to observe them, to know what kind of actions to expect from them.

But the hard lines from tension in Shinsou's body had only grown stiffer, and the way he glanced at All Might was shifting from fear to irritation. He had also shifted from just sitting on the couch to crouching in the corner of the arm rest, ready to spring forward.

He was becoming more agitated about something, and if it wasn't resolved soon, he may do something drastic.

"Hey, Eri," Mirio called, drawing a flinch from Shinsou. "Have we watered the bean yet today?"

Eri pulled a panicked face. "No! I forgot!"

"It's okay! Let's get some water and check on it!" Mirio said, picking Eri up to help her pick a cup from the cabinet and turning on the faucet so she could fill it with water. He noticed an odd scorch mark in the basin, probably evidence left from Aizawa-sensei trying to make instant noodles again.

Mirio let Eri down and followed her to her room, where she was relieved to find the beansprout on the windowsill no worse for wear. "I'm sorry, Beanie. There's just been a lot of stuff going on," Eri apologized to her science project, gently trickling water into the styrofoam cup.

" It's okay, Eri! " Mirio answered in a high pitched voice. " I know you've been really busy, so I've been working hard to grow a whole lot for you! "

Eri giggled, her panic forgotten. "I want Beanie to grow really big, and make little beans so me and Twenny can both have Beanies. And you can have a Beanie too! Maybe..." Eri trailed off, her voice becoming smaller. "Maybe Twenny won't be scared of you if you both had Beanies. 'Cause Twenny said he likes you, he's just scared."

Mirio nodded, ruffling the top of Eri's head. "I like Twenny too! But I can be kinda scary, since I'm such a big guy. I know he'll stop being scared of me pretty quick, because he knows we're good friends-"

"BEST friends!" Eri corrects, throwing her arms around his legs. Mirio melted at the sight.

Eri had always been shy, even after she had time to warm up to him. Even if she had always felt this way, something had kept her from expressing it in such a happy, normal way.

Mirio definitely liked Twenny, even if just for allowing Eri to feel safe enough to act like the happy girl she deserved to be.

"I don't think Twenny is really scared of me, though," Mirio says softly, patting Eri's head. "I think he's kinda scared of Toshinori, and I'm kind of in a pickle, because I don't know why."

Eri presses her head against his knees, curling her toes into the carpet. "Mirio, I'm not supposed to tell anyone, but... If you don't tell anyone, never ever ever.... I can tell you."

Mirio crouches down, solemnly offering his pinky finger with his other hand across his heart. "I won't tell, Eri. It'll be our super special secret."

Eri frowns at his offered pinky, becoming far too serious for Mirio not to be concerned. "It's about the bad place that Twenny was at, so you really can't tell anyone, Mirio. Really. Twenny said I can't tell anyone, or something really bad would happen, and he was really scared, so it's got to be really bad."

Mirio grinds his teeth behind his smile, knowing he's have to betray the very confidence he was promising Eri. "I won't tell anyone, Eri. I wouldn't tell any of our secrets, but especially if it's something dangerous."

Eri stares at his pinky for a while, trying to decide whether to trust him, before she wraps her tiny pinky around his. "Twenny drew a picture, a long time ago. I think he had a bad dream, where people change. And he says that looking at those people makes it better, 'cause you remember what they look like. But Twenny couldn't look at the ladies he drew, so he drew them. And one of them looks kinda like Toshinori."

"And they were from the bad place," Mirio whispers.

Eri nods. "He said I can't tell anyone. And he got really scared when I looked at it. Really really scared. And the picture was scary too."

"Does he still have it?" Mirio asked. "It sounds really scary."

Eri shook her head. "He got rid of it. But the lady had a black eye, like Toshinori, but she only had one. And she had yellow hair, but it was really long and swirly. I had bad dreams about her, 'cause she was so scary."

"What about the other lady? Was she scary too?"

Eri shook her head again. "She looked nice. She was kinda smiling. Twenny got really mad drawing her, but I think he wanted to do a good job. I think it was a really bad dream..." Eri fidgets, her head lowering. " 'Cause when someone nice changes with a bad person, it's really scary."

Mirio knows he should try to get more information on the other woman, but Eri is far too upset for any more prying. "Those are really scary. I'm sorry you and Twenny have dreams like that."

Eri looks up at him, opening her mouth to say something else, but then decides not to, and pulls her pinky away. "Maybe if we get Twenny a stuffie, he won't be scared of Toshinori."

"Maybe! But I had another idea we could try," Mirio says, standing up. "I think that we should try doing something together! All four of us! That way Twenny can see that Toshinori isn't scary, because you'll be right there with him! And nothing bad can happen when Eri is here!"

"Yeah! I can keep Twenny safe and you can too!" Eri cheers, pumping her fist in the air with a toothy not-quite smile.

Mirio grabs her sides and lifts her up, inspired by the heroic pose. He runs into the living room, shouting, "Never fear, Super Eri is here!"

Shinsou flinches, looking at them with wide eyes, but something in Eri's expression pulls a soft smile from him. All Might covers his bloody cough with a handkerchief, then chuckles at the sight. "If I were an active hero, I do believe I'd ask you to be my sidekick, Miss Super Eri! What a bold and reassuring catchphrase!"

Eri shrinks a bit under the scrutiny, embarrassed, and kicks to be put down. As soon as she's on the ground, she runs over to All Might, putting her hands on his knees. "Mr. Toshinori, can we do an activity together? All four of us?"

All Might wrings his hands, nervous in the face of Eri's polite pleading and puppy dog eyes. "O-of course! What would you like to do, Miss Eri?"

Mirio knew that Eri wasn't likely to answer. She was getting better at open-ended questions, but still needed a suggestion or two before she could make a decision. "Maybe we could make lunch together," Mirio offered, wondering how badly a group rendition of Baby Shark could go.

"I'm afraid my cooking skills are on par with Aizawa's, but I am getting better at baking!" Toshinori said, raising his finger. "Perhaps we could bake some cookies to enjoy after lunch?"

"You can make cookies?" Eri asked, eyes wide with wonder.

"Why, yes, I can." All Might answered, nervously scratching the back of his head. "I may have scorched the first few batches I made, but now I'm quite competent!"

Eri raced to Shinsou, placing her hands on his legs. "Twenny! Toshinori can make cookies! A lot of them! Not just the ones in those little packages! That means you can have them too, right? 'Cause you said you can't eat those cookies because they're Eri cookies, but these can be everyone's cookies!"

"Y-yeah, Eri," Shinsou answered, resting his hand on her head. "As long as you get enough, I can have some too. If that's okay."

"Of course! I'm sure Yamada has enough for a few batches, but if not, we can definitely have some supplies delivered," All Might reassured, rising to look through the cabinets. "Yes, we do have a few options... Sugar, snickerdoodle, chocolate chip, oatmeal, perhaps there are a few lemons in the refrigerator too."

Mirio went to check, if only to allow his smile to drop for a few minutes while he searched.

He had allowed himself to forget it, but seeing Shinsou and Eri interact for the first time reminded him of it.

Shinsou was a kid. A kid who had gone through so much already, gaining far more scars than the ones on his face and hands. He was a scared, traumatized kid who ended up raising another kid all by himself. A kid who denied himself cookies so Eri could have enough. A kid who deserved his own cookies.

A kid who needed a hero for years, but never got one. And when he met with Sir Nighteye....

He begged for Eri to be saved, not him.

"We have lemons and oranges!" Mirio announced, painting his smile back on. "And it looks like enough butter, milk, and eggs for several batches. Maybe even one of each!"

"Excellent!" All Might said with a clap. "Now, I have heard that little Miss Eri is quite a fiend for lemon muffins, and young Togata for oatmeal cookies, so I'm quite pleased with our supplies." Mirio blushed, wondering how on Earth that information had gotten to All Might of all people. "I myself enjoy chocolate chip, but what type would you like, Shinsou?"

Mirio flinched. Surely All Might hadn't forgotten....

All Might's jolt and ensuing panic told him he did. "Oh, I mean- you do seem like someone partial to snickerdoodle, but, uh..."

Mirio sent a pleading look to Eri, and noticed how Shinsou's shoulders had risen to his ears. Eri nodded in determination, turning to Shinsou. "Twenny, what's your favorite cookie? I wanna make your favorite ones!"

The tension seeped out of Shinsou all at once, and he smiled at Eri. "I'll like any cookies you make, Eri. I don't really remember my favorite, but I remember liking chocolate."

"I like chocolate too!" Eri cheered.

"Me too!" Mirio cheered as well.

"Perfect! I was hoping to try something a little different if we have enough left over," All Might said, glancing at the coffee pot. "Togata, my boy, if you could get the ingredients from the top shelf - I don't quite trust myself not to drop any - then I can check the instructions for the meal Yamada has prepared for us. And perhaps Eri and Shinsou could set out a few mixing bowls-"

"Yeah! Come on, Twenny, we've got to be good helpers!" Eri cheered, pulling on Shinsou's hand.

"I'm coming," Shinsou answered, pausing to put his book down before allowing himself to be dragged to the kitchen.

Mirio beamed as they set to work, noticing that Shinsou became more relaxed with a task at hand and Eri by his side.

Even if Shinsou still followed every move All Might made as he directed them, it was a far cry from what he had seen before.

The kid even looked happy at times.

27 watched as Eri broke her cookie in half, chocolate stringing then breaking as she did so. She handed half out to him, a little ritual she had made with the last few batches of cookies.

He found that he did like chocolate, as well as snickerdoodle and lemon, but Mirio was the only one to actually enjoy the oatmeal cookies.

Even though 27 couldn't remember being able to eat to the point he felt this full, not counting the times he was force fed, he took a bite of the cookie.

"It's kinda...yucky," Eri said, pulling a small frown.

27 didn't know what she was talking about, it was delicious. It had a bitter flavor throughout, only broken up by globs of chocolate chips, but something about the combination just made it better.

"Well, coffee is an acquired taste!" Mirio says, frowning around a bite. "But, this kind of tastes like..." The hero turned around to investigate the coffee machine, pulling out a canister from behind it. "Oh no! This is Aizawa-sensei's illegal blend! When Nejire stole a sip from it last year, she almost passed out from caffeine poisoning!"

"Oh goodness! I really should have-" Toshinori fumbles, reaching forward to take the tray.

27 sweeps a stack of cookies into his hand, pulling them close to his chest with a glare, challenging the man to take them from him.

Toshinori withers under his stare. "Shinsou, my boy, I really don't think it's a good idea to eat those."

27 stuffs the rest of the cookie in his mouth. Come what may, he wasn't going to give these up.

"Maybe the batter cuts through enough of it, so it isn't dangerous?" Mirio says, though he clearly doesn't believe his own words. "In any case, I don't think we're getting those back."

"Nope," 27 says around a mouthful. His hands are starting to tingle, and his mind has never been so alert. Why didn't The Miasma have these things on hand? 27 felt like he could fight a room full of 98 clones and come out without a scratch.

"Twenny, you really like them!" Eri says, handing him her half. He stuffs it in his mouth before Toshinori can stop her.

"They're really good," 27 says, reaching for his glass of milk. He drains it and wonders why he's still so thirsty. "Kind of familiar. I was wondering what that machine made. Coffee? I think I like coffee. It's really good. Why is it so familiar? I think I've at least smelled coffee a lot. I don't know where. These are really good though. Effective for combat. Why haven't I had these before? Maybe it's not good for long term use. Maybe it's damaging. I don't know. Why do I remember what coffee smells like? It's weird. It's so familiar."

Mirio refills his glass of milk and pushes it forward with a pleading tension in his eyes. 27 drains the glass again with several chugs.

"My hands feel weird. So does my head. Huh. It smells really familiar." 27 can't stop talking, even when he tries to. He feels like if he stays quiet, the words will build up and his head will explode. "Huh. This is a good interrogation tactic. Why didn't the police officer try it? I mean, he tried a lot of other things. I really can't stop talking. This feels weird. I don't like talking. What's your quirk? I don't know. I'm not trying to use my quirk. I hate it. I don't want to use it. Especially not on you. Sorry."

Toshinori looks shocked for a moment, surprised that 27 would do something as stupid as ask him a question directly. He doesn't know why he can't stop asking questions, he knows better, and he can barely blurt out a sentence afterwards to keep his quirk from activating. It was starting to give him a headache.

Instead of lashing out, like 27 is sure he will, like 27 has been waiting for him to, Toshinori just wrings his hands. "Oh! Uh, well, it's hard to believe now, but before I retired I was known as All Might."

27 is shocked out of wondering what Toshinori was going to do to him with his quirk. All Might .

It has to be a joke. He's convinced it is, but then Mirio shows a rare frown. "All Might, sir, even without your quirk, you'll always be All Might. You'll always be the greatest hero of our time. Sir Nighteye would tell you the same thing."

All Might .

"O-Of course, my boy! A quirk certainly doesn't make the hero, but I am quite unrecognizable now. It's been quite a change, but one that I've found I'm growing to like."

He had been sitting in the same room as All Might, the man that The Miasma made millions off of just for knowing the most benign things about him, such as his shoulder width or the name of a fan he spoke to. He had been waiting for and half-goading All Might to punish him. And thought he'd survive that.

"You know, young Shinsou," All Might said, drawing his attention back to the man. 27 doesn't know how he does it, but he manages to look him in the face. "I can understand that you have difficulties with your quirk right now. I myself have heard others speak about quirks negatively, to describe them as villainous. Perhaps, you could see me as somewhat of an authority on villains, given my career, but I've always disagreed with that way of thinking. Quirks are always what you make of them, and I think yours has the makings of a heroic one."

Heroic? His quirk?

Mirio nods, beaming from ear to ear. “Of course! There are a lot of flashy and offensive quirks out there, but the utility of yours is really far beyond any of them! Instead of dragging out a long fight, risking casualties on either side, you could just walk up to the villains and say, ‘Hey, are you guys making trouble?’ and then they’d answer you, and you’d have them completely restrained! In an instant! Without anyone getting hurt! It really doesn’t get more heroic than that!”

Toshinori sputtered another stream of blood into his handkerchief, wiping the red smears from his mouth as he chuckled. “Just imagine how differently my last fight would have gone with young Shinsou by my side. The man was a hapless rambler. He wouldn’t have been able to resist.”

27 took another bite, considering. Mirio’s strategy would never work, he couldn’t use his quirk on multiple people at once. He would start a fight and have to take the rest down, and depending on how many they were and how strong they were, he might not make it. And taking down a villain that ended All Might’s career? Just like that? With his quirk?

Ridiculous.

“If a quirk is what you make of it,” 27 says, staring at the counter. “Then I’m already a villain anyway. I shoplifted. A lot. That’s not even close to the worst thing I’ve done.” He takes another bite, even though his hands are starting to shake. “Or maybe I’m a criminal. What’s the difference between a villain and a criminal? They never covered that. They should have. I should have gotten a rulebook or something. I probably messed up a rule for criminals. Maybe I should have gone to villain’s school. Is there a villain school? I mean, probably. There’s a hero school. There must be a villain’s school somewhere. I’m still talking a lot. It doesn’t make any sense. Can I have- wait, no, I’m not going to ask questions, I got lucky that time. Is it- it’s really hot to me. I feel really hot.”

“Shinsou, maybe you should give-” Mirio starts, then flinches when 27 takes another bite out of spite.

“These are mine. You can’t have them. If you try to take them from me, I could probably throw you across the room. I mean, with the proper leverage, I could throw a lot bigger people than you, and you’re pretty big. A really tough opponent. Especially the quirk. I’d definitely try to quirk you first in a training match. But that only works once. Next time, you’d probably be mad. That happens a lot. I’m pretty sure Dragon Face never forgave me for what I said about his face, but he was really easy to rile up. I never caught his name. Why are names weird? I have a lot of them. A lot of people do, but my names are weird. Huh. 27 stuck though. Maybe it was my second name? I don’t remember the first one. I don’t like the new one. It’s weird. Why do these-”

“Hey, uh,” Mirio interrupts, holding out an open tupperware. “I think those cookies are going to make you sick if you keep eating them, so why don’t we put them in here and you can keep them without eating them? Is that okay?”

Eri jolts up in panic, hands wrapped tight around his arm. “Twenny, don’t eat those! They’ll make you sick!”

27 doesn’t need any more reason than the panic in Eri’s red eyes to put the cookies in the container, though he holds it to his chest as soon as the lid is shut. He tries to breathe, but finds himself breathing a lot faster than normal, and he is starting to feel sick to his stomach. “It’s okay, Eri. Even if I get sick, it’ll be okay. Chisaki isn’t here, and the new people don’t care that I can’t talk, so it’s okay. But I won’t get sick, so that’s okay.”

Eri’s eyes well up with tears, and he feels guilt wrap around him tightly. He knows he’s acting strange, and it's worrying her, but he can't really stop it. He feels his arms twitching, itching to do something, anything. He feels more restless than he ever has in his life, but the nausea increases with his restlessness as well.

"Eri, it's okay. Shinsou's not sick, he just ate too many cookies, so he's kind of hyper right now," Mirio says, placating her. "I'm going to look up on my phone what to do to help."

"Perhaps if he takes a medication that causes drowsiness, it can cancel out the effect," Toshinori offers, looking through the cabinets.

Mirio winces. "I thought that too, but this article says that's a bad idea. Water, exercise - well, maybe not, that could make it-"

"I do need exercise though. I haven't trained in a month. I haven't really trained in a long time. Am I going to have to fight hero students? I don't know. Their quirks must be really powerful. Like those hero cartoons, since they're heroes. When is that going to happen? I don't know. When is..." 27 feels his stomach clench, and it hurts. He felt like he was going to throw up before, but now he wants nothing more than to do so.

"Twenny," Eri whines, noticing his arm wrapped around his stomach.

"Herbal tea! Herbal tea is best, All Might, can you-" Mirio starts, looking up from his phone.

"Mint and chamomile would be well suited for this, I think," Toshinori says, pulling out a tea kettle.

"Eri, it'll also help if Shinsou has something to hold onto, like a stuffed animal, so can you-" Eri runs away before Mirio can finish his sentence, and returns with Mocha held in her hands.

"Thanks, Eri," 27 manages to grunt, nearly doubled over from nausea. Holding Mocha to his stomach did seem to help. "Is Mocha magic? I used to think so, I think. Maybe."

"Perhaps a bit too magical," Toshinori chuckles, picking out some dried herbs. "It is good to know that those mocha cookies could become dangerous in the wrong hands. For a moment, I truly believed you would throw young Mirio, my boy."

"Mocha," 27 repeats to himself, pressing his sweaty brow to the cold countertop. "I wonder if my mom likes me now. I thought she would. Probably not."

"It's okay, Twenny," Eri says, pressing herself against his side.

"It's okay. I've got you. You've got me." 27 says, wrapping his arm around her. His stomach churns ominously, and he can feel the saliva build up in his mouth. "And it's okay, but I'm going to throw up."

27 races to the bathroom, hoping that he managed to reassure Eri enough beforehand.

What's New, Pussycats?

Chapter Summary

27 has been poisoned, and now faces a new interrogation tactic while he's weakened, and distracted by his favorite Saturday morning cartoon.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Again, none!

Also, Happy birthday Aizawa! This week's update will be an early double post to celebrate.

When he hears a knock at the door, Toshinori is prepared to throw himself into a dogeza and beg for Aizawa's forgiveness, before he realizes that neither Aizawa nor Yamada would have knocked.

Togata looks up from his phone and gives him a reassuring smile. "Oh, I asked Midoriya to pick up a caffeine detox drink from the combini down the street. He just texted to confirm that it's him."

"Young Togata, are you certain that's a good idea?" Toshinori asks, glancing at the still miserable Shinsou, wrapped up in blankets as Eri lays on top of him, watching a cartoon. "Aizawa may not approve of any visitors he doesn't know about."

"I'll take full responsibility," Togata pledges, bowing quickly. "But if Aizawa-sensei sees Shinsou in this state, we'll die."

The cheerful smile only makes the truth of the statement more haunting. "I will take responsibility, young Togata. I was the poisoner in this instance."

Togata tries to protest, but another polite knock at the door stops him. He walks forward to open it and greets Midoriya, who takes a look around the darkened room before his eyes fall on Toshinori. "All Might, are you okay? Did someone give you caffeinated tea?"

"Jeez, you're basically accusing me of poisoning All Might," Togata pouts exaggeratedly, crossing his arms over his chest.

“O-Of course not, Sempai! But why would you need caffeine detox?” Midoriya asks, holding up the bag in his hand.

Midoriya’s eyes look haunted as he turns to face Togata, his movements stilted and tense. “Sempai. Did you-”

“Loud,” Shinsou grumbles, probably due to the headache that had set in an hour ago, stretching his arm weakly towards Midoriya. “Relief. Now.”

“Oh! You must be Shinsou!” Midoriya says, toeing off his shoes to walk over to the miserable teen splayed across the couch. “It’s very nice to meet you! I’m Midoriya Izuku! It’s nice to be able to meet you before tomorrow when you meet everyone in school, since it might help to see a familiar face! Other than Eri and Aizawa and Toshinori and...”

The glare beneath Shinsou’s furrowed brows knocks the wind from Midoriya’s sails, and he rushes to pull out the detox drink.

Shinsou yanks the bottle from Midoriya’s hands and chugs it, his eyebrows furrowing further with the effort. He stares at the empty bottle afterwards, then sits up to stare at Midoriya.

“O-oh, here’s another one if you need it!” Midoriya offers, and Shinsou only shakes his head, scanning the room. “Uh, Sempai, why was Shinsou-”

“It was my fault,” Toshinori says, bowing at the waist. “I unwittingly made some mocha cookies with a coffee that is apparently poisonous to all but Aizawa. The effects are, as you can see, quite devastating.”

“The illegal dark blend,” Midoriya mutters, hand raising to cup his chin. “I noticed he was drinking it, which is odd because the forums didn’t pick up on any eventful patrols in his areas, and he wasn’t assigned to watch our dorm, even though it was supposed to be his shift last night. He didn’t appear to be injured, so a mission is unlikely, but not impossible. Maybe he was able to remain on the backlines and had the proper support to-”

Shinsou points to his chest, then his hands flutter into a sign, as he grimaces.

“Oh! Uh, I know that you’re referring to yourself, but I don’t recognize the other sign. Sorry, I only remember a few signs since it’s been so long. I tried to learn with my friend, Kachan, but since it’s him, I only remember the signs for bad words,” Midoriya admitted, scratching the back of his head.

Shinsou stares at him blankly, until Eri runs up to tackle Midoriya from behind. “Twenny, this is Izuku! He talks a lot, but he’s really, super nice! He should be your friend!”

“Eri!” Midoriya says, turning to ruffle her hair with a smile. “It’s nice to see you so excited! I’m sure me and Shinsou will definitely be friends!”

Shinsou watches Midoriya speak to Eri with a guarded expression, something akin to jealousy flashing across his eyes, but then turns around to make sure that the tupperware with the mocha cookies are still on the other end of the couch, along with the stuffed cat. Toshinori has noticed he was quite possessive over those items.

“Hey, Midoriya, is Aizawa-sensei running late? He was supposed to be back around this time.” Togata asks, checking the time on his phone.

Midoriya tilts his head in confusion. “He asked to see Ochako, Tsu-chan, Kachan, and Todoroki after school. I’m not sure why he needed to talk to Ochako and Tsu-chan, but I thought he was going to take Kachan and Todoroki to their provisional licensing training since Yamada-sen...” The teen cups his chin again, eyebrows furrowing. “No, Present Mic doesn’t have a show scheduled for tonight, since it’s Wednesday. And his show is usually cancelled if something comes up, not rescheduled, except for the Christmas special five years ago-”

“I suppose I should call Yamada and ask if he will be the one to return home first, but I do recall he had a meeting with Principal Nezu scheduled,” Toshinori said, pulling out his phone. “Perhaps if we have a few more hours than expected, Shinsou and young Midoriya could become better acquainted.”

Togata pulls an unsure face, probably seeking to gently scold him, but Toshinori raises a hand to stop him.

“I do think it would be good for young Shinsou to have a familiar face tomorrow. After all, class 1-A is an excitable bunch.” Toshinori isn’t sure if his smile is reassuring enough, or if he had simply left no room for the young man to protest politely, but Togata brightens all the same, and agrees.

His phone call to Yamada confirmed his suspicion that he did not know that Aizawa was going to be running late, and that it would indeed be a few hours before Toshinori and Togata would be relieved of their duties. He waved off Yamada’s profuse apologies, and reassured him it was no trouble, before returning to the living room to check on his young charges.

Shinsou still had command of the couch, with only Eri allowed to sit on it, perched on his legs in a way that made Toshinori’s knees ache in sympathy. Togata and Midoriya were sitting on the floor, as the green haired teen spoke excitedly about the cartoon they were about to watch, having seen it during his childhood.

Satisfied, Toshinori began preparing a pot of tea while he searched for a bag of popcorn. The excitement of nearly being slain by Eraserhead had died down, and left him quite worn out for what had otherwise been a pleasant day off.

27 doesn’t like this show.

He remembers it.

He remembers watching a lot of it as a kid. Him and Mocha, curled up on the couch, alone for most of Saturday before his mom finally came out of her room to make him dinner.

The show explained a lot of things to him as a kid. Like why his quirk was a bad one.

The heroes on this show had good quirks, like the boy who could be twisted up into any shape and come out unharmed, or the girl who could move the earth, or the other girl who could sense where people were.

His favorite one was the telepath girl. He thought he could be a telepath.

He thought his quirk was just developing funny, but if he tried hard enough, he could send messages into people's brains. He could start sending messages that would make his mom happy to his mom, and she'd smile like she used to. But every time he tried, his mom got mad. She'd stop moving, even after he snapped the threads tying her mind to his. She'd stare, for a really long time, not moving, until she went back to her room and stayed there for a while. Sometimes hours. Sometimes days. Then she'd come back out, and everything would be fine.

Until his head itched. Until he thought to himself, this time I'll do it right.

What a stupid little kid.

Eri dug her elbows into his side, curled up behind him, holding her head with her hands as she watched both Izuku and the television show with tired, half-lidded eyes. Izuku was fun to watch, though. He's pretty sure the kid has seen this show a million times, but he still jumps and gasps when the villain is revealed, or hums and nods about the first aid technique each episode explains. Eri does too, but she has an excuse.

Izuku keeps looking at him. 27 doesn't like it.

He knows he's looking at his scars.

They're hard to see in the dark, only lit up by the television screen. When the screen gets bright, that's when Izuku looks.

27 misses the mask.

He knows he shouldn't. He knows that Eri would hate it. That it would remind her of the 8 Precepts.

But he can allow himself to miss it. Miss the way it kept him from speaking. He said a lot of things that he didn't mean to, and without the mask, he'd keep saying those things. People would keep staring.

Izuku glances over at him again. It's rude. This time, 27 glares, and Izuku jumps.

"S-sorry! I didn't know I was- I just- didyouwatchthisshow?" the green haired boy stutters, hand scratching furiously at his messy hair.

27 must not have hidden his surprise, because Mirio laughs.

"Midoriya used Search! It's super effective!" the hero says, glancing up from his phone game.

"You could try out the phone to talk to him, if you want. But I think Midoriya is going to combust if he doesn't know whether you're a fellow hero fan or not."

27 doesn't really care whether the kid combusts, but he does want him to stop looking at him. He fumbles for a minute, trying to remember which button turns the phone on, then pulls up the text-to-speech app that Mirio showed him and types in his response. "I wa-atched it when I was young-er."

The voice is weird, but at least it works. Izuku grins at him. "Oh! Who was your favorite hero? I really liked Tiger, but my favorite hero overall was-um. Uh." He suddenly blushes, glancing over at Toshinori. "Who was your favorite? In the show and in general, I guess."

27 frowns at his phone. He didn't have a favorite hero overall, not one he remembers, but.... "Man-da-lay. Her qu-irk is the mo-ost useful in these e-episodes ."

"Right? She's the perfect support hero, and she always comes up with a great strategy! I couldn't believe it when I got to speak to her during Summer Camp!" Izuku gushes.

Mirio sees something in 27's face that betrays him again, and smiles even harder. "Maybe Aizawa-sensei should call her so you can meet her, Shinsou."

27 tries to hide it, but he wanted to meet her. Even after all these years, a part of him still wanted that. Wanted to meet his favorite hero, even if the dreams her character had promised him had all turned to ruin.

"Tis I! Brainwash-io! Oh oh oh!"

27 forgot it was this show.

"If you talk to me, I turn you into a zombie! Look at how I've turned these cute little kitties into evil, gross zombies! Oh oh oh! Your mother is allergic to zombie kitties, isn't she, Ragdoll? Oh oh oh!"

"Achoo! Achoo! Leave me, Ragdoll! Achoo! He's too evil! Achoo!"

Maybe that's why he remembered it. He must have been heartbroken as a kid.

"Izuku! I don't like this episode!" Eri whined, turning to look at 27 with a pained expression. She shouldn't throw a fit for his sake, shouldn't draw attention to herself like that.

"It's just a show, Eri," 27 says to try to reassure her. "My quirk doesn't even work like that. Cats can't answer questions."

"It made you sad, though," Eri says, laying herself on top of him. She's been fighting sleep for a while now, which might be making her a bit more sensitive. Maybe once Mirio and the others leave, she'll finally get some rest, and be in a better mood for his owner and Yamada.

"When I was little. I'm not sad about it anymore," 27 says, tugging at her unraveling braid. He hadn't even tied it right.

"You don't like your quirk 'cause the show made you sad, so I don't like this show anymore," Eri mumbled into the blanket, before she sprang up with her eyebrows drawn together in irritation. "And I don't like Izuku for bullying you!"

"Eri?!" Izuku cries, looking stricken. "I didn't mean to-"

"And I don't like Mirio or Toshinori for poisoning you! I hate today! It was supposed to be fun but it's ruined!" Eri screams, kicking her feet in a flurry.

27 sighs, dragging her up by her armpits to hold her up, looking at her grumpy pout and teary eyes. "Eri, you need to calm down. I know you're tired-"

"You're not my mom! You can't tell me to take a nap! No one's my mom if you're not my mom! I don't need a mom, Twenny!" Eri yells, scrunching her face up as it turns red.

Guilt falls over 27 heavily. He should have realized it sooner, but Eri had a hard enough day already, and all these episodes about the Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats' parents needing to be rescued had just compounded the issue.

Eri always got upset when they read books with parental characters in them. She had nightmares about Hansel and Gretel for years, her mental image of her parents growing more grotesque each time. He always had to be careful which book he picked for her after that.

“Then I’m your mom,” 27 says.

Eri is shocked out of her fit, just like he wanted her to be, just like Big Quirks and Little People recommended. If he made the fit more ridiculous, she would stop for a moment to wonder what was going on. Eri did just that, staring at him, her teary red eyes wide.

“And I’m going to put you in your room, so you can take a nap,” 27 says, his tone calm and soothing to try to entice her into agreeing.

Eri is limp for a moment, still staring at him in shock, before her face turns red again and she covers her eyes with her hands, whining, “I don’t need a mom, Twenny.”

“Too bad, I’m your mom now. Next time you get upset, you should tell someone, or walk away to calm down, instead of saying mean things to your friends,” 27 scolds. He knows it’s better to do this when they’re alone, but if Eri doesn’t apologize soon, Izuku and Mirio might start crying.

Eri starts crying instead, one of her more volatile mood swings hitting her hard. Hiccups and sobs jolt through her while he still holds her up. “I-I’m sorr-ry! I d-don’t h-hate you g-guys!”

“Aw, Eri! We know that! We’re sorry that we didn’t realize how tired you were!” Mirio apologizes, wiping his own tears from the corners of his eyes. “I’m still your best friend!”

“Y-Yeah!” Eri agrees, nodding violently. “A-and Izuku too! And Toshi! Y-you made me cookies and I was m-mean!”

The green haired kid and the skeleton both wave their hands in front of them in the exact same way, almost copying each other’s reassurances as well. 27 found himself wondering what kind of relationship they had to be able to mirror each other so perfectly without meaning to.

27 gathered Eri into his arms as he stood up, snatching his cookies and Mocha off the couch afterwards. Eri rubbed her nose against his sweatshirt, but he didn’t have the heart to scold her further. He would just make sure to change before Yamada or his owner returned home.

He let Eri down once he entered her room, though she held on to the hem of his shirt. “Pick out a good book for us to read, and your favorite stuffie.”

“Yeah, you can hold him. He’ll make you feel a lot better,” 27 answered, shaking what remained of her braid loose.

Eri took Mocha and held him close to her chest, picking out a tall but thin book about a black alley cat. 27 made himself comfortable on the bed, though he felt like he might sink through it as he wondered how anything could be so soft, and held out an arm for her to lay on.

Eri curled up into his side, handing the book to him as her head fell heavily on his chest. She probably wouldn’t be able to stay awake through the whole story, but she kept picking at his shirt as though to stave off the inevitable.

“Once, there was a black cat, and his fur was sleek as the night-”

27 ran a hand over her back. He shouldn’t encourage this. It was weird, really weird, and they were already weird enough. “Yeah?”

He didn’t have to let the string drop, still doesn’t feel it pull, and Eri just hums, curling herself even closer to him. “The cat is Zawa.”

27 nodded, and turned back to the book. “Once, there was a black cat named Zawa, and his fur was as sleek as the night...”

Eri fell asleep after 3 pages.

27 fell asleep after realizing he couldn’t get up.

Aizawa scanned the hallway as they turned the corner, frowning. “The provisional licensing training isn’t under my discretion. And I don’t disagree with their methods.”

“ARE YOU KIDDING?! I didn’t get into UA to be a damn babysitter! If I see one more snot-nosed little freak I’ll-”

“Shouto!” Endeavor called, exiting a room Aizawa hadn’t been able to check. From the corner of his eye, he saw the flinch. It was a familiar one. “Shouto, you know better than to ignore a message from me.”

“Endeavor,” Aizawa greeted, keeping his tone as level as possible. “If you have something to say to Todoroki, and haven’t gotten a response, reach out through the proper channels provided by UA. This isn’t one of them.”

Endeavor leveled a glare at him, the wreath of flame growing higher. “This seems perfectly adequate to me. I’m speaking to my son, and as I had to take time away from my duties as the number one hero to do so, I suggest you stay out of it .”

“It seems Present Mic gave you the wrong impression last time,” Aizawa said, turning on his heel to approach Endeavor. If the action put Todoroki out of Endeavor’s line of sight, it was just a coincidence. “This isn’t a place for parents to meet with their children. It’s a provisional licensing building. I would expect the number one hero to be aware of that.”

The flames flickered as Endeavor ground his teeth, glaring over Aizawa’s shoulder. He struggled not to use his quirk just to see them flicker out. “Shouto. You will answer my phone call. Am I understood?”

Todoroki nodded, still looking away.

Endeavor turned on his heel and stormed off.

“Sensei,” Todoroki says, far too quietly for even him. “That wasn’t necessary.”

Aizawa knows it was. That it had been. That it had been for a while, but he had looked away from

it. “I only do things that are necessary.”

“Thank you.”

Aizawa glances at Bakugo, his arms crossed and his body language unnervingly demure. Hizashi must not have noticed that when he ‘strategically’ left the boys with Endeavor last time, admitting that he hoped Bakugo could give the hero the what-for and only jump in to ward Endeavor off from retaliating.

Aizawa reminded himself to ask Toshinori to take over the provisional licensing chaperoning duties. It would probably deter Endeavor more efficiently.

Chapter Summary

Eri really likes living with Twenny and Zawa and Yama, but she's still trying to figure out what that means for her. Luckily, she watches a lot of TV, and the TV is very informative.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: None!

Welcome to my favorite chapter to write, and Happy Birthday again, Aizawa!

Eri woke up from her nap feeling a lot better. She kind of wanted to wake up Twenny too, but she knows she has to be a good girl, and not bother Twenny. Even though he said he wasn't sick, she knows he isn't feeling good, and when you don't sleep enough when you don't feel good, you could get sick.

When Twenny got sick, it was really scary. She had to be a really good girl, or else Twenny wouldn't get medicine. Twenny had a cough and couldn't talk, so he couldn't say anything to her, but he really tried to. When He found out about that, He took Eri away from Twenny for a long time. She had to be really good, and go to the chair all on her own. He even made her sit in it without the straps once, but it hurt too much and she couldn't be good. He just stared at her and put them on. She was glad He did that.

Eri didn't like going to the chair. She liked going to the Safe Place a lot more. Twenny always put her in the Safe Place when he took her, but He didn't know how. Or He didn't want to.

When Eri got to go back to Twenny, he cried a lot. Twenny told her he was sorry, and she knows Twenny says he's sorry for a lot of things he doesn't do. But Twenny was really sorry, and Eri cried because he was really, really sad.

Twenny didn't get better until after they got rescued. Twenny tried to hide his cough, or how he was really tired and clumsy a lot, but Eri knew he wasn't okay. Eri worried a lot.

Eri still worries about Twenny. She hopes he never gets sick again, because it made him so sad. She tries to take care of him, like he always took care of her. Eri knows that Yama and Zawa worry about that. They give her weird looks when she feeds him or when she cuddles with him when he gets really scared, but it's Eri's job to take care of Twenny now that she can.

Izuku and Mirio and Toshinori gave her really weird looks when Twenny said he was her mom, but it really made Eri happy. And embarrassed, a whole lot. At first, she thought Twenny was being really mean to her. But Twenny's face was kind of red when he said it, so even though he was embarrassed, she thinks he was happy too.

Eri knows Twenny isn't her mom. She knows her mom gave her away, just like Twenny's mom did to him. Eri doesn't think a lot of moms are nice, only the ones on the TV, but Twenny is like a TV mom, and Eri really wanted to have a TV mom.

But if Eri has a TV mom, Eri needs a TV dad. And Eri wants to see her TV dad right now, and let Twenny sleep. Zawa said that Twenny can sleep alone without having bad dreams, and Eri isn't sure about that, but she can make him feel better if he does since she'll be awake.

When Eri opens the door, Zawa changes the picture on his computer. Sometimes he does that when he's working, because he looks at things that only adults who are 'read in to the investigation' can see. And Eri never gets read in, unless it's an investigation about a cat that went missing. When it is, Zawa shows her a picture and relies on her to tell him where the cat is hiding. He texts what she says to his boss, and after a while, he tells her that she saved the kitty! Eri likes those investigations, because she's really good at them.

"I heard you had a very busy day with Togata and Toshinori," Zawa says when she stays by the door, not sure if she can bother him. Zawa sounds really tired, but he also sounds like he wants to talk to her.

Eri walks over and puts her arms over his lap, sighing. "They poisoned Twenny instead of being friends with him. And I got really mad, and really sad. It wasn't a good day."

Zawa just stares at her for a while, then puts his hand on her head. "I'm sorry you didn't have a good day. I know you were excited about it. It was probably Toshinori's fault, wasn't it?"

"He didn't know you drink poison, so he put it in some cookies. I really liked the other cookies, and Twenny REALLY liked the poison ones. He was kind of being bad when he didn't stop eating them, but I think he knows not to do that anymore," Eri says, then sighs. "Toshinori scared him too. Twenny gets scared of people a lot, but today he was so scared we couldn't do the fun things I had planned."

Zawa frowns, and looks at the computer like he's kind of mad. "I was planning to take you two to school tomorrow, but it sounds like that's not a good idea. Shinsou might need some more time to get comfortable here."

Eri tugs on Zawa's shirt so he looks at her. "Zawa, can you call Twenny 'Twenny'? He doesn't like the name you call him. He said it was weird, and he didn't like it. But I know he likes being called Twenny."

Zawa kind of frowns, but then he stops, because he doesn't like frowning at her. "Eri, would you like to see a picture of Twenny when he was around your age?"

Eri is really excited. She's never seen any pictures of Twenny, and she was really happy that he took the cat picture, because at least she'd always have that one. She nods, and Zawa picks her up so she can see the computer.

He has to type a lot of things in, and some of them look like dots, even though there's not a button for dots on the computer. He clicks on something, and a picture of a boy shows up on the screen.

One of his teeth are missing, and he's kind of smiling in a weird way, kind of like she smiles when she tries really hard to, and he doesn't have any scars. But he has the dark lines under his eyes, and his hair is poofy and purple, just like Twenny's is.

"That's what Twenny looked like?" Eri asks, still surprised. She hopes Zawa isn't playing a trick on her, even though he never does that.

"That's what Twenny looked like when he was 4 years old. Can you read these little words up here?" Zawa points to the words above the picture, and Eri can read it without saying them out loud, but she always likes to read for Zawa and Yama, because they smile when she does.

" 'Shinsou Hitoshi,' " Eri reads, then looks at Zawa. "But that's the name you guys gave him."

Zawa smiles at her, but his eyes are kind of sad. "When children are born, their parents give them names, and those names are called 'legal names.' Some people change their legal names later on, because they don't like them, or if they get married, but the name they receive from their parents is meant to be their name for the rest of their life. Twenny's parents named him Shinsou Hitoshi, and since it's his legal name, we call him that. But I didn't know he didn't like his name, I thought he was just unfamiliar with being called it."

That makes Eri really confused. "Why did Twenny's mom give him a name if she gave him away?"

Zawa doesn't like what she said. His eyes get bigger, like he's scared, but everything else about him stays the same. "Did Twenny tell you that?"

Eri nodded. "But that's what a lot of moms do, Zawa. It doesn't really make sense for moms to name their kids and then give them away. My mom gave me away, but she only gave me half a name. You and Yama tried to find the other half and couldn't, but maybe He was supposed to give me the other half."

Zawa puts his arms around Eri's stomach and hugs her, like Twenny does when he's really scared. He's quiet for a long time. "Moms aren't supposed to do that. Most moms don't give their children away. I'm sorry that happened to you two."

Eri looks up at Zawa, and he does look really sad, even though he tries not to. "Zawa, did your mom give you away?"

Zawa's lips look funny for a minute, and he looks at a corner even though there's nothing there. "My family wasn't like most families."

"What about Yama? Did his mom give him away?"

Zawa doesn't like that question either. He's really quiet for a long time, long enough to know that Eri was right. Zawa just wanted to make her feel better, somehow. It doesn't really make her feel better to know she was right, but she might be even more sad if she found out he was right, and she really was supposed to have a mommy and daddy like on TV.

"Zawa, can I get another name? I want to still be Eri, but I want to have another half of my name, like everyone else has when they write their names." Eri doesn't know why, but Zawa's face turns a little red when she says that.

"The other half of your name is called a 'family name.' My full name is 'Aizawa Shouta,' and my grandfather's full name is 'Aizawa Shoga.' If someone knew my grandfather's full name and met me, they would know that we were related, because our family name is 'Aizawa.' "

Eri nods, but she doesn't know why Zawa is taking so long to answer her question. He likes explaining things, but Eri really just wants to know if she can have a real name, like everyone else does.

"To be given a family name, it means that you are adopted into that family. If...you took Toshinori's family name, for example, your name would be 'Toshiori Eri.' And that would imply that Toshinori adopted you, and was legally your father."

Eri frowned. 'Adopted' and 'Legally' sounded like really serious words. Zawa didn't seem like he liked saying them. "So, if my name was 'Aizawa Eri,' then you would be my dad?"

Zawa's face got really red, but he nodded. "I would."

Eri felt her face get really red too. She tried to hide it by hugging her knees together. The name sounded kind of funny, but she did think Zawa was a good dad. He was a real TV dad, because he smiled at her and hugged her and helped her stop crying when she was sad.

But Yama was a pretty good TV dad too. He was really silly, and kind of loud, but he made her favorite food and always let her help, and he taught her how to braid. 'Yamada Eri' sounded kind of funny too.

"Zawa, why aren't you Yamada if you're married to Yama?" Eri asked.

Zawa laughed a little, with his really quiet laugh. "Because I went to school with a man named Yamada Shouta, and I didn't like him. And Hizashi didn't want to be 'Aizawa Hizashi,' because it had too many 'z' sounds. It hurt his teeth to say it. So we just decided to keep our own names."

Eri tilts her head. That sounded really silly to her, since Zawa sounded really serious when he said married people changed their names. But Zawa and Yama were pretty silly sometimes.

"We talked about it for a long time before we decided that, because family names are very serious. Maybe we should talk more about your family name before we decide on one. Does that sound good?" Zawa asks her, and she's glad he says it like he really wants her to agree. Family names do seem like serious business, and Eri isn't sure which one she wants.

"Yeah, I think so. Can we go outside?" Eri asks. She likes this place a lot better than her old one. People called her old one a 'compound,' and she doesn't like that word. People call this one a 'dorm,' and she likes dorms. Everyone she knows lives in one close by, and she likes being able to see them whenever she wants.

But sometimes, if she stays inside too much, she forgets that it's different. Zawa always lets her go outside when that happens, even when he's really busy.

Zawa nods, even though he's probably busy, and tells her to pick out a jacket and scarf because it's cold outside. Eri picks her really puffy pink jacket that makes her look like Thirteen when she has it all zipped up, and her favorite scarf that has cat faces on the ends that make pockets for her hands. She likes that it's a really long scarf, so it kind of makes her look like Zawa when he wears his hero clothes.

Zawa helps her put on her jacket, but lets her put on her shoes by herself. He doesn't put on a jacket, but Eri can't really tell him to do that when he's a grown up. It's really cold outside though, and it's really dark. There aren't even stars out in the sky.

Zawa hums, looking up. "It might rain tomorrow. The clouds are covering up the sky."

"Oh," Eri says, then grabs his hand so they can walk down the stairs together. She likes when Zawa explains things to her like that, before she even has to ask him. She used to get really nervous asking him things, because she thought he might get mad, but she knows he won't now. He even likes answering her questions, even though he answers a lot of questions at work when the heroes ask. He must like answering questions a lot.

Except when Ashido asks questions. He gets mad at her questions, but not Eri's.

Even when they get down from the stairs, Eri doesn't let go of Zawa's hand. His hands get really cold, and it's already really cold outside, so she needs to make sure they don't turn into icicles like Todoroki's. She knows Zawa wouldn't ask Todoroki to fix his icicle hands if that happened, and Twenny was just her kotatsu head for now. Maybe he could share his kotatsu head someday, but he must be really embarrassed about it now.

There aren't a lot of people outside, probably because it's so cold, and maybe it's really late. Eri gets to say hi to Nemuri, and she says hi back and tells Eri how cute she looks. People tell Eri she's cute a lot, and it used to be really embarrassing, but she had to get used to it.

Nemuri also teases Zawa, and he uses his Teacher Voice at her to make her stop. Zawa sounds mean and even extra tired when he uses his Teacher Voice, but he never uses it on Eri, even when he teaches her things.

Nemuri laughs at Zawa, because she gets his Teacher Voice a whole lot, then tells them to stay warm and leaves to go to her dorm.

Zawa doesn't really take her anywhere in particular. He knows that Eri just wanted to be outside for a while. They get to walk around for a long time, before Zawa gets a phone call. "Is everything alright?"

Eri is glad he answers like that. If he sounded mad, it usually meant he had to go to work, but he sounds like he's talking to Yama.

"We're near the cafeteria, close to the break area outside. We could meet you there, but..."

Zawa listens for a while, then says "Okay," and hangs up.

"Yamada and Shinsou are going to meet up with us. Can you pick out a table for us to sit at while we wait?" Zawa asks, and Eri tries to find a really good table, even though there are a lot of leaves on the one she picks. She tries to brush them off by herself, but Zawa has really long arms, so he does it a lot quicker.

Even though Zawa is really cold, he puts his arm around her while they sit, so Eri can be warm. Eri wishes she could be bigger than Zawa so he could be warm too, but she does like being little and warm.

Zawa puts a leaf on her head, because he's silly. Zawa tells her she looks like a Kappa, and then tells her about how Kappas are magical children that swim all the time and wear bowls on their heads. And if you fill up a Kappa's bowl, they do favors for you.

Eri doesn't need anyone to put water on her head to be helpful, though. She really likes helping anyway.

"Shou! You don't have a jacket on! You don't want to catch a cold, do you?" Present Mic yells. It's a good thing Present Mic's there to scold Zawa, since no one else can.

"I'm fine," Zawa says, but he only says that to tease Mic. Eri knows he's really cold, but he doesn't want Mic to know he knows he's cold. It's 'admitting defeat,' and Zawa doesn't like doing that.

Twenny looks really worried, but he stops looking like that when he sees her. He smiles at her, and she tries to smile back, but she knows she doesn't do it right. At least Twenny knows she meant to.

"Twenny! This is the lunch area of school! Zawa said that the heroes eat here when it's a nice day, but it's too cold for nice days now. When the trees have green leaves again, we'll have nice days and we can eat out here!" Eri is really excited to see trees with green leaves, because she's only seen that on TV or in picture books. She's also excited to eat outside, with Zawa and Yama and Twenny.

Twenny sits down next to her, really close so she's extra warm. Zawa moves his arm before Twenny sits down, and Eri doesn't like that. She really wishes Twenny wasn't scared of Zawa, but she knows he won't be scared forever, because Zawa wasn't really scary at all.

"Twenny, did you know trees grow leaves every year? They're green first, but then they turn orange and red and brown and fall off. And they do that every year! Trees must get really tired of doing that," Eri says, making sure to talk a lot because Twenny doesn't look like he wants to talk much right now.

He gives her a proud smile, for being so smart, but it turns a little sad. "I did know that. I'm really glad you learned about that too."

"I want to learn a whole lot of stuff, so I can be like Momo! She's really smart, as smart as you are, Twenny! You guys can probably talk about how smart you are for hours! Maybe you can meet her tomorrow, if you're comfortable. It's okay if you're not, though. School was scary at first for me too," Eri kicks her legs out under the table. She wants to be good and not pout, but she really wants to take Twenny to school tomorrow. She wants him to be friends with all her friends, because her friends made her feel better when she used to be scared all the time.

"We were going to have Nemuri come over tomorrow, though! She has all sorts of games and art lessons already planned out! It'll be really fun!" Mic says, waving his hands around. "She's been around kids a lot, so she's an expert at having a great time!"

Eri knows that Nemuri is a whole lot of fun, but she looked really tired tonight. She would need to sleep a whole lot not to be tired tomorrow.

Twenny takes out his phone, and starts typing stuff on it. "I a-am fine wi-ith going to schoo-ol. I ca-an only be poi-soned once before I le-earn ."

Present Mic frowns and rubs his forehead, like he does when Zawa really scolds him. "I'm sorry, alright?! Shou tried to tell me Toshinori was a bad idea, but I didn't know it would be this bad! Nemuri is much better equipped to watch you guys!"

Twenny types some more, before Mic even finishes talking. "To-oshino-ri was fi-ine. I ca-an go to schoo-ol, Insta-ant Tra-ansmi-itter ."

Present Mic puts his head on the table and groans. He must have had a really rough day. "This is the sign for 'Transmit.' 'Instant' is just 'Now,' but with quicker movements."

Present Mic lifts his head to watch Twenny copy what Mic's hands did, and smiles.

"Yep! Just like that! Do you have any ideas for Shou's hero name? I can help you come up with some if you're getting tired of picking on me," Mic says, and he really wants Twenny to say yes.

But Twenny doesn't want to. He just shakes his head, and looks at the tree close by. "Eri, have..." Twenny picks at his orange wooly scarf while he stops. "Trees are fun to climb, too."

Eri didn't know that. She really likes trees, but she's never climbed one! She doesn't even mind that Twenny was talking weird again. "Can I climb a tree? I'll be really careful! I've never climbed a tree before!"

Zawa smiles at her and ruffles her hair. "That one looks like a good one." He points at the one that Twenny was looking at.

Eri gets up to run over to it, and Twenny follows her. She's glad he did, because the tree looks really tall, and Twenny isn't even as tall as the tree is. "Twenny, how do I climb it? It's so big!"

Twenny laughs a little, then puts his foot on a big root at the bottom of the tree. "If you stand on this, you can put your hands on this branch and pull yourself up. It looks like someone used their quirk on the tree to make it easier."

"You have a good eye. Kamui Wood took some landscaping liberties when he visited," Zawa says, while Present Mic sits down next to him to keep him warm. "And he refused to undo them when he left."

"But that's good, 'cause now I can climb the tree!" Eri says, standing on the root while she stretches up to reach the branch.

"Wait, let me," Twenny says in a kind of scared voice, leaning over to take her scarf off. "Don't want you to get tangled up."

Eri keeps reaching for the branch, but it's hard to do with her puffy jacket. "But... Zawa's scarf... doesn't tangle."

Eri tries her best to reach it, but right before she gives up, the branch under her grows enough to grab it.

"Zawa! Did Kamui make the tree magic?" Eri asks.

"Maybe." Zawa answers like he's right behind her, and she can hear something that sounds like his magic scarf.

It takes Eri a long time to get her leg over the branch, and Twenny looks really scared, even though he told her how to do it. But when she does it, and pulls herself on the branch, she feels really proud of herself.

She looks at Twenny and Zawa, and they both smile at her. She wishes they could see each other smile, but smiling at Eri will have to be enough for a while. "I did it! I climbed it!"

"Do you want to try standing up?" Zawa asks.

Eri knows she shouldn't, because Twenny looks worried, but she knows it'll be okay because Zawa is here too.

Her legs get really wobbly when she tries to stand, and it starts to get really scary. She puts her arms out to try not to wobble so much, but it's really tricky. She only stands up for a second before her legs wobble really bad and she starts to fall.

But Zawa's magic scarf wraps around her stomach so she doesn't fall. She just stands up straight, and it seems really easy to do it now. "I can stand up! See, Twenny! I can climb and stand up too!"

Twenny gives her another proud smile. "You're doing a great job, Eri."

Eri smiles. She knows she did it right, because the muscles in her cheeks get kinda sore, but Zawa's eyes get really soft, like when he looks at cats, or when he's really proud of her. Yamada takes a picture on his phone, and she's really glad he was recording the whole thing.

Twenny looks really happy too. She likes that he looks so happy with something she did.

"Twenny, can I use your kotatsu head?" Eri asks. Twenny's face gets really red, and Zawa and Yama give her really weird looks, but he nods and walks closer to her, crouching down when he turns around. She's already up so high that she can sit on his shoulders with just a little help.

She sighs when she puts her hands in his floofy hair. It's really, really warm, and it feels really nice.

"Twenny, your kotatsu head is the best." Yamada laughs when she says that, and puts his hand in Zawa's hair.

"Emitter quirks do have hot heads, don't they? Super useful on cold nights like these! They're like walking handwarmers! I never thought to call Shou a 'kotatsu head,' though!" Zawa glares at Mic, but doesn't make him take his hand away.

Zawa looks at Twenny, then at Eri. Then he walks over to them, leaving Mic's hands to get cold. "Eri, can you tell me if Shinsou's head is hotter than mine?"

Eri puts one of her hands on Zawa's head, and frowns. Maybe she needs to get closer to his scalp. She messes up Zawa's hair when she ruffles it, but his head is still kind of cold. "Twenny's head is a whole lot hotter."

"How about now?" Zawa uses his quirk, and his hair gets real floaty and pretty.

"Yours is hotter than before, but still not as hot as Twenny's." Zawa frowns a lot when he hears that, and he makes his quirk stop. "It's okay though! Your head is still a pretty good kotatsu! Twenny's is just 'top of the line' kinda kotatsu!"

Present Mic laughs a little, but his eyes look worried. "Well, it's a good thing you have a top of the line kotatsu head! I'll just have to make due with second best." Zawa makes a hissing sound when Mic puts his hands in his hair again, but Mic pretends he didn't. "It's about time we set up the kotatsu at home though, isn't it, Eri?"

Eri nods. Yama had been telling her about how warm and comfy kotatsus are, and she really wanted to try one out.

Twenny's face was really red still, even when they got home. Eri hopes that Twenny doesn't start hating the word 'kotatsu,' even though Yama says it a whole lot to tease him, because she really likes kotatsus.

But out of the three of them that she knows, Twenny and Zawa are still her favorite kotatsus.

First Day of School

Chapter Summary

27's first day of school manages to be worse than he expected it to be.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Gory imagery from a dream, Food avoidance, and canon typical violence.

Yep, THREE chapters this weekend! How could I not when there's a new chapter of The Last Resort to celebrate?!

"Hey, little bro."

27 can't find him. He's using his quirk. He can't find him.

He can't find Eri.

"You can't make her behave, Dog?" He looks around, but there's nothing but empty corridors. Chisaki is close, but he can't find him, can't see him.

There are screams behind a door. He didn't realize there was a door there, but he opens it. It's completely dark, he can't see anything.

Eri screams. He tries to shout for her, tries to move his hands in the darkness to feel for her, but his mask is closed, his hands only shake.

The lights flick on. It's not Eri in The Chair.

It's 50.

She's bleeding, blood pouring onto the floor. The needles stuck into her too deeply. Her eyes are terror wide and full of tears as she shakes her head, as much as the restraints will allow. "Shinsou, don't do this. Please, please, please let me out. Don't take me there, don't take me to The Chair," 50 sobs, her lips twisted around the word of each plea.

He sees his hand rise, but it's not his hand.

He doesn't wear gloves.

The hand that isn't his hand is lifting up, towards his mask. It will take his mask. Chisaki will take his mask.

Not his hand, Chisaki's hand is his hand, they're fused he's stuck he's Chisaki he's become Chisaki he can't get out he's going to hurt Eri-

"Twenny?"

27 opens his eyes, breathing hard as he does. His hand is clutched tight around his mouth, and if he was screaming, at least it was muffled.

It was a dream.

Eri still clutches at his arm, her red eyes wide with concern. 27 tries to breath, tries to reel in his panic. He can't deal with it right now. Eri might have had a bad dream herself. "I'm okay. Bad dream. You okay, Eri."

Eri frowns, but nods her head. "I'm sorry, Twenny. Yama said I should get ready first and let you sleep. I shouldn't have."

27 shakes his head, sitting up. "No, you need to listen to the heroes, Eri. I'm fine. It was a dream, but now I'm awake. Just like I tell you."

Eri nods, then pulls herself onto the bed to wrap her arms around his neck, hugging him tightly. The last of his rattling nerves are melting away in her embrace. She's here, she's safe. There aren't any Chairs here. "Now you're awake, 'cause I'm here. And I keep bad dream things away from Twenny, and Twenny keeps bad dream things from me."

Eri pulls away to bat at his bedhead, frowning at the mess even though it's a far cry from the one he had before. "You have to get ready for school, Twenny! It's your first day, so you gotta make a good impersonation!"

27 feels a real smile pull on his lips. " 'Impression,' but they sound really similar. Need to brush my hair."

27 yawns while Eri runs off to fetch a comb. He convinces himself that this ritual is good for Eri while she fixes his hair, which seems to be even more tangled after he went to bed with it half-wet from his shower.

"I don't know what I'm supposed to wear," 27 mutters, glaring at his closet. Eri had a couple of dresses that resembled school uniforms, and was wearing one of them now, but he had nothing of the sort. He did have a few button-up shirts but the brown leather jacket was the closest approximation to a blazer he had.

He didn't want to choose the wrong thing to wear, especially today. He knew it would be impossible, but he wanted to blend in as much as possible. The less attention he drew to himself, the quicker the hero students would be to forget he existed. The less they would bother him. The less they would stare.

He missed the mask.

"You should wear your favorite clothes, Twenny!" Eri said, trying in vain to make his hair lay flat. "That's what Yama told me on my first day! We're lucky we don't have to wear uniforms like the heroes, 'cause Izuku has to wash his a whole lot."

27 frowned. The cat hoodie wasn't a good thing to wear to blend in. The colors were dark, but not dark enough, and it was probably the farthest thing from a school uniform that he owned. And if they knew that it was his favorite, that he liked it, they could take it from him.

He looked at Eri's outfit again. White button-up shirt, dark blue suspenders and skirt. The hero students might wear something similar. He picked out a few dark blue clothes and held them up for Eri to decide, and tried to seem grateful for the help even when she picked a V-neck sweater. He could probably wear one of those T-shirts under it to hide the many scars it would show.

Now that he had a reason to investigate those shirts in the back, he realized they had a theme. They were all hero merch. Two Present Mic shirts, two more for his radio show, a Ms. Joke shirt, a Midnight one that made him want to ball it up and hide it somewhere that Eri wouldn't find, and a few heroes that he didn't know. The Lemillion shirt looked like it was hand-made, and the tagline was already peeling off. Three Eraserhead shirts were in the same shape, but one of them had all the lettering so peeled that some looked to have already fallen off. The Delete Face shirt looked professional, at least. Clearly not a well-known hero, but at least he had a somewhat decent agency. Even though the picture they selected was weirdly blurry, to the point that it somewhat resembled his owner.

Only the tip of the 'te F' lettering peeked out from under his sweater, so hopefully Izuku wouldn't comment on it in the hopes that he was a fan of a hero he had never heard of.

He wavers before finally picking the orange wool scarf he wore yesterday. He knew the urge to use it as a make-shift mask would rise in him, but maybe if he allowed himself to pick at it, that would be enough.

Eri was helping Present Mic cook something, though it looked like breakfast had already been served. "Good morning, Shinsou!" Present Mic greeted, signing as he did. 27 returned the sign, but still felt too tired to tack on a variation of his hero name. Present Mic didn't seem to mind that. "Would you like to help make lunch? I've got one of my favorite helpers here, doing some great bento-box organization, but if you wanted to chop up a little salad-"

' Yes. Can help. ' 27 signs as he approaches, hoping that it could distract Present Mic long enough that he wouldn't notice 27 not eating breakfast. Present Mic put the lid on the sausages he was searing, pulling out a bowl of vegetables and a cutting board.

"Sweet! So, I've got these veggies already washed, if you could just cut them up about this thin-" Present Mic sliced a carrot, nearly the size of a toothpick, "-then we'll be golden! But don't worry about making them too uniform, it's pretty tricky at first!"

27 picked up the knife and twirled it in his right hand, wondering if he should use his right or left hand. He didn't seem to have much trouble with such a basic trick, just threading the hilt across the back of his fingers. Perhaps being Unmade couldn't take away the skills he had learned at The Miasma.

The skills that 50 taught him.

Chopping the lettuce and carrots was pretty easy, and he only messed up the size when he forgot to measure before he cut. He spun the blade idly after he was done, wondering if he could still catch the handle if he tossed it spinning in the air.

"We've got a budding sous chef on our hands!" Present Mic says, examining one of the slices before he looks at the knife 27 was still holding, caught between two fingers. “You definitely seem to know the way of the blade .”

27 tries not to roll his eyes when he watches Present Mic swing around an invisible katana. So few Numbers trained in depth with swords that he never received the basic training for that.

“I wanna know the way of the blade!” Eri says, trying to arrange the seaweed on a rice ball to look like a happy cat. “Twenny, can you teach me to do that?”

He swallows the instinctive ‘No’ that comes to mind. Eri was barely younger than he was when he was first taught, and she could probably use some instruction on self-defense. But the thought of a weapon in her tiny hands made him feel ill regardless. “Hold up your hand,” he asked.

Eri did, and he swallowed the sick feeling inside him.

“Maybe when you’re older, but your fingers are pretty close together. You’d probably be better off with a staff weapon, or a baton. With knives, you have to be able to adjust your grip quickly, and fingers with a wider span between them are better for that,” 27 says, recalling Bug’s evaluation of his ‘dainty but stubby’ hands. “But I can show you how to twirl a baton, like the girl from that show you like.”

“That should be the extent of any weapons training,” his owner says, pouring himself a cup of coffee. His tone was edged with something less than neutral, but without seeing his face, 27 wasn’t sure if it was just exhaustion or anger. He nodded his agreement anyway.

Eri pouted, turning to 27. “Mom, Zawa won’t let me learn weapons because I’m a girl, and that’s not fair. You said I just have to be older.”

27 ignored the sound of his owner choking on his coffee, weighing his options. He wasn’t sure how his owner would respond to 27 answering to ‘Mom,’ but if he didn’t respond to Eri, she might throw a tantrum. The blame for the tantrum would be placed solely on Eri, no matter what he said, and 27 didn’t want to know what would happen if his owner was displeased to suffer it so early in the morning. “I don’t really want you to learn how to use a weapon either, Eri. It’s not because you’re a girl, it’s because weapons are dangerous, and I don’t want you to get hurt.”

Her frown softened, but her eyes still looked angry at the perceived injustice. 27 flexed his hand to show the thin white scars littered among old calluses along his fingers, and showed his palm to Eri.

“When I was learning how to use a knife, I cut my hands a lot. Especially when I tried to learn tricks like throwing them up in the air and catching them. It happened a lot because my hands were really small, because I was young.” Bug said he’d have been better off picking the gun, but he never wavered. 50 told him not to pick it. “So even if I did want to teach you how to use a knife, I would wait until your hands are bigger. But really, I don’t want to. I don’t want your hands to ever get hurt like mine did.”

Eri traced the scars, the ones so small that she hadn’t noticed before, and nodded. “Not just because you want me to be cute forever?”

27 smiled, trying not to laugh. “I think you’ll be cute forever anyway.”

Despite her own bravado, Eri blushed and turned back to her riceball art. “As long as it’s not because I’m a girl! Because that’s mean!”

“Eri, we would never!” Present Mic declared, resting a hand on his heart. “Even though you’re living with a house full of men, we’re sensitive men at least! Sensitive to the struggles of being a woman! Sensitive to the microaggressions common in the workplace and the world at large! We are feminists! Death to the patriarchy!”

“Not particularly sensitive to time, however,” his owner added. “We need to leave in 10 minutes or we’ll be late.”

“Shou! Grab that thermos I - Shinsou, you haven’t even eaten yet! Grab a muffin at least! Eri, we’ve got to finish up these boxes on the double!” Present Mic yelled, panicked at the thought of being late.

27 did grab a muffin from his plate, but waited until the kitchen was properly distracted to walk to the bathroom and flush it down the toilet. It seemed like a waste, but it couldn’t be trusted.

When he returned, his owner was helping Eri into her backpack, and Present Mic handed him a thermos. “This is some of my coffee! I added a little hazelnut creamer, but let me know if you like it! I swear it’s fine to drink, it’s not Shou’s.”

27 waited until they had walked halfway across the campus to smell it. It still had that delicious aroma, just a sweeter and nutty note woven into it. Not a poison that could be detected through smell.

Maybe it wasn’t poison, though. They were walking to a building full of witnesses, and the likelihood of every hero out of the many he saw running across campus being complicit in his gruesome death seemed unlikely.

He took a small sip, and waited.

Even if nothing happened, his stomach turned every time he tried to take another.

It was a good thing Eri asked to be carried once they entered the building. If he tucked his chin just right, his scars were hidden behind her head.

Everyone still stared though. He kept his eyes on his owner’s back, and trained himself not to flinch at every ‘Who’s that?’ and ‘What’s his quirk? It must be something bad if Aizawa-sensei has to watch him too.’

He had to keep his head down. Blend in. Eventually they would forget. This would be the worst it will ever be, because the newbie is an oddity at first, and normal at second.

Hopefully the hazing would be pretty light here. Chisaki had given him free reign when he realized that the underlings disliked keeping fights to the sparring ring, wanting to improve their own ranking by bringing the ‘9th Expendable’ as they saw him down a peg. Kick the Dog was a fun game, until it wasn’t, and they learned that quickly enough.

These heroes didn’t look like they’d be too quick on the uptake. When he glances around, there’s a few that look strength-enhanced, but there are too many he can’t even guess. Three animal characteristics, but guessing their quirk from that would be a crapshoot. Froggy’s tongue could be her only weapon, or she might spit poison as well. Blackbird might fly, or mimic voices. Tailman might have a hidden strength enhancement.

They had to be powerful to get into this school. They had at least a year's training, probably more. 19 of them, even if they weren't used to coordinated attacks, and they probably were, they were a threatening force.

And every last one of them was staring at him.

Eri started slipping out of his hold, going limp, and though he could just hold her closer to stop her, it would look odd. It would be a visible weakness. He couldn't afford that.

"Everyone!" Eri called, pointing at 27. "This is Twe- um, Shinsou Hitoshi. He's glad to meet you!"

Eri bowed, and he followed, embarrassed that his high school class introduction was being performed by a 5 year old who only knew how to do it from watching cartoons, in front of a class that he wasn't really a part of.

"So, please be friends with him!" Eri asked, still yelling far more than she needed to. 27 stood up, refusing to look anywhere but at Eri.

"W-We welcome you to class 1-A. Shinsou!" a boy shouts, though 27 still refuses to look. "And I'm sure that we will be very good-"

"Tida," his owner says, a bit of bite in his tone. It softens dramatically when he addresses Eri. "Thank you for the introduction. You two can sit behind Yaoyorozu."

27 keeps his eyes on Eri, even as they walk through the rows of desks to the very back, where an empty desk is accompanied by a much smaller one with a bright yellow top and blue chair. Eri takes the small one and he breathes a sigh of relief knowing he'll be able to be close to her, taking his seat.

"Sensei, we have revised the search and rescue plan that we devised yesterday per your instructions, and have organized a presentation for your approval-"

"Tida, it's fine. We're going over the midterm scheduling again, for the last time, so pay attention," his owner interrupts.

Eri pulls a coloring book and supplies for herself, then his JSL handbook, which he hadn't even noticed her putting into her little backpack this morning. He was thankful regardless, given something to do between checking on her work and listening to his owner's angry tone.

These underlings must have caused a great deal of trouble in the past to earn that kind of angry tone. It could make them more likely to strike out at them, in a fit of desperation. Prove their worth by taking down someone perceived to be close to the boss, never fully realizing that they were the ones that were the higher rank. They were volunteers. He was a pet. He was owned.

"Now, for the remainder of homeroom, I suggest that you study, but I insist that you not bother me," his owner orders, sitting down at his desk at the front of the room. He felt the eyes turn to him, now that his owner's lecture was no longer a distraction, and he refused to acknowledge them. He didn't want the confrontation now. Not with Eri right beside him, likely to be caught in the crossfire if he didn't move fast enough.

"Psst, Momo!" Eri whispered, causing the girl in front of him to turn around. 27 caught the action out of the corner of his eye, but kept his eyes on the pages in front of him. "We can share my banana chips."

"Oh, thank you Eri! Do you want me to help you open the bag?" The girl asked with a prim voice.

“Yes please,” Eri answered, and he watched the exchange out of the corner of his eye, making sure the product return to Eri. It was the least he could do, now that he wasn’t deemed worthy enough to open the banana chips for her. “Here’s some for you, and some for Twen- um, Shinsou!”

27 stared at the chips placed on the corner of his desk, and listened to the girl in front of him eating hers. Despite his hunger, despite the food being from Eri, he didn’t want to eat a single one.

“Momo, Shinsou is really smart. He reads a whole lot of books because he likes books a lot, and he taught me a whole lot of stuff before we were rescued. I think you should be really good friends,” Eri prodded, and 27 was beginning to feel like the chips were part of a much larger scheme concocted in a child’s mind.

Just like any deal, you had to get the interested party to lay down their guard. Food was a go-to in any instance, alcohol to go with it in the best scenario. Talk up the product, nudge them closer to agreement, then seal the deal while the mood was still positive. Momo unfortunately fell for it. “Of course! I would like to be Shinsou’s friend, Eri, but, it’s quite understandable that these things take time. Whenever Shinsou would like to, we could discuss our favorite books, or find other common interests.”

27 found tried to ignore Eri’s stare, though he knew it was useless. “Twenny, Momo is really nice. I promise you can talk to her, and nothing bad will happen. You can talk like you used to. You even used to talk to him, and he did really bad things, so it’s not fair that you can’t talk to Momo.”

27 bit down on his cheek. He knew that. He knew nothing bad would happen. He knew it was confusing for Eri that she was the only person he could talk to now, even though he had been able to talk to Chisaki just a month before. She didn’t know. She couldn’t know.

He got mixed up when he was fused. He lost some things, gained others. Eri had saved him, and she could never know any differently.

“Eri, it’s okay. Aizawa-sensei told us that Shinsou has trouble speaking to others sometimes. None of us will take it personally. Perhaps, instead of being frustrated that Shinsou can’t speak to us, you can think about how much he must trust you to be able to talk to you. You must be a very important person to him.”

27 looked at Eri, to make sure she wasn’t on the verge of a tantrum, but the sight of her staring despondently at her banana chips with her head on her arms made the guilt even worse. He put his hand on her head, and didn’t even get a glance in his direction.

“I’m sorry, Eri,” 27 whispered. I’m sorry I’m broken now. I’m sorry I made you sad. It’s all I seem to do now.

“It’s okay, Twenny,” Eri said, at least raising her head. “Can I ask if Kirishima remembers you? You don’t have to talk to him, though. I’ll tell him not to.”

“If you’re allowed to. Aizawa is in charge, so if that will make him mad, you need to wait,” 27 stipulates. He doubts that Eri is allowed to wander around during class time, even if she’s not a student, and even if this free period hardly counts as class time.

“She is. Aizawa-sensei lets her have free reign of the class, which we appreciate,” Momo says, as Eri gets up to walk towards the front of the class, approaching a boy with bright red hair. “Did you know Kirish- I mean...”

The girl goes quiet, realizing her mistake. It was odd how often that happened here. The police officers never cared whether he could answer or not, they still asked their questions, sometimes demanding that he answer with the pen and paper. One of them had mentioned a name, Kenma, perhaps a telepath that would dig into his skull and pull out the answers they wanted. The one with the too honest eyes had shot that down, then pleaded with 27 to just write something. Anything. Anything about the place he was at before the 8 Precepts.

27 didn't. His Bug scars didn't have to burn, but they did, and he found himself in an empty room still rubbing them hours later, trying to convince himself that there were no bugs under his skin.

He met his owner a few days later. The police had sold him, or rented him out long term. There really wasn't a difference to him.

He would always be owned by The Miasma. Their claim ran deeper than the tattoo or scars. They gave him his name. The one he would always keep. They made him.

The Miasma would kill him soon enough. It would be done by now if Chisaki hadn't taken Boss' vial of his blood when he bought him. Now he was left to wait, waiting for Boss to get enough information to break in to this place, to pay off someone on the inside and send a Number in to finish him off. Maybe it will be 127 again. Even if he failed the first time, 127 was still too useful to be thrown away so easily.

27 looks at his desk and notices the note, folded in half on his desk. He looks at the girl and realizes he's only seen her hands and her back, has no idea what her face looks like. He doesn't want to know, he doesn't even want to know what she wrote. She was still an underling, still a threat, and he knew nothing about her.

But the note might reveal something. He needed information, desperately. And if she went through the trouble of writing it down, it might have information that his owner wanted to keep hidden from him. A warning about what would set his owner off. The punishments used here. His intentions when he bought 27, his job here.

He opens the note, and notices her penmanship is so clean that it looks like it's an excerpt from a textbook.

'I apologize, I was wondering if you knew Kirishima in some way, and forgot that asking may make you uncomfortable. If you would like, we could pass notes to converse, but it's understandable if you would rather study instead. I always tried to stick to the background and observe when it was my first day at a new school, or a new situation. I feel it calms me to know what to expect, somewhat. But if you have any questions at all, you can always write me a note and I can answer them. It's my duty as the Vice President of Class 1-A to make sure all of our members are kept informed.'

Nothing. Nothing of value in that note, beyond knowing that she was higher ranked. Not the highest, not a President, but not like the rest of this group.

She offered him information, though. He just had to ask for it. She didn't list any prices, but perhaps she would once she knew what he wanted to know. If she operated like The Miasma, he wouldn't be able to buy anything. He had no money and no information he could trade in exchange. He had no idea what she wanted from him. Was it a test to see what he knew? To keep him off-kilter, to know his weaknesses from what he didn't know? To gather that information for the group and plan an attack?

Or was she like Nemoto? The man never realized the importance of keeping information hidden, perhaps as a neurosis from his quirk which left no secrets from his prying eyes. Nemoto had an odd, one-sided kinship with 27, not unlike 127, but as a mental quirk user rather than having a similar name. He gave 27 information freely, on the few instances they were given the chance to talk. The only thing he ever tried to take from 27 was a look inside his mind.

Nemoto was never able to do it, and that only made 27 more interesting to him. All the better for 27. Nemoto's eyes would glow through his goggles, the muscles on his neck moving as his mouth opened for the words he was waiting for to come.

But nothing ever did. And Nemoto would chuckle to himself about the raging storm inside 27's mind, the clouds sheltering him from prying eyes.

All the better if she was like Nemoto. The storm had probably worsened, becoming a black, twisted thing. Her face would reveal if she had a mental quirk, dropping into shock or pain depending on how deeply she found herself trapped.

There was one thing he wanted to know, enough to risk letting her know he didn't know. Enough to trouble himself to find a way to ask without asking.

27 takes one of Eri's crayons, and tries in vain to make his fingers not shake and jerk as he writes. He frowns and scribbles out the first word, and rewrites it more carefully. After he reads it again, he folds it up and holds it out near her waist on the left side, where his owner's line of sight would be obstructed, though the man looks like he's sleeping on his desk.

Her hand takes the note, and he watches her read the few words he had written, then write a reply to hand back with the same trade-off.

'My quirk is Creation! I can create anything that I know the chemical and molecular make-up of using lipids from my body. If you're asking for everyone else's quirks, I'm sure that they will let you know soon enough. Iida wanted to organize a roll call of everyone's name, quirk, and hero name so you can become more familiar with us, but Aizawa-sensei may have realized that it can be overwhelming to have 19 people introducing themselves all at once. I would write them all down, but I believe Iida is still working on a way for everyone to introduce themselves to you in a more organized way.

'I almost forgot to add, but my name is Yaoyorozu Momo, and my hero name is Creati!'

Eri returns to her desk in higher spirits, after 27 had tucked the note in his pocket, unsure of what to write next, but sure that he didn't want to encourage the ache in his hand. "Kirishima said he doesn't remember, but he wouldn't have bullied you if you did go to the same school. He thinks you're really cool, and he really likes your hair 'cause it's manly," Eri says, kicking her legs before she speaks. "And it's okay that you don't want to be friends with anyone right now. I forgot how scary it is, and I'm sorry I made you sad."

"It's okay, Eri. I know you want me to make friends, and I'm sorry it's frustrating right now," 27 says, running his fingers over the hair at his nape. "But, I'm trying. I'll get better at it."

"You can do anything if you try! So I know you'll be friends with everyone soon! I just gotta be patient," Eri cheered, humming as she went back to her coloring book.

27 watched her for the rest of the period, slipping the banana chips into his pocket one by one, so he could keep Eri from noticing he didn't eat them.

Perhaps he could eat them later, when the thought didn't make him feel so nauseous.

His owner handed them off to Present Mic for the next two classes, and though the voice hero was unbearably loud, 27 was able to go through a refresher on Eri's JSL lessons during the brief moments of silence.

The difference between the two English classes was startling. While Present Mic seemed to struggle to keep class 1-A in line and attentive, he was able to actually teach class 1-B, and progressed a lot farther into the subject. 27 noticed that if one of the students started to talk to a peer, or pull out their phone, the girl with red hair would clear her throat, and the student would jump to correct themselves.

1-B didn't just have discipline, but a disciplinarian. A Bug. That Iida guy could certainly use some instruction on the subject.

When the bell rang, 27 noticed the manic looking blonde guy walking towards him, followed closely by the redhead. As though the blonde had sensed his pursuer, he quickly lept onto a desk and ran across the tops of the row, to land right in front of 27.

The blonde swept a hand through his hair to play off the dramatic stunt he had just performed. "How nice of you to finally arrive, Mr. Transfer Student! You must have a good reason to miss two classes and to forget your uniform, I hope. Class B doesn't tolerate such sloppiness, unlike Class A."

The way he hissed those words made 27 wonder if the blonde had plans to eliminate Class A, or if he was still working on them.

"So, what's your excuse? You haven't even introduced yourself either, though judging by your half-feral appearance, you may need a demonstration before you can manage that much," the blonde said, bringing the back of his hand to his cheek like a haughty cartoon villain. "My name is Monoma Neito, but you can address me as-"

A large, blocky hand chopped the blonde on the top of his skull. If the hand was a bit heavier, or combined with a hardening quirk, it would probably cause brain damage or death.

The disciplinarian didn't seem too concerned with those risks though, glaring at the blonde in disappointment. "Monoma. You know you're not allowed to speak to students outside Class 1-B without supervision."

"He...must be," Monoma answered, fighting against the weight of the hand to rise. "Why else...is he here?"

"Kendo," Eri whined, pulling out her biggest puppy dog eyes. "Monoma was bullying Twenny, and it made me really sad. He was acting scary."

The redhead reeled back to deliver a chop that splayed the blonde on the floor with a solid 'THUNK.' Kendo then looked at Eri with an apologetic expression. "I'm really sorry, Eri! He knows better than that, I swear! I'm sorry you had to suffer Monoma, um, Twenny?"

27 hoped that the nod conveyed whatever this Kendo wanted to hear from him. He could probably take her down if it was necessary, but he didn't want it to be. With someone like her, like Bug, she would hold a grudge until he had been ground under her heel appropriately enough, and he couldn't risk having divided loyalties to his owner.

"Twenny can't talk yet, but he says it's okay. He knows you try your best, Kendo!" Eri translates, and 27 nods again in agreement.

"Oh! That's okay! Is Twenny a ward of UA, like you are, Eri?" Kendo asked, casually grinding the heel of her foot into Monoma's back as he struggled to get up.

"Yeah! He lives with me and Aizawa and Yamada now! Me and Twenny used to live together with just us, but when we got rescued, he had to live at the police station, 'cause they must have gotten him mixed up," Eri says, swinging her legs under the desk. "But I'm really happy Twenny gets to live with us now!"

The brief shock that crossed Kendo's face must have translated to a lack of pressure under her heel, as Monoma rolls away, crashing into several desks, to rise up and point his finger at 27. 27 can't help but point a finger at himself as the blonde pants and fumes.

"He's a criminal! Why did UA allow a gangster like him into our classroom?! Class B! Not even the lowly, despicable, oddly well-suited for Class A- "

"MO-NO-MA," Present Mic yells, making 27's ears ring. "Shinsou isn't a criminal, more at 5! I'll ask Kan to give everyone the deets, but you guys are going to be late for hero training! Go! Go! Go!"

Kendo didn't spare another glance as she dragged Monoma out of the classroom, which was all the confirmation 27 needed. Two hero students knew he was a criminal, information that had oddly not been disclosed to them beforehand. Now it would spread like wildfire, the previous deception incensing them further. 27 would be lucky to avoid a school-wide riot at this point.

Present Mic sighed, rubbing the back of his neck. "Sorry about that, guys. Kan was supposed to give 1-B the rundown, but I guess he really doesn't read the staff memos. I'm sure Kendo will get the message across before tomorrow! Now, let's check in with Shou to see if he's spending his free period in the staff room."

27 kept his ears peeled for any whispers in the hallways, but any conversations about himself seemed to have died down. For now.

But that would change in just a matter of time.

The free period was blissfully calm in the staff room, where 27 was able to go over Eri's math lessons while his owner mostly ignored them in favor of grading.

Present Mic popped in, carrying their packed lunch, and didn't have to say a word before Eri grabbed 27's hands to tug him into standing. "C'mon, Twenny! We got to wash our hands before we eat lunch together!"

"Alright, don't run off, or I might get lost," 27 chided, looking back to see if they had an escort from either hero. No such luck.

At least the bathrooms were close by, so that if 27 was attacked, Eri would be able to return to the heroes safely. The students that populated the hallway seemed to run with single-minded determination to be the first to get lunch, ignoring 27 and Eri completely. His habit of crowding Eri against the wall saved them more than once from a reckless speed quirk.

27 noticed that one of the bathroom stalls seemed to be in use, and purposely chose the sink in front of it to keep an eye on the occupant with the mirror. He didn't have to wait long, as the door burst open as soon as he turned on the faucet.

The angry blonde from Class 1-A hissed as their eyes met in the mirror, realizing his amateur ambush had been expected. "Oi, you've got it real fucking nice now, don'tcha? Probably gave Sensei some bullshit sob story to get out of jail, so that snot nosed brat could keep waiting on you hand and foot. That right, bastard?"

27 started washing his hands. He probably had some time before the blonde got himself worked up enough.

"You listening, shitrag? Or are you pretending to be deaf now, too? Yeah, real fucking smart to give that up on the first day," the blonde growled, stalking towards him. "Everyone else here is too fucking shitbrained to see it, but I'm fucking on to you. Who the fuck are you working for? The League? You little pansies can't drop in anymore?"

His hands started sparking when he mentioned 'The League.' Fire quirk or explosives, he wasn't sure.

But he was glad the blonde was stupid enough to spin him around before he could dry his hands. "You wanna answer me, you piece of-"

27 grabbed both hands and slid water across the boy's palms, before grabbing a wrist and shoulder, slamming him into the sink counter. "I'm going to win," 27 threatened, watching the boy scramble against such an easy lock.

27 noticed those beady red eyes turn to something more unhinged, before the kid kneed him in the side. His grip wavered and the blonde charged from his hold, trying to tackle him. 27 struck first with a palm to the nose, disorienting the boy long enough to sweep his legs and shove him to the floor.

Before he could manage a better pin, the blonde grinned, and swept a loud fireball where 27's head had been. The fireball pattered out in a cloud of smoke.

Explosion hands. And now they were back in use.

27 couldn't do much more than dodge. The blonde had a wide range with tight movements, too quick to counter. In a confined space like this, he had a huge advantage, and the feral grin said he knew it.

"Twenny!" Eri's voice called from outside the door. 27's sleeve was singed from the distraction. "Are you okay?"

27 threw himself into a stall and closed the door, then pulled himself over it as he heard the blonde level an explosion against it. He landed on the boy's shoulders in a crouch, hands tucked under his chin to keep from being bucked off immediately.

Eri peeked in shyly, eyes wide with fright. 27 ground his teeth, hoping that she would obey. Hoping he wouldn't have to use his quirk. "Eri, go back to the staff room."

Eri turned and let the door close, her movements shaky and panicked. 27 felt the urge to snap the blonde's neck rise before the boy made that decision for him, leaning forward to charge him into a wall head first, his forehead meeting plaster with a thud that vibrated in his skull.

The blonde dislodged then spun him around, hand fisted in his sweater. "The fuck did you do to her, you fucking-"

27 kicked out his ankle, earning just enough time to grab the blonde's wrist and tackle him onto his stomach on the floor. 27 kept the boy's palm twisted towards his back, the other arm trapped beneath him, and 27 made sure the pin was secure before he brought out his knife, pressing the blade to the back of the blonde's wrist. "Stay down or lose a hand, Blasty. I really couldn't care less."

The blonde ground out a laugh, bluffing to try to distract what 27 already knew. His hands were tied to his quirk, to his career as a hero, and 27 could destroy at least one of them if he wanted to right now. The boy turned his head to try to face him, teeth bared. "That'd make me a lot less useful to your chucklefuck gang, wouldn't it? You fucking bastard."

27 just glared at him. "I'm not part of any gang, or league. You mean nothing to me," 27 clenched his teeth, pressing the blade hard enough to draw blood. "But you made Eri see something that frightened her."

The blonde snarled. "Yeah, I bet you do that every fucking night, you-"

27 reared the blonde's head back by his hair, ready to slam his chin against the floor. He might break a few teeth, bite a chunk of his tongue clean off if he was lucky. The door opened before he could, his owner standing in the doorway with his white scarf floating around his head.

His owner didn't say anything for a moment, just staring, before he sighed. "Shinsou, let Bakugo go."

27 complied, tucking the bloodied knife back into its sheath and rising to stand. Bakugo sprang up after him, throwing a sparking hand towards his face, and he grabbed his wrist instinctively before he realized the sparks had gone out.

"Bakugo. Stand down," his owner growled, eyes glowing red. "And explain yourself."

The blonde tugged his arm out of the hold, spinning to face his owner. "How about you explain, huh?! Why didn't anyone know he was a fucking villain?! You bastards partnering with the goddamn League for some fucked up midterm exam? Leaving us in the dark while you get information from him? Which fucking is it?"

"It's exactly as I said before," his owner answered, tone surprisingly calm. "Shinsou is a ward, and as a ward, he has no active involvement in any criminal organizations-"

"The shitty extra from Class B said-"

"Monoma," his owner interrupted, "Doesn't override my instructions. You were told not to interact with Shinsou."

The blonde hissed, turning his head away. "Yeah, and he sure talks a lot of shit for being a fucking mute."

His owner glanced at 27, and he kept his gaze on the floating scarf, watching as it dropped to his shoulders. His owner sighed again. "How badly are you two injured?"

“I’m fucking fi-”

The boy turned to glare at him. “Don’t fucking pull that mute shit now-”

27 shook his head, then winced as an ache bloomed behind his eyes. ‘ A little. ’ He didn’t want to admit the injury, but a concussion wasn’t easy to hide. Being caught lying would be worse than being caught injured. ‘ E-R-I. ’

“Eri is fine,” his owner answered. “I’m going to leave you with Yamada and Eri while I take Bakugo to Recovery Girl’s office. Tell Yamada if you start feeling worse.”

27 nodded, then walked to the sink to wet a paper towel, cleaning the blood from the scrape on his head. It still looked awful, with a swelling lump beneath it, but if he cleaned it off a bit, perhaps he wouldn’t scare Eri as much.

He handed another paper towel to the blonde, who swatted it on the floor petulantly despite the blood sprayed across his lip and chin. “Don’t fucking pull that shit, you’re the one who fucking hit me.”

‘ I did. Scare E-R-I. Will break you. ’ 27 signed. Even if the threat wasn’t understood, at least he said his peace.

Bakugo narrowed his eyes, hands moving in a flurry. ‘ Try me, fuck faced shit eating- ’

“Enough,” his owner growled, turning to open the door. “If I have to break up another fight between you two, Principal Nezu will be signing expulsion forms by the end of the day. Move .”

27 allowed Bakugo to stalk behind him, but kept a hand on the knife just in case he was that stupid.

Now that he knew his name, he wished he had taken a chunk of his tongue, if just for teaching Eri swear words.

Aizawa watched Recovery Girl take inventory of Bakugo’s injuries, debating on whether he really should expel his student. Not for the fight. Though it was completely out of line, he would have been able to predict it if he knew that Shinsou would restrain Bakugo in a wrist-lock. And given that Shinsou was clearly trained to counter a multitude of quirks, he should have.

There was a reason that Bakugo was only partnered with Kirishima during hand-to-hand combat drills, and Bakugo himself might not be aware of it. At least Kirishima knew to avoid certain restraining holds after Kamino ward.

“Am I gonna get expelled for this?” Bakugo asked, glare still present, but his usual expletives were absent. The adrenaline must be dissipating after Recovery Girl’s treatment.

Bakugo hissed through his teeth, turning his head to the side. “He’s fucking faking it. Just came up with some bullshit story to go with it.”

“Do you think that I would allow someone dangerous into my classroom?” Aizawa pointedly ignored Bakugo’s finger pointing to his bloody nose. “At what point did he bring out the knife?”

Bakugo’s eyes darted to the side. “When he already had me pinned on the floor, what fucking difference-”

“I suspect that knives are his weapon of choice. His quirk isn’t an offensive one,” Aizawa interrupted. “In what scenario would you try to pin or restrain someone without using your quirk?”

Bakugo looked away again, but he remembered this lesson. Aizawa made sure to drill it into him harder than the other students, knowing his personality. “To deescalate. I fucking...” The teen ground his teeth, snarling. “I didn’t...fucking want to, alright? I wasn’t trying to start shit when I went in there, but he fucking...pissed me off.”

“The second topic you will research,” Aizawa said, making sure to meet his student’s eyes. “Are triggers. A somewhat benign action or stimulation that causes a dramatic emotional response. Shinsou grabbed your arm, or wrist, I assume, and you reacted disproportionately to the situation.”

Bakugo laughed bitterly. “I got fucking triggered, is that right? Those shits at the League didn’t mess me up, they didn’t do shit to me-”

He’s never told that to anyone but Hizashi, and he’s not sure if it’s appropriate to tell Bakugo now, but he needed his student to understand. The naked shock on the blonde’s face told him that he did.

“Most heroes have something akin to that, thanks to our line of work. Like the rest of class 1-A, more was thrown at you before your time.” I’m sorry.

Bakugo grinds his teeth together, glaring at the foot of the cot. “What about All Might?”

Screaming, certain accents, car alarms, gun shots, pressure on the scar on his side. “That’s not my place to say, though he would tell you if you asked.”

The teen’s face falters for a moment, but Aizawa is sure that he won’t. He might assign an interview as another essay topic, after he considers whether it would be helpful or devastating. “He’s fucking weird around Eri. You should be protecting her, not letting some weird guy like him around her. He could be doing some messed up shit when you’re not looking.”

Aizawa allows the change in topic, crossing his arms. “A psychologist recommended that they continue living together for the foreseeable future, because though their relationship is odd, right now it’s beneficial for them both. I have only ever observed a parent-child relationship between them. If it became anything close to what you’re implying, Shinsou would be removed.”

Bakugo nodded, as though Aizawa needed his approval. “It’s not like I care about the snot nosed brat or anything, but she didn’t get too freaked out, right?”

Aizawa only barely kept from rolling his eyes.

27 ignored how much Eri pouted when he could only eat half of the bento box. He ignored how much Recovery Girl reminded him of 10, to the point that it hurt. He ignored the stares and whispers in the hallway, and his own shock over being able to speak during the bathroom fight.

But 27 could not ignore Class 3-A.

Just walking into the room, he could tell the difference that two years of training made. Their eyes weren't just hostile, but evaluative. He was being dissected by heroes who could smell any old wounds he carried just by the way he walked to his desk.

It was a small mercy that Mirio was their buffer for this classroom. 27 could trust that he would get Eri to safety, though 27 liked his chances against this class far less than Class 1-A.

"Hey, Mirio," a student resembling a spiny toad hissed, drawing the blonde's attention. "You mind switching seats with me today?"

27 frowned. If he had to guess, this one could shoot projectiles out of any point that they had those spiny protrusions, which was everywhere. Sitting directly in front of him was the cheapest shot any assassin could take.

Mirio lifted an eyebrow, that eternal smile not wavering. "Aizawa-sensei assigned the seating chart, and if you think I'll give up the closest seat to Eri easily, you're very mistaken, Shizuo."

Shizuo scratched the side of their chin nervously, claws dragging on rough scales. "Well, you know, with your quirk and everything, I just think it's better if someone else sat in front of that guy. Just in case."

27 wasn't sure if Shizuo was a good actor, or if the story about the bathroom fight had been grossly exaggerated to the point of striking true fear into these heroes. Mirio's grin gave nothing away when he turned to face 27. "Oh yeah, Shinsou. Did you really murder Bakugo in the bathroom and then attack Yamada-Sensei? It seems kind of out of character for you."

27 raised an eyebrow. Murdering Bakugo was pretty easy to fathom, but attacking a pro hero and walking around campus afterwards? These students were supposed to be heroes, not stupid.

Eri slapped her hands on the desk, leaning over it to frown at the blonde hero. "Mirio! That's not funny! Twenny got really hurt, and he wouldn't hurt Yamada! Never ever ever!"

The smile fell away into placating shock, as the hero waved his hands in front of him. "I'm sorry, Eri! It was just a crazy rumor I heard, I didn't really believe it though!" He then turned back to 27, the smile returning. "Maybe you could tell us what really happened, using your phone! I bet that would really put those rumors to rest, don'tcha think?"

27 looked at his owner, who was writing an outline of the lecture on the chalkboard, facing completely away from him. As much as Mirio thought his own telling of the events would smooth things over, he couldn't risk breaking one of the few rules his owner had established.

"Wow! You're not even a student and you're better behaved than us! Sensei!" Mirio called, causing his owner to look over his shoulder. "Shinsou can use his phone to talk, right?"

"Of course he can," his owner answered, returning his focus to the board.

Mirio stared expectantly as 27 began typing, a bit too giddy to see him use the phone. "I bro-oke Bakugo-o's nose and cut his a-arm. Tha-at's hardly mu-urder. A-and I'm not stu-upid enough to atta-ack a pro. My ea-ars aren't bleedi-ing, if you-ou haven't no-oticed."

Shizuo glared, slamming a hand on his desk. “Still! He attacked a first year with his knife-summoning quirk! I’ll be able to detect it if he tries to attack you, Mirio!”

“No o-one has a kni-ife summoni-ing quirk. I ha-ave a knife. A he-ero should fi-igure that out, at le-east. A-and Mirio is u-under Eri’s pro-otection.” 27 continued typing. “E-even if he wa-asn’t, he-e seems like the-e only one he-ere who has a-any situa-ational awa-areness. Tha-at’s more formi-idible than shooti-ing spi-ines.”

Shizuo paled, staring at 27 with a slack jaw. “Did you read my record? How did you-”

“Shizuo, that’s kind of easy to guess, since you’re in the hero course,” Mirio interrupted, scratching the back of his head. “Of course, Shinsou and I just have a lot more situational awareness!”

A blue haired girl in front of Mirio screamed in frustration, rubbing her head frantically. “Jeez! Can you guys really call yourselves upperclassmen?! You’re bothering Shinsou with dumb-dumb rumors, and now Mirio won’t let me bother him! And I really wanted to bother him today! Mirio, can’t I-”

“Nope!” Mirio declared, putting his hand up. “We can only bother Shinsou for 5 minutes a day, and Shizuo just used all of them up!”

27 found himself paying more attention to the discussion than his book as the class went on. New tactics and strategies, especially with a psychological aspect to them, were always useful, but the debates that went on between the students and his owner were interesting as well. How to determine when an opponent’s will was failing, whether that was a time to persuade them to surrender. Was it better to break the will of a group by devastating their leader, or to let that leader surrender and hope that a rival didn’t take up the charge?

When it led back to a question of morality, 27 found himself losing interest. These heroes were willing to sacrifice an easy win just to uphold the idea of ‘The Hero’s Mantle.’ Risk getting killed or injured more than necessary to be seen as a martyr for other people to worship. They clearly hadn’t faced the reality of the world if they could say those things so easily.

Chisaki might have been right about Hero Syndrome.

When the class ended, 27’s eyes met the blue haired girl’s, and she grinned widely. Mirio threw out his arms to block her, but before it was necessary, the dark haired boy in front of her wrapped a tentacle around her waist as it shot out from his arm.

“TA-MA-KIII!” the blue haired girl complained, pumping her fists up and down against the tentacle. “I just want to say hi! Can’t I say hi?! It’s rude if I don’t say hi!”

The dark haired boy turned to look at 27, but quickly looked away, slumping further into himself. “You really shouldn’t bother him today, Nejire. You’re a lot to handle on a good day.”

“Shinsou, do you mind just waving at Nejire?” Mirio asked, clapping his hands in front of his chest to subtly beg. “She’s going to be in a mood if you don’t.”

27 didn't particularly care if she was in a mood, since he wouldn't have to interact with the third years again until tomorrow, but something about her watery eyed pout was familiar enough to make him cave.

"YAY!" Nejire cheered, kicking her feet in the air while she was still in the tentacle's grasp.

"Shinsou waved at me! We're going to be best friends, Tamaki! You're going to be really jealous! I bet you're going to be SUPER jealous! He looks like he could be your little brother, but he's going to be MY little brother, and we're going to make you SUPER jealous!"

"He does look similar to..." Tamaki muttered, before he glanced at 27 again and slammed his head into his desk. "I mean..."

"I hope you guys have a good rest of the day!" Mirio cheered, raising his hand so Eri could give him a high-five, as seemed to be a ritual. "If anyone gives you trouble, just call your big brother Mirio!"

"MIRIO! I'm their big sister! Big sister Nejire! Call me instead!" the blue haired girl wailed as she was dragged out by both Tamaki and Mirio.

His owner rubbed at his eyes, exhaustion plain on his face. 27 knew that was because of him. Because he made trouble. He should have found a way to avoid the fight with Bakugo. He could have been half-way forgotten by now if he did.

"Shinsou," his owner said, tucking his hand into his pocket. "Show me the knife."

27 stood stiffly, angling his body away from where Eri was sitting. He hadn't cleaned it yet, and didn't want her to see it besides. He didn't want his owner to see it either. He knew he would take it, and he knew he couldn't refuse that. He pulled the knife free from the sheath and gripped it a little tighter than necessary to keep from shaking.

His owner's eyebrows rose slightly before he spoke again. "How long have you had that?"

' 2 days. ' 27 answered, his signs awkward while still holding the knife. ' I am sorry. '

His owner nodded, leaning his back against the wall. "If I trust you not to use it again, would that be a mistake?"

27 shook his head. It could be a test, a test that he was failing miserably, but if there was a chance, a chance that he could keep this knife, he would risk it.

"Good," his owner said, repeating that training word. "You have an appointment after school tomorrow. For now, Hizashi has his free period, and then we have one more period with Class 1-A. Hizashi should be in his classroom."

27 followed, and didn't mind that Eri wanted to hold his hand as they walked through the halls.

An appointment.

A job.

English Theory

Chapter Summary

27's English class is going well, but Eri's homeroom is a bit more

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Mild Dissociation,

The free period with Present Mic ended up being 27's favorite part of the day. Even though he struggled to forget his impending assignment, or the hostile students right outside the door, he was able to do something he had truly missed since The Miasma.

He was able to learn from someone.

Teaching himself sign language and bits of English had been difficult. It was time consuming to constantly drill himself on the same subjects, frustrated when he found out he had remembered something incorrectly, and someone wasn't there to just tell him what he was doing wrong.

Present Mic's teaching style was completely different from Bug's. He never tutted under his breath to make 27 second-guess himself, or beat him into the ground until he learned how to avoid her blows on his own. Even when 27 was wrong, he explained why he might have thought that before he explained why it should be different.

Present Mic never fumbled with his words and go quiet while 27 simmered in confusion, like 10 would at times. He explained everything confidently, and seemed to struggle to hold himself back from going on too many tangents.

Present Mic taught him like 50 did, during the few lessons 27 had with her. Smiling, encouraging, correcting him confidently and gently. When Present Mic tapped his hand against his arm, pleased that 27 circled the right noun, he almost jumped out of his skin at the memory of 50 doing the same.

"Sorry, sorry! I got too excited," Present Mic said, wiping the corner of his eye. "It's just, I've been teaching Class A for almost a year and they still get stuck on capitalization for state names! It's because a good chunk of them study with Midoriya, and he just struggles to understand that 'Texas' isn't just shorthand for 'Texas Smash.' "

' Class A too noisy. ' 27 signs. ' Deserve better. '

Present Mic raises his arms as though to grapple his shoulders, his eyes watery, but instead he throws his arms against the chalkboard, groaning. "I KNOW. Iida tries, but they're animals sometimes, Shinsou! Animals! Beasts without reason! Without a hunger to know! I know it's second period and they're tired and Shou lets them sleep in homeroom which just makes it worse, but Shinsou," Present Mic whips his head around to fix 27 with a pleading expression. "I just wish I had a class full of kids like you."

27 can't help but quirk an eyebrow. ' Quiet. '

"No! Kids who want to learn! Kids who see the value in something other than throwing punches and taking down villains!" Present Mic says, miming a punch and heroic stance. "I know that's why they chose UA, but so few appreciate that UA is a high school, and they need to learn their fundamentals too! They all think my class is just a waste of time, but when they fumble through an interview for American broadcasts, ho! They'll realize it's too late!"

" ' Thank you for meeting me, Mr. President! ' " Mirio calls from the doorway. " ' I will save one million people as hero! ' "

" ' Lemillion, after you save one million people, what will you do next? ' " Present Mic asks, holding an invisible microphone towards the blonde hero.

" ' Go to DisneyWorld! ' " Mirio answers, throwing a thumbs up as he completes what must be an inside joke. "Ecto-sensei let me out early, so I figured I could walk with you guys to Aizawa-sensei's homeroom. One of the Big Three walking around the first year hall should draw more attention to how Shinsou didn't paralyze you from the waist down after you risked your life to save the entire hero course from Shinsou's Demon Shadow Sword Quirk."

Eri sighed with more exhaustion than she should really have, laying her head on her workbook. "Why are the heroes being so dumb to Twenny? I've tried everything but they're still being mean!"

"I'm sorry, Eri. I'm just interesting to them now," 27 apologized, shrugging. "They'll move on to something else to talk about in a few days."

"As long as you keep your Ogre Rage Nether Weapon quirk to yourself," Present Mic joked, elbow falling short of giving him a nudge. "Just one more class! Homeroom for you guys and... 1-C's English for me."

27 could hear the despair threaded through the voice hero's words. ' Bad. '

Present Mic's smile was hollow. "I wish you were there... to give me hope."

27 couldn't help the bitter feeling that rose up in him the more he thought about it. His life would have been far different if he was.

Eri stuck close to Twenny as they walked to their desks, and hoped that it helped him not be so scared.

Twenny was having a really bad day, and Eri was having a really bad day too. All thanks to the heroes being dumb.

Twenny's first day at school was supposed to be awesome! Eri had a plan for him to have at least five friends by the end of the day, but he was too scared to even talk to his future best friend, Momo.

But that was okay! Twenny's next best friend would be Kirishima, because they both had fun hair and liked Baby Shark, even if they didn't remember each other from school. Kirishima didn't want to talk to Twenny after Bakugo glared at him, but he still said he liked his hair, and that Eri did a really good job on it.

Twenny kept her busy with studying during the first English class, so she couldn't talk to Kaminari or Ashido. Eri wasn't sure if they would be good friends, but they both talked a lot so Twenny wouldn't have to, and they both needed good influences. Zawa said that a lot.

Then, after the second English class, scary Monoma ran up to them instead of Kendo. Kendo is always super nice to Eri, and Yama said she's the mom of Class B, so Eri was sure Twenny would want to be her friend so they can talk about how hard it is to raise kids. But even when Kendo did come over, Monoma started yelling crazy stuff, and that made everyone look at Twenny weird.

Eri usually likes Zawa's free period the best, and she really wanted to spend time with him since she had to start going to Yama's classes instead of just staying with Zawa. But Twenny was really scared. Twenny always looked around rooms, but he kept doing it every time he thought Eri wasn't looking. And he looked at Zawa a lot too, but Zawa was ignoring Twenny. And Zawa ignoring Twenny meant that he didn't really talk to Eri, but he looked at her and smiled whenever she got a question right.

Eri hoped that things would get better after lunch. She was really excited to see Twenny open his bento box and find the happy cat rice ball she worked so hard on. When she was making it, she thought about how much she wanted Twenny to be happy and have friends, just like Yama does when he cooks and thinks about how he wants the people who eat his food to be happy. Yama says that makes the food magically better.

But Eri didn't make it right today.

Eri already knew that Twenny was fighting someone in the bathroom, but seeing him on top of Bakugo with that scary look on his face made Eri's head feel dizzy and her legs feel weird, kind of like they weren't there.

Eri should have been more worried about Twenny, but she kept remembering the fights Twenny had when they lived in the compound.

Sometimes, Eri's quirk didn't work when He wanted it to. When that happened, He did bad things. Sometimes He injected her with something that really hurt. Sometimes, He showed her videos of Twenny fighting people.

Twenny was a good fighter, and Eri always hoped he would win. But that never happened. Twenny would get more and more hurt, until he stopped moving. Twenny would bleed, and his arm would get turned wrong, and his mask would get kicked. Twenny would make sounds that made Eri cry, because she knew he really had to be hurt to make sounds like that.

And Eri couldn't save him.

That bad feeling inside her would make her quirk start working again. And He would tell her that since it worked, He would fix Twenny. But if she ever stopped making it work, He wouldn't, and Twenny would die.

That happened once. Eri felt the bad feeling, and she cried, and she tried to make her quirk work. She tried as hard as she could. But He didn't do what He said He would.

Even when Twenny begged Him to.

Yama and Zawa knew something bad happened, and Zawa went to save Twenny while Yama calmed her down. He asked her to name all the things she could see in the room, to wiggle her toes and make fists with her hands until the dizzy-numb feeling went away.

Then Twenny came back with a bump on his head. Eri was glad it was just a bump, but she was still really mad at Bakugo. When she hugged Twenny, she gave Bakugo the meanest look she could, even though it made her sad to do that to a hero.

She tried to get Twenny to eat more, but he said he couldn't in a really tired voice. He kept pulling at his scarf when he thought she wasn't looking, and he looked kind of scared of her when he caught her watching him do that once.

Eri just really wanted to go home. She felt bad for making Twenny go to school. Even Mirio didn't make her feel better, and she knew he was trying his best, even though he did it wrong at first. Eri was pretty sure Twenny just wanted to go home too, because he didn't even read his book during Zawa's class.

After Zawa talked to him about the knife, Twenny started walking weird. It was like he would walk after Hari took Twenny out of the room sometimes. He was really stiff, kind of like Iida walks when he has to do some class president stuff he's nervous about, but Twenny didn't have class president stuff to do. Twenny was probably scared of the doctor's appointment.

Zawa tried to hide it from Eri by just calling it an appointment, but Eri knew it was a doctor's appointment. And she knew that Twenny knew that too, because he was really scared. Maybe if Eri begged and cried, Zawa wouldn't take him. When Eri was supposed to see a doctor about her quirk, she did that, and Zawa called a lot of people and said that Eri couldn't go. The people were really mad, and Zawa got really mad back, and he even he walked outside to yell at them. But after that, Zawa told her she didn't have to go if it made her upset.

It was a good thing Twenny likes Yama so much. Eri likes Yama too, but she really wishes Twenny will start to like Zawa as much as she does. Yama started teaching Twenny more English, by writing a bunch of words on the chalkboard and asking Twenny to circle things or use his hands to tell him what they meant. Yama smiled so much at how smart Twenny was that Twenny even smiled a few times too.

But Twenny went back to being slumpy and scared when they had to go to homeroom, even though Mirio was there. And Eri heard the heroes talking about Twenny, and saw them look at him like they were scared.

Eri was starting to hate school, and that made her really sad. She just wanted the day to be over so she could cuddle with Twenny on the couch and keep him safe.

So when Todoroki walked up to Twenny, Eri felt like she was going to cry. She liked Todoroki. He never bothered her, and when he said hi to her, he was always really quiet. Todoroki was the last hero Eri thought she would have to get mad at.

"Todoroki," Eri said, looking at her desk as she tried to keep her eyes from watering. "Don't be mean to Twenny. Please."

Todoroki stepped back really quickly, like he got scared of what Eri said. Maybe he was scared that she was going to use her quirk, because she knows heroes think she uses it when she gets really upset. Sometimes she wonders if that's why they're so nice to her. "I'm sorry, Eri. I wanted to ask him a question, but if you would rather-”

Eri looked up at him, and even though his face was still really calm, his eyes were a little wide. He was definitely scared of Eri.

Twenny stared at Todoroki, and Todoroki stood up a little straighter as he looked back. “Can I see what your teeth look like?”

Eri looked at Todoroki confused, and Twenny didn’t really move, except to tilt his head a little. Eri was used to Todoroki saying things that made people confused, but that was the most confusing thing Eri has ever heard him say.

Izuku looked a little embarrassed as he looked over at them. “Todoroki, maybe you shouldn’t ask him like that? Or maybe not today?”

Todoroki looked back at Izuku, but then turned back to Twenny to stare at him. It didn’t even look like he was blinking. “I’ve had this theory for a long time, and only you can unlock its mysteries. Can I look at your mouth, please?”

Twenny’s eyebrows screwed up for a minute before he went back to looking like Twenny, then smiled weird to show Todoroki his teeth. Todoroki nodded with a small smile.

“Thank you,” the hero said, then turned back to Izuku. “My theory is correct.”

A lot of students wanted to know his theory. Some of them were excited, but a few of them just laid their heads on their desks and covered their ears.

“He’s only been here one day and Todoroki already has a theory! Spill! Spill! Spill!” Ashido chanted, pumping her fists up and down.

Todoroki looked at Zawa, who was pretending to ignore everything going on, like he usually does when they don’t make too much trouble. “It would be inappropriate to tell everyone here.”

Zawa looked up, and Todoroki jumped when he noticed. “Todoroki. Why is this theory inappropriate to talk about?”

Todoroki didn’t look like he wanted to tell Zawa. “It may have been insensitive to tell Midoriya about it. I apologize, Sensei. And I don’t hold any judgements for your personal history.”

Izuku laid his head on the desk and covered it with his arms. “Todoroki, please don’t...”

Zawa ran a hand over his mouth as he leaned back, like he was trying to hide whether he was mad or trying not to laugh. “Since your classmates are so intrigued now, please explain your theory. You can use the chalkboard if that’s more effective.”

Todoroki nodded, and walked to the front of the classroom. Everyone turned to watch him, even Twenny.

Todoroki wrote Aizawa’s name at the top of the board, then Eri’s a little further down, with a line between them and ‘Red eyes’ in the middle. ‘Parent’ was written under Aizawa’s name, and ‘Child’ above Eri’s. Todoroki then turned to face the class. “I have begun to suspect that the reason that Aizawa-sensei and Eri’s relationship formed so quickly is due to Aizawa-sensei being Eri’s father. Until today, their similar eye color when Sensei activates his quirk was my only evidence.”

Midoriya hugged his head tighter. “Todoroki, that’s not how quirk heredity works.”

“It could be,” Todoroki answers. “But if Aizawa-sensei were Eri’s father, she wouldn’t have been in the situation she was previously. It wasn’t until we learned about Shinsou that I was able to connect the pieces.”

“You haven’t connected shit,” Bakugo growled. “What does looking into Shit-sou’s mouth like a fucking pervert have to do with any of this?”

Todoroki just turned back to the board and wrote ‘Shinsou,’ with a line going to Aizawa and ‘Emitter quirk,’ ‘Tired,’ and ‘Teeth’ written in the middle. Then he drew a rectangle and lines inside of it to make a bunch of little squares right beside ‘Teeth.’ “Shinsou and Aizawa share several similar attributes. The most valuable evidence is their teeth. They both have perfectly aligned teeth, something too rare to be coincidence. It’s genetic.”

Sero raised his hand. “Todoroki, you’ve heard of braces, right? Maybe you shouldn’t just start saying Aizawa-sensei had kids then abandoned them? Right in front of him? Because braces exist?”

Todoroki shook his head. “I’m not casting any judgements. In fact, I have reason to believe these circumstances were out of Aizawa-sensei’s control.”

Todoroki drew another line from ‘Shinsou’ and wrote ‘Yamada’ at the top of it, and ‘Voice quirk’ in the middle of the line. He then drew a line between ‘Aizawa’ and ‘Yamada’ and wrote ‘Close Relationship’ underneath it.

“I have reason to believe that at one time, Aizawa-sensei and Yamada-sensei wanted to have a child together. They contacted a surrogate,” Todoroki explains, writing ‘Mother’ under Zawa and Yama’s relationship line, then drawing a line from that word to ‘Shinsou.’ “Who carried Shinsou to term in secret after Aizawa-sensei was unable to pay for the services due to being an underground hero, as his salary is the lowest in the industry.”

Todoroki drew a yen sign and crossed it out above ‘Aizawa.’

“She had a quirk that allowed her to,” Todoroki answered without looking back. “However, this woman was also tied to the criminal underworld, and gave Shinsou to the 8 Precepts of Death. And after Aizawa-sensei’s career progressed and he became more widely known, she was able to use her quirk to conceive Eri without Aizawa-sensei’s knowledge, in hopes of creating a rival to one day take him down. Eri was given away as well, and not discovered until the raid on the 8 Precepts.”

Todoroki finished the line between ‘Woman’ and ‘Eri,’ then drew a line between ‘Eri’ and ‘Shinsou’ before he put the chalk down, turning to face the class.

“This brings us to the present. Eri and Shinsou were unconsciously aware that they are siblings, which explains the relationship between them, and the relationship between them and Aizawa-sensei.”

Eri looked between Twenny and Zawa, wondering if Todoroki was right. Twenny’s mom did give him away, just like her mom did. Maybe their moms were the same mom, and Zawa really was their dad. Maybe Twenny was scared of Zawa because he knew that somehow, and was really just mad at Zawa for not being their dad for a long time.

Todoroki made a lot of sense.

Bakugo slammed his hands on his desk, making Eri jump. "OR, this is all some half-baked bullshit and you're all fucking idiots for buying this! The twerp has red eyes and the corpse has weird teeth! That's all you fucking got! You gonna say I'm Sensei's bastard child next?!"

Todoroki tilted his head to the side like he was thinking about it. "You are very defensive about this theory, and you did instigate the fight-"

"I know that a lot of Todoroki's theories have been found to be untrue," Iida says, flapping his hands around to try to get Bakugo to calm down. "But this one may explain something that has been previously unexplained. However, I don't believe it would be appropriate to pry into Aizawa-sensei's personal life, so we should try to forget the information that has-"

"What?! Iida!" Ochako says, turning around in her desk. "Is Todoroki right about this?!"

"It isn't appropriate for us to-"

"Dude, you have to tell us!" Kirishima yelled, smiling really big.

Class A started yelling over each other and crowding Iida into a corner. Eri felt bad for him, but she really wanted to know too.

"Return to your seats," Zawa said in his Teacher Voice, making everyone frown as they sat back down. "Iida, explain to the class why you think Todoroki's theory is credible."

Iida jumped like he didn't expect Zawa to tell him that, but with everyone looking at him and Zawa telling him to, he had to. "If Eri and Shinsou are both wards, they wouldn't be allowed to live together. The policies surrounding wardships strictly prohibit any cohabitation. In fact, only wards from unrelated investigations are allowed one hour of supervised interaction if the appropriate forms are filed and approved. Aizawa-sensei above any other hero would adhere to those policies. However, if Eri or Shinsou were his biological child-"

"Enough," Zawa interrupted, frowning. He looked at the chalkboard again, for a long time. Long enough that Eri stopped wondering if it was true, but started wondering whether it was her or Twenny that had Zawa as a dad. "Iida is right about wardship housing policies, though that isn't covered until your third year. However, neither I nor Present Mic have children."

The heroes were quiet while Zawa erased the board, and Eri tried not to get too upset. It would have been really nice if Zawa was her dad.

Izuku raised his hand, waiting for Zawa to turn around and call on him. But Zawa was cleaning the board really slowly, like he didn't want to have to call on Izuku. "Sensei, um. If Iida is right about the wardship policies, then why-"

"Iida is correct," Zawa answered, his Teacher Voice sounding a little more tired than usual. "Allowances were made above my paygrade."

Zawa erased the yen sign.

"Free periods are a privilege, so I suggest that you use it for self-study," Zawa said, turning around to face the class with his angriest Teacher Voice. "If you don't, I'm more than happy to assign a 20 page report on the topic of pay disparity in the hero industry."

The heroes all found books to read, but Eri didn't want to read hers.

When Zawa took her home from the hospital, he told her she was living with him as a 'ward.' Wards got to live with heroes to keep them safe, and she knew Twenny really needed to be a ward to keep him safe.

But Twenny wasn't supposed to live with them. Zawa said it was allowed, but it didn't sound like he was as sure as Iida was when he said it wasn't.

If Twenny wasn't supposed to live with them, was someone going to take him away? If Eri wasn't good, would that make them take Twenny away? Would Twenny have to go back to the bad place?

Twenny looked like he was worried about that too.

Be Good

Trigger Warnings: None!

I'm putting up a double chapter as thanks for reaching 2000 hits! Thank you guys so much for reading and enjoying!

Hizashi could only hold him, he knows any assurances he could come up with would go unheard right now. Shouta just breathes, he doesn't want to talk yet, doesn't trust himself with words. He goes limp in Hizashi's embrace, head tucked into his shoulder.

It had been a very bad day.

The fight with Bakugo. The knife they didn't know about. The tension Shinsou carried with him the entire day, somehow worse than the way he had been in the interrogation room.

And Eri, despondent little Eri, had started calling Shouta 'Aizawa' again.

Hizashi knew it hurt. Becoming 'Yamada' again hurt. It hurt to hear Eri revert back to her quiet, polite way of speaking, dropping her nicknames and flashes of emotion in her tone. The way she tried to sound too mature when she spoke, flinching when she mumbled a word as though she expected to be corrected far more harshly than Shinsou ever would.

He knew it hurt Shouta more. He had been Zawa longer than he had been Yama.

They knew there would be backtracking. Regression. But it hurt to think they caused this, that keeping Shinsou home for one more day could have prevented it in some way, or delayed it. That they had failed as heroes, as caretakers.

But they were here now. The wards were asleep, and the walls could drop. They could hold each other, let the guilt seep out, and try to fix it tomorrow.

"I need to talk to Nemuri," Shouta whispers, pulling away just slightly. "If she has any advice...."

Hizashi nods, tracing circles over Shouta's shoulders. "It's not your fault."

Shouta presses his forehead against him, hiding his face. "I have to fix it."

He knows Shouta would struggle to say that if he could see his face, even with him. He knew Eri had only lived with them for a month, knew that was hardly enough time to justify the way they had begun to feel about her. The way Shouta felt a bit more keenly, but no less readily than Hizashi.

If Shinsou's eyes stopped lighting up when he signed to him....

It was something so small. They had known Shinsou for days, not weeks, and Hizashi knows he should be more concerned. Knows this feeling could be stemming from an unhealthy place, from poisoned ground. Trying to save that middle schooler that was convinced he was a villain because of what happened when he was born, instead of the kid who had been through so much worse. The kid who was afraid of something worse than Chisaki.

"I've got a few hours before work. I'll be here if anything happens," Hizashi reassures, and wishes he had taken another day off from his hero duties. He was offered that time, but he didn't really consider how much more difficult the transition would be for Shinsou than Eri. He didn't even think that Shinsou would be attached to him this early, especially not more attached to him than Shouta.

Shouta nods, and gives him a barely-there kiss before he leaves for Midnight's dorm. To get answers, to get a strategy.

Shouta without a strategy was a painful sight to see.

"Oh? Does your husband know what you're doing here, Shou-chan?" Midnight purred, leaning against the door.

She must have gotten the hint by the way he invited himself inside, as she closed the door and walked to the kitchen to mix up some instant coffee. He didn't even have the energy to complain about that offensive choice in drink.

"Yamada didn't tell me why Shinsou isn't in my art class anymore," Nemuri said, half complaint, half inquiry. Originally, they wanted to see if Shinsou could handle being away from Eri for a short period of time, and Nemuri's art class seemed well suited to distract him. But after the reaction he had to waking up without Eri there, that plan was quickly changed. Though, there were other reasons.

"Something is wrong with his hand. He avoids using it," Aizawa answers, settling into his usual place on her couch, and Nemuri hums thoughtfully. "Eri regressed. I'm 'Aizawa' now."

He forces his fist to relax, but the tension just travels up to his jaw. It was selfish of him, selfish to let it hurt. Eri had to be hurting more. Hurting because of him. Because he failed her.

"It happens. A lot," Nemuri chides, handing him a mug one of her wards had made. The son of a mob boss who could cry poison tears, if he remembered correctly. "When did it start?"

"After school, when we got home," Aizawa takes a sip, and ignores the taste. "She was quiet during the walk, and hasn't left Shinsou's side since lunch."

Nemuri takes the armchair catty corner to the couch, legs tucked underneath her. "A lot of changes have taken place in a very short amount of time. That's scary enough, but according to the rumor mill, it was a very stressful day. Safety is in past behaviors, and proven people."

He thought he was one of them. A person Eri could trust.

"She'll try again, Aizawa. And after that, she'll remember that it's safe. And after that, she'll retreat back into her shell," Nemuri takes a drink, and sighs. "It's hard. It feels like an insult to your entire career, to have a child doubt you. But it's never really about you, it's about what they've learned, what was proven to keep them safe years before they even met you. One day, she'll regress from something else, but you will still be 'Zawa.' "

Aizawa rubs his thumb over the handle of the mug, the edges where it was rough and less glazed. "It would have been better if Shinsou was assigned to you. Eri could still have that anchor." I have no idea how to help him . I've already messed up this badly.

Nemuri hums her dissatisfaction, giving him a half-hearted glare. "You're right! If he was my ward, I'd have him talking on the first day! With all of my years of experience, he would be fully recovered by now! Really, you're doing everything wrong!"

He knows she's joking, but he doesn't feel like she's wrong.

Nemuri softens, staring at her own mug. From the little girl that she reassigned to Joke. The one ward she couldn't talk about for years afterwards, blaming herself when the investigating officer should have known better. The reason Aizawa stared at the mugshots of the 8 Precepts members for hours, trying to find them in his own face. "Shinsou is a hard one. I don't envy you at all."

Aizawa doesn't want to say it. Some illogical thing rises in him at the thought, telling him he's admitting to being a villain, in some way, by admitting he's seen as one. "He sees me as Chisaki. He does anything that resembles an order when I speak to him. Tomorrow, he's going to have a tattoo removed," Aizawa pauses, realizing he's holding the mug so tightly his knuckles are turning white. "I don't know how to convince him that I'm not giving him another brand."

Nemuri leans her head against the back of the chair, turning her mug in her hands. "That's a hard one. Trying to convince a child that they own their own body, but with Shinsou...."

Shinsou hasn't had enough time to even fathom that. Aizawa hasn't given him enough time.

"It was his choice, right?" Nemuri asks, stripping too much accusation from her tone to make him doubt the question was anything but.

"He got it when he was fused with Chisaki and another member of the 8 Precepts," Aizawa answers. "He was going to burn it off if I didn't catch him."

Nemuri keeps his expression blank, but her breath catches for a moment. "He's not ready to face the brands, then. That's another trauma entirely. One too many."

"Five that I know of," Aizawa says, then more softly. "Hundreds that I don't."

"Only he does," Nemuri muses, an indirect attempt to reassure. "Let him think about what he wants. I wouldn't...." Nemuri sighs, closing her eyes for a moment. "I didn't even look with Yukoi. It might have helped."

Yukoi was reassigned a week later. Nemuri thinks that removing the brand without replacing it was too new, too challenging. The wait for the new one too much to bear.

"Shou, I do love you, and I know you're trying your best," Nemuri says, staring at him with a soft gaze that turns harder. "But you need to treat Shinsou like Eri, even if he's far more deadly."

Aizawa wanted to know, but he didn't expect to hear this. "In what way?"

"You go on duty when you're with him. You watch for him to reach for the knife, check his feet for a fighting stance," Nemuri glances at the capture scarf Aizawa hasn't taken off in days. "Shinsou might not have noticed that, but he can see the difference between you and Yamada. Yamada shares things with him, even if it's just a smile or a bit of nervousness. Yamada is vulnerable, and you never are. Except with Eri."

Aizawa was trained against it. He struggled, even with Eri, to do it. Let himself smile. Let himself relax. Let her play with his hair. Telling her things that he liked, things that he never shared so easily with others.

Eri made it easier. He told himself he had to do these things, to model them for her. And it got easier as it worked, as she did start to talk to him more, to tell him the things she liked too.

He didn't notice his guard rising with Shinsou, but Nemuri was right. He hadn't shared anything with him, half out of avoiding him to keep from causing him stress, but the other half was training. Recognizing the way Shinsou carried himself, remembering the video of him fighting off his attackers in that cell. The brutal injuries he had caused when he was in that interrogation room. Aizawa was recognizing a threat instead of the child beneath it.

"It's hard, I know," Nemuri sighs, propping her head on her hand. "The first time I was able to turn my back to a ward who pulled out a knife, I got stabbed. It took a long time to try again, but the second time, I didn't. Maybe because they knew how much I hate getting stabbed."

Aizawa almost hopes Shinsou would do that. That kind of fear was familiar, and far less than the stock-still terror Aizawa inspired now. "You should meet him this weekend. Observe the situation."

Nemuri gives him a Cheshire grin. "Well, if you insist, but Emi is coming in Friday night. I'll just have to invite her too, so she won't be lonely."

"Fine," Aizawa answers, taking another sip of his rancid drink.

Nemuri waits for a protest, or at least a stipulation, but Aizawa has none to offer. This situation is far beyond him, and he knows that. "You've got it bad, Shouta," Nemuri teases. "The 'Zawa' withdrawals are making you desperate."

"She has experience with mute cases," Aizawa answers, making Nemuri glance away. "And she's far more tolerable with a distraction."

Nemuri chuckles, pressing a finger to her lip. "Oh, isn't she? Delightfully one-track minded."

Aizawa ignores the innuendo, finding himself more settled now.

Sharing things. Expressing vulnerabilities.

Chisaki wouldn't have done that.

27 angles his feet towards the desk, straining to get his footing before his arms give out, or the ceiling tiles begin to crack. It's harder getting out of an air duct than in, but that was always the case, he should have remembered that.

He stands on the desk and lets his arms fall to his sides, rubbing the overexerted muscles. The ventilation system led to a lot of rooms, including Eri's, but the vents were too small in the living room, bathroom, and kitchen to use as access points. He wouldn't be able to use the air ducts as an escape measure, but if he gathered some rope or made some, they could use the window in Eri's room.

He picked up the vent cover and took a screw out of his pocket, to put the room back to rights. He had gathered as much information as he could, yet he still had several hours before he was supposed to be awake. His old friend, sleeplessness, still remained.

The front door had opened and closed a few hours ago. Someone exiting. An hour later, that person returning. An hour ago, someone leaving again.

He didn't know who remained, Yamada or his owner, but they were in the living room now. Awake, by the occasional sound of footsteps to the kitchen. Keeping watch.

From the right corner of the couch, only the first half of the hallway was visible, which would be beneficial if not for the nightlights positioned down the length of the hallway. If he opened the door, the light at the end of the hall would cast a shadow for the watchman on the couch to see.

Why did he ever think those lights were for Eri's sake?

At least Eri was beginning to realize it. There was a part of him that wished it wasn't so, that the reality beneath was the same soft, confusing thing it was on the surface. Twenny wanted to tell her no, that it would be okay, that Eri could keep dreaming of a world where beds and books and food were given away for free.

27 couldn't. The only reassurance he could give her was that her job was simple, 'Don't make them angry.'

27 had other jobs. Don't make them angry, learn their tells, find the weaknesses, learn the game. Play the game. Lose at it, keep Eri safe. Keep Eri happy.

She'd learn to be happy again. It was hard to accept the reality after dreaming for so long, but it was time. His place here was fragile, and if he lost the game badly enough, he had to make sure she would be safe.

27 heard footsteps as he finished replacing the last screw. From the couch, down the hall. To the office or bedroom, he needs to count the difference tomorrow, should have before. A door closes. He waits.

20 minutes.

They might be asleep. He hadn't given them any indication he was awake. Eri was sleeping in her own bed. Fitfully, when he checked on her, but he already knew they didn't have cameras to watch them.

Not yet. Even Chisaki waited a year before he installed one, though it had plenty of blindspots.

30 minutes. Should he risk it? If there was a camera placed on the couch now, the watchman could be surveilling it now. Luring him into a trap.

37 minutes. He hears the whimpering. Eri is having a night terror, he doesn't have much time before she starts screaming. Not enough to use the ventilation system. If she screams, she'll make them angry. The watchman must have wanted to find something out of place, and he can't let it be Eri.

27 opens the door, only as much as he needs, and makes his way into Eri's room, resolving to make sure a few nightlights go missing in the future.

Eri whimpers and thrashes on the bed, not yet caught in the stillness that explodes into a scream. 27 kneels beside her bed, pushing the sheer curtain away, and waits until she turns towards him to press his hand over her tiny mouth.

Her eyes spring open and she screams against his palm, thankfully muffled. He could have forced her jaw shut, it would have been easy to do, but he couldn't. Not to Eri.

27 whispers assurances, as quiet as he can. "It's okay. It's a bad dream. It's okay."

Eri stills, eyes panicked and watery, but when he pulls her into his arms she tucks her face against his shoulder hard, hard enough to muffle the sobbing. She remembered her job. "Z-Zawa m-mad. H-he ate h-hi-im."

27's chest tightens. He can't comfort her the way she needed, couldn't take her to his owner to remember the man's face. He might not even be the watchman, but if he was....

Eri takes her deep breathes, guided by the circles he draws on her back and the quiet hums he makes. She's trying to be good, trying so hard to be quiet. " Za-awa ," she sobs, and his chest aches as she starts crying harder.

He's asking too much. Eri wasn't meant for this, and he had never wanted it for her. It was hard enough in that cold, concrete room, but for her to stay cold in this warm and soft place they had found was just too much.

The door opens.

27 is frozen in place. Dog knows to push Eri away, Twenny knows he can't, not after all she's been through today. He can smell the bleach, hand in his hair, 'Are you trying to get her sick, Dog? Oh, if Chisaki caught you, it wouldn't just be a bath.'

Eri keeps him tethered in the fog, still shaking but aware enough to recognize his owner's voice when it finally comes. "Eri, are you okay?"

Eri tightens her hold against it, trying so hard, but a sob wracks through her and she runs, throwing herself into his owner's arms. "Don't b-be m-ma-ad, 'm so-o-orry! I'm so-orry!"

His owner's arms wrap around her, red pajamas and white hair dissolving into shadow, and 27 just watches. The white scarf is gone and 27 left his knife in the room, the fight would be a little more even if it has to happen. A fight is his only guess for a good distraction, he doesn't know the man's tics yet, doesn't know how to hide Eri from his attention when she does something wrong. "I'm not mad."

"B-be go-ood, gonna be go-ood," Eri sobs, pushing away just go pull herself back. "D-don't ta-ake Twenny! Please! Do-o-on't!"

Eri wails, pain and terror that works its way deeper into his chest without words to dilute it. His owner's arms tighten around her, and he glances at 27 before returning his focus to Eri, curling a hand over the back of her head. "Eri, I'm not going to take Shinsou away. Did... what Iida say scare you?"

Eri starts to calm, still struggling to even out her breaths, but she holds her breath and nods, every tiny muscle in her body held tight as she waits.

"Eri, I..." His owner pauses, turning his face to the side. "I wouldn't let that happen. Shinsou was assigned to Yamada as a ward. So you two could live together. The people that Iida said would take him are the same people who want Shinsou to be here. They wouldn't want you to miss him."

Eri wipes away her tears, still sniffing, then looks up at his owner. "Y-you won't take him to the b-bad place? O-or the ch-chair?"

27 had to look away, knowing his face would betray him. She dreamed about him being taken to The Chair. Remembered the one horror he could never protect her from, the one she knew best.

He knew that kind of dream. He had woken up screaming from it himself, clutching her tightly when he remembered how to breathe, only to run his hands over her arms, afraid to find a lump squirming beneath her skin.

"Eri, I would never let that happen. I would never," his owner sucks in a breath, possibly to steady himself from that flash of anger in his voice. "I would never hurt you. Either of you. It's my job to keep you safe, as a hero and as your guardian."

Eri calms, though 27 knows she's still trembling without having to look. "Can...I call you 'Zawa...' and it won't make you mad?"

Something moves, a rustle of fabric from either of them, but for a moment 27 forgets that it couldn't be the scarf, that it wasn't reaching out to wrap around Eri's neck. 27 turns back to look, and catches that odd, soft smile on his owner's face. "I like being called 'Zawa.' Even more than my hero name."

Eri presses her face into his chest, her toes curling into the carpet, probably embarrassed. "I like calling you that."

27 barely hides the clench of his jaw. The exchange, trading things that they liked. Eri didn't know she was handing him the tools for her own punishment. This one wasn't dangerous, but the way Eri answered tells him it was practiced often enough. She had or would give away something they could take.

"Can Twenny sleep in my room?" Eri asks, and 27 flinches. She handed him something, something easily taken away. They had separate rooms for a reason, and the nights she could ignore that were wearing thin. They would put their foot down eventually, they would make her stay in her own room in a way far crueler than bribery and reading bedtime stories.

"If he wants to," his owner answers, glancing at the pink curtain surrounding her bed. "I don't mind at all." His owner is a very good liar, and he can't blame Eri for being fooled. If 27 didn't know better, he might also trust his words, even if they made no sense.

Eri only had to look at him with her eyes still watery from tears left unshed for 27 to stand and pull the comforter farther back. She runs to get on the bed, as though she knows his owner might change his mind. At least she knew that much.

27 pulls the covers over her and sits, finding himself unable to lay down with his owner's eyes still watching. It could be a test, half-failed already, but not fully. A beating, but not a bleach bath.

"Good night, Zawa," Eri calls as she yawns, tucking a calico cat plushie under her chin.

"Good night," his owner answers, closing the door behind him. 27 lays down, wondering if Eri was learning the game a little faster than he expected.

She squirms closer to him, yawning. "Me n' Zawa will keep you safe, Twenny."

"Yeah," 27 answers, running a hand over her hair. "I'll keep you safe too."

Let's Chat

Chapter Summary

Yamada gives 27 a surveillance detail, and unlocks a new way to gather information from his phone.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Mild dissociation spell

27 doesn't sleep. He watches Eri slumber, thankfully undisturbed from nightmares. He counts her plushies hung on the wall, 37 he can see but there are more he can't. He runs through all the JSL signs he knows, recalling any English words that partner with them.

Yamada returns to the dorm an hour before he enters to wake Eri up, already dressed in his hero costume. He opens the door too suddenly for 27 to feign sleep, but doesn't seem to notice. It's probably beneath him to punish 27 for not sleeping when he was told to. "Good morning, listeners! Time to get ready for school!"

Eri grumbles until she rolls into 27's thigh, springing up as she realizes his presence. "Twenny doesn't want to, Yama! Don't make him!"

Yamada winces, teeth flashing for a moment, before he leans against the doorframe, looking at 27. "I know yesterday was pretty rough, kiddo. It really wasn't supposed to be. I really wish you could stay home, but...."

27 shook his head. 'I'm fine. E-R-I worried.'

Yamada smiled, though it was strained. "Still! If anything happens or you want to come hang out with me for a while, just shoot me a text and I'll be there! We can get it all set up at breakfast!"

The rest of the morning sank into routine, Eri picking out her clothes then 27's, choosing a black hoodie that at first glance was similar to his uniform at The Miasma, until 27 noticed the cat ears poking out of the hood. It was kind of adorable, and 27 wondered if Eri had something similar.

It turned out she did, a tiny white hoodie that she had changed into, wanting to match. Yamada combed her hair into pig tails as Eri poured 27 a bowl of cereal, and 27 watched Yamada work, trying to figure out how he was able to pull her white tresses into shape without hurting her.

"Alright! Can I see your phone for a bit? I'll just put my number in and give it right back," Yamada asked, possibly noticing the way 27's hand tightened possessively over the device.

He didn't want to hand it over. It was not only incredibly useful, but it was also the most expensive thing he had ever possessed. It made him feel a bit more normal, a bit less like Dog, owning something that Rikiya and Chisaki had.

But he couldn't refuse Present Mic.

The right hand hits the hardest, and the blonde hair hanging limp around the hero's shoulders was starting to look like a different shade the more he wavered. Bug wouldn't have let him hesitate this long, and he should count himself lucky that Present Mic hadn't gotten angry already. He held the phone out for the hero to take, hoping that if he was angry, he would hold the grudge until Eri was out of the room.

"Oh, it's the same model as mine! That's good, these things are confusing for an old geezer like me," Yamada says, sitting close to 27 as he held the screen out for him to watch. "The messaging app is- oh. That's right, we haven't gotten a SIM card yet."

27 watched as Yamada closed the app that displayed the warning about the missing SIM card, pulling up another that listed several games and other apps.

"Let's get you set up on LNE for now, and maybe Snapchat too. LNE is easier to use, but Snapchat is also super fun to play around with. That's the one with the cat filter!" Yamada rambled, pulling up LNE as soon as the icon loaded on the screen. "Alright, I'll just plug in your name here, my email for right now, verify it after this and.... then.... Presto! Here's our chat, when you open up this screen, just tap my name here and you can send me a message!"

Yamada handed 27 back the phone, which started to buzz and ding as more chats labelled 'Do you know' with various names popped up.

"Looks like some students wanted to chat with you too! Now I can have you spy on them and tell me when they're on their phones in class!" Yamada laughed in a dramatically villainous way, twirling the ends of his mustache.

27 would have ignored the other messages if Yamada didn't assign him to a surveillance detail. He opened the first 'Do you know' and saw it was for Mirio. Another message popped up asking for his username for the chat.

27 frowned. When he typed in his new name, another dialogue popped up asking if he was sure. He wasn't, it seemed like the app didn't want him to use that name.

27 had never picked his own name, and he had too many to choose from. 27, Dog, Twenny, Shinsou, Listener, and then some that his clients from The Miasma had given him. Quizzler, Hypno, Mind Stealer, Mind Flayer. Names given to him to cover up the fact that he was a Number, that he was rented out for a night. All of them seemed a bit cheap to him.

He turned the phone to Eri, who read the name at the top and beamed. "You're friends with Mirio on the phone!"

"The phone doesn't like 'Shinsou Hitoshi,' " 27 explained, his new name feeling strange as he spoke it for the first time. "I don't know another name to pick."

Eri took the phone and started typing with practiced hands as Yamada looked over from the stove. "Oh, you can still use your name, Shinsou! LNE just encourages you to make a new one since most people use inside jokes as user handles."

Yamada rubbed the back of his neck nervously as he turned back to making coffee, and 27 wondered what name he had picked for him in their chat. Even if Yamada called him 'Shinsou,' maybe he wanted to give him another name, but wasn't allowed to speak it after the police had named him. Maybe it was a name as tawdry and dramatic as the ones his clients had given him.

Eri handed back the phone, which he noticed already had a few messages on the screen. "You can change it if you don't like it," Eri said, fidgeting in her seat. "But Mirio likes it! He promises he won't tell!"

27 scrolled to the top of the messages and started reading.

Eri's Plushie Dealer: Hi Shinsou! This is Togata Mirio! I hope you like the phone!

Eri's Mom: hi mirio!!! this is eri, i picked twennys name!!! aizawa said twenny is my secret nickname for twenny, like zawa is for him, so i didnt pick that one but you can use my other secret nickname. it matches with your phone nam but if twenny doesnt like it the phone says he can change it right?? i hope he likes it

Eri's Plushie Dealer: !!! Hi Eri!!! Awww I like the name you picked! It's so cute! But maybe I should change my name, I don't want Shinsou to think I'm a criminal or anything.

Eri's Mom: no! i like your name!

Eri's Mom: were eating cereal. what are you eating for breakfast?

Eri's Plushie Dealer: /// I'm glad you like it! I'm eating Eggos! They're my favorite!

Eri's Plushie Dealer: Maybe if I get this job I applied for, I can get you a phone too! Then we can talk all the time! And I can know what you're eating for breakfast!

Eri's Mom: yeah!!!! and the phone wont care i dont have a whole name because i have to pick one anyway!!! heres twenny!

Eri's Plushie Dealer: Hi Shinsou!!! I promise I'm not a bad influence on Eri, it's just a joke I thought was funny at the time!!!

27 pushed down the embarrassment he felt reading his username. He had a job to do, to gather information on the students for Yamada, to be his inside man. Perhaps Yamada would want to know what job Mirio was trying to get.

Eri's Mom: It's fine. You'd make a horrible dealer. Can't pull off the intimidation part. Job.

Eri's Plushie Dealer: lol Probably! I had to fight class 1-A to get them to listen to me during my big speech to them! If only I could imitate Aizawa-sensei better!

Eri's Plushie Dealer: Oh, and I applied for a construction job! Even if I can't be a hero, I still have the muscles to do this job! I might have more options if I transferred into GenStudies to graduate, but Principal Nezu was really against it. He's going to put me on an academic hold at the end of the semester until I get my quirk back.

27 closed the chat application, though he knew he still had a job to do. It would have to wait until the guilt swirling inside him calmed.

Eri liked this hero, whether he was a good one or not. She asked him to fix Mirio, and he could. He could take control of Eri, control her quirk where she couldn't. It was 27 that decided Mirio's fate now.

27 decided whether he would be a hero or not.

Did Mirio know that? Was he keeping close to Eri for his own sake, and trying to bribe 27 with the phone to sway him? What would happen when he realized his plans hadn't worked? How would he force 27 to control Eri to regain his quirk?

27 felt the hum from the phone's vibration through the table, and tucked it into his pocket to mute the sound. The guilt had dissipated, becoming something else, something that turned his stomach all the same.

There were too many players in the game now. Too many angles and 27 didn't have a plan for any of them.

The buzzing kept getting louder as the morning went on.

The day passed by more smoothly than it had yesterday. The students seemed to ignore him, except for a few waves that he could easily look away from and plead ignorance to. The only moment of panic during homeroom was when the pink girl stood up, slamming her hands on the desk as she glanced at 27 with a strange, thin lipped smile, then turned to the red haired boy behind her and nodded violently, jumping up and down as she did. The boy stood up, screaming "REALLY?!" and 27 worried they were going to attack, before his owner ordered them to sit down.

Surprisingly, that was the only time Class A interacted with him. 27 thought their interest would hold until the weekend, but the explanation came during 1-B's English class.

Monoma kept staring at him. Anytime 27 looked, he caught the blonde looking back at him, and though he turned away, he would be back to staring immediately. As soon as the class was dismissed, Monoma sprang from his desk and attempted another leap, but Kendo was faster, catching his waist in the crook of her arm. "Monoma! I already told you-"

"Well, maybe I was going to apologize before you rudely interrupted me!" The blonde protested, straining against her arm as he pointlessly reached towards 27. "Class A reacted in their usual barbarous way, but I should have known that before I told them! Someone should take responsibility for yesterday, but I wouldn't hold my breath waiting for Class A to do so!"

Kendo sighed, shoving Monoma in front of her with ease. "Shinsou has been through enough already. Save it for Monday, alright?"

Monoma sighed, as though Kendo had asked him to do the impossible, and looked over Kendo's shoulder to catch 27's stare. "You're right, he does look terrible. You should increase your water intake, Shinsou. You look a little dehydrated from all the stress."

27 raised his eyebrow. ' You look crazy. '

Monoma copied ' crazy ' with a baffled look on his face. "Is there something in my hair? Or are you saying - Present Mic-sensei!"

"Oh, that's kind of a loose sign to interpret," Present Mic answered, lying through his teeth. "You should think about learning a little sign language for yourself, though! It's very useful in stealth and rescue operations! Such a shame UA hasn't offered a course for it yet."

Monoma was still repeating the sign as he left, following Kendo. As soon as they were out of earshot, Present Mic laughed.

"That's one way to inspire them to learn," the hero chuckled. "I think Shou is going to sleep through his free period, and maybe you two should too. I can make him give up the sleeping bag if you want, Shinsou."

'I'm fine.' 27 lied, as his legs ached just from standing. 'Need water. I guess.'

Yamada laughed, far more than necessary, and walked them to the staff room.

His owner was asleep already, sitting under his desk with a yellow sleeping bag cocooned around him. 27 assured Yamada that he didn't want the sleeping bag several times before the man left, promising to come back and take it if 27 changed his mind.

When 27 turned around, he saw Eri already passed out, laying across his owner's legs. Realizing she probably needed the rest more than her math lessons, 27 pulled out the phone and sat down in a chair positioned to watch the door and the two nappers.

He ignored the first two chats, though both had messages waiting, and pulled up the next 'Do you know.' It was Midoriya Izuku.

27 ran a hand through his hair, frowning at the phone. He needed to pick the codename himself this time, since Eri would pick something embarrassing. If he knew what Izuku had already picked, he could choose something to match. Something that would make sense. But he wasn't given that information.

An inside joke. He didn't have anything like that with Izuku, he only saw him for a handful of hours, and the only conversation they had was about the Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats.

Maybe Izuku picked a name based off that show. His favorite character was Tiger, he might have chosen Tiger as his username. But going by Mandalay....

27 typed in the name and waited for the phone to load.

Deku: Hi Shinsou! This is Midoriya, the weird guy that was bothering you yesterday. Sorry about that! It was nice watching KKP with you!

Deku: Or, I hope it was. I didn't really know about your quirk being on it, I'm sorry about that.

Deku: Your quirk is really cool though! Sempai told me more about it, I hope that's okay! Please stop me if I start rambling about it, I know that's kind of annoying

Deku: I'm really glad that you get to live with Eri again! She was really worried about you while you

Deku: Sorry I meant to backspace not send! I'm just really glad you're with her again! She talked about you a lot, and you seem like a really nice person!

27 closed the chat and moved on to the next one, hoping that somehow, it would tell him how to change his username.

This chat was different. Instead of one person, there were three names grouped together, Midoriya Izuku, Uraraka Ochako, and Iida Tenya. Three people to judge his choice in a username.

He closed the chat again and leaned away. He had been given so many names and yet he couldn't pick a single one. He knew the one he picked for himself was stupid, but he couldn't figure out how to change it. None of the things he tapped on had a clear option for it.

He pulled up the Deku chat again. Izuku had already seen something embarrassing from him.

Brainwashio: This app is confusing. I can't change my name. I don't know why you're calling yourself useless either.

Deku: You've never used LNE bef

Deku: I MEANT TO BACKSPACE

Deku: Sorry, it's kind of confusing for me too since I got a new phone! The keyboard layout is off.

Deku: You can tap on your name to change it though!

Brainwashio: Your name is still Useless. I don't know what that's from.

Deku: Oh! It's my hero name! I know that's kind of weird, but since my name is 'Izuku,' I used to be called 'Deku' before I came to UA. Instead of trying to forget about that, I decided to change the meaning of the name for myself and take pride in it! For me, 'Deku' doesn't mean 'Useless,' it means 'You can do it!'

Brainwashio: This username works then. You're on your phone in class, though.

27 isn't sure if he really was called 'Brainwashio' by kids trying to bully him, but it seems likely enough. It's not like he has a hero or villain name to use.

He wonders if Present Mic was only interested in students that were on their phones in his class when another message comes in.

Deku: You sound a little bit like Iida! But it's okay! Midnight-sensei lets us have free time after we do any quizzes. Art History is one of my better subjects, so I have a lot of free time.

Deku: Not that I'm bragging, though! Everyone does well in this class, so I'm definitely not at the top or anything!

Brainwashio: There's another chat with you, a girl, and the weak president.

Deku: Ochako and Iida! They're good friends of mine, and I just thoug

Deku: TT.TT I hate this phone.

Deku: You don't have to respond if you don't want to, especially since Iida made one with everyone in Class A for you. That one is kind of a mess right now, though, so sorry in advance!

Brainwashio: The naming conventions in those two

Brainwashio: I don't know them.

Deku: It's okay to pick any name you want! The Class A one is...chaotic. Kaminari and Ashido keep changing everyone's names, even though Iida asked them not to, so you wouldn't be confused. But in the IzuOchaIida chat, we're using video game characters!

Brainwashio: I don't know any.

Deku: I could pi

27 waited for another message, but none came. Izuku must have not meant to send that message. Again.

27 scrolled through the remaining chats. Another group chat with 20 other names, which must be the Class A chat. A chat for Izuku and Mirio. A chat for Monoma. A chat for someone named Koda Koji.

A chat for Bakugo Katsuki.

27 assigned a username for that chat, but Bakugo hadn't sent him a message. His eyes were becoming strained from staring at the screen too long, and 27 closed the app, deciding to keep watch for the rest of the period.

Lunch, then Class 3-A. He should probably check the messages from Mirio before then, so he wouldn't try to talk to him during the class, perhaps even using Eri as a means to further pressure him into restoring his quirk. English after that. Homeroom.

The job.

27 found himself staring at his owner as he slept, wondering what the job could entail. He hadn't been evaluated yet, nor trained. Eri didn't seem to be involved, as Yamada had told her she would be spending time with Mirio after school.

What was his job supposed to be? Was it somehow related to his owner's hero work?

His owner's eyelids fluttered, as though he had sensed 27's stare, and he looked away, hoping that he wouldn't wake. A loud snore reassured him.

Lunch. 3-A. English. Homeroom. Job.

He wasn't sure which one worried him more.

It wasn't lunch. Though Yamada seemed disappointed that 27 hadn't opened their chat, he only asked once before swiftly changing the conversation. Eri was still groggy enough not to notice that 27 only ate her rice ball and a few steamed vegetables.

3-A also went surprisingly well. Though he hadn't checked the messages yet, Mirio seemed more nervous about being in the same classroom than 27 was. He kept scratching the back of his head anytime he glanced at 27 while he spoke to Eri about their upcoming playdate, but didn't say a word to 27 himself. The only member of 3-A who did talk to him, surprisingly, was Tamaki, who handed him a water bottle and muttered that drinking more water helps when he doesn't sleep enough. The tentacle-summoner then bolted as though he still believed those rumors about 27's knife quirk.

English was actually fun. Yamada seemed to have forgotten 27's surveillance assignment completely, instead of being disappointed that he didn't have much to report. After doing a few more circling exercises, 27 decided to try to translate his report so far in English using his left hand to write, thinking that could compensate for having found out so little. The result was messy, and nearly incomprehensible, but Yamada smiled so much that it looked like it hurt him.

27 stared at the word, committing the correct spelling to memory, and nodded.

Yamada started rubbing his eyes with the back of his hand. “Ugh! My explanations are so bad on the spot like this! You deserve better, Shinsou! I need to sit down and actually make a study plan for us. Actually, we need to test your general studies too, but... Ugh, okay,” Yamada looked up at him, his eyes irritated from the thorough scrubbing. Unless he had been crying?

27 turned back to the chalkboard. ‘Mirio has a,’ and he paused.

He knew he learned that word. It was a short one. He remembers being surprised that something so small could stand for all the things that a job entailed. The blood rushing in his ears, the feeling of Bug's quirk under his skin, the unnatural way that warehouses and docks were so large, so much larger than any space had a right to be, swallowing him up and leaving him with the fear of ‘ Don't mess this up, don't fail, if you fail you die Bug will kill you if you mess this up -

“Shinsou? Are we doing alright, buddy?” Yamada asks, far closer than he was before, hands hovering over 27.

‘ Away .’

He didn't mean to do that.

But he did it. He signed it. Yamada's eyes were focused on him and he signed it, in front of the worst possible person at the worst possible time. He watched Yamada's eyes move, move to watch his hand, he knew that sign.

He knows he's broken. Yamada knows .

“Hey, Shinsou, it's okay, I didn't...” Yamada takes a step back, running his hand over his preposterous hair. “I might have laid it on a little thick earlier, I don't want you to feel nervous about not knowing something. You're learning, you know? You can always make mistakes with me, I'm not going to be mad! What you know so far is amazing, you know! Just, uh...”

Yamada glances at 27's hand, he's going to ask-

“So, ‘Mirio has’ something! Do you know the sign for it? Maybe a ‘cold’ or ‘girlfriend’?” Yamada signs, too jerkily. 27 doesn't think he can remember those signs, but he turns to the board and hopes that remembering this stupid little word is enough to compensate for it, and distract Yamada from asking him what 'Away' means.

'Job.' 27 writes. Three little letters, and he fell out of his head over them.

"Mirio has a job! Okay, that's-" Present Mic stops himself, staring at the board. "I didn't know about that. Do you- is it okay if I look at your chat? If it's not, it's okay, I'm just..."

27 hands over the phone. He knows it's not his at this point, with how often it can be taken away. But something else makes it easier to give it back to Present Mic. Maybe he shouldn't have told him about Mirio's job, but maybe it was good that he did. Maybe Mirio wasn't supposed to have a job, he could be on hold from an injury and not just for losing his quirk.

Yamada scrolled through the phone, his eyes working this way and that as he read, hand curling over his chin. At the end, he sucks in a breath, handing the phone back to 27, his voice turning unnaturally serious. "I'm glad you told me, that's-"

"Don't be mad at Mirio!" Eri demanded, shaking her head. "Tell him I don't want a phone! I didn't know he wasn't supposed to have a job!"

"Whoa, whoa, little listeners! I'm making it out to be something that it's not. I'm sorry! I'm not mad and he's not doing anything bad!" Present Mic tries to reassure, waving his hands at both Eri and 27. "I'm just worried about Togata. He's a good kid, a really good kid, and I worry about him a lot and... I don't want him to give up on something that will hurt him down the line, you know?"

Eri's eyes only became more panicked at Yamada's words. "He's gonna get hurt at his job?!"

"No! No, sorry, I just," Yamada's hands fell to his side, and he stared at the wall as though he couldn't figure out what to say. "Having another job is fine! I work as a radio host and I'm still a hero, but a lot of people don't think like that. I don't want Togata to think of it that way either. I... I really just don't want him to be sad, and not tell anyone. Because that's a pretty rough place to be, you know?"

Yamada's attempts to reassure Eri weren't working. 27 watched her face fall, her lip wobbling dangerously close to a sob, when the door opens and Mirio steps in. "Hey guy-"

"Mirio I'm sorry! I'm gonna fix it, so don't be sad!" Eri yells, bolting out of her seat to throw herself against Mirio's legs. He leans down to pick her up, fixing her with a puzzled look.

"I'm not sad, Eri! I got two chocolate milks from the vending machine today! How can I be sad after that?" 27 notices that Mirio only glances at the chalkboard. The words written aren't a surprise to him, and 27 knows that he knows what they mean. He had been listening.

"I'm gonna fix you, Mirio, so don't get a job," Eri begs, wiping at her tears. "I'm gonna try really hard! And do it all by myself so Twenny doesn't get sad either!"

Mirio's smile softens, and he leans forward to catch Eri's gaze. "Hey, it's okay. I'm not giving up on being a hero, Eri, so don't worry about that! In fact, this job is going to help me be a better hero."

Mirio turns to Present Mic, though his smile becomes a little more strained, and he doesn't seem to ever make eye contact.

"I was actually inspired by your job as a radio host! I was listening to Get Your Hands Up! when I realized that learning all about sound equipment probably helps you as a hero, since it accentuates your voice quirk. And then I wondered what could help me utilize my quirk,” Mirio says, tilting his head with his hand tucked under his chin. “I figured, if I knew more about how buildings are designed and built, I could phase through walls quicker to get to where I need to be!”

He’s not a good liar. Even that smile is fading the more he talks.

“Let’s say there’s a hostage situation in a huge, 80 story tower, and all we know is that the villain is standing close to an air vent because the sound of the air whooshing was heard over the phone when he made his demands. With what I know now, I’d be pretty stumped. There’s still hundreds of places with an air vent in that building, maybe thousands. But if I learned more about building codes, I might be able to narrow it down. If it’s winter, it’s a heating vent, and then if it’s su-”

“Th...” 27 grits his teeth and glares, but doesn’t allow himself to stew in his own disappointment. Still broken, still unable to talk. Even for something this simple, a simple little fact that still boils in the back of his throat, screaming for him to just say it.

He turns to the chalkboard, hardly noticing how badly his hand shakes. ‘They’re the same vent. Don’t ’

Fuck , was he really going to write something that lame? Wasn’t there anything else he could write instead? Anything?

27 didn’t want to turn around. He wanted to throw his head through the chalkboard.

Why did he even care? This hero could be manipulating him, manipulating Eri. This could all just be the culmination of his plan, his game, and 27 knows better. All that he really knows about Mirio is that Eri and Yamada like him.

27 doesn’t even like him. He’s far too perceptive, far too connected, and that damned smile hides everything that 27 needs to know about him.

He doesn’t know why, but he couldn’t stand to see it fading anymore.

When 27 does turn around, that smile is gone. Shock is written all over Mirio’s face, his jaw hanging open, his eyes wide and focused on the board as though it holds the secret to life, not just chicken-scratch and an overused line from a boring cartoon.

Then, Mirio grits his teeth, gasping before he starts scrubbing the back of his hand over his eyes, but the tears still fall regardless.

He fell right into it, he doesn’t even have time to be impressed with how flawless Mirio’s strategy was. Now that this overgrown hero is blubbing all over himself, there’s no way that 27 could deny what Eri wanted him to do.

Eri was going to start crying, and he’d have to control her, and he’d hate himself the entire time, but now that he was crying Present Mic would force him to-

“I won’t!” Mirio shouts, hand curling into a triumphant fist even though the tears are still falling down his face. The smile returns all the same, even brighter than it ever had been, as though enthusiasm could make up for the slip. “I won’t give up, Shinsou!”

27 glances back at the board. Has this guy really never heard that line? He was way too fired up over something so uninspiring.

“Jeez, I got you guys all worried over me, what an awful hero. Sir...” Mirio stops himself, gritting his teeth before he laughs, an airy chuckle too full of bitterness. “I really need to get ahold of myself! The next time you talk to me, I’m going to make sure it’s not to comfort me!”

‘Trying to call you stupid,’ 27 signs, his eyebrow raised incredulously. Mirio had placed far too much value in 27’s attempt to speak, something that shouldn’t be awe-inspiring at all. It should just be normal. He should just be able to tell him he was stupid normally .

“I know ‘you’ and ‘stupid!’ ” Mirio cheered, as though he could make up for his moment of sorrow with enthusiasm. “So if you’re trying to call me stupid, I agree! I completely forgot why I wanted to be a hero in the first place. So that people like you can smile, Shinsou! And not worry, especially not about me!”

A girl with brown hair peeks through the doorway, staring at Mirio, which causes Present Mic to run to the door, shouting down the hall, “CLASS IS CANCELLED! YOU’RE WELCOME!”

A round of applause and cheering causes Mirio to hide his face behind his hand, muttering about embarrassing himself in front of other young heroes. Eri pats his head, trying to reassure him.

Present Mic claps a hand down on Mirio’s shoulder, his face turned grim. “Okay! So we’re going to have a chat, about a lot of things, but definitely how much money Shou and I owe you! The fees from babysitting Eri are one thing, but then you add interest and the cost-”

“Mic-sensei! You’ve got it wrong! I don’t need-” Mirio tries to protest, but he hadn’t noticed the fire in Present Mic’s eyes. He wasn’t going to be deterred.

“NOPE! You’re too good, Togata, you’ve been too good to us and we’ve taken advantage of you! I can empty out my savings over the weekend, and anything else we still owe- well, you know where we live, we can work out a payment plan- but if you need a place to stay-”

“Sensei, please it’s-”

Mirio agrees, warily. “But I’m not taking any money-”

27 follows close behind Present Mic. Though he doesn’t want to, he might have to restrain him from throttling Mirio if the hero kept denying payment. 27 would pay for it, dearly. He still didn’t know the punishments, but laying hands on someone so close to his owner might get him killed.

It might not just be Eri still held in Mirio’s arms that makes him ready to risk it.

Cat Fight

Chapter Summary

27 learns the real reason that he was taken to UA, and Aizawa gets answers from Officer Sansa.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Vague mention of attempted suicide, Dissociation

SPOILER FOR EXPLANATION

Sansa mentions that Shinsou tried to bite his tongue off while he was in the interrogation room, and that he was stopped. Shinsou's perspective isn't given, nor is the scene described in graphic detail. If you want to skip, you can stop reading after "We tried, Eraser," and begin again at "Well, maybe Naomasa."

Aizawa wondered why Togata was taking so long to bring Eri and Shinsou to Gym Gamma, until he sees Hizashi has also tagged along, his hand clapped tight around Togata's shoulder.

That much is enough for Aizawa to know the situation, but Hizashi still tells him anyway. "Oh good! Toshinori is here! I'm going to steal Eri's date for a little bit, do you think he can keep an eye on our dear listeners?" ' He broke down. '

"There's no cookies for him to poison, so I'm sure it'll be fine." Aizawa tucks his hair behind his ear, tapping once. Hizashi could sign with Shinsou at his back, but Aizawa was in his direct line of sight, and Shinsou didn't need to know any more about Togata's situation than he already did.

But the kid wasn't looking at Aizawa at all. His gaze was locked on the students, who were practicing quirk control, hopefully still solo under Toshinori's supervision.

Shinsou's expression betrayed nothing, but a subtle shift of his feet confirmed Aizawa's worries. Aizawa sent a pointed glance at Eri, then back to Hizashi. "You're supposed to be in class right now. Unless you finally took my advice and had 1-C expelled."

"Shou! I wouldn't do that! I would definitely cancel class and become the most beloved teacher on staff, though!" ' Will try. '

"Being well-liked as a teacher is a sign of not doing your job well," Aizawa chided, risking a subtle nod. "But you've never taken my advice before, and you won't start now. I'll work out who has babysitting duty with Toshinori. With any luck, he'll take over training and we can leave."

"You can't call me a bad teacher and then try to skip yourself! But I'll see you at home, little listeners!" Hizashi said, waving to Shinsou and Eri as he guided Togata out.

"The heroes are training! You've never seen them train before, right Twenny?" Eri asked, pointing to the arena. "You gotta watch out for Izuku, though! Zawa says he breaks his arms way too much, so you gotta yell at him if he looks like he's gonna break them again."

Shinsou was still watching, an eyebrow rising for a second before it was schooled back into place. "You're probably better at yelling at him, so I'll leave that up to you."

Aizawa approached Toshinori, keeping watch on Shinsou from the corner of his eye. The retired hero hardly noticed his approach, humming while he considered what he saw below. "Toshinori."

A mild sputter of blood answered him, and Toshinori covered his mouth as he turned. "Yes?"

"Togata had something come up. He was going to keep an eye on Eri and Shinsou, but would you mind-"

"Oh, of course!" Toshinori interrupts, realizing that the wards' presence. "Though, I thought Eri kept herself occupied during these training exercises. Perhaps I hadn't been paying much attention."

Shinsou's stance adjusts again, and this time he leans back a bit, a muted dodge from a student's blow. Aizawa frowns. "Keep Shinsou from watching. This sight is too familiar for him."

Toshinori nods grimly, but a friendlier version of his signature grin replaces that serious expression as he walks towards the wards. Aizawa takes his place to lean against the railing, watching the training below though his attention is solely focused behind him. "It's nice to see you two again. I hope the students have been behaving themselves, though I know they're quite overwhelming at times."

"Bakugo got in a fight with Twenny, and Todoroki thinks Twenny is Zawa's kid. But they haven't been mean today! Maybe they're being good because it's Friday!" Eri rambled, excited but not entirely comfortable with Toshinori's presence.

"They do know that they have to behave on Fridays, or else face young Aizawa's wrath at the dorm over the weekend," Toshinori chuckles, and Aizawa fights not to grin to himself. "I was wondering if you two would help an old man like me learn something I truly should have made time for before now, if you would like to."

"Yeah! We're really good helpers, right Twenny?" Eri asks, tugging on a piece of clothing to get Shinsou's attention.

Toshinori needed to hurry up. The answer was calm, but Shinsou was never that short with Eri. He might already be too close to falling away. "You see, I was hoping to learn a bit more sign language, but young Yamada is very busy. Since young Shinsou here has been picking it up so well, perhaps he could show me how to say a few words.”

Aizawa winced. He knew he should have given them an activity or a few ideas, but he had no idea that Toshinori was going to come up with that. How did he expect Shinsou to teach him without saying the meaning of each sign?

“I know some! And I can ask Twenny to show me more, so Twenny doesn’t have to talk to you. Right, Twenny?” Eri asked, a bit worried that she still had to fight for Shinsou’s attention.

Aizawa leaned back and caught the sight of Shinsou stepping back as though coming out of the fog, guilt flashing in a frown and wide eyes as he turned to look down at Eri. “Yeah, that’s fine. If that... That should be okay.”

A statement where a question was. He was adapting his way of speaking, but something in the way his alarm dropped away from his tone told Aizawa this wasn’t new. New to Eri, but Shinsou had learned to speak this way to others. The struggle was in doing it with Eri, in this new situation. In a place he was safe. “Thank you, my boy! I truly appreciate it! Now, I believe there’s a spot right over there that’s far enough away from young Bakugo’s explosives for us to hear each other. If I know the boy, and I do, he’s only warming up right now.”

On cue, Bakugo fired his grenade at the wall, glaring at it afterwards. He had been working with the Support Department to find a balance between the multiple rounds that multiple collection canisters provided, without losing too much firepower. Dividing his sweat into thirds seemed to be too much in his opinion, though Aizawa thought it was perfectly adequate.

Jirou was also finding fault with her costume improvements, though admittedly, it was still in the prototype phase. Moving the speaker ports to her shoulders did allow her to use her quirk faster, but she was having trouble remembering exactly where those ports were without looking. The cable for the aux extender didn’t look like it was secured or hidden either. He would have to check in with the Support Department to make sure that was taken care of in the end-result.

Aizawa was able to focus on his class for a while, making notes but seeing nothing that required his intervention. When Asui’s maneuvering put her a bit too close to ‘Bakugo’s area,’ Kirishima warned her before Bakugo could start having a fit.

Aizawa was too busy watching Bakugo as he turned to grouse at Kirishima over some perceived insult that he didn’t notice the newcomer until his name was called. “Eraserhead! Don’t tell me you threw him in there with all those quirks going off.”

Sansa. Shit.

Sansa hadn’t noticed Shinsou’s presence tucked into a corner of the walkway, but Shinsou had noticed his. His body was frozen, eyes terror wide and locked on the police officer. Fear written on his face more plainly than Aizawa had ever seen it. Had ever inspired.

“Toshinori, take over here,” Aizawa growled, taking Sansa’s shoulder to guide him outside. It didn’t matter if Shinsou watched the training and lost himself in a fight long-ended, because he had never looked as afraid as he was of the sight of the police officer.

Sansa had better hope it was just the uniform.

“What are you doing here?” Aizawa demanded, fixing the officer with narrowed eyes.

Sansa’s ears tipped forward, crossing his arms. “You didn’t read Naomasa’s email? He realized he didn’t tell you before you hung up, but due to Shinsou’s case, you need a police escort to go off campus. I was the lucky winner today.”

“I should have been called back, an email isn’t for time-sensitive information. I would have been able to warn him that you were coming,” Aizawa fights not to mirror Sansa’s posture, fights to strip the anger from his tone. “You can see how that would be important, considering the circumstances of Shinsou’s case.”

Sansa’s ears flicked back, catching the insult and accusation as intended. Then, he sighed, lowering his head as he shook it. “Yeah, Naomasa wasn’t exaggerating. You really can’t get like this, Eraser. This case is too-”

“I’m a bit more concerned about my ward’s wellbeing than the case, Sansa,” Eraserhead interrupts, forced to drag the question out into the open. “Is there a reason why you were picked that I’m not aware of?”

Sansa stared him down, futilely, before he laughed, quick and exasperated. “Yeah, actually. Naomasa sat down and watched a month of security footage to figure out which one of us would scare him the least. It was me. I wasn’t there as much.”

“During the interrogation, or when he was force fed?” Aizawa hopes the question catches him off-guard enough to slip up. He knows he was there for the interrogation.

Sansa goes rigid, the fur on the back of his neck fluffing up. Aizawa has never seen him that angry, and he’s seen Sansa in every color over the years they’ve worked together. But the anger falls away, leaving something far more open and raw. “No, I wasn’t there for the force feeding. Only a few times, when Naomasa thought it might help the kid stay...”

Sansa trails off, shaking his head in frustration, a less useful guard.

“Do you know how long we begged him to eat? We all took turns, cooking, buying take-out, eating some of it in front of him to prove it was safe. We begged him to eat every time, but there was nothing we could do, Eraser. We didn’t have Eri.”

Aizawa feels the doubt begin to creep, but doesn’t show it. He wants Sansa to keep going.

“Naomasa thinks that you think it was part of the investigation. It wasn’t, it was just a precinct full of people who were just trying to keep this kid alive. People who dedicated their lives to protecting others, watching this kid waste away in front of us. We tried, Eraser. Tried to get him to eat, to stop trying to bite off his own tongue-”

“What do you mean by that?” Aizawa interrupts, stepping forward with a glare. “That wasn’t in the files I was given. If Shinsou is a-”

“Well, maybe Naomasa gave you shitty files because the guy hadn’t left the station in a week!” Sansa nearly slips into a yowl, but Aizawa would believe him even if he didn’t.

He remembered how exhausted the detective had looked that day at the station. He remembered wondering how bad this case could be to grow so many lines on the young detectives face, wondered how long it had been since Naomasa last saw his wife.

"You have no idea how hard he had to push back to keep Mind Slice out of it! If you didn’t take him in, Kenma would be using his quirk on Shinsou right now.”

Mind Slice. To think of using that man’s quirk on a traumatized child....

Sansa shakes his head. “You’ve worked with us for years, Eraser. You’ve worked with me , and if you think I wanted any of that, to do that to that kid....”

Aizawa breathes. He knows enough now, enough to believe Sansa. But to re-evaluate the situation, he needs more. “Did you use a muzzle?”

It was standard procedure. Aizawa had only seen it used a few times, just to secure someone for transport to a hospital where they could be sedated and treated. The rubber mouth guard was just to protect someone from their most desperate moments, but for Shinsou, it was likely kept on for days, the hospital already a dangerous place for him. Sansa looks away and nods, scowling. “I was the one to take it off. He... tried to hold on to it.”

Aizawa isn’t shocked to know that.

“I let him. I waited, tried to get him to play cards with me. After we played a few rounds, he started having a spell, and I could take it off of him. I don’t know if that was better than just ripping it off the first time, but I was just trying not to hurt him. That’s all any of us ever did,” Sansa fixes him with a stare, reeling back from the vulnerability that Aizawa had maneuvered him into. “The whole station is waiting to hear from me. It’s Naomasa’s day off and I know he’s parked right in front to hear it first. We want to know that he’s okay.”

Aizawa doesn’t know if that word applies to Shinsou, or if it ever really would. “He eats if Eri gives it to him. He slept the first two nights. He doesn’t eat or sleep enough, but-”

“It’s a miracle he does, you have no idea. He didn’t even move , Eraser, he...” Sansa interrupts, shaking his head as he looks back at Gym Gamma. “Hanajima is going to cry when she hears that.”

Hanajima never cries. She’s seen too much to be able to anymore, but Sansa’s own suspicious sniff makes Aizawa rethink that.

“We should go over the files together, make sure you have everything. Did you get the update on the mother?” Sansa asks, ears perking up.

“I haven’t checked my email,” Aizawa states, hand moving to his phone before he realizes Sansa will tell him. He’s eager to know.

“Interpol is playing ball with us now. With what Eri said, we actually have evidence of human trafficking charges, which always makes our international friends work a little harder. The mother might know something, and if she knows enough, then...” Sansa spreads out his arms for a moment, shaking his head. “Shinsou won’t have to talk.”

“Is there a plan after that?” Aizawa asks, realizing he has never thought that far ahead. “Infiltrate deeper, or take them out?”

“It depends on what we find out. I say take them out, keep them from taking any more victims. Let Shinsou sleep at night,” Sansa’s head tilts, ear flicking. “Or are you asking what happens after that?”

He was. “I wasn’t.”

Sansa grins all the same. “It makes a lot more sense now. Naomasa should have known better, especially since Eri came along.”

Aizawa fixes him with an exhausted glare. “I don’t know what you’re implying. I was concerned with his methods, and considering everything that went wrong with this case, I had reason to be a bit short."

The grin softens into something less teasing, but even more accusatory. "It's going to take a while before all this is over, but if you're already this protective of him in a week, I'm going to bet you'll be filling out the adoption papers by Christmas."

"He is a ward under my care," Aizawa states. "I'm only as protective as I need to be to do my job."

Sansa just shrugs and doesn't push.

"I still have a training session to supervise. Stay in Shinsou's line of sight, but don't interact with him, just talk to Toshinori. Let him observe you," Aizawa both orders and asks, considering the best strategy. "Eri will probably want to talk to you as well, but keep in mind that Shinsou is protective of her. If he feels you're a threat to her, he'll attack."

"You say that like it's a threat to me," Sansa says, one ear flicked back. "I know how to deescalate, Eraser, but the kid is skin and bones."

"He has my knife." Sansa should probably be aware of that.

" Why does he have a knife? " Sansa asks shrilly.

"He stole it, and I let him keep it. I suspect he has extensive weapons training, based off of a conversation he had with Eri--"

"Yeah, Eraser? You gave the kid a knife?" Sansa repeats, still stuck in disbelief. "You know you can't do that, right? We've had enough instances where heroes get stabbed by their wards, and if you become one of them--"

"He won't," Aizawa cuts off, fighting the tension that builds. Sansa should know that he won't, that he's been trained not to. "If he tries to, I can stop him. But if he does, it's a sign of progress."

Sansa stops, silent for a moment. "Right, but... Damn."

"I'm consulting with more experienced heroes in that regard," Aizawa says, barely glancing at Sansa. "If you don't mind, I do have a class to get back to."

"Yeah, got it. Watch out for knives, thanks for that," Sansa complains, following behind.

Aizawa sees it first. He knows the moment it turns ugly, and pulls himself over the railing to get there in time, knowing that even if he could shout, words would take too long to carry.

He isn't fast enough.

27 knows he's being obvious, but that works better, because Toshinori is far too soft. He doesn't even remember why he thought the man was a threat in the first place, he's completely oblivious to the point that 27 had to drop the subtleties.

"Your right hand has to be on top, and the circle goes this way," 27 demonstrates to Eri, as she flips her clasped hands over to the correct position.

“And this means ‘friend!’ I’m going to call Mirio my friend using just my hands,” Eri decides, oblivious to the way Toshinori’s face falls when he sees 27 staring back at the training arena.

“I’m glad you have such a great friend, Eri,” 27 says with a sigh.

He decides to go for the jugular, and hope that Toshinori doesn’t start crying. These heroes have been making a habit of doing that today.

“I wish I was better at making friends. I just...don’t know anything about them. And it’s not like I can ask, or even talk to them.”

27 doesn’t have to work too hard to make himself sound pathetic, not when he’s speaking half-truths.

He bites out a bitter laugh, scratching the back of his neck. “Maybe that’s better, though. Aizawa probably has a reason to tell them to stay away from me. Not because of my quirk.... I hope. I hope he knows I wouldn’t use it, but.... The fight with Bakugo really did make me seem like some kind of villain.”

He picks at his sleeve, wanting to make sure Eri hasn’t gone quiet because she’s about to cry. He knows it’s unfair to have her be witness to this manipulation, but the information just out of his sight beyond the far railing too important.

“Maybe that’s why he didn’t want me to watch them train.” He fakes a startle after he finishes muttering that truth, looking at Eri in alarm. She’s not crying, but her eyebrows are furrowed between sadness and a bit of irritation. He doesn’t let that sting. “Sorry, Eri. I know he doesn’t think like that. Aizawa is a really nice hero, and you like him a lot. I just hope that-”

The cat came to collect him. They were going to take him from Eri, why did he pick that fight with Bakugo why didn’t he get enough information for Present Mic why was he trying to manipulate All Might they could take him back and take and take and take

He wasn’t supposed to know they messed up and he knows and “Twenny,” Eri whines, clinging to his arm. “Toshi, don’t let them take Twenny! I’ll be good, don’t let them take him back!”

Fog around his brain his hands aren’t his hands anymore he can’t feel anything they’ll put the ring in his mouth and “It’s fine, Miss Eri! Officer Sansa must be here for young Shinsou’s appointment, I’m sure that’s all there is to it!” Toshinori says, confidently enough that 27 believes it.

The fog retreats. The appointment.

‘You may see him from time to time, but you won’t be transferred into his custody again.’

It wasn’t a job.

It was an interrogation.

He had been so concerned with the heroes that he had forgotten about the police completely. What they wanted, what they would take from him.

He wouldn't have a job here. Not really.

His owner was supposed to make him comfortable, make him lower his guard. So that they could take more from him. So they could take what they wanted so badly, what he could never give them. Would never give them.

27 feels the grin pull, they messed up, and turns it to something more reassuring for Eri. "Don't worry, Eri. I forgot all about that, so I got kind of worried when I saw the police officer. But he's just here for that appointment today."

Eri tugs on his hood, trying to pull the cat ears over his head. She probably still believes that cats protect against bad things, even though she's been proven wrong enough times. She pouts, pulling her own hood on. It still makes her look adorable. "You don't have to go to the doctor, Twenny. I'm gonna tell Zawa you can't!"

27 raises an eyebrow. "It's not a doctor's appointment. I'm not hurt."

"But it's an appointment, and appointments are for doctors," Eri says, tilting her head. One of the ears folds over while the other stays up. 27 fights not to stare at it.

"It's an appointment to talk to the police officer. Aizawa said I had to do that sometimes. Since I can't talk to them, they didn't get the answers they wanted when I was staying at the police station. I guess they're hoping that I'll get better if I'm staying with you, so they probably want to check if I'm better yet," 27 explains, glancing around to see that Toshinori moved to the railing at some point, his hand held up to his chin as he watches the heroes.

"But you can talk to me," Eri says, shuffling closer to his side. "They could tell me the questions and you can tell me the answers, then they won't bother you anymore."

27 tries to judge the distance between themselves and Toshinori. It seems far enough to risk it if he whispers. "They want to know about the bad place. I can't tell them about it. And if I do...." they'll take me away from you. "Something bad will happen."

Eri is smarter than he realizes, even though he tries to keep her from figuring it out. She clings onto his arm as though they're trying to drag him away now. "I won't let them," she swears, with a determination she's probably picked up from Mirio.

"Don't worry about it," 27 reassures, leaning closer to her to pat her head. "I just have to not talk to them. And I'm really good at that."

Eri doesn't like his joke, tucking her head against his arm. "If I cry, Zawa will yell at them and make them go away."

27 smiles, flipping one of her cat ears between his fingers. "You don't have to, though. I don't want you to cry, even if it's to get me out of trouble. I can cry just fine."

"When Zawa comes back, you should cry and make him let you stay with Mirio and me! We're gonna play a phone game and catch lots of cute things! And I get to name them!" Eri suggests, and the offer is pretty tempting.

"I can play the phone game another time. It might make Aizawa upset if I cry every time, so I've got to go a few times," 27 explains. His owner seemed too self-assured to doubt his ability to make 27 talk. It would break down, slowly, perhaps even dangerously, but that was fine.

27 knew the game. At last.

His owner wanted to make him talk. Yamada was there to bring down his guard. Eri to distract him and comfort him all the same. The heroes surrounding him wanted to entice him into forming friendships, desperately, to glean information from him to feed to the police.

It all tied back to The Miasma. It always did. He should have realized it sooner, but now he knew.

“Young Shinsou,” Toshinori called, the air of nervousness the man always seemed to carry falling away like a veil. Almost like he knew what 27 was thinking, that he had figured it out too. “I have an idea, if you’re amenable to it.”

27 finds that he doesn’t have to force a grateful smile when he hears the idea, nodding his agreement. He turns to Eri, his one concern with this plan. ‘Don’t look,’ he signs, and though she’s still wary, she pulls her hood over her face to say she’ll obey.

27 allows himself to grin as he follows Toshinori down the steps. He knew the game, and this played into it perfectly.

“You have no idea how great it is to be matched with someone in my own weight class,” Weird Elbows says with a grin, though Sparky overhears and glares.

Canned Joint didn’t need to be insulting. 27 rolls his eyes, settling close to the edge of the marked off ring, giving himself the distance to observe. His quirk had something to do with the cylinders in his elbows, perhaps he could bend them like a ball joint. 27 looks over the costume, catching on the recognizable shape of the helmet. If he was stupid enough to have tape-

“So, All Might-sensei said we can use our quirks for mobility as long as both of us agree to it. I can shoot tape out of my elbows, and I’m getting pretty good at swinging around with it,” Stupid Tape says, tapping his weird joints. “So, you could use your quirk-”

27 nods, settling into a stance. Low, because he’s going to come in high.

“Sweet!” Scotch says, settling into his own stance. Facing a little to the left of 27, arms raised up for a block, knees bent to an absurd degree.

Two white lines shoot out. Middle? Only a foot away?

27 watches the boy rappel himself forward, knees still bent too far even as he glides along the ground, his back tipped far too temptingly. 27 grinds his teeth and severs the tape with a flick of his knife, sending Scotty Tape onto his back in a puff of dust.

The kid sits up, rubbing the back of his head, confused before he sees the frustration on 27’s face, turning aside to scowl. “Yeah, I know it’s not the flashiest quirk in the world, but you don’t have to look so disappointed.”

27 rolls his eyes again, pointing up to the walkway above him, then signs ‘Be serious.’

Adhesive Boy looks up like he hadn’t noticed the walkway at all, then back down to 27 in surprise.

“Are you sure you’re not Aizawa-sensei’s kid?”

It doesn’t get much better when he tries the walkway. He lands right in the middle of 27’s reach, neither aiming to take him out on the landing nor confuse him by zipping into another maneuver to maintain the distance. With an elbow to the chest, Office Supply is on his back again.

They had to be joking.

President Engine takes quite a while to get into the fight, devolving into a long spiel about how he’s hesitant to fight someone without any protective gear. 27’s eyes glaze over far before the end of it, grateful that Turbo is nothing like Chisaki and won’t lash out if he doesn’t feign enough interest. But when the fight finally begins, Motor Leg uses his quirk the right way, and he’s heavy enough not to go down with a shove. However, Car Show hesitates quite a bit before he goes for an attack, and when 27 catches the right angle to lock his leg, he folds like a cheap table with just a tap on his shoulder.

They were heroes. They must have trained for years to earn the right to be here.

Floaty actually manages to make him smile. She’s scrappy as hell, and something about her reminds him enough of Whistler to jump back farther than her fist can reach, dodging a phantom baton. Then she goes in to flip him over her shoulder - the wrong move for his height, and it’s too slow, too loose, he kicks out her feet and spins her like a top onto the floor.

She did well enough to make him check to make sure she’s alright, crouching down on the balls of his feet to make sure she gets up. She slaps her hands against the floor in frustration, eyes screwed up tight. “I almost had you!”

She didn’t. If he didn’t counter her, all she would have wound up with was 27 leaned over her back, and if he was a heavier opponent, she would have gotten herself crushed against the mat when her legs gave out, just like what happened when 82 tried to flip 98 when she died in that ‘training accident.’

Bubble sits up, rubbing the back of her head. “I guess I really need to train harder to learn the moves Gunhead taught me. We’re the same age, and neither of our quirks are outright offensive, but I’m the one calling myself a hero.”

27’s hand rises before he can stop it, but he doesn’t make contact. It’s a close enough hover, and she stares at his hand with her familiarly wide eyes.

He’s been spending too much time with Eri. He doesn’t need to pat an underling’s head just because they’re sad.

Just because they’re children.

They kept saying they were the same age. The heroes, his owner, Yamada. It couldn’t be true. He could never have been as naive and untrained as they were.

“It’s alright, Uraraka. Shinsou has been training for years,” Tail Man says, walking over to the ring, his narrow eyes cutting to 27. “I could tell by the way you carry yourself. Your style is really mixed, which makes for a great learning experience for me.”

27 is pretty sure Karate Kid is drooling over the chance to fight him, and from what he’s seen so far, he can understand. He nods his agreement and takes the middle of his box, just outside the range of that tail.

Before Puffball even steps into the ring, 27 realizes it was a mistake.

The rules of the sparring session were simple, no quirks unless agreed upon, only for movement if they were, and the match concludes when someone lands on their back.

Judo Dude couldn't be flipped. His tail would stop him from falling.

He's not sure if that's why Kangaroo Boy is smiling like that when he settles into his own stance. It's eager, self-assured and hungry to throw 27 down.

27 couldn't let that happen. Nothing good ever happens from losing a match with an underling.

Prehensile Child likes his high kicks, and when 27 tests his weight against the block from his arm, he notices it. He can make those high kicks because he's using the tail to balance. His other attacks are precise, hard, practiced, but something about those high kicks is off. He could go much harder than he does with that tail behind him.

That tail is a problem. But Martial Monkey wasn't entirely lucky, because he's taken down that tail before.

27 takes a beating to get to it, his arms and ribs ache and throb with bruises he'll feel for days, but he gets close enough to try. He feints a chest-grapple, catching the smile on Pony Tail's face and meets it with his own, knowing by the way the blonde's hands are moving that he fell for it.

He pulls himself behind, over the tail but keeps an ankle in the small loop it's already made to catch Extended Vertebrae's weight as he stumbles instead of catching 27's elbow to deflect. 27 grabs the blonde's shoulder tight, kicks behind his knee, and he knows that timing is everything, if he messes up he could snap his own ankle.

Doctor's Appointment

Chapter Summary

27 sees a doctor, and has some open wounds treated afterwards.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: None!

A possibly spoilery summary (In that, I'll be summarizing plot threads that will be brought up in this chapter, and you may be able to guess what is going to happen before it happens if you read it.) is provided below:

Previously on Wards of UA: In the last chapter, Shinsou fought Sero, Iida, Uraraka, and Ojiro in succession during a light sparring session arranged by Toshinori, who had done so with some manipulation on Shinsou's part. Shinsou also discovers that his purpose at UA is to be interrogated more subtly about The Miasma, through Aizawa, Yamada, and the hero students. Shinsou has seen Recovery Girl previously after being concussed after fighting Bakugo on the first day of school. Aizawa requested that Naomasa arrange an appointment with a tattoo expert to have the tattoo that Shinsou gained from being fused with Chisaki and Nemoto removed, though Shinsou was under the impression that it was a job, and enters the chapter under the impression that it is an interrogation at the police station. Aizawa has directed Class 1-A not to interact with Shinsou, as Shinsou would be unlikely to want to interact with them. Shinsou's right hand shakes and is uncoordinated after being 'Unmade' by Chisaki, which he tries to hide by using his left, though Aizawa has noticed. Shinsou's Miasma mask was removed after Chisaki bought him, and then he was tattooed shortly after while the wounds from the mask were still open.

Shinsou doesn't even look like he's breathing, but that distant look in his eye tells Aizawa that it's not because he's winded.

He was too late to stop the match, but fast enough to stop Ojiro from doing a field check. Aizawa doesn't want to know what would happen if someone broke Shinsou out of that trance with a touch after it was triggered in a fight.

He doesn't want to know what Shinsou sees right now either, instead of the ceiling he's staring at with unblinking eyes.

Eri shoves through the ring of students, running towards Shinsou. Aizawa raises his arm to stop her from reaching the dazed teen, afraid that she could become his target for the fight still playing in his mind. Her fingers clench tight in his sleeves, and she calls out for Shinsou. "Twenny!"

He springs up with a ragged gasp, hand brushing over his mouth then hair, pausing when he realizes his hair moves. That it isn't tied up in knots and mats.

Aizawa has never been more grateful that Hizashi was able to cut it.

"So, the charges moved down from murder to witness tam-"

"Sansa," Aizawa hisses with a glare, turning back to Shinsou. "Are you injured?"

Shinsou is still too dazed to hear him, still panting too hard, scanning his surroundings jerkily.

"Ojiro probably ripped his fucking hair out, swinging him around like a fucking middle schooler in a cat fight," Bakugo snarls, half helpful and half antagonizing.

Ojiro looks up, finally finding an outlet for his panic, fists still clenching and unclenching at his sides. "The pin he was trying for would have broken my tail! I was trying to stop him!"

"Sprain it, or tear a few ligaments," Shinsou says. The unnervingly flat tone of his voice is more shocking than the fact that he speaks. "You wouldn't go down if I didn't."

Shock crosses Ojiro's face before it slips into anger. "You were trying to- we agreed to 'light sparring!' That means no injuries!"

"I'm close to 500, and you knew that. Do you wa- hah ," Shinsou stops, wincing as he lowered his head into his hands, pressing tight against his temples.

His quirk was causing him pain, and Aizawa suspected it wasn't just the sudden use of it. He knew enough about mental emitter quirks to know that the reaction he was having right now was a dangerous one.

"We're taking him to Recovery Girl. Ojir-"

"No, Eraser, wait," Sansa pleaded, catching the name Shinsou spoke, the number. "Hold off on that? For five minutes? He's talking, so just-"

"How much information will you get before he has a stroke?" Aizawa snaps. Eri's trembling making the shock on Sansa's face a hollow victory. He rests a hand on Eri's head, softening his tone for her. "We're taking Shinsou to Recovery Girl. He's going to be fine."

She nods, then walks over to Shinsou, who thankfully recognizes her presence, trying to hide the agony still twisted on his face. "M'fine. Don't worry," Shinsou tells her, though he whispers through gritted teeth.

She pulls his hood over his head, not because it will block out some of the light. Cats were one of her little superstitions, and Aizawa suspects that picking that hoodie out for Shinsou kept her from protesting more against taking him to school.

"Ojiro, you're coming as well. The rest of you are-"

"IS SHINsou okay?!" Present Mic yells, before he's cut off by Aizawa's quirk. Shinsou makes a sound suspiciously similar to a sob. He waves a hand for Present Mic to come down from the walkway, and Present Mic nods before he starts sprinting towards the stairs.

“The rest of you are dismissed,” Aizawa orders, glancing around at the still shell-shocked students, and very pointedly not at Toshinori. He doesn’t trust himself enough to do so.

“Aizawa-sensei, should I carry-” Ojiro stops as Shinsou pulls himself up, unsteady on his feet.

Ojiro should carry Shinsou. He should have been able to do a field check before allowing him to sit up. He should be able to check his pupil size, ask how severe the pain is and where it’s localized. None of those things can happen in Shinsou’s case, and Aizawa can only hold out hope that Chiyo can check him over, even in this agitated state.

Yamada doesn’t keep the concern out of his expression, and Aizawa doubts he could if he tried. “Take Eri. I still have to sort things out with Sansa,” Aizawa tells him, glancing in Toshinori’s direction. He doesn’t feel guilty all for the ear bleeding assault he has brought on the Symbol of Peace.

Shinsou barely makes it to the main building, stumbling so often that he gets tired of glaring at Ojiro with every offer of aid. The pace to Recovery Girl’s office is so tortuously slow that Aizawa’s nerves sing in relief to see the sign above her door, finally able to stop fighting the urge to throw the teenager over his shoulder to get him there faster.

Chiyo takes one look at Shinsou and scowls. “When I told Yamada that he needed to be seen regularly, I did not mean daily, Eraserhead.”

“He tried to use his quirk, and now he has a migraine,” Aizawa answers, as Shinsou sits on the cot Chiyo directs him to. “Ojiro’s tail may also be sprained.”

Aizawa nods, and walks Sansa just outside the door, allowing Chiyo the space to work.

“Reschedule the appointment.”

“It could just be a migraine, and he should be back on his feet in time,” the cat officer argues.

“He’s not in the right state of mind to make any decisions like that,” Aizawa answers. “And that’s if it’s only a migraine.”

Sansa isn’t pleased, but he nods and takes out his phone. Aizawa returns to the nurse’s room, telling himself that it’s only rational to be present to sign off on any treatment Chiyo needs to provide.

“Ojiro was correct, it’s just a light muscle injury. And Shinsou does have a migraine, so it’s best to let him rest here while the treatment starts to set in,” Chiyo informs him, but Aizawa knows her well enough to know what she really means to say when she glances at her personal office.

“Toshinori allowed the fight, didn’t he?” Aizawa asks Ojiro, who looks down guiltily despite his attempts not to shame him.

“He said that it would be a lighter way to end the week. Shinsou seemed frustrated when he was going up against Sero and Uraraka, so I thought-”

“You were his third opponent?” Aizawa interrupts. He couldn’t have been away for that long.

“We weren’t given time limits, it was just a ‘Flip the Turtle’ kind of match. Sero wasn’t taking it seriously, he was trying to imitate some anime move. And Uraraka has only been training for less than a year, so she’s still hesitant when she goes for something more advanced. Oh, I forgot that he fought Iida too. The knee lock he did was a little risky, considering his mufflers were hot,” Ojiro reports, his tail swishing once to betray the excitement he must have felt to see a challenging opponent.

He knew he couldn’t blame Ojiro for that. With all of his years of martial arts training, his hand-to-hand combat matches were decidedly one-sided, and his peers used that to their own advantage. Shinsou was probably the first opponent that wouldn’t need a lesson at the end of the match to explain a hold or flip.

"I should have realized it then. That Shinsou is a bit reckless," Ojiro says, sinking back into guilt.

That isn't surprising. He was probably trained to view his body only slightly more valuable than his knife. To be disposable, if the situation called for it. However, " Three of your peers were taken down, even with their quirks?"

Ojiro knows that tone. He fears it. "Sensei, I'm sure they weren't taking it seriously-"

"Even if they weren't, and they should take every moment of training seriously, they were defeated too easily." Aizawa sees a lot of quirkless combat drills in their future. Ojiro sees it too, shoulders slumping at the thought of all the tutoring he'll be asked for.

It almost makes Aizawa ask, but he catches himself when he sees Sansa return.

"You should return to the dorms and rest. You're not in trouble this time, since this was allowed to go on with a teacher's approval," Aizawa reassures, and the relief on Ojiro's face almost makes him leave it at that. "But at some point, Class A needs to understand the meaning of don't interact ."

Ojiro apologizes, glancing at Shinsou as he leaves, clearly wanting to ask if he'll be alright. But fear wins out in the end, and he doesn't.

Chiyo jerks her head towards her office, which is too cramped for all three of them. Sansa assumes a guard position against the wall as Aizawa closes the door.

"I know you're new to wardships, Aizawa," Chiyo says as she sits in front of her computer. "But I've never been assigned to be the sole medical provider for a ward, and frankly, I'm not equipped for it."

"It's necessary," Aizawa states. It shouldn't be.

Chiyo takes his word for it, sighing. “I can't tell how badly he strained himself. With what little I was given by the police, his temperature runs abnormally hot, and fluctuates dangerously.”

"Is the lack of using his quirk making it worse?" Aizawa asks. That had been their biggest concern with Shinsou's muteness. After using his quirk so regularly, the shock of disuse would cause problems, and even if those problems became life-threatening, they had little recourse, given his reaction to using his quirk on Eri.

"It's one of many possibilities. I'm not a quirk specialist, so I can't say one way or another," Chiyo answers. "I'm also not a nutritionist, but I've done my best to put together a few recommendations, after Yamada told me you weren't given anything."

Hizashi hadn't told him that, but he did notice more vegetables in their lunch than usual. He sees the first sentence on the page, bolded and in red, and frowns. "He likes coffee."

"I doubt his body could process the sugar in a full serving of fruit," Chiyo chides. "He can only take in so much, what he eats and drinks has to be nutritionally sound. He's dehydrated on top of that, and severely stressed."

"Unsurprisingly," Aizawa deadpans.

"His immune system is weakened due to that. You should take precautions to keep him from getting sick, such as a face mask or hand sanitizer," Chiyo advises, and Aizawa tries to hide the clench in his jaw. "You emailed me about his hand, but I haven't examined it."

"If it's not possible to do so without his knowledge, it would be best not to. Not yet," Aizawa says. Not until he trusts us to know.

Chiyo shakes her head. "There's enough scarring to suggest nerve damage, but I can't say for sure. Does he know enough sign to give me a little more of his medical history?"

Aizawa frowns, doubting Shinsou even knew it, or even had any medical history to give. "We can see."

When Aizawa opens the door, he doesn't expect to see Sansa standing right beside Shinsou's cot, taking off his gloves. "You know, I'm pretty sure I've shown you before, after you cheated at Uno."

Shinsou's eyes are still focused on Sansa's hands, the wideness not set in fear, but something else. Something that makes the kid seem far younger and more innocent than he ever had outside of sleep.

Sansa flexes his hands, revealing the reason he wore gloves in the first place. The pads of his fingers had soft, rounded bumps, not unlike a cat's. His toe beans. He hated showing them to people, and Aizawa probably hadn't helped with that. Sansa glares at him half-heartedly, whining, "Eraserhead, don't you have a cat that the kid could obsess over? I'm pretty sure that's why Naomasa picked you."

"Cats are a responsibility I can't afford, given my work schedule," Aizawa lies.

A few years ago, he and Hizashi had been adopted by a white longhaired hair stray that had taken their community food offerings as an invitation to move in with them. Hizashi figured that she must have been a house cat at one time, abandoned on the street after she became inconvenient, but she remembered enough to integrate herself seamlessly into their apartment. Happy to chase their socks around, knock cups and other odds and ends onto the floor in what Hizashi claimed were 'gravity tests.' She made a habit of kneading into Aizawa's ribs or chest after every patrol gone sour, adding her own little wounds to the ones he already earned that night. Not that he would protest, even if he could.

Socks passed away during winter break, after too many hard years had aged her too quickly. Hizashi was beginning to think of adopting another cat from their feral colony, specifically the tabby runt that liked to curl up against their window every winter.

Then USJ happened. Then the dorms. Then Eri. Now Shinsou.

At least there wasn't room to argue about cat adoption. "Shinsou, Recovery Girl would like to ask you a few questions. Are you feeling well enough for that?"

The purple haired boy tilted his head minutely, but looked at Aizawa with a surprising blankness. He still didn't meet his eyes, but his shoulders were far more relaxed than usual. He nodded.

"Have you gotten headaches before, after you use your quirk too much?" Chiyo asks. "Is that a normal reaction?"

Shinsou's eyes widen a bit, lips parting before he retreats back into calm, but he pauses before he answers. He must not have remembered trying to use his quirk. '4 people. Don't.' He stops, rigidity workings its way back into his limbs. 'Not want. My fault. I am sorry.'

"You were in an altered state after hitting your head. I know it wasn't intentional, and I'm not angry," Aizawa placates, though he doesn't expect his words to calm Shinsou down. It must be terrifying to find out you did something after the fact, with no memory of doing it. "Do you get headaches after you use your quirk on four people, or because you fought four students?"

'First.' Shinsou signs. Then draws a line from under his nose to his lip. 'Blood. Dangerous. Mind pain.' His finger taps against his knee, trying to remember another sign. 'P-A-S-S-O-U-T.'

"Do you need to end the control on each person, or do you control all of them at once?" Aizawa asks, unsure whether Chiyo actually needs to know that information, or if it's purely his own curiosity.

'All. Not end. Learning.' His signs become more fluid as he describes his quirk's capabilities, different from the slight shaking of his hands when he explained its risks. Unsurprisingly, since he had lived so long in an environment where his quirk's utility had been the only thing keeping him alive.

Aizawa nods. "He has headaches, nosebleeds, and could pass out controlling four people at once."

"Those could be symptoms of a brain hemorrhage," Chiyo notes, and Shinsou nods. "Did someone tell you that was a risk?"

Shinsou nods again, hands lifting to sign, but he stops himself and shrinks. He must have been told that at the Nomu Organization that had him previously. And he thinks even giving that away could be dangerous.

"Is there anything else causing you discomfort? Are you sleeping and eating well?"

Shinsou shakes his head then nods, a lie, but he does it resolutely enough to make Aizawa wonder if he really believed it. If what he had at UA truly was more than he had ever been allowed before.

"Those are all the questions I have for now, but I would like to see Shinsou in a week's time for another check-up. Not beforehand, please," Chiyo glares, and Aizawa can tell that she's disappointed in the comparison to Midoriya's frequent visits.

He could try to convince her that it was All Might's fault, but the words sing hollow now. He knew it was his own fault. Shinsou was a ward under his care, not Toshinori's. He was the one who failed to prevent this.

Aizawa expects Sansa to bid his farewell when they exit the building, but he doesn't. "So, the old man said he can take him in anytime, since it's such a small piece to remove," Sansa says, ignoring Aizawa's glare. "We could reschedule, but maybe we could also ask the kid what he wants to do."

Shinsou's head tilts at that, though he seems to be trying to ignore that they were talking about him in the first place, still staring across the campus landscape with his hands tucked into the front pocket of his hoodie.

Despite Aizawa's reservations, he does ask. "Shinsou, would you still like to have that tattoo removed today?"

The kid goes completely still, then turns his head to glance at Aizawa's face before his eyes dart to the side, his usual focus. He must have forgotten about the appointment entirely, understandably given the chaos the last few days had been. He nods, though he still doesn't relax.

"There isn't any rush, if you would rather--"

"The kid said yes, Eraserhead," Sansa interrupts, grinning. "I don't need a translation to know what a nod means."

Aizawa sighs, worried that this was still too much for Shinsou. The kid might have agreed, but whether he was in the right frame of mind to do so was unclear. But if Aizawa refused, that itself was as good as a brand.

For better or worse, Shinsou had made his decision, and Aizawa hoped it wouldn't waver.

The cat talked a lot. 27 forgot how long he could just ramble to himself, putting even Present Mic to shame. His owner didn't seem to like it, answering any questions with a grumble or cutting off an embarrassing story with a glare. 27 knew he should mirror that behavior, to reflect what his owner wanted to see.

But his owner wasn't really his owner anymore. Not the same way The Miasma owned him.

He was Chisaki now. The way he had begun to view Chisaki after he had been allowed outside, allowed to put plans into motion. The way their game twisted beneath the table, unknown to Chisaki until the last minute.

In the end, Chisaki lost. In the end, his owner would too, though he hadn't worked out how quite yet. With The Miasma at play, his options were thoroughly limited, and the only end that seemed inevitable was his own death at a fellow Number's hands.

But he could die still winning. And he could die without Chisaki's name carved into his skin. Without Nemoto's.

27 kept his hood pulled up and his body tucked away from the windows as best he could during the drive to the tattoo shop. If he had a mask....

He needed to get one. These frequent trips outside were dangerous, and anyone on the street could be an informant for The Miasma. His hair was one thing, but the scars on his face were as good as his Number being displayed out in the open.

The tattoo shop was small, at least, and deserted. Dark, with a smell of ink so familiar he nearly touched his scars to see if they were still bleeding, freshly freed from the weight of the first mask.

The tattooist wasn't what he expected. An old, bald man with a hunched back and bared arms, glowering when they entered, but then directing an unreadable grin towards 27. A band of tigers tattooed on his upper arm began to move, chasing each other's tails. "So, we're taking something off today. Tried to cancel on me, but I was just too curious to see what it is. Take a seat right here, kid."

27 did as ordered, glancing at a tray that held a machine similar to the one Memory used to number him, before the old man kicked it away.

"Right, so let's see that arm." 27 began rolling up the sleeve, but stopped as the man clicked his teeth in disappointment. "No, that's not going to work. I need a little more room than that. Can we take the hoodie off?"

27 moved robotically to comply, not allowing how much he didn't want to be undressed affect him. It shouldn't affect him at all.

The old man stared at the scars, long enough for 27 to notice, then put his hand on 27's wrist, turning his arm to look at the 'Dog' tattoo. "It's not white ink, thank God. That's a pain to pull out, believe me."

"The tattoo is behind his elbow," his owner says, though he's staring at the wall with his back leaned against another, arms crossed over his chest. Curiously, he seemed to be avoiding the sight of his scars.

"What are we thinking about this one?" the old man asks, still staring at the kanji. "I don't know about you, but you look a lot more like a cat to me."

The man chuckles at his own joke, and 27 draws a box around the word with his finger. He hopes that it's enough for the old man to understand.

It isn't. "Not the whole thing? Or... Aren't one of you guys supposed to speak for him? Can you ask him what he means by that?"

His owner looks, his lips becoming a thin line. He's angry. 27 thought he was too much like Chisaki, too self-assured to care what 27 wanted to do at times, but he was wrong. He didn't want him to do that. "Shinsou wants the kanji removed. Leave the rest of it."

His owner glances towards the door before 27 can read his expression again. Wasn't he still angry about that?

Didn't he want the whole thing removed so he could put his own on?

27 knew that was what the visit was really for. His owner hadn't put his name on him yet, only giving him a new one. 'Shinsou Hitoshi' would require more room than 'Dog' or '27' did. Even if he chose the cat design, he would still want to cover up the place that his previous names had occupied.

Unfortunately for his owner, he would have to be specific about his intentions. 27 could afford to play dumb now, but he couldn't afford to let them take '27' so easily. Nor could he lose the ability to hide it.

“Alright, then. And the other one is right,” the old man pulls his arm to the side, revealing Nemoto’s tattoo. “Here. Patchy, that’s good. It’s a little old, but I think it’s not settled well. Odd, but that’s better. Is there anything else?”

27 points to the back of his neck, leaning forward so the old man can see what 27 thinks is the symbol of the 8 Precepts of Death. He’s only managed to catch parts of the black circle in the mirror, but he imagines nothing else would satisfy Chisaki’s need to claim him more thoroughly than The Miasma did. Or attempt to.

27 freezes when his finger presses against his shoulderblade. He didn’t know there was another.

Chisaki’s or Nemoto’s, he didn’t know, he couldn’t tell, he never saw . He never even saw that one, another mark on his flesh, another piece of him that wasn’t there anymore.

‘ All. ’ 27 signs, his hands shaking, fog creeping inside his skull but he refuses to let it swallow him. ‘ All off. ’

“What does that-”

“He wants all of them off,” his owner answers, still pointedly not looking when 27 tries to see his face. His voice is too neutral, it gives him nothing, but his face has tells, they’re just hard to see. “He only wants to keep the black band.”

“Got ya, alright then,” the old man agrees, settling down on a rolling stool. He snaps his rubber glove, which causes 27 to look at him, catching both the grin on his face and the sight of those running tigers on his arm. “So, my quirk is going to pull the ink out of your skin. It might sting or itch, but I need you to keep still for me. I’ll try to work fast since we’ve got a lot of work to do. If it starts to get too much, or you need a break,” he slaps his hand on the armrest of 27’s chair. “Just do that, and we’ll stop.”

27 nods. He doubts he will, though. He needs them taken off, even if it hurts. Even if it burns .

The man puts his hand close to the tattoo of the blue oni, but doesn’t touch it. Instead, his fingers curl, unnaturally strained, and 27 feels liquid begin to run down his skin. The old man stops, grabbing a paper towel to wipe away the liquid, then frowns. “Wait, is that cat Sharpie? I didn’t even notice, thought it was just faded....”

27 doesn’t look at the kanji. Only when the man is done does he make sure that he didn’t take more than he should have.

That name is gone. ‘Dog’ is gone.

The worst of the 8 Precepts was being bled from his skin, leaving only The Miasma behind.

Silver Tongue

Chapter Summary

27 discovers why Ashido and Kirishima seemed so suspicious during homeroom, and Aizawa gets a small break in Shinsou's investigation.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Vague mention of the existence of sex trafficking at the end of the paragraph that begins in "It didn't happen often at The Miasma."

Recap of The Wards of UA: Shinsou was sold by his mother at the age of 4, and a missing child investigation was launched into his disappearance. Eri has taken to calling Shinsou "Mom" occasionally, which is a new development. Aizawa choked on his coffee the first time he overheard Eri call Shinsou that.

The dorm is thankfully quiet tonight, though Aizawa wishes they didn't have to be there. He wishes he could just let the wards return to the dorm to find some semblance of comfort in more familiar surroundings, but luckily, neither of them seem too affected by the day's events.

Eri and Shinsou are both sitting on the cot against the wall of the 'Safe Room,' as the teachers have named the dorm observation room. Aizawa glances up at the surveillance monitors every now and again, while he re-works his class calendar to include as many hand-to-hand combat sessions as he feasibly can. He knows he can't strain his students too much when every class they have pushes them to the limit, and he knows that this is a problem focused on in their second year.

But as good as Shinsou was, he shouldn't have won three matches against his students. They needed to try harder.

He glances up again, to the central monitor focused on Bakugo's dorm room. The door is wide open, and he sees Sero dart back inside with a video game controller. Technically, he should go down there to tell them that quiet hours still apply on the weekends, and they need to be in their own rooms either studying or sleeping, but he knows that they know he won't. It's too much effort for very little reward.

Eri is still trying to figure out the phone game that she plays with Togata, nestled in Shinsou's lap while she pouts at his phone. They had caught a few monsters when they first set it up, but now there weren't any more to be caught, unless they started walking around, which was the point of the game.

Shinsou still looked like he was seconds from falling asleep, though he had looked that way for hours now. Still fighting it, even with Eri's presence and the silence of the Safe Room.

Aizawa hoped that he would lose out before Hizashi returned in the morning and could take the two wards back to their own dorm. He knows that Shinsou barely slept in the interrogation room, that the first two nights his body needed sleep more than he could fight it, but he hopes it wasn't a fluke. The kid needed to unlearn the sleeping patterns that he had been used to at the 8 Precepts compound, perhaps even before that.

Eri leaned back and sighed, the phone falling out of her hands. Bored of watching a screen without monsters on it. She looked up at Shinsou, then Aizawa, and back again, a question she was working up the courage to ask plain on her face.

"Mom, can I get an apple from downstairs?"

Shinsou startled, staring at Aizawa's back, and Aizawa looked back at the central screen just in case the purple haired teen could tell he had been using the reflection of the screens to keep watch over them. Shinsou was waiting for a reaction, but Aizawa made sure not to give him one, not after the choking fit he was caught off-guard by yesterday morning. "You need to ask Aizawa that question, Eri."

"Zawa, can I get an apple? Tokoyami said I can have his apples if he has some, and I think he does," Eri asks.

"That's fine," Aizawa answers, turning to look at his charges, catching the way that Shinsou's lips twitched downward in a frown. "The students have cleared out of the common areas if you would like to go with her, Shinsou."

He nods agreement, following Eri as she stands up to walk to the door, holding onto his hand. Aizawa follows them on the camera feeds, to make sure there wouldn't be any incidents of his students rushing up to ask how Shinsou was after the match earlier today.

'Mom.' That was a new one.

Not at all unfounded, given their history, their dynamic, but Aizawa could tell that Shinsou wasn't comfortable with it. Aizawa wasn't either, to be honest, but he didn't want to confront what 'Mom' really stood for just yet. He knew he would eventually, if it didn't degrade naturally over time.

With any luck, Eri and Shinsou would find themselves in a place where that word didn't fit anymore. Where Shinsou was no longer Eri's primary protection against a dangerous and frightening world, and Eri was no longer the only person in Shinsou's world he truly cared about. Whether that dynamic would soften into a sibling relationship, or somewhere in between was completely unpredictable at this point.

But both their worlds were larger at UA, for better or worse.

Aizawa sees his personal phone light up before it begins to vibrate, and frowns when he reads the caller ID. "You're on duty. Don't tell me you're slacking off or injured."

"What, me? Slacking off? I would never! I just found myself in a quiet part of town and wanted to see how my little bean and favorite listener are doing, since I've barely gotten to see them all day!"

Slacker. "They're fine. Eri will probably fall asleep soon, hopefully Shinsou will too. The appointment went well."

Hizashi sighs in relief. “That’s good, I really wish I could have gone too. So, I definitely chewed Toshinori out a bit too much, we’re going to have to send him a fruit basket or something. It turns out our little purple haired listener has a bit of a manipulative streak.”

Aizawa cocks an eyebrow. “How so?”

“After he taught him how to sign ‘friend,’ he went on a little spiel about how he wishes he could be friends with Class A, but you’re just so cruel and heartless, thinking he’s a villain, so you wouldn’t even let him watch them train. Sad puppy dog eyes and everything. Of course, Toshinori being Toshinori decided that the sparring matches were a good way for them to relate to each other, common skillsets and all, but jeez. Would you have been able to say no?”

“Yes,” Aizawa hisses. “Because I know that Shinsou is a traumatized child, and he shouldn’t be given to his every whim. I told Toshinori not to let him watch, and I didn’t think I would have to get more specific than that.”

“Well, Toshinori had the best of intentions, at least, so I do feel bad about yelling at him.” Hizashi pauses, probably checking his surroundings again before he speaks. “The talk with Togata went well enough. I don’t think he realized how unhealthy his thinking was before I sat down with him. He cried, we cried... He’s grieving now, though. Finally.”

“I noticed,” Aizawa says. It wasn’t easy to see with how naturally he beamed at Eri, how little had changed in their own dynamic, but the weariness had finally set in to his shoulders. When Eri wasn’t looking, the smile was allowed to fall.

It would get easier to let it fall when it needed to. “Did you have any idea that babysitters are so expensive?! We’ve really robbed the poor boy! Maybe he can stay with us over winter break- I mean, we have really robbed-”

“Hizashi,” Aizawa interrupts, rubbing his eyes. They’ve talked about this. At length. “Disregarding how inappropriate that would be, we don’t have the space for it. And Togata has a father.”

A supportive, emotionally well-adjusted, non-neglectful father on top of that. To the point that Aizawa finds himself wondering why Togata chose to be a hero in the first place. “Well, about that... It’s kind of an adjustment right now. Togata didn’t say enough for me to know one way or another, but I think it might be a bit hard for him to go home right now. They have the same quirk, and to know his father still has his.... He might just need an escape route.”

Damn it. “We’ll talk about it.”

Hizashi knows that means yes. “So, you’re alone right now, right?”

Aizawa knows he is, but he still finds himself glancing at the door, knowing that tone Hizashi is using. “Yes.”

“What are you wearing? Something se-” A scream and crash in the distance cuts Hizashi off, and even though they’re only talking on the phone, Aizawa can almost see the twitch in his husband’s eyebrow.

Aizawa laughs, despite himself. “I’ll call you.”

“Can’t even... I love you!” Hizashi grouses, turning cheerier before he hangs up to actually do his job, now that he has to.

Aizawa puts his phone down, performing another cursory glance at the monitors before he freezes, then sprints for the door with a swear.

When would Class 1-A understand the meaning of don't interact with Shinsou ?

“Apples are my favorite,” Eri says, watching 27 wash the one she picked from the crisper. “I like that we get to eat our favorite foods here. You should tell Yama your favorite food, Twenny, and he’ll make sure you get to eat it a lot.”

27 hums, noticing the clean knife on the dishrack, before he hands the apple off to Eri. “I thought your favorite food was fried chicken.”

Eri tips over to stand on one foot, looking up in confusion. “I like chicken, but it’s not my favorite. But we never got to eat chicken back when we were in the room.”

“You were too little to remember it,” 27 realizes, rubbing the back of his neck. “I got you some once, and you were really excited. You asked for ‘shicken’ a lot after that.”

Eri stares at her apple as 27 pulls another from the crisper. “I like that you don’t have to do stuff to get food here. You don’t have to get hurt anymore.”

27 puts his hand on her head, distracting her from her brooding. “I like that too, Eri.” He liked that she didn’t have to go to The Chair anymore.

He didn’t want her to know that he still had to do things to earn their keep here.

It was all on loan, at least. A loan he wouldn’t pay back. As long as he was careful, he could use that to his advantage. Pay for his books and food with mocked attempts to give them information, perhaps give them a few false leads if the situation called for it. He needed to find out what they knew first, to make sure his lies were believable.

27 begins slicing up the apple while Eri watches, nibbling on the one she has. “Twenny, you like oatmeal.”

27 can’t help but laugh a little. “No, actually I hate oatmeal.” He realizes what she meant after he says it, feeling guilty for thinking it was a silly assumption. “I liked that we didn’t have to leave the room on days that we had oatmeal. That made me really happy.”

She must not have made that connection before. He worries that she’s going to get upset with how much they’re talking about their time at the 8 Precepts, but instead she tilts her head, eyebrows furrowed in frustration. “I want to make your favorite food, Twenny. What, um...”

27 stops. This wasn’t just her usual babbling.

She was imitating him. Imitating the way he couldn’t ask questions. She had no reason to do that, she wouldn’t have to if he wasn’t so broken.

27 puts down the knife, turning to crouch down on her level, struggling to keep his tone even with how shattered he felt. “Eri, you don’t have to talk like that. I know it’s weird that I do it, but... You should talk like you always do. It makes me happy to hear you talk normally.”

Eri frowns at her apple. "It's really hard not to ask questions. I'm sorry you have to, Twenny."

"I'll get better," 27 lies, ruffling her hair. "So you don't have to be sad about it. It's just until I get better at controlling it."

He stands up and notices two shadows from the stairway, though their footsteps are too far away to hear, he can tell by their movements that they're trying to sneak up on them.

27 continues slicing the apple, having another reason to pick up the knife.

Pink Girl and Red Shark peek around the corner, grinning until they realize 27 has already noticed them. "Aw, jeez!" Acid Hands complains, pulling at her hair. "Now Aizawa-sensei is going to give us more stealth training!"

They definitely needed it. The lightbulb at the top of the stairs flickered at times, and he might not have noticed it going out, if they had thought of that. And they should have.

"Aizawa says you need a lot of training, Ashido," Eri says around a mouthful. "But you'll be a really great hero if you take it seriously!"

"What?! He did?! Aww, I love having Eri around! We get to know all about Aizawa-sensei's secret thoughts and feelings!" Ashido gushes, perhaps overlooking the insult to her work ethic.

"Are you making apple bunnies for Eri?" Hardening Quirk asks, following his fellow hero to the counter. "That's so manly!"

27 tries not to raise an eyebrow. He's beginning to think Rocky doesn't really know what 'manly' means, since he uses it so often.

"We can share," Eri offers, then gasps. "If you share, it'll be like in the movie, and maybe you'll remember going to school together, Kirishima!"

Red Rodeo runs a hand through his hair, suddenly struck by a bit of nerves. "Actually, it turns out you were right, Eri. We did go to school together."

27 freezes.

"You must be psychic, Eri! We didn't even know it, but Shinsou, Kirishima, and me all went to the same elementary school!" Pinkie Pie cheers, holding up her phone. "My mom even sent me some pictures! And there's a video of Shinsou at my birthday party! I didn't invite Kirishima though, because even back then I knew he was super lame."

"I wanna see!" Eri shouts, straining on her toes to look over the counter.

27 doesn't want to see. He doesn't want to see it at all. He doesn't want to know what he looked like before the mask, before The Miasma, before he was 27. Before he was.

But Eri did.

She feels weightless in his arms, staring at the phone. He doesn't know what she sees, but he knows what he does.

It's a boy. He looks remarkably like him. Purple hair, purple irises, bags under his eyes. That's where the similarities end.

That couldn't be him. It wasn't.

The boy smiles among a group of other children, lined up against a wall, wearing yellow hats and blue uniforms. He seems nervous, too awkward, close to the end of the line but the gap between the children on either side of him seems larger than it is with the others. The boy must not fit in well with his peers, though his grin suggests that he tries.

“That’s you! And you, Twenny!” It’s not him, but he doesn’t correct her. “Where’s Kirishima, though?”

“Oh, that one’s me! I started dying my hair when I decided to be a hero, to be more inspiring, ya know?” Kirishima says, pointing at a boy with black hair and a thin lipped smile. “Hah, I used to get nervous about showing my teeth, too.”

“Shinsou was one of my best friends!” Ashido lies, flipping the picture to one of her younger self hugging that purple haired boy. It seems like she never lost that careless enthusiasm, clinging to the boy even though he has to lean over the table between them to do it. The boy smiles for the camera, and just for the camera, unsure if Ashido is hugging him just for the camera as well. “We had matching hairstyles, so of course we had to be friends!”

The picture flips again, this time to a video. Children are milling around a living room, some of them gathering up discarded wrapping paper, others playing with toys scattered around. The boy holds a stuffed animal to his chest, and 27 doesn’t want to look, doesn’t want to look, doesn’t want to see if it has a blue ribbon.

“ Why’s his name Rupert? ” the boy asks, scratching his head. “ I named Mocha ‘cause that’s what his ear said, but Rupert doesn’t have a name on his ear. ”

“ ‘Cause I had a bear named Rupert, but he got melty, ” Ashido answers, hugging Rupert the Second to her chest. “ But I love Rupert a lot! My mommy always fixes him when he gets melty! ”

The boy frowns, still scratching his head. He knows better than to- “ Why does he get melty? ”

“ Cause I- ” Ashido stops, dropping Rupert as her arms go limp. The boy’s face falls, reaching out to touch Ashido’s shoulder, because sometimes that’s all it takes, but then a woman with purple hair curled into tight ringlets runs over to him, taking him by the shoulder.

He forgot her face looked like that. He thought she looked more like Bug.

“ Hitoshi, you know better! ” The boy knows, still frozen in fear. He buries his face in Mocha’s fur to hide his tears. “ Mina, honey, are you okay? ”

Ashido nods, reaching out her arms towards the boy, but the woman’s hand still on her shoulder holds her back. “ Shinny, don’t cry. I’m okay! Slippies happen a lot, and you shouldn’t be sad about it! ”

“ Ui, it’s really fine, ” the woman holding the camera says, laughing under her breath. “ Why don’t we- ”

“ I’m sorry, Mika. I think we’re a little upset right now, ” the purple haired woman says, taking the boy’s hand as she stands up. “ It was a lovely party, but I think we need to head home. ”

“ Shinny! Don’t cry! You can stay! ” Ashido pouts, stomping her feet. “ Shinny, I love you so you have to stay! ”

“ Mina, you’ll see Shinsou at school tomorrow. You need to say goodbye like a big girl, and not throw a fit like a baby, ” the camera woman teases, goading the girl into behaving by making her want to prove her new age.

Ashido stomps her feet again, but wraps her arms around the boy’s shoulders. The boy knows not to react, not to say anything at all right now. “ We’re gonna play with Rupert and Mocha tomorrow at school! So don’t be sad, okay? And don’t miss again, or I’ll be really sad and cry! ”

The boy nods. He knows better than to talk right now. He should have learned not to say anything at all, but eventually, he did.

“Your mom was kind of a sourpuss,” Ashido says, as the video ends and the screen changes. “I mean, it’s not like you had a quirk like mine. I melted everything I got my hands on until I was 6 years old. Even poor Rupert had to have surgery almost every day.”

Missing.

The boy went missing after that. He was last seen walking home from school, wearing his uniform - yellow hat, blue smock, white tennis shoes. He had a Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats themed lunch box. There's a reward for information, a number to call. It's too bad they never found him.

He's probably dead by now.

"Twenny?" Eri says, pulling on a lock of his hair. "Why didn't the heroes find you when you were little?"

Ashido pulls away the phone, staring at it in horror. "Oh shit, I'm sorry! I forgot that was- Jeez, that must be really hard to look at."

"The heroes probably tried," 27 mutters, laughing bitterly. "They probably put my face on a milk carton, and I never saw it."

He wonders what his mother felt seeing it. What she felt looking at every missing child flyer, every news broadcast she was on. Was she laughing behind her tears?

"We, uh," Kirishima starts, pausing as he glances away. "We looked for you for a long time. The parents, teachers... Even the kids. We weren't allowed to walk home alone anymore. You probably shouldn't have either. Just..."

"What happened?" Ashido asks, unusually dour. "You were there one day, and gone the next. We never found out whether you ran away, or were kidnapped, or..."

27 turns back to the apple slices. He doesn't know what happened to that boy, but maybe he could lie about it to make them feel better. That sad face doesn't suit Ashi. "Villain school."

He cuts a bit too deeply for the bunny's ear. What a stupid lie. The heroes couldn't possibly believe it-

"Really?! No wonder we couldn't find you! No one ever heard about a villain school for kids!" Kirishima says, staring off in wonder. "Dude, it makes so much sense, though. Why wouldn't there be a villain school?"

"Did you have a uniform?" Ashido asks, fists curled close to her chest as she bounces in excitement. "And school festivals? Were you the top of your class at villain school?"

27 keeps staring at the apples. Maybe if he doesn't look at their faces, his throat won't close up, and he can keep lying. Maybe he can speak only if he lies, if he whispers quietly enough that his broken mind doesn't recognize that he speaks. "I was failing. They were going to expel me if I didn't get sold to Chisaki."

27 feels the air being sucked out of the room, perhaps his words came out a bit too close to the truth. Ashido is frozen in place, such an unnatural position for her. Kirishima's eyes are wide with horror.

Was it that unusual to them? For someone to be sold?

It didn't happen often at The Miasma, but 27 had heard enough at the 8 Precepts to know it wasn't an unusual business. People would run up debts to the mafia, and businesses that operated like The Miasma would take over those debts in exchange for a person. Not always the debtor, sometimes it was a family member who had a useful quirk, or a daughter who was coming of age.

It wasn't even as though this was something limited to the criminal underworld. 27 read enough books and plays to know people had been owned and sold for centuries.

Why were they still looking at him like that? Why did Ashido look like she was going to cry?

"Shinsou," his owner called, at the bottom of the stairs. At least he had adequate stealth training, enough to surprise even 27. "Take Eri back to the room."

27 nodded, glancing at Ashido and Kirishima as he passed. They kept staring at him, Kirishima's jaw working around words that weren't uttered, as if he was imitating 27 too.

When he returned to the room, he realized he forgot the apple bunny snacks, but Eri must have taken his hesitation in putting her down as something else. She curled her arms around his neck, hugging him tightly. "It's okay, Twenny. I say weird things to them too, and they look at me weird. Zawa says we just grew up different, in a bad way."

"It wasn't all bad," 27 says, half comforting and half musing to himself. "I think things would have been worse if I wasn't sold. I was really close to failing when I met you. If I didn't...."

Two more rounds with Bug. Then he would become less useful.

He would have failed on a mission. Been killed there, like 50, or taken to the Red Room to be finished off by Bug. He would have died without eating food that wasn't gruel, without bathing himself in warm water. Without knowing Eri.

"I'm glad I met you, Eri," 27 says.

He thinks there's another way of saying that, but he can't remember what it is.

"Sensei," Kirishima says, fists still knotted at his sides. "Why didn't they find him? Why did he have to..."

His words choke off, unable to say them. Without the right to say them.

He feels it like a throbbing wound in his pride, as a man, as a hero. He didn't know why he didn't before then, how he was able to forget. It seemed easy enough at the time.

His mom told him that he and Shinsou weren't really friends. In fact, Kirishima didn't even like him back then. They got into a fight at school after Shinsou started telling him facts about sharks, and asking if he had rows of teeth behind the ones in the front or if they'd grow in when he was older.

He was too young to believe his mother when she tried to tell him Shinsou was probably trying to be his friend. He decided he hated Shinsou after that.

Until he went missing.

Kirishima looked for Shinsou, half of it because the heroes that visited the school said they were looking, and he wanted to impress them. The other half was to apologize for being cruel. For not being his friend. For making him leave because he must have been lonely.

All of that faded into memory, and then faded further into nothingness. While Kirishima forgot about him and went to school, had friends, and worried about his cowardly personality, Shinsou was still missing.

Shinsou was being sold .

"What were you showing him on your phone?" Aizawa asks, watching as Ashido wiped away her tears and sniffled.

"Pictures, we..." Ashido's voice is strained as she tries to answer through the tears. "We went to school together. We were friends be-before...and I forgot about him while he..."

Aizawa rests his hands on their shoulders, and Kirishima flinches with the contact. He could have looked harder. He could have at least remembered him. "You weren't heroes. You were children ."

"I only looked at the playground!" Ashido wails, voicing the desperate pain Kirishima isn't brave enough to do more than feel. "And I started playing when I got bored! What if I could have found him?!"

"No one found him," Aizawa answers, more sternly. "Because the people who had him didn't want him to be found. Those people are being investigated now, by fully fledged heroes. Not four year olds."

Kirishima turns to Aizawa, determined. "Sensei, I want to-"

"Fully fledged heroes, meaning myself and Present Mic," Aizawa interrupts flatly. "If I find out that any of Class A is involving themselves in this investigation, they will be expelled."

It's easier to accept, knowing that Eraserhead is the one in charge of the investigation. Kirishima knows his teacher won't give up easily.

"Now," Aizawa says, turning to Ashido, "Since it's relevant to the investigation, I need you to send me all the pictures you have, and anything you can remember about Shinsou's disappearance, or his circumstances leading up to it. I'll be reaching out to both of your parents for what they remember as well."

Kirishima’s mom didn’t. She told him Shinsou’s mom was so torn up about his disappearance, she drove herself crazy afterwards. His mom wished she still had her number, so Shinsou’s mother would know that her son was safe. “Where is Shinsou’s mom? If Shinsou is staying with you-”

Shinsou is asleep, Eri passed out on his arm. They seemed to sleep that way out of habit, something that reminds Aizawa how confused Eri had been when she held up a pillow on her hospital bed. ‘These are soft.’ She couldn’t yet ask him what they were, only the furrow of her brow communicated her need for him to explain.

He hadn’t wanted to ask if she had ever had one before. He didn’t want to know if such a simple comfort had been withheld from her, an action that couldn’t be anything less than pure malice. Completely illogical.

Aizawa is glad that Shinsou is asleep. Those words still ring in his ears, the voice twisting and becoming something more familiar. More shrill at times, more exasperated at others. The same voice and the same words, at different points in time.

‘You know you can’t do that to your mother. You need to keep the eyepatch on, or else Mommy can’t see what she’s doing. It scares Mommy when you do that.’

He was watching TV, not looking at her. Illogical. Completely irrational.

‘Even when you’re sleeping, Shouta. I know it gets sweaty, but what if Mommy needs to check on you? You don’t want to scare Mommy, do you?’

His eyes would be closed while he slept. Delusional. Acting out of fear, not reason.

‘How can I trust you when you’re acting like that?! The look on your face, it’s- you hate me, don’t you Shouta?! You want to see me get hurt! That’s why you’re going to your grandfather’s, I can’t trust you at all! You won’t behave! Put your eyepatch back-’

Did Shinsou Ui buy a muzzle?

Aizawa closes his eyes, rubbing them with his fingers. This was unprofessional. This line of thinking had to stop.

There were similarities, but thinking about them served no purpose. It wouldn’t help with the investigation, it wouldn’t help Shinsou at all.

Shinsou Ui reacted poorly to her son’s quirk when it developed. She instructed him not to ask questions. Shinsou scratched his head before he asked questions, perhaps due to an uncomfortable sensation where the quirk factor cells were growing, like many developing quirks caused.

A four year old couldn't be expected to ignore that uncomfortable feeling. Shinsou asked a question, one that didn't seem like anything other than natural curiosity. He reached out to Ashido after he did so, and became upset when he was caught. Not out of shock, but shame, too quick for this to be the first time he had been scolded.

It was hard to know for certain, with only a few seconds of footage, but something in Shinsou Ui's reaction read deeper than scorn, or anger. There was a moment when Ashido was saying goodbye that her jaw seemed to be shaking, her eyes seemed more distant.

Thinking of the similarities would serve no purpose.

Not when the differences were so vital.

Enter Ms. Joke!

Chapter Summary

27 meets a new yet familiar face, and Aizawa takes the opportunity to drill his students in quirkless combat in a very unique way.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Dissociation, Dehumanization

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa invited Ms. Joke and Midnight to observe the situation with Shinsou, utilizing both of their extensive wardship experiences while Ms. Joke is at UA visiting Midnight. 'Delete Face' is a brand of knock-off hero merch for Eraserhead. Class 1-A has observed Shinsou speaking after he fought Ojiro in a sparring match, Kirishima and Ashido heard him speak the night before when he spoke about 'Villain school', and Bakugo heard him speak while they were fighting in a bathroom on the first day of school. Bakugo was assigned a 100 page essay about Post Traumatic Stress Disorder and Trauma after that fight, which is due at the end of the month or he will be expelled at the end of the term. Shinsou was named 'Dog' at the 8 Precepts, and Aizawa learned a little of what he went through while at the 8 Precepts by talking to Sir Nighteye after Sir Nighteye used Foresight on Shinsou prior to the raid.

Aizawa was full of regret.

Not because he's had five hours of sleep over the past two days.

Not because he didn't think to replenish his coffee stash in the Safe Room.

He regretted ever inviting Emi over, to what he thought was his dorm room, but what she interpreted as Class 1-A's dorm.

A dorm full of students who were going to be expelled if they didn't take those damn Delete Face shirts off.

"Eraserhead! Don't you always look beautiful in the morning? So dashing and handsome, oh! Please marry me now!" Emi cooed, sorting through a cardboard box to find a size large enough for Shoji. "Your students and my students already get along so well, we can just find a school somewhere between UA and Ketsubutsu and transfer them all there! We'll be one big, happy, blended family!”

“Sensei, are we going to have a joint training session with Ketsubutsu?” Kaminari asks with a grin, pulling at the seams of his Delete Face shirt to show it off. “We should all wear these shirts to-”

“No,” Aizawa says flatly, realizing that Kaminari seemed to be impervious to the usual death glare. “Ms. Joke isn’t here for any official UA business. Nor would she ever be.”

Emi burst out laughing. “There’s that humor I love so much! Shouta, please ! I’m already yours, you didn’t have to go through the trouble of finding these two little cuties! The little girl has my hair and your eyes, and that strapping young man definitely has my sense of humor and your chin! Oh! What a perfect little family.”

While Emi holds her blushing cheeks, Aizawa notices Todoroki move his hand to his chin in thought.

Eri moved closer to the cardboard box on the floor, causing Shinsou to follow close behind, still staring at Emi to evaluate her threat level. “I have this shirt too! So does Twenny!”

“Of course you do, sweetheart! Eraserhead doesn’t have any proper merch, so these professional knock offs are the next best thing! And you’ve got to show that you appreciate the hero that takes such good care of you!” Emi gushed, wrapping her arms around Eri from behind, snuggling her closely.

Shinsou stiffened, but his hand remained at his side, instead of reaching for the knife Eraserhead knew was still tucked into his jeans. “Emi, if you don’t mind-”

“I mind!” Ms. Joke said with a pout. “I’m taking the kids and leaving you! Sayonara! May you never break my heart again!”

She held up the angry face for an impressive two seconds before bursting out laughing again.

“How could I be mad at that adorable face! Come along, my sweet children! Auntie Emi and Auntie Kayama have a lot of gifts for you at our super-duper fun-terrific dorm room! We have plans to spoil you rotten and never ever give you back!” Emi called, Eri already trailing at her heels while Shinsou stiffly followed.

Aizawa glared at the cardboard box, already making plans to destroy it, before he looked up to do a quick headcount.

17 expulsion forms. That seemed like too much work.

“Those of you who are wearing unlicensed hero merchandise, head to Gym Gamma. The rest of you are lucky .”

27 didn’t know what to think of this ‘Ms. Joke.’

She was manic, and easily distractible. Though she spent most of her attention on Eri, 27 could feel her gaze wander to him at times. Not in a recognizably threatening way, not in a way he could read easily. It was just a glance, and then she’d be distracted again.

She seemed to be ignoring him for the most part, to play games with Eri, while Midnight watched from the sidelines and occasionally joined in. Eri seemed confused by her too at first, but was slowly warming up to match that same manic energy, even smiling at times when she did well at their games.

Right now, Emi was trying to teach Eri how to juggle with red foam balls that she had pulled out from behind Eri's ear. Eri was trying, but her hand-eye coordination still wasn't properly developed. 27 should have worked on that more, should have found some way to make or steal toys for her when they were at the 8 Precepts. Children were supposed to play to build that kind of coordination, but he never provided that for her, and now she was behind-

A ball landed on his head, then rolled off into his lap. "Whoops! I messed up!" Emi said, scratching the side of her head. "This juggling act is pretty hard, ain't it Eri?"

"Yeah, but you're really good at it, Emi!" Eri argued, trying to comfort the older woman. "Twenny, do you wanna try? I wanna see if you can juggle too!"

27 took the balls from Eri's hands, starting out with three. 50 taught him how to juggle knives, during one of the training sessions they had. 27 had been upset over something he couldn't even remember now, either he had been forgotten during mealtime a few days in a row, or he had gotten on Bug or Memory's bad side.

Maybe he hadn't seen 50 in a while, and was worried that he would never see her again.

After they ran through their usual drills, 50 had taken out a few throwing knives, and started juggling them for him. He had been mesmerized, and wanted badly to learn how to do it himself. His hands twitching by his sides, desperate to reach for the knives, and eyes wide to not miss a second of the trick.

50 gathered them in her hands and smiled at him. ' Want to try? '

He could only nod. He never told her how amazing she was to be able to do that. He never thanked her for showing him how to do those tricks, or how to use his knives. He never thanked her for being the only person at The Miasma that smiled at him like that.

' You're doing great! '

"Wow! You're doing great!"

27 missed the catch, ball falling to the floor with a muted bounce. He looks at his hands and realizes that there's five foam balls, plus the one on the ground. He doesn't remember picking the others up.

"Whoops! Sorry to startle ya! I was just enjoying the show, and you know it's a good show when you just can't help yourself!" Emi says, and for a moment, she doesn't look like Emi at all.

Is that what 50 looked like before he started forgetting?

He remembers her green hair. Her scarred arms. The scar on her wrist where he accidentally cut her during training, the one she said she didn't mind having.

Pieces of 50 had started to drift away from him, no matter how hard he clung to them. He doesn't remember the shape of her eyebrows. He doesn't remember whether she had pierced ears, or if that was Memory somehow mixing in. If she had one scar across her lips or two. Whether she really had the same burn mark on her leg that he did.

Would 50 have looked more like Emi if she never took her brother's debt?

“Twenny, it’s okay! You did really good! I like watching you do tricks and juggle!” Eri says, placing her hands on his knee to lean closer to him. “So don’t be sad!”

“I’m not sad, Eri,” 27 answers, absentmindedly tracing his number, the connection he still had to 50. She never even left him with a scar to remember her by. “I was just thinking of something and got distracted.”

“Now that was some real clownery, son! I have to say, I’m impressed! You deserve a T-shirt! A prize! What’ll it be, buckaroo?” Emi asked, winking at him with her fingers wagging like twin pistols.

“Do...” 27 stops, the words catching in his throat.

Why did it keep happening? Why was he able to speak so easily sometimes and not others?

Why did he blurt out a question in the first place? These were two heroes, they were part of the group that was watching him, why would he antagonize them when it didn’t play into his strategy at all?

“Gotcha, I know what you’re thinking!” Emi said with a snap of her fingers, dashing down the hallway to one of the bedrooms. “I packed it especially for you! I know you’re a connoisseur of this sorta thing, so I want to know if you approve! If not, I’ve got a date with a man in a back alley who owes me a refund!”

She ran back with a bundle of white cloth in her fist, that she unfurled in front of her with a flourish.

“TA-DA!”

27 couldn’t help the smile creeping over his lips, though he tried to hide it with his hand. It was exactly what he was asking for, and he should be a little more unnerved that she knew that.

“So, do ya like it? Do ya do ya do ya?!”

27 nodded, taking the shirt in hand. Maybe he’d work up the courage to change into it, just to see the look on Present Mic’s face.

"Why..." Shitty Hair pants, struggling to keep pace with Bakugo. Dumb fuck needed to work on his cardio instead of obsessing over bulking up. "Why...are you here...bro? You're safe... from the madness."

'The Madness' takes another victim, Deku screeches before he hits the sparring mat, and Shitsei starts looking around for an extra that isn't keeping pace with the laps they're supposed to be running.

He might be seeing shit, but it looks like Ojiro deliberately slows down.

"Got business with Sensei," Bakugo explains, while Aoyama gets called to the center of the Hell Blender to face Aizawa in a quirkless match. "You talk to that purple haired fuck yet?"

"Shinsou, yeah," Kirishima answers, oddly defensive. "Last night."

"Got business with him too," Bakugo growls, passing Sato again. "Ojiro knock his fucking head on straight or what? Fucker doesn't even look at the chat, don't know why he's fucking in it-"

"Bro," Shitty Hair starts slowing down, and Bakugo forces himself to match the pace. "You worried about Shinsou? Even after the-"

"FUCK OFF! I DON'T GIVE A SHIT ABOUT THAT CREEP!" Bakugo snarls, but the dumb shit surgically attached to his hip just grins that dumb fuck smile.

"Aw, Bakubro! I know you care, in your own super manly way- wait! Come on!" Bakugo is done with his shit. He can get splattered on the mat by Sensei for all he cared. "He talked to me and Ashido! Like, normal talk! Kind of."

Finally, he was going to be useful. "Did you fight him?"

"What? No! He was making apple bunnies for Eri, you can't just-"

"Was he doing that creepy fucking cuddle thing with the brat?" Aoyama starts swearing in French, like he thinks no one else knows what he's saying. It's honestly fucking poetry.

"Uh, holding her? Like you do with a cute kid like Eri? Yeah, he was," Kirishima looks to the middle of the blender again, shaking his head. "You wanna go to my room after this? Some stuff came up and... I dunno, could use your Baku-brain for it."

"Talk now, I got shit to do after this bullshit," Bakugo barked. "And keep the fucking pace! You're gonna be a shit hero if you get winded this fucking easy! Fucking sack of bricks."

Shitty Hair just grins.

Aizawa was not a young man anymore. He was tired long before his students seemed suitably winded, and he dismissed all but one of them.

Ojiro seemed to think he was being held back for some delayed punishment for the sparring session he had with Shinsou, rigidly watching as Aizawa took a slightly longer water break than he would have otherwise. That much was punishment enough.

The tension flowed out of him when he was called onto the mat, tail flicking between excitement and nerves.

Their styles were well balanced against each other. Ojiro could be swift where he needed to be, but the kid could hit hard where it counted. Aizawa learned to dodge first, second, and third, before he sized up an opening worthy of the risk, and to finish the fight right there.

Ojiro was good, but he was still learning. The boyish grin on his face every time he peeled himself off the mat told Aizawa he knew that, and wasn't bothered by it in the slightest.

"Your blocks are too rigid. You need to learn to adjust in proportion to your opponent's weight," Aizawa tells him, as he tries to ignore Ojiro's tail, now in a full wag. "I'm not as slow as Sato or Shoji, so as soon as you counter me, you need to go right into your next move.”

“Yes, Sensei!”

Aizawa’s ankle stings the next round, but Ojiro learns quickly. “Train with Uraraka more often. Your sessions with Hagakure don’t seem to be helping you.”

Ojiro startles, the beginning of a blush working up to his ears, different from the flush from exertion. “Yes, Sensei. I know they both could use some more-”

“Not for them,” Aizawa cuts off. “You only train seriously with your heavier classmates, and as I already said, it affects your technique. Avoiding Uraraka because she takes advantage of your skillset doesn’t benefit you in the long run. Either work out a more balanced way to spar, or refer her to me, and I will be the one to remind her that you are a student, not a member of staff.”

Ojiro looks horrified to imagine that confrontation, though it would honestly play out like this one. “I’ll talk to her, Sensei! It was probably my own fault for not being direct with her, or the others.”

Aizawa nods, estimating that he probably has just enough time to collect his wards from Nemuri and Emi before he passes out from exhaustion. Even if he no longer has patrols, sparring with Ojiro after 16 matches with his students was beyond his limit.

“Sensei, I’m not sure if I should ask, but,” his student glances to the side. “Is Shinsou alright? He spoke after hitting his head-”

“He was cleared by Recovery Girl without any serious injuries,” Aizawa answers. “You didn’t cause any permanent damage.”

“I know, but,” Ojiro says, turning to him for a moment before looking away again. “Perhaps I’m not asking how he is physically.”

Aizawa paused, considering his answer. His students didn’t deserve a lie that didn’t serve them, but they also didn’t need to know the details of Shinsou’s case. Though he could repeat himself over and over, his students were latching on to Shinsou in their own, protective way. A way he would be proud to see - his students taking the idea of the Hero’s Mantle seriously enough to want to protect both of the wards of UA, while some fully fledged heroes would only pose with one of them long enough to secure a bump in rank.

But Shinsou’s mental health wasn’t a class project, Bakugo being an unfortunate exception, though Bakugo could relate far more than the rest of the class. They only needed to know the bare minimum, which he should have covered more explicitly than telling them that Shinsou was unlikely to talk to them.

“Shinsou is selectively mute, but he wasn’t prior to the rescue,” Aizawa answers, lifting his hair from his neck as he wished he had a hair tie to keep it up. “In certain situations, he seems to be able to speak. You triggered one of those situations.”

Ojiro shuffles his feet nervously, something deeper than guilt surfacing. “Sensei, when I grabbed his hair... Shinsou made this noise.”

Aizawa stares at his student. He needs to know for the investigation, and to dig out whatever unsettled Ojiro so thoroughly. But the naked pain and twist of confusion on his student’s face makes him want to cover it back up and hope that Ojiro forgets it in time.

Aizawa struggles not to betray the horror he feels, for Ojiro to witness that, for Shinsou to do that.

There were wounds that were too deep for Shinsou to hide when he began to dissociate. Aizawa had noticed them, catalogued them into his reports, discussed them with Hizashi late at night. Naomasa's paperwork noted that there were times after the force feeding that Shinsou would make a whining sound, similar to an animal in pain. His eyes still unfocused, body still shaking. That unnatural sound unnerving enough to be conveyed in Naomasa's usually terse reports.

But Aizawa knew that Shinsou had been trained to do that, Chisaki doing far more than naming him after an animal, to attempt to make him one. "Ojiro," Aizawa says, though he has no idea what he could possibly say to comfort his student right now. "That is something I cannot discuss with you due to the circumstances of Shinsou's case." It would be better if you could learn to forget these things now, rather than after you graduate.

Ojiro nods, pulling a mask of determination on after he winces at the memory one last time. "Thank you for your time, Sensei."

Aizawa takes a moment to just stare at the empty gym while Ojiro leaves, wanting to avoid any more questions that could come up from one of his students.

When he opens the door, he's faced with that exact scenario in the worst way. "He's not fucking mute."

Aizawa does not have the patience left for Bakugo, stepping around the teen as though he's just an unfortunate obstacle in his path, rather than a nightmare of determination and terrifying intelligence when he wants to be.

"I read all the shit I could find on that selective mutism bullshit, and it doesn't fucking line up," Bakugo growls, stalking after him. "Even with voice quirks being fucking weird when they're mute, he talks too damn much when he shouldn't. He talked to me during the fight, he talked to Ojiro, he fucking spewed some bullshit last night about some villain school, and now dumbass Kaminari thinks we should find that school and do an exchange program or some shit--"

"What is your point?" Aizawa grates, finding that ignoring the problem is more exhausting than it's worth.

"It's his quirk that's fucked," Bakugo answers. Aizawa closes his eyes for a moment, regretting that he allowed himself to forget that Bakugo was too perceptive to be involved in any aspect of Shinsou's case. That he aimed the student's terrifying focus on it unwittingly when he assigned the Trauma Project. "If he was mute, he'd only talk when he's comfortable or some shit. And he wasn't fucking comfortable with me trying to beat the shit out of him."

"He was," Aizawa muses aloud, something that clicked into place after the shock passed, now knowing why Bakugo had been so insistent that Shinsou wasn't mute after the fight. He hadn't been speaking to Ojiro, locked in another place and time. His conversation with Ashido and Kirishima either due to Eri's presence, the shock of seeing himself from a more normal time, or both. But speaking during a fight was easy to explain. "A hostile situation like that is far more familiar to Shinsou."

He was comfortable in a fight. It was something he could understand, interactions far more easily understood than peaceful cohabitation at the dorm, or the students of UA's friendly gestures. The only thing more familiar to Shinsou than being with Eri was being in a fight for his life.

Bakugo hesitates, and for a moment, Aizawa can believe that this situation has blown over. That perhaps his student will simply complete the project as Aizawa had hoped he would, delving into a deeper understanding of his own trauma rather than focusing on Shinsou's.

"I want to talk to him," Bakugo states, a request surprising in how devoid of swears it is. "For that bullshit project."

His pause only makes the explanation less believable. Aizawa sighs. "Don't. Interact-"

"Bullshit," Bakugo interrupts. "He needs that social interaction bullshit from the rest of the extras, that's why you brought him to UA. I don't give a shit about that, I just want to prove that I'm right. He's not mute, it's his quirk that's fucked up."

Aizawa stops and turns, Bakugo unwavering under his stare, chin still jutted out in self-assurance. He truly believes it. "If Shinsou agrees to speak to you, I will allow it for the purposes of your project. If he explicitly agrees verbally, or through sign language."

Bakugo turns to the side with a hiss, but Aizawa doesn't miss how his eyes narrowed at the words 'sign language.' He knows that Bakugo knew very little sign, and suspected it was still a denial of the risks associated with his quirk that he refused to learn more. It was a battle to make sure his student included ear plugs in his hero costume requests to the Support Department, and he knew Bakugo didn't always wear them.

One of these days, Present Mic would have to sit down with Bakugo and explain that childish denial wouldn't protect him from the realities of his chosen career. That Bakugo would be lucky to retire with some hearing ability left, if he hadn't started to lose it already, given how often the teenager shouted. That he would be fully deaf before he graduated if he didn't take serious precautions now.

"Fine! The creep is at your place, right?" Bakugo asks, and Aizawa feels the exhaustion double, nearly ready to buckle to the ground and convince himself that Nemuri could keep the wards for a few more hours while he took a nap on the campus grounds.

"Monday. Do not interact with Shinsou until then," Aizawa grates out, barely able to keep his eyes open as he drags himself towards the teacher's dorms. He's too tired to be properly relieved that Bakugo storms off towards the student dorms, growling a few choice words but otherwise agreeable to his stipulation.

Aizawa knew that he couldn't compare to the years of wardship experiences that Kayama and Emi had. He wasn't a prideful man, he was a rational one. The math simply worked in their favor.

But he still didn't expect to see Eri smiling as she ran into his legs, screaming his nickname so loudly that for a moment, she looked like a normal 5 year old girl, and nothing like the child still haunted by her experiences even at the best of times.

Even Shinsou seemed surprisingly relaxed, glancing at him just long enough to do his usual pat-down, before turning back to the television to watch some show about a cat behaviorist. Sushi was curled in a ball in his lap tightly enough for him to know that the cat had made himself comfortable there hours ago. That was surprising, as Sushi had begun to get a little crotchety in his old age, and didn't typically warm up to strangers so quickly. Perhaps the cat had sensed Shinsou was a kindred spirit in that way.

Perhaps Emi or the cat had been able to give Shinsou something that Aizawa didn't know how to give, and his chest ached at the thought.

“Aw! Can't we keep them? Please please please?!” Emi begged, hands pressed together in front of her face. “They're little angels, Shouta! Look at them! Don't you think Eri needs a little halo and wings? I do! I think you need to dress her more appropriately for how angelic this sweet little girl is!”

Eri posed, fingers pointing to her smile, more strained and attempted under the scrutiny or slight embarrassment, but it was still nearly too much to bear. Aizawa knew there was going to be a costume from Emi on their doorstep in the future, and he hoped that Hizashi would be able to stand the sight of it.

“And darling Shinsou! Sushi is just in love! I'm in love! I'm going to keep him!” Emi declared, crossing her arms as she pouted in determination. “Shinsou is just too sweet to tell you, but I'm going to tell you that he deserves to be with me, so I can give him all the cats in the world! It's nothing less than what he deserves, I tell you!”

Aizawa almost agrees, to call her bluff and hope it isn't a bluff, but he sees the way Shinsou's hand freezes and pulls away from Sushi, laid back on the couch. Emi's words could be taken in a different context, one that Shinsou is intimately aware of. Not the playful kind of exchange that Emi meant, but an exchange of ownership. “There's a cat cafe nearby. We should visit it at some point.”

Shinsou glances at him out of the corner of his eye, but Aizawa is distracted by Eri pressing her face against his legs, hands clutching tighter onto his pants. “But cats are scary,” she whines, and Aizawa looks up to Emi for a very necessary explanation.

Emi tilts her head, smiling nervously. “Sushi wasn't in the best mood today. He got a little spooked at first, but we did get to pet him when he settled down, right Eri?”

Eri nodded, turning to stare at Sushi as she pressed herself closer to Aizawa out of fear. “But I don't want to scare the cafe cats! That's mean!”

Before Aizawa can explain, Shinsou speaks first. “Cafe cats are socialized to not get scared, Eri,” the purple haired teenager says, pointing at the television. “Remember that episode? Cafe cats are really friendly, and they don't get bothered by loud noises or strangers. They know that good things happen when they're working, so they don't get scared.” Shinsou rests his hand on Sushi's back, stroking with short movements that stop when the cat rolls over to present his stomach, a temptation Aizawa has earned many scratches from taking. “Sushi just hasn't been around a lot of kids, so he got scared. He didn't mean it, though. I know he'd like you if you spent a lot of time with him.”

Aizawa is still shocked that Shinsou asked a question and didn't panic, didn't even seem to realize that he had asked it. “I'll ask beforehand, so you're not interrupted from any other type of date.”

Kayama gives him a Cheshire grin, but she always behaves herself in front of a ward. “I think Yamada came back an hour ago, but he might have been too busy working on lunch to drop by. We've only had a few snacks today." The subtle wag of her finger as she glances towards Shinsou tells Aizawa that he didn't eat at all.

"We should see what he's making then," Aizawa says, ignoring the growl from his own stomach as he tries to maneuver the wards into returning to their own dorm, though he knows the fun they've had with Emi and Kayama makes the departure harder.

"Aw! But I'm going to miss them!" Emi whines, crouching down to hug Eri close. "Can't I just put Eri in my pocket and carry her around with me everywhere?"

Eri giggles at the mental image, turning around to squeeze Emi in a hug that makes her groan as though the 5 year old could actually press the air out of her lungs. "Emi, you're silly! But I like you!"

Emi looks up with a desperate pout, actually seeming to tear up with those words. "I like you too, Eri! I like you a lot! I'm definitely going to steal you again! It's going to be Emi and Eri, just like it was meant to be!"

"Eri and Emi! Emi and Eri!" Eri chants, as Shinsou gingerly guides Sushi to curl up on the couch, stroking his head in an attempt to keep him settled.

Eri is brave enough to walk over to Kayama and give her a hug as well, which Kayama returns while she sends a sly look to Aizawa, one that threatens to steal the wards away more often in the future. She even gives Sushi a shy little pet, jumping back when he stretches towards her, and she runs back to the safety of Aizawa's legs.

Neither Aizawa nor Shinsou expect Emi to step in front of Shinsou as he moves to follow Eri, tucking her arms around his waist. Aizawa stiffens as he watches Shinsou's flinch, his arms jerking upwards but stuck in the air rather than throwing the hero off of him. "I'm going to miss you too, buddy!" Emi says, muffled as her face is pressed against Shinsou's hoodie.

There's clear panic on Shinsou's face, to the point that Aizawa is ready to walk over and pull Emi away himself, but he's frozen as he watches it slip away. He watches Shinsou's eyes start to close, resting back into that blank and neutral calm, his arms lowering, fingers twitching for a moment before he surprises Aizawa completely.

He puts his arms around Emi, wrapped around her shoulders, then closes his eyes and relaxes, tension flowing out of him with an audible exhale. Aizawa can hear Emi's hand moving in circles against the fabric of Shinsou's hoodie, tracing the pattern soothingly over his back. His shoulders slump in response, leaning further into the hug. His lips betray a twist of pain before the moment ends, and he straightens up, slipping the blank mask back on but for the wideness still set in his eyes, not quite panic but something close.

Emi just beams at him, pulling away and allowing the teenager to follow Eri back to their dorm, which appeared to have been opened by Hizashi judging by the sound of Eri's excited recounting of the day's events.

Aizawa looks to Kayama and Emi for their own retelling, and he's surprised to see Emi's fingers tighten around her arm as she refuses to meet his eyes, frowning. "You've got a hard one on your hands, Eraserhead," Emi mutters, unnervingly devoid of her usual cheer.

"You seemed to make a difference," Aizawa notes, wondering what Emi had seen apart from the vast improvements in the wards behaviors that could have caused the concern now apparent on her face.

"Now, now! I won't let the two of you be grumpy Guses!" Kayama complains, leaning over to pull a canvas bag closer to herself from where it was leaning against the TV stand. "This is the one, right?"

Emi nods, taking the book that Midnight hands to her from the bag, and presents it to Aizawa with a flourish. "TA-DA! The key to understanding Shinsou, written in a book easy for you to understand!"

'Loving Your Feral Cat' was the title, though Aizawa read it several times over, sure that his sleep-deprived brain was misreading it. "I've had a feral cat before. Shinsou is nothing like-

“ ‘There are very few truly feral cats in Japan,’” Emi reads, finding the page she wanted quickly enough for Aizawa to know she has read this book several times over. “ ‘You may assume your cat’s skittishness must be an aspect of their personality, because a cat’s emotions can be hard to perceive to the untrained eye. But in truth, your cat lives in terror of a world strange and unfamiliar, unable to understand that there are things that seem threatening, like yourself, that are not. Your cat has never learned that your hand is held out to comfort, or that your presence means no harm.’”

If Shinsou had learned those things, it was long forgotten beneath years of living the way he had. “Why did you hug him if you knew that?” Aizawa asks, far more interested to know if there was a way Shinsou could stand a less aggressive form of touch and not react poorly.

“It was a challenge line,” Emi answers, and the cat behaviorist says the same term in the pause that she takes to close the book. “And it was a lot of work to get to that point. I don’t think he’s ready for you to try it quite yet, but the book will explain it much better than I can.”

Aizawa takes the book, frowning as he remembers his conversation with Ojiro. Even if their intentions could not be more different, Aizawa was loathe to see Shinsou compared to an animal. He was loathe to do anything like Chisaki had.

But that wasn’t a rational response. He asked for Emi and Kayama’s advice, and they had given it in the form of this book. If there was anything useful to be learned from it, he would simply have to read it and see.

“Now, if you don’t mind,” Midnight said, leaning forward to play with the neckline of her sweater. “I didn’t exactly invite Emi over for a PG rated weekend.”

“Babe,” Emi whines, holding her blushing cheeks. “You can’t say those kind of things to my future husband. He must think I’m a loose woman.”

Midnight chuckle, her tone of voice growing more sensual. “Oh, I can tell him exactly how-“

Aizawa shuts the door behind him before he has to hear any more of their flirting, unwilling to become a victim to their twisted idea of foreplay.

Not when he was sober, and married.

Now! That's What I Call Music

Chapter Summary

27 receives a laptop, but ends up spending more time on his phone. Yamada finds himself dragging his feet to host his radio show, until Aizawa inspires him to do something he hasn't done in nearly a decade.

Trigger Warnings: Mild Dissociation

Chapter Notes

Sorry for the deluge of updates, guys! But tomorrow is my birthday, and all I really want is to read some comments. And this is was my favorite chapter to write, so I hope it's enjoyable for you guys!

P.S. - I wonder what would happen if you take that "herotube" link and change it to "youtube" :)

Previously on The Wards of UA: Naomasa wants to give Shinsou a laptop with a keylogger to see if he will use it to look up information about the Nomu Organization. Shinsou fought Bakugo on the first day of school, resulting in Bakugo being assigned a 100 page essay on the topic of trauma related disorders. Shinsou later fought Sero, Iida, Uraraka, and Ojiro in a sanctioned sparring match, and Ojiro's match ended when Ojiro grabbed Shinsou's hair, resulting in a dissociative episode where he spoke and attempted to use his quirk, which ended in a severe migraine. Ashido and Kirishima learned that Shinsou went to elementary school with him before he was sold to The Miasma.

Even if it had scarcely been a day since the last time they had been in the same room together, Yamada had missed his husband and their wards fiercely. He enjoyed hearing about everything he had missed from Eri, and was so enraptured by her recap of the Checkers match where she soundly defeated Midnight that he almost missed Shinsou eating all of his lunch, something that had become a rarity over the past few days.

Unfortunately for him, Shouta was only able to remain conscious as long as it took to eat his serving, dragging himself to the couch afterwards to collapse into a well earned nap. He was quickly joined by Eri, who never missed an opportunity to nap with Shouta, and seemed a bit wiped out by all the fun besides.

That left Yamada with the unpleasant task of presenting Shinsou with the new laptop he picked up from Naomasa, without betraying anything that could make the teenager suspicious of it.

“The phone is pretty handy to have, but I like using a laptop for more intensive stuff, like doing any research or watching videos,” Yamada explains, turning the computer on as Shinsou watches as his side. “I can show you a few HeroTube channels that teach JSL - Oh! We should definitely set up an account on that, so they’re easier to find.”

‘Lot of A-C-C-O-U-N-T-S.’ Shinsou signs with a half frown, the closest thing to a complaint Yamada thinks he’s ever communicated.

Yamada laughs sheepishly. “Yeah, it’s the digital age. Social media is a hard thing to keep track of. I make it look easy, but between three different accounts on every media platform in existence, sometimes I just want to throw my phone off a cliff and hide under a rock for a few days.”

Shinsou frowned, his hand placed over his pocket where he kept his phone. Perhaps the HeroTube account should wait until the teenager wouldn’t see it as a responsibility.

“So, I’m not sure how familiar you are with the Internet, but it’s a pretty neat thing,” Yamada says, pulling up the browser as he convinces himself that this deception is necessary. He knew it was for Shinsou’s own best interest, but he disliked lying to Shinsou, suspecting that he had earned a bit more trust from the teen than any other adult in his life. “Let’s say I forgot where my radio station is. I can just type the name or anything I remember about it into this little bar right here, hit send, and looky there! Now I’ve got the address, the website, and if I look at the ‘Images,’ I can even see my promo pictures!”

Even the cheesiness of his advertisements couldn’t dampen Shinsou’s apparent curiosity. His eyes were widened, leaning a bit closer to the screen. Before the guilt could become clear in Yamada’s face, regretting that he hadn’t left the laptop for Shouta who had a far better poker face, Shinsou’s hands raised up to sign. ‘Today Music.’

Yamada groaned, leaning back against the chair. “Do you have any nicknames for Midnight or Ms. Joke at least? I can’t be your favorite person to pick on.”

‘I do,’ Shinsou answered, then tapped on the screen, pointing to the picture of his latest billboard mock-up. ‘Today. Music.’

“Oh!” Yamada cried, slapping a hand over his mouth. “That’s right! My radio show is tonight, and I never told you about it! Every week I go on the air and play music for my listeners. Some nights I interview other heroes, or I have a little Q and A session, or give out advice for people who call in. And some nights I have to cancel, and Byte Sound takes over for me.”

Yamada wonders if he should text his sidekick now so that the wards could stay home rather than being dragged to the dorms with Shouta again. Eri never seemed to mind, in fact she looked forward to the dorm nights. On those nights she received all the attention she wanted from the hero students that were always ready to make her snacks or organize a movie marathon in the common area. But Shinsou was a very different story. He hadn’t even been at UA a full week, and had been through enough stressful events to deserve staying home for a month.

“I could stay in tonight, though. Byte already has the playlist made up, and I don’t have anyone scheduled to call...” Yamada tapered off, pulling out his phone to confirm his worries. “Shoot, Hawkes.”

Hawkes had been a nightmare to schedule. After months of back and forth and hundreds of noncommittals, Present Mic had finally caved and involved Tokoyami to pressure the Number 3 hero to give him a real date and time, and he finally promised he would call in tonight after 10.

Interviews were the one thing that Byte Sound refused to do. Though she was fully deaf, her quirk allowed her to hear the electronic pulses that passed through the station's equipment, often faster than the human ear could process. She technically could do an interview and use their more professional text to speech program to ask questions or comment, but she hated being on the air, adamant that she just didn't have the personality to carry a show.

Shinsou must have noticed his worry, signing, 'It's fine. I don't know. Hero. D-O-R-M.'

"Yeah, you guys are supposed to go to the Class 1-A dorms tonight. Shouta has to be there on the weekends," Yamada answered, not quite pleased that Shinsou had learned how to avoid asking questions in sign language as well. "But Shouta always tunes in to my show! You should tell me what song you want to hear, and I'll make sure to play it just for you, with a shout out and everything!"

Hopefully Shinsou's song request would be a bit easier to work in than Eri's. He never failed to deliver on any song she picked out for him to play, but the station manager hadn't been pleased by the amount of complaints his audiophile fan base had filed after the second week of Baby Shark. He hadn't made the situation any better by going on a mini-rant on Twitter about how people who take the term 'good music' to disavow others who enjoy any form of music that pleases them are idiots who don't understand that art can never be quantifiably good.

It might have been easier to just tell them that an adorable 5 year old girl had struggled for weeks to tell him what her favorite song was, and the first night he played it was the first time he made her smile. But Shouta was extremely against the idea. With the popularity of his radio show, the media would speculate what his relationship to this 5 year old girl could be, bringing dangerous and undue attention to their ward if she was ever discovered in the media frenzy. He would never want to bring Eri into the spotlight, with her quirk being dangerous in the wrong hands and her life being stressful and bizarre enough without paparazzi on her heels, but on a more selfish level, he didn't want to answer the questions that would inevitably come up.

Who was Eri to him? In truth, his answer wasn't a professional one. Eri wasn't just a ward to him, and he knew that she wasn't just a ward to Shouta. There was a line that wasn't meant to be crossed in wardship cases, one that Kayama had warned them to keep for both their sakes. There was a level of attachment that was to be expected, and another that would only cause heartache when the wardship was dissolved.

He hadn't brought it up to Shouta yet. Each time he thinks to, he remembers that it's only been a month, that he really shouldn't be thinking this way so soon. But he wants to make sure that if the wardship was dissolved, that Eri would stay with them.

That he could call her his daughter out loud, instead of trying to keep himself from even calling her his daughter in his head.

Shinsou seemed to be getting more frustrated as he tried to come up with a song, hands rising to sign only to drop back to his sides with a frown. Yamada decided to change the subject for him, despite how eager he was to know what kind of music Shinsou liked. "You don't have to pick tonight, though! But if any of my tunes catch your fancy, be sure to let me know! I need to make sure my music still appeals to the youth, after all. But, let's get back to this laptop business. This is how you get to HeroTube, oh wonderful wealth of cat videos that it is."

Shinsou might have tried to hide it, but Yamada had lived with enough avid cat fans to spot one a mile away. After showing him the JSL channel and an English one, he started pulling up cat video after cat video, pleased to earn that wide-eyed look of adoration and even a few ‘ Cute ’s after he taught him that sign.

Before he knew it, the clock was telling him that he needed to wake up Shouta to make sure he didn’t sleep through his dorm shift, leaving Class 1-A unsupervised to wreak untold amounts of havoc. “You guys still have a few hours before you have to go back to the dorm, but I need to make sure Shou wakes up before I leave.”

Shinsou seemed to waver for a moment, staring at the laptop with what he hoped was a Google-able question that could help with the investigation, but instead he followed Yamada to the living room.

Yamada noticed that Shinsou seemed to trail after him quite a bit as he fixed Eri a small snack and woke Shouta up repeatedly. It made him wonder if Shinsou had missed him as much as Yamada knew he would miss him tonight. Several times, Yamada pulled out his phone, determined to call Byte Sound to take over for just one night, and deal with the fallout tomorrow.

But in the end, he found himself struggling not to ruffle the teenager’s hair or pull him into a hug as he tells his little family goodbye, knowing those actions would only pull the worry from Shinsou’s face in the worst way.

27 tried not to let the separation affect him.

He could see Eri on the monitors. He knew the fastest route to the common area, and now that he knew the hero students’ quirks and combat abilities for the most part, he had several strategies to take them down if anything untoward happened while he wasn’t there.

His owner assured him that Eri would be safe, that she watched movies with the heroes on a weekly basis. That he was free to join them at any time. 27 must have allowed some amount of anxiety show to receive that kind of permission, and he assured his owner that he knew, and it was fine.

It didn’t feel fine at all. It felt like he was being strapped to the table in the Red Room, just waiting for Bug to begin. Like Chisaki was taking off his gloves.

He stared at the monitor, checking their positions again. Craven Raven was the closest to the stairway, perched on a stool in the kitchen area with Body Horror. Both were pretty tough front-liners, with the ability to extend their range of attack to an absurd degree, but Nevermore was vulnerable while his quirk was extended from his body. 27 could rush him, and depending on whether he could control a level of permeability in his quirk, possibly entangle Flesh Growth with it.

Ashido was next, sitting on the recliner with Bolt and Tongue Whip on either side. Her acid hands would be easy to use against the other two, and judging by Pikachu’s ability to incapacitate himself, he would have to be careful not to set off that bomb and instead use it against the others.

That weird strength quirk that seemed to be muttering to himself during training seemed like a good target for Shock Therapy. Incapacitate the unknown, reduce the risk of surprises.

27 didn't have a strength quirk, but he wouldn't need it to throw Bubble around. Icy Hot had a powerful quirk that didn't fit his current environment, hopefully he was as restrained in combat as he seemed to be socially. Izuku was the closest to Eri, the most threatening presence. He had a powerful strength and speed enhancement quirk, but seemed to only use his legs for attacking, in a way that wasn't natural nor practiced nearly enough to give 27 any problems.

27 glanced back at the phone when he saw his owner's head moving, to make sure that he didn't suspect that he was also watching the video feed. He made himself look busy on the phone, scrolling idly through the unread messages to avoid any more odd attempts at conversation from his owner.

It was weird that he had attempted it at all. 27 was so caught off-guard when his owner asked if he liked cats that he couldn't come up with a better response than ' No. ' It was clearly a lie, one of the worst 27 had ever told, but he panicked too quickly to come up with a better one.

But something must have caught his owner's attention on the screen, and he returned to staring at it, leaving 27 in peace for a little longer.

27 accidentally tapped on the Class A chat, the request for his username staring accusingly back at him. He should at least go through his unread messages, to see if any valuable information had been sent to him there before he looked through this one.

Eri's Plushie Dealer: But don't worry about it! I'm really excited to learn more about buildings, it kind of goes with my quirk, you know?

Eri's Plushie Dealer: I almost got trapped in a boiler room during the raid, lol. I probably wouldn't have been as impressive as a hero with scorch marks all over my face. You would have been like, 'Who is this lame guy trying to save?'

Eri's Plushie Dealer: But really, I don't want you to feel bad at all. It's a good learning experience!

Eri's Plushie Dealer: Did you get enough sleep last night? Neji wants to get her bedding during lunch so you could take a nap during our class. You can definitely do that if you want! Aizawa-sensei might have fooled you, but he takes plenty of naps during class, he's just on his best behavior right now. :p

Eri's Plushie Dealer: I'm sorry for making you upset, Shinsou. I'm really glad you told Present Mic, and I want you to know that I'm not mad at all.

Eri's Plushie Dealer: I'm still crying thinking of how much you believe in me though!!! I'll never forget your words of encouragement!

27 worried at his lip, trying to decide whether he should message the hero so he would stop working himself up about the situation, or if the hero would eventually stop bothering him if he didn't.

He was too close to Eri for that to happen.

Eri's Mom: It's fine. I don't know how you haven't heard that before. It was pretty lame.

Eri's Mom: I don't know if this school teaches heroes about building infrastructure, but that seems like something they should.

He started typing a message about how he learned how to navigate ventilation systems as one of his first lessons at The Miasma. Bug took advantage of his small size and his easy ability to scare by running him through a maze of vents while she hit the outside with a steel pipe, telling him that if he screamed, she was going to send her bugs in after him. But he couldn't let Mirio know that, he couldn't let any little piece of The Miasma slip away from him so easily.

Izuku had finally messaged him back, though.

Deku: Li

Deku: It's okay if you don't like it, and I don't mean to be offensive or anything, so please don't take it that way

Deku: But Link is a very cool video game character that I think suits you! He's a hero who is reincarnated during times of trouble to save a princess named Zelda in most games

Deku: And I kind of think that suits you and Eri

Deku: Link is also mu

Deku: Link doesn't have dialogue in most games, and some fans think he uses sign language to communicate!

Deku: I have a few of my favorite Zelda games in my dorm, if you ever wanted to play?

Brainwashio: You picked a character that can't speak. I might be sensitive about that.

27 bit the inside of his cheek, trying not to grin. This Izuku guy seemed way too easy to fluster, and would probably panic when faced with the thought of truly hurting 27's feelings.

He would definitely be useful in the future.

Next was Bakugo's chat.

You're a lying little bitch: Fuck you little piece of shit I know you fucking saw this

You're a lying little bitch: You pretending you don't know how this shit works either? Dumb fuck

You're a lying little bitch: Shitsei gave me a goddamn impossible ass project because of your smart mouth so you better fucking help me with this shit.

You're a lying little bitch: AND LOOK AT THE FUCKING GROUP CHAT

You're a lying little bitch: I'M FUCKING OVER EVERYONE MOONING OVER YOUR ASS

You're a lying little bitch changed their name to Ojiro should've broken your neck

Ojiro should've broken your neck: I'm FUCKING ON TO YOU. Monday. Forget that mute ass bullshit and tell Shitsei you want to study with me or I will KICK YOUR SHIT IN

I broke your nose: :)

I broke your nose changed their name to If Eri ever swears I will kill you and no one will find the body

If Eri ever swears I will kill you and no one will ever find the body: You make a lot of demands for someone who has nothing to offer me.

Now he knew that Bakugo truly was his favorite type of opponent - temperamental, low IQ, and relied heavily on their physical quirk. He should probably use this chat to find out exactly which buttons to push to make him tip over the edge, where he would be so blinded by rage that even his quirk's power wouldn't save him.

The chat for Izuku and Mirio seemed superfluous, and he had no need to involve himself with Class B yet, making him pass over Monoma's. He set his username to 'Link' in the chat for Kirby, Metal Knight, and Deku Sprout, then closed it as it only had their introductions.

Koda Koji interested him, though. Was this someone who wasn't a UA student? Could they even be an informant for The Miasma that had tracked him down?

Koda: Hello! I hope it isn't odd to create a chat when we haven't spoken yet. I just wanted to let you know that I know JSL, so if the rest of Class A ever gives you any problems, you can sign to me, and I'll ask them to stop.

Koda: Momo is learning too, though! Midoriya also mentioned wanting to learn, so maybe Class A can form a study group. :)

A member of Class A. 27 had no idea which one.

27: I don't know a lot of sign yet. Still learning.

Before he sent his next message, a flash of movement caught his eye. The fleshy strength quirk was on his phone.

Koda: That's okay! I'm probably not as good as Present Mic, but I could also teach you, if you wanted.

Weird Strength Quirk turned his phone over, but left it in his lap, like he was waiting for a message. Interesting.

27: You're watching the movie. I don't know your quirk.

The Unknown picked up his phone and glanced around the room, as if he was looking for someone. Not so Unknown anymore.

Koda: Are you here too? I can move if you want to sit closer to Eri!

Koda: My quirk is being able to talk to animals! Sometimes I can control them with just my voice. Other times, I have to convince them, but I always try to be polite! It's not the most outright heroic quirk, but I believe I can use it to help others!

This one seemed even more unnervingly pure hearted than Izuku. 27 couldn't even hate him for it.

Maybe he should open that Yamada chat, but an odd, irritating feeling told him not to. That it might be a good idea to see how long he could ignore the chat before Yamada got angry and demanded to know why he wasn't using the app correctly.

At this point, he probably should try to force Yamada's hand. He still didn't know the punishments. But Class A might have that information already, with any luck they might have given it away for free.

Izuku was right, this chat must be chaotic. It made the app destroy itself twice, the screen freezing then returning to the background when he tried to open the chat. On the third and final time he was going to attempt it, it loaded the messages.

And there were a lot of messages. It took a long time for him to scroll up to the top, and when he saw their first messages, he froze.

They had sent him information about their quirks. Their names, their hero names. Most of them even sent pictures of themselves so that he knew which one had which name. They casually explained how their quirks worked, what weaknesses they had. Some of them admitted that they weren't as well trained in certain areas, especially hand-to-hand combat. They ranked themselves in accordance to grades and combat abilities.

All of that dangerous information was just given to him. And he had risked the wrath of his owner, his tenuous connection with Toshinori, and his own life just to get a glimpse of it.

But if he had just opened the chat, he would have had that information that morning.

Biting back against his own frustration, 27 scrolled through the rest of the messages. Some of them appeared to be in code, and Kaminari seemed to only use that code to communicate. They asked him a lot of questions, ranging from the mundane like whether he liked chocolate milk, to more risky things like what his quirk was, or how long he knew Eri. Some of those invasive questions were shut down by the others, and several parties apologized on the questioner's behalf. Eventually, the messages about him tapered off, and the discussion descended into chaos. Ashido and Kaminari changed the usernames of others and each other, discussions about schoolwork and movies and games took place. President Ingenuity tried to move those discussions to another chat where only the hero students were members, but several students protested that they liked this one better, for some reason.

Then, the sparring match with Ojiro happened, and the focus on him flared back to life.

Energize me Capitan: Shinsou @ Ojiro: I like you better when you don't touch my hair

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: SHUT THE FUCK UP DUMBASS. YOU FRY YOUR MEAGRE FUCKING BRAINCELLS ENOUGH TIMES IN A WEEK TO SPOT HEAD TRAUMA. FUCKING IDIOT

Omae wa mou Shindeiru changed NANI???'s name to Broccoli Shit

Omae wa mou Shindeiru changed Energize me Capitan's name to NANI???

Ya Good Boiii: Oof, Kaminari has been Marked for Death™. Been nice knowing ya buddy.

Red Robin YUM: f

What them cords dooo: f

Ya Good Boiii: f

YAAS Alien Kween: @Ojiro spill the fucking tea on how Shinsou is doing or I will do horrible, horrible things @you

Easy Bake: @everyone I'm sure that everything will be fine. Iida confirmed that he texted Aizawa-sensei to request an update on Shinsou's health.

Sweet Honey Sugar Life: So, does anyone know what the police officer meant by witness tampering?

NANI???: That means Ojiro will be arrested for his crimes against Shinsou's hair.

Do The Robot: I would like to remind you all that Shinsou can see these messages, and this is not the designated chat for these discussions. - Iida Tenya

The Cure'd Bird: Alas, I believe that message has arrived past the hour of its need, Iida. Now that the words have been spake, a madness shall descend upon us all, until relief finds us in knowing what we question.

Kakashi: A bit much, Tokoyami.

The Cure'd Bird: I have a reputation to uphold, Shoji.

Ya Good Boiii: But Sato has a point? The 8 Precepts are in jail, why do the police need Shinsou as a witness?

Frog Princess: Aizawa-sensei would not approve of us asking. You know he's very protective of Shinsou, and it's probably for a good reason.

Do The Robot: Eri's case is actually very atypical for a wardship designation. A wardship is usually for cases in which an at-risk minor who does not have the proper protection afforded to them from their parents or guardians is determined to require the protection of a hero during the course of a criminal investigation they are a key component to. The hero they are placed with is determined by their ability to restrain the ward if the ward uses their quirk against the hero, as well as whether the hero has security clearance, wardship certifications, and how well the investigation plays to their specialization. With Aizawa-sensei's quirk, it's quite remarkable that he hasn't had a wardship until now.

Frog Princess: Iida.

Do The Robot: WRONG CHAT I CANNOT APOLOGIZE ENOUGH

Floatalicious Def: Has anyone heard from Ojiro??? Aizawa-sensei hasn't texted Iida back.

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: HOW ABOUT I FUCKING SEND ONE OF YOU SHITS TO RECOVERY GIRL SO YOU CAN ASK FOR THE CORPSE YOURSELF

Ya Good Boiii: I volunteer whoever ate my Fritos as tribute

Ya Good Boiii: I was SAVING THEM

What them cords dooo: I volunteer Kaminari as tribute. He probably ate them anyway.

Strawberry Cream Dream: I volunteer Bakugo as tribute

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: EAT SHIT AND DIE

Fidget Spinner Tail: Shinsou is fine. He had a migraine. I still volunteer myself as tribute.

C Me Dance: Nooooo! You didn't mean it! It was just an accident!

YAAS Alien Kween: More, or I'm waxing your tail tonight.

Ya Good Boiii: Uhhhh @Ashido you good?

Red Robin YUM: @Sero long story, come over.

Fidget Spinner Tail: Aizawa-sensei said he tried to use his quirk? But Recovery Girl said he would be fine with just rest. He was laying down when I left. The police officer followed us to Recovery Girl's office. Also, we're going to have a lot of quirkless combat drills. Sensei is very disappointed in us.

YAAS Alien Kween changed Fidget Spinner Tail's name to Baby Jail

YAAS Alien Kween: u r warned. Do NOT touch my boy.

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: @DEKU I KNOW YOU FUCKING KNOW WHAT QUIRK HE HAS. WHAT THE FUCK WAS CORPSE TRYING TO DO

Broccoli Shit changed their name to Broccoli Boiii

Broccoli Boiii: I'm not telling anyone. Aizawa-sensei didn't tell us, and he must have a reason for that. I was told by accident.

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: @FROGBITCH SHITTY HAIR WILL TELL ME WHEN HE'S DONE WITH FUCKED UP ELBOWS SO YOU BETTER JUST FUCKING TELL ME NOW

Frog Princess: Those of us who participated in the raid were told exactly what Aizawa-sensei told the class. Shinsou has a voice activated emitter quirk. That is all that we need to know. You don't need to be afraid of him considering that he rarely speaks, Bakugo.

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: I'M NOT FUCKING SCARED OF THAT TWIGGY LITTLE SHIT YOU DUMB FUCK

Nothing else seemed important in the messages that followed.

But he had gained a lot of information. Izuku knew what his quirk was, but luckily, he was the only one, at least at this point. The heroes were suspicious of the police officer. Kirishima and Ashido had made their past connection to him blatantly obvious.

Their usernames absolutely sucked.

27 was going to close the chat until he could find a way to get the information he wanted from it, but then he saw a new message pop up.

YAAS Alien Kween: I see u.

YAAS Alien Kween: Say something or I will leak compromising pictures involving you, me, and a lot of non-toxic finger paint.

At least that was a good threat. He had hope for this one.

27: Watch the movie or be on your phone somewhere else. You're distracting Eri.

27: That was a lot more distracting.

Ashido stopped flailing on the video monitors, her cheers having already drawn attention from everyone else in the room. She turned back to her phone, bouncing in her seat excitedly.

YAAS Alien Kween: THE CRYPTID HAS BEEN FOUND

YAAS Alien Kween: WHERE ARE U???

27: Elsewhere.

Ya Good Boiii: Vague af.

Strawberry Cream Dream: You're in the safe room, aren't you? Eri says hi.

27: Tell her I said hi back.

Strawberry Cream Dream: She said she wants you to be friends with us so we can all watch movies together, and you would really like this movie.

What them cords dooo: Should we be concerned you're in a safe room rn? Is there a villain attack or something?

Broccoli Boiii: The Safe Room is just the video surveillance room that the teachers on shift stay in to avoid us. Kacchan and I were sent there once. It has live video feed from all over the dorm, and a cot for Eri to sleep on during Aizawa-sensei's shifts.

Red Robin YUM: Where's the camera??? Can you see me?

Red Shark was easy to spot, with all the attention he was drawing to himself as he waved and spun around in circles in the hallway.

27: I can see you. I could tell you where the cameras are, but not for free.

YAAS Alien Kween: COME DOOWWWN I WANNA HANG OUT WITH UUUUU

27: No.

Hon Hon Baguette: mon petite violette, you are quite brusque. Would you like to share a cheese sample to put your worries to rest?

27: Non.

C Me Dance: AH HH WE HAVE SO MANY QUESTIONS! I'm writing a program to pick out all the messages where we asked you something so it's easier to answer rather than scrolling through all that mess.

Easy Bake: I was just about to do it by hand. You are a life-saver, Tooru.

C Me Dance: #PythonPWNZ

Pika CHUUUU :* : Fiiiirst! How did you get those scars?

He sees Amphibian Girl lash Power Outage with her tongue, glaring at him. It made him feel a little better to know they weren't likely to ask that question soon.

Floatalicious Def: KAMINARI

YAAS Alien Kween: Tsu gottem

Strawberry Cream Dream: That was very rude.

27: I only have one question, and I don't give information away for free. I'll only answer one question in return.

Pika CHUUUU :* : Sorry. That was not very cash money of me.

27: I don't know what any of your coded messages mean, Sparky.

Easy Bake: You don't have to answer any questions you don't want to, and we will happily answer any that you have!

The Cure'd Bird: Kaminari is grinning madly with delights untold.

The Cure'd Bird: You have made a grave mistake, Shinsou.

What them cords dooo: KAMINARI DON'T YOU FUCKING DO IT

Pika CHUUU : changed their name to Meme Master*

Meme Master: Allow me to teach you the ways, grasshopper

Meme Master: Pls click this link. <https://www.herotube.com/watch?v=dQw4w9WgXcQ>

Ya Good Boiii: SHINSOU DON'T DO IT STAY PURE

What them cords dooo: Rickrolling? Really?

C Me Dance: DONE! :)

C Me Dance: 22MB file attached. Tap to download.

27: One of you pick the question.

Floatalicious Def: WHO GETS TO PICK??? HOW CAN WE DECIDE THAT?!?!

Easy Bake: We can do a tally system! @everyone Send your vote to me through PM

Floatalicious Def: IT'S SO HARD TO DECIDE.

27: Fine. Two questions for one answer.

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: You're fucking enjoying this bullshit, you smug fuck.

Omae wa mou Shindeiru changed 27's name to NANI?!

YAAS Alien Kween: TAKE IT BACK BAKUGO

NANI?! changed their name to 27

27: :)

Meme Master: SO BRAVE

Ya Good Boiii: Balance is restored. We can't have two Marked for Death(TM)

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: WANNA FUCKING BET

Broccoli Boiii: Kacchan. Pls.

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: IDAF DUMB BITCH CAN FUCKING FIGHT ME AND NEXT TIME I WILL BEAT HIS SHIT IN

27: :-)

Ya Good Boiii: Oh god not that face

Meme Master: Bakugo needs a vibe check. What's the sitch, my good dudes?

Red Robin YUM: Not good.

Ya Good Boiii: He's screeching.

27: :--)

Ya Good Boiii: WHERE'S THE RESULTS WE NEED TO END THIS

Easy Bake: Koda and Iida are left, I'm going to Iida's room now. He might be asleep.

NANI??? : Just voted! Sorry Momo!

Floatalicious Def changed NANI???'s name to Goodest Boiii

Broccoli Boiii: Kacchan how could you???? I'm sorry Koda I didn't notice!!!

Do the Robot: I have also voted! - Iida Tenya

Easy Bake: Question 1: Who do you like the best out of Class A?

Easy Bake: Question 2: Why did you pick '27' as your user handle?

Easy Bake: But remember, you don't have to answer either question if you don't want to! We can skip and move down the list!

27: Skip 1.

YAAS Alien Kween: IT'S ME THOOOO

Easy Bake: Question 3 - I'm skipping and very disappointed in those who would try to cheat on our finals. Question 4: What is your relationship to Aizawa-sensei?

27: Skip 4.

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: FUCK YOU. STOP DRAGGING THIS SHIT OUT.

Easy Bake: Question 5: How long have you known Eri?

Floatalicious Def: Awwww I wanna know cute Eri stories too! Did you know her when she was a baby????

27: 1 - My username is a name I've used more often than the others.

27: 2 - More than 3 years. She wasn't a baby, but she was about 2.5 years old. She had some verbal delays, but her other milestones added up to around that age.

Ya Good Boiii: Does Shinsou have a mommy blog?

Broccoli Boiii: SERO

Ya Good Boiii: I'm just saying!!! That sounds like something from a mommy blog!

27: As a cute story, she was really attached to the first book she learned to read. She refused to go to sleep without it. She also used to be very insistent on picking her own dress in the morning, even though they were all the same. There was a ritual to it. And she really liked Mimic's puppet. There were a few times she tried to hug it.

Floatalicious Def: these Eri stories have watered my crops. #blessed

Meme Master changed 27's name to Teen Mom

Broccoli Boiii: KAMINARI >:(

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: STOP HIDING SHIT DEKU. IF YOU'VE GOT A FUCKING PROBLEM JUST SAY IT

YAAS Alien Kween: Shinsou talks so much abt Eri its soooooo adorable

YAAS Alien Kween: I WANNA KNOW MORE ERI STORIES

Strawberry Cream Dream: Eri is right here?

Ya Good Boiii: I don't like the way you said that, Todoroki.

Broccoli Boiii: She is! Todoroki is just confused why we can't ask Eri, but it's because Shinsou remembers more about Eri's early childhood than she does.

Strawberry Cream Dream: Understandable, have a nice day.

Do the Robot: Oh no.

Floatalicious Def: TODOROKI WHO DID THIS TO YOU???

Meme Master: :))))))

Meme Master changed Strawberry Cream Dream's name to Welcome to Chili's

The Cure'd Bird: He grows stronger with each victim he takes.

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: CORPSE FACE ASK YOUR FUCKING QUESTION AND FUCK OFF

Teen Mom: :---)

Ya Good Boiii: shinsou PLEASE HE'S TRYING TO FIND YOU RUN

Kakashi: Shinsou this is not a good idea. For any of us.

Red Robin YUM: Shinbro Bakubro kinda hates that face. IDK why it brings out the Bakurage but it does.

Broccoli Boiii: AVENGERS ASSEMBLE TO DEFEND THE SAFE ROOM

Floatalicious Def: OTWWWW CMON IRON MAN

Teen Mom: 1 - He won't be able to find me. 2 - Aizawa is here, and I doubt Blasty can do anything in front of him. 3 - I can and will destroy him given the opportunity.

Sugar Daddy: I heard the scream. Shinsou he's close. On the 5th floor.

Kakashi: Is this flirting?

Ya Good Boiii: @Shoji Probably? But let's keep that to ourselves and let them work it out, okay buddy?

Red Robin YUM: no??? This is not flirting!!

YAAS Alien Kween: u seem a lil defensive kiri... whys that? ;)

Omae wa mou Shindeiru: IDGAF ABOUT SHITSEI IF YOU DON'T FUCKING ASK YOUR QUESTION I'M BEATING IT OUT OF YOU

Red Robin YUM: BAKUNO

Teen Mom: That's a very uninspired threat. Try harder.

Baby Jail: I'm outside the safe room making sure Bakugo doesn't actually get in, because Aizawa-sensei will take it out on all of us.

YAAS Alien Kween changed Baby Jail's name to Best Boiii

Ya Good Boiii: I love a good redemption story.

Broccoli Boiii: A new boiii!!!

Goodest Boiii: Welcome to the Boiis Ojiiro!!!

Teen Mom: List the punishments used here, by Aizawa or Yamada in particular, preferably by severity.

The messages suddenly stopped.

27 waited. He closed and reopened the app, thinking it must have frozen again, but nothing happened. A quick scan of the monitors showed that most of the heroes were looking at their phones, though Crimson Foul and Puff Ball were trying to restrain Fulmination in the stairway, and Commander Diesel was shouting at them while wearing a nightcap and plaid pajamas.

The others should be answering him. He had given them plenty of information. He had given them far too much, now that he looks back and reads what he had said about his name. He should have skipped that question, he shouldn't have answered it. Few organizations used numbers as code names, if they put together that his number meant he was a Number, then they may be able to find The Miasma.

Then he would be useless to his owner. He would be taken away from Eri.

27 startled at the sound of the door opening, to see Eri poke her head in with a smile dancing in her eyes. "Are you still talking to the heroes, Twenny?"

27 rubbed the back of his neck, glancing at his owner, who seemed to be reading a book. Perhaps he hadn't noticed the commotion on the cameras. "They stopped answering. I might have said something weird again."

Eri shut the door behind her, then crawled into his lap to play with the strings of his hoodie. "That's okay, Twenny! They were really happy you were talking to them! Even though you were making Bakugo mad, but Todo really liked that."

"You like Todoroki again," 27 assumed, noticing that Chili had been awarded an nickname, and Eri nodded.

"He doesn't know a lot of movies either, even though he's a hero, so you don't have to be embarrassed about not knowing movies. And you don't have to be embarrassed about your scars, 'cause Todo has a big scar too, and no one bothers him about it," Eri says, looking up with her pleading red eyes to try to convince him to at least be friends with this hero.

27 frowned, pressing his finger to the sunken groove on his cheek before he catches himself, pulling away. "They don't bother me."

Eri picks at her skirt, frowning at her white leggings. "I don't like mine, either," she admits in a small, wavering voice.

27 pulls her close to his chest, wrapping his arms around her. "I know. I'm sorry," he whispers, biting at the inside of his cheek as he considers whether his opinion would make her feel any better. "I think the swirling ones are cute, though."

Eri cocks her head, then pulls at his sleeve to poke at his Bug scars. "These are cuter. They're like little sidewalks."

"Hmm," is all 27 can manage to say in answer, coming out a bit more strained than he meant it to. He hates when she does this. Especially when her fingernails are a little too long, like they are right now. She doesn't even realize that she's scratching him as she drags her finger up and down his arm.

He doesn't usually hate it this much, though. His teeth start to hurt from how hard he's clenching his jaw, and he can smell blood in the air at times, thick and coppery. She never makes him feel like this, at worst it's an unpleasant buzz in his skull but right now he feels like he's drowning. He can't let her know, this is one of the few things she likes, and he can't make her feel sad again.

He's terrified and wounded by the numbness setting into his hands when he hears her gasp.

"That word is gone!" Eri says, pulling his sleeve back as if that kanji had been moved higher up his arm somehow. "How'd that word go away?"

"It got taken off," 27 answers, finding he can breathe a little easier now that she's distracted. "The big circle on my back too."

Eri stands up to pull his shirt back to see, running her hands over the skin as though it's just hiding beneath the surface. "He won't get mad?" Eri whispers with a slight tremble in her legs.

"Nope," 27 answers, grinning as he thinks about this victory over Chisaki. He wishes he could face the mobster down and show him the spaces that he thought he used to own. He can only imagine the look on his face. "I don't care if he does. He doesn't scare me."

Eri wraps her arms around his neck, hanging off of him like a necklace. "I'm glad, Twenny! Nobody's gonna call you that name anymore, and nobody's gonna hurt you."

He hugs her back, smiling despite knowing how wrong she was. "I'm glad too."

Eri glanced over at his owner, and recognized the website he had pulled up on one of the screens.

"YAMA'S SHOW!" she screamed, relaxing her hold to slap her hands on either side of his face.

"Twenny, Yama's show is gonna start! He's gonna play a song for me too! He's gonna play Baby Shark just for me!"

"Oh," 27 says, smiling just for her benefit. "I didn't think they played songs like that on the radio. He asked me what song I wanted too, but..."

"You didn't pick?" Eri asked, head tilting to the side. "But he would play it! I promise he would! Yama plays any song he wants, 'cause no one can tell him what to do!"

"I... couldn't think of any," 27 lied. He liked the intro song for Sailor Moon a bit more than the other songs he knew, but he didn't think asking Yamada to play it would go over well for him. At best, it made him look stupid, at worst, Yamada could think he was trying to mock him or sabotage his show.

"I imagine that Present Mic would like to know if you hear a song you like," his owner said, startling 27. The man's gaze wasn't directed at him, he seemed to be staring at the wall instead. "He enjoys talking about music."

"He can even take songs home with him on his phone!" Eri said, bouncing on his leg. "Then you get to listen to them anywhere you want!"

His owner smiled at Eri, then clicked on something to make the computer begin to play music. 27 watched as his owner picked up his phone, and wished that he was close enough to know what he was typing as he heard it buzz from messages being received.

But Eri was settled comfortably against his chest, making it impossible for 27 to sit at the corner of the cot, where he might have been able to see if his owner was messaging someone about The Miasma. He needed to find a way to learn what they knew, soon.

But tonight, he supposed he just needed to listen to the radio.

Aizawa loved his husband. He truly did, and he knew that he didn't show it nearly enough.

He just hoped that he didn't give Hizashi a heart attack with that last message.

Hizashi always responded to his texts immediately while he was doing his show, unless there was a technical issue or he was on the air. But the music had been playing with no commentary breaks or issues in sight, and what he thought had been a teasing text message was beginning to look like the last thing Hizashi saw before he died.

Finally, the reply came in.

Zashi: babe ARE YOU SERIOUS???

Zashi: I AM PLAYING SUCH SHITTY MUSIC YOU CANNOT

Zashi: I AM FREAKING OUT A LITTLE I HAVE NOTHING PREPARED I

Shou: A little?

Zashi: PLEASE TELL ME HE LIKED SOMETHING SO I CAN MAKE A NEW PLAYLIST OFF OF THAT

Zashi: THE FIRST REAL SONG SHINSOU HEARD WAS A SHITTY TOP 40 MY MANAGER INSISTED ON I AM CRUSHED I HAVE FAILED

Aizawa glanced at the screen's reflection, but as he suspected, Shinsou wasn't giving him any indication whether he liked the song or not. He certainly wasn't disinterested, his head tilted slightly so that he could hear the music better, his eyes a bit wider than usual. But he had worn that same expression since the show began, and after cycling through almost every music genre, Aizawa realized it.

Shinsou hadn't heard this kind of music before.

To Aizawa, it wasn't surprising. After all that had been denied to Shinsou, he doubted that any of his previous organizations would let him explore his taste in music in between rounds of torture. He thought that telling Hizashi his suspicions would make his husband a bit flustered, but make the night a little easier to work through. He knew that Hizashi had been dragging himself to the radio station, obviously wanting to stay home with them, and thought that changing his playlist up a bit to accommodate his ward would help him feel more connected to them.

This was a bit beyond that.

Shou: He doesn't seem to hate anything so far.

Zashi: babe ilu but not hating is not enough right now

Zashi: He looks like he likes Morrissey maybe? BUT I'M NOT ONE OF THOSE PEOPLE BABE HEEEEEEEEELP

Shou: He probably hasn't heard enough music to form an opinion.

Zashi: OH GOD I'M FORMING HIS TASTE IN MUSIC I CAN'T DO THIS SHOU

Shou: You've been a radio personality since you were 20. I think you're more qualified to form his taste in music, if that's a possibility, than anyone else.

Zashi: Did he tell you????

Shou: No. It's just an assumption. I could be wrong.

Zashi: Ur never wrong!

Zashi: mute me next break?

Aizawa tried not to roll his eyes, pulling out the bluetooth headphones he had started stashing in the Safe Room desk. Though Hizashi had started censoring his program a bit more since Eri started listening, he would still request that Aizawa mute certain live portions or bawdy English songs that his station manager insisted on playing. He had a suspicion that wasn't the case in this instance.

Shou: Ready. Don't give away any information about Shinsou.

Zashi: How do you know me so well babe??? It's a little creepy

Shou: You asked your fans to build a wedding playlist instead of doing it yourself.

Zashi: I NEEDED SUGGESTIONS IT HAD TO BE PERFECT!!!!

Shou: That's how I knew.

Zashi: 30 sec!

Aizawa tucked one of the headphones in his ear, hand hovering over the audio output menu to switch the devices as he counted down the seconds. He was a bit off, but the record scratch was all the warning he needed to know that his husband was about to start talking.

He heard Eri start to explain to Shinsou that sometimes the radio goes quiet for a while so that Yamada can eat a snack, a white lie that Aizawa had come up with on the spot, too exhausted at the time to properly explain that there were certain things that she wasn't old enough to hear. Shinsou seemed to accept that, turning back to his phone with a frown, before he let Eri take it over to check on their monster game.

"Helloooo listeners," Present Mic drawled as the jingle for his commentary break stopped. "This is your man of the hour, the voice hero when you're in need, telling you to Get Your Hands Up! Week after week, year after year, we get together for our little chats, our moments, our love for music. I know my most devoted listeners already know tonight's playlist by heart, but tonight, Get Your Hands Up! is going to do something we haven't done in a while! We're opening the phone lines for you, dear listeners, to send me some tunes for all of us to enjoy!"

"I can hear my listeners asking, 'Why?! Why would you change a set playlist, Present Mic, oh masterful DJ that you are!' And to that I say, 'Because I can!' It's my show, I'll damn well do what I want on it!"

He definitely didn't clear it. Hizashi was going to get a lot of angry phone calls over the next few days.

“But,” Hizashi starts to break through the Present Mic persona, his voice dropping a bit lower and becoming more even. “Listeners, you deserve to know the truth behind this decision. During the last music break, I got a call telling me that one of my listeners wasn’t just new to the show, this listener is new to music. My show is the first time he’s heard any music at all, and that...” Hizashi stops, pausing to collect himself. “That’s really humbling.”

Shouta finds himself smiling. It had been quite a while since he was able to hear Hizashi so clearly on this show, that side of Hizashi that few really got to know. A quieter, sweeter side that could be so vulnerable so easily. The Hizashi he fell in love with.

“I can’t play just any old song after hearing that, and despite being the Voice Hero himself, despite running this show for over 10 years, I can’t be the only voice this kid hears tonight. I want my listeners to not be listeners tonight, I want all of us, every fan of music that’s listening tonight, to reach out and welcome this kid to one of the most universal joys in this world. To share your favorite songs, the best songs you know. My audiophiles, my dedicated roadies, and every casual fan who knows what it feels like to listen to a song and have it get you, call in! Call in, tweet me, email me, I can send an intern up to the roof to look for smoke signals but we already have one posted at the fax machine! I want to hear you, listeners! Hear you reaching out through the airwaves!”

Present Mic rattled off all of his points of contact, his station number, all of his social media, and even his email and fax number. Hopefully his husband would pay his interns back with a well deserved pizza party after this.

Shouta quickly turned the speakers back on, leaning forward with his elbow on the desk as he closed his eyes and listened, a smile tugging at his lips.

It wasn’t every night that Hizashi played his song for him.

Present Mic was about to lose it. From his station manager sending a parade of interns to his suite to shove memo after threatening memo under the door, to the snarky comments from a certain subset of former fans, to the overwhelming weight of running this show for Shinsou, Present Mic was about to lose it.

“I just think it’s funny that you called me an elitist and now you want my help,” the smug little bastard on the other end of the call said, toying with the very last of Present Mic’s nerves. “If you can’t pick your own music-”

“I’m sorry, not-listener! I think you missed the part of the program that explained what’s happening tonight! And you know what’s happening tonight?! Not you!” It was pretty hard to be a wordsmith when the voice hero could practically feel his blood pressure rising. Byte Sound raised an eyebrow at him from the other side of the glass partition, but he waved her off, signaling for the next caller in the queue. “Get Your Hands Up! You’re on the air, dear listener! What funky fresh beats are you bringing to this salad?”

Maybe he’s used that line already tonight, but between the panic and zero sleep he’s gotten the past two days, he really can’t bring himself to care. “ Oh, hi! Um, I’m a huge fan! I don’t really have a song picked, but I was going to see if my quirk would still work without seeing the little kid this show is for, if that’s okay. ”

Present Mic was intrigued by the young man who had called in. “Your quirk?”

“ It’s called Heartsong. When I look at a person, I can hear their favorite song, even if they haven’t heard it yet. I’m trying to get better at using it, but it doesn’t always work on someone I’ve never met. ”

Present Mic muted himself to squeal in delight. “WOW! I would love that, little listener! What an amazing quirk!”

“ Thanks! I really hope this works, though. Maybe if you tell me enough about him, I can start to hear it. ”

Present Mic hummed, scratching his head. “Well, I can’t tell you a whole lot, I’m afraid. His mom would get pretty mad if his secret identity was exposed.”

Present Mic grinned to himself, finally getting a little vengeance for all of Shouta’s teasing since Eri came to live with them, which admittedly had made his mother henning worse.

“I can tell you that he’s wicked smart. I mean, this kid picks up language like a fish to water. He’s a little shy, at least right now, but I know he has a wicked sense of humor just waiting to come out. And he loves his little sister, she’s his entire world. He absolutely dotes on her. He’s a sweet kid, and... it surprises me sometimes. He’s been through a lot, more than he ever should have, but this kid... He’s pretty amazing.” Present Mic shakes his head, trying to pull himself out of the morose state he’s found himself in. That kind of feeling didn’t belong on the airwaves right now, not tonight. Not for Shinsou. “And he loves cats!”

“ Okay! I can kind of hear something! It’s really faint, but I definitely know it,” the listener hums, then snaps his fingers. “ Flash by Sajou no Hana! It’s really faint, though, and a little distorted. I really can’t be sure if it’s right- ”

“Well, there’s only one way to find out!” Present Mic thanked his lucky stars that this was a song they had the rights to play. His station manager was already taking a huge chunk out of his paycheck to cover the fines he’d already wracked up on the recommendation of his listeners. “Stay on the line with me, my talented listener! I’m going to try my best to snatch you up before every disk jockey in Japan hunts you down!”

His listener did, and they ended up talking for quite a while, Byte Sound pulling songs from the Twitter tag without having to be asked to. The kid was a college student with dreams of being a professional discographer, and he certainly had talent for it. Even if the move to Mustafu would be a bit much for him now, Present Mic had enough industry connections to make sure the kid would be able to quit his unpaid internship at his university, and start working with the music pros.

When he hung up, he got a scathing look from his sidekick, who signed, ‘ If you fire me, I’m leaking That Call. ’

‘ No! No! I would never! ’ Yamada quickly signed back, and it wasn’t just the fear of what would happen if certain snippets of a conversation he had with Shouta while under the influence of an embarrassing quirk got out to the masses. ‘ You’re my ears, Byte, I could never lose you! ’

Byte Sound rolled her eyes, but the little smirk told him she just wanted a little reassurance. She’d gone through a lot of rejection to finally find an agency that would take her on as a sidekick, but their loss was his gain. She had been instrumental in too many stakeouts for him to ever consider letting her go. ‘ Let me meet your son. ’

Present Mic choked on air, brain stuttering over her assumption. ‘ NOT SON! Ward! ’

Byte Sound pulled her lips between her teeth, smiling and nodding tightly. He could hear that disbelieving ‘Mmhhh’ through the soundproof glass. He could never let Shinsou meet Byte. His ward already bullied him enough, but with her bad influence? The sass would be unbearable.

But Byte went back to her duties, counting him down for another caller. He took a quick sip of lemon water and did a few arm stretches, trying to shake out the exhaustion. The live portion of the show would be wrapping up soon, the rest was just a few pre-recorded bits and pre-selected music. Even if he wanted to work through the night on his show like he used to, his brain was already too fried to give his listeners the quality content they deserved.

“Before I take the last caller, I just want to thank all the music lovers who came out and jammed out tonight. I can’t wait to check in with our newest listener to see what’s caught his fancy! Lucky last caller, Put Your Hands Up! You are live and on the air with the Voice Hero himself, Present Mic!” Yamada dragged out his name for effect, hoping it ate up a few more seconds of air time.

“ Lucky, ” a familiar drawl answered, and Yamada covered his face with his hands, realizing how close he had been to getting fired tonight. “ What a wild program you’ve had tonight. I kind of feel inspired by it, ya know? ”

“Aw, Hawkes, don’t make me blush!” Present Mic protested. “The Number Three hero complimenting me is bound to give me a bigger head! It might even get big enough to match my hair!”

“ It’s pretty deserved, ya know. I’ve enjoyed listening to all these people helping this kid out, except for those guys you pissed off on Tweeter, or whatever it is. ”

Present Mic fumbles to find something to say that isn’t a bird joke. That didn’t go over too well when Hawkes broke the top 20 ranking. “I hope you’ve heard a few songs that caught your fancy! I certainly have! I really should make Open Mic Night a regular thing!”

Hawkes huffs a laugh, “ I think you should. Before we do this interview thing, I’ve got a song request for ya. ”

“Well! Far be it for me to tell Hawkes the Winged Hero no! What’ll it be, my friend?”

“ Free Falling by Tom Petty, I know you don’t have to look for it too hard, ” Hawkes teases. Present Mic didn’t, but he would have had it already queued up if someone hadn’t been spiteful enough not to warn him who was on the line. Not that it was her job or anything. “ You know that’s my favorite, but be sure to tell me if the kid likes it too. ”

Present Mic found himself a little taken back by the sincerity that had snuck into the usually blasé hero’s words. He wasn’t going to be Number 2 for just any reason. Even if he didn’t show it much, Hawkes had a genuine desire to help others, more pure than a lot of heroes could claim. “Of course! I’ll be letting everyone know how we did next week, but I guess now that I have your number, you'll be the first to know!"

"I'll hold you to that," Hawkes says with a chuckle, and thankfully stays silent on the line until he hears the beep to confirm that they've moved off the air. "So, who's the kid? You seemed pretty fired up about him, so I know he's not any old randy."

Present Mic groans, realizing that his hero manager was going to have a field day trying to manage everyone else's curiosity in that very answer. "My ward. Was I really that obvious? And Hawkes, I've got to apologize--"

"Nah, I jerked you around a lot to get this set up. I don't really care for the fanfare anyway, but let's just call it even," Hawkes drawls, finally admitting that half of those infuriatingly vague responses were intentional, as he suspected. Even if the Winged Hero didn't care for the pomp and circumstance that came with media, he didn't have to make it harder to work with him. "Heard a bit about him, thanks to a case I've got. Hope he's doing better now."

"A bit," Yamada answers. Better than the way he was in that interrogation room, but nowhere near where he deserved to be. "But I know it'll get better."

"I'll bet on it," Hawkes answers, sighing into the phone. "You sure I can't just take off after that? It's such a nice night, and I know you hate background noises, so I can't exactly stretch my wings and talk at the same time."

The offer was oh so tempting, and he had a feeling Hawkes already knew that. "I don't know, maybe if I find someone else to fill the slot. I'll let my people call your people, you know?"

Hawkes just laughed it off. "Come on! We're squarezies, right?"

"Oh, we're squarezies," Present Mic answered, the memory of every missed call to his agency giving him enough spite to carry on. "But I can't exactly let you slip away so easily now, little bird. Not after you were so hard to catch. But since you're one of the few heroes I like chatting with, we'll keep it short. Half an hour to go through the usual yadda, then we can just chatter til the clock runs out--"

"Oh no, look at that," Hawkes says, full of false disappointment that Present Mic has heard far too many times to be fooled by. "I've got an emergency in, like, 20 minutes. Do you think we should call it quits now or--"

"Fine," Present Mic whined, the irritation fueling him burning out to fumes. "But stop giving me the run around, alright? I'm a hero, I get it, this part of the job sucks, so just work with me. I know I'm not as bad as the news anchor on channel 8."

"Pssh, no one is. I think half the pros she's interviewed have tried to dig up an old shoplifting charge so they could haul her off the air and into a cell for a few days."

Present Mic might be one of them, but after listening to her try to tell him he couldn't possibly be deaf if he was a radio show host, as though she knew anything at all about anything, no one could blame him.

Especially not Shouta, who ended up using an informant to find out about her little trips to a certain select club that she certainly didn't want anyone to know about.

And if the future Number 2 hero's song was the one that Shinsou liked, he'd certainly share that information with him.

And the lyrical translation for the song referenced is below:

I was fascinated by me. The more it becomes ash.
A simple word, dripping, all the gears went crazy. It 's a simple phenomenon. I know my mistake doesn't work.
If you can love your shape, you don't need happiness anymore.
Everyone, he is just getting lost now. I was fascinated by the flashing sound in the distance. The more it becomes ash.
The more blind you are, the more strongly your heart shines. Hey, do you know only your eyes? I wish I could cancel all my mistakes with a simple self-harm.
Looking at me with scarlet eyes. Happiness is no longer necessary.
Everyone, he is just getting lost now. I was fascinated by the flashing sound in the distance. The more it becomes ash.
The voice isn't even reaching you, both eyes are cloudy. I'm still dreaming of you. Oh.
Everyone, he is just getting lost now. I was fascinated by the flashing sound in the distance. The more it becomes ash.

(There is meaning in the song that Heartsong picked, though I wouldn't say that it's Shinsou's favorite.)

Chapter Summary

Aizawa tries to improve his relationship with Shinsou using the book that Ms. Joke provided with startling results, Class 1-A has a meeting to discuss Shinsou, and an emergency occurs in Todoroki's room that requires both Aizawa and Shinsou's expertise.

Trigger Warnings: Description of torture, Child death in a dream, Mention of animal death and subsequent incineration (though it does not occur), Brief mention of torture on a young child (that a character is mistaken about)

And there is a reference to a particular Dadzawa fanfic that will be referenced again later in this one, which will explain a certain new character's naming convention.

Chapter Notes

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa receives a book on caring for feral cats from Ms. Joke, with the advice that using that book will help him connect with Shinsou. Shinsou messaged a group chat containing himself and the students of Class 1-A, and at the end of that chat, asked what punishments were used by Aizawa and Yamada. While Shinsou and Eri were at the 8 Precepts, Eri would always have a serving of jello on days that she had to go to The Chair, though Eri never made that connection. Yamada changed his radio show program to ask for callers to recommend their favorite songs after Aizawa messaged him with the suspicion that Shinsou had never listened to music before.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

When he first met Eri in that hospital room, the day after she had woken up from her feverish coma, she had shivered in fear, curling herself tight into a cocoon on her bed. Immediately, his mind drifted to too many rain soaked kittens he had rescued out of habit, and perhaps the familiar white shade of her hair in combination had pushed him to make his decision. He had long since learned that he couldn't walk away with half-efforts in these situations, not anymore.

Aizawa knew how to act with Eri. He kept himself small, distant, his hands visible and his movements slow. His voice was soft as he introduced himself, as he explained her situation. Hearing that he was a hero was what drew her out, just like setting a warm saucer of milk down in front of a drenched kitten. The blankets fell slowly through their conversation, and he was able to approach little by little. By the end his open arm and side was the cocoon she nested herself in when a nurse startled her by entering the room.

Eri needed a safe place, a haven to return to when the world was too frightening or difficult to understand. He could make himself into that place, easily in spirit, though it was harder in practice. Aizawa had to learn how to make himself soft in ways no one had ever shown him, but Eri never noticed. She never seemed to see him flinch the first few times she played with his hair, or how stiffly he moved to return her embrace the first time she felt confident enough to initiate a hug, rather than ask for it.

But Shinsou was not a kitten. He was hardly a feral cat either. In that interrogation room, and sometimes after, the image of Eri held in Shinsou's arms brought about another comparison entirely.

There was a wildness in his eyes at times, a slow dissection of how to stalk forward, to use his claws, to make a kill. It was something he didn't blame Shinsou for knowing, the boy's survival likely hinged on it more often than not. Shinsou had been a kitten years ago, but now Aizawa saw that he had been made into a predator.

When he was with Eri, there was a softness that belied that. A tigress curled around her cub. The affection between them made it easier to ignore how much more dangerous it would be to approach, especially when the tigress was as wounded and cornered as Shinsou.

Shinsou needed to learn a different level of trust, back to the very concept of the word. He needed to learn that safety and security even existed, before he could learn how to ask for it. There was a level of fear ever present inside Shinsou that was easy to compare to a feral cat, but Aizawa could never forget that Shinsou could be lethal if he wanted to be.

It was Aizawa's job to make sure he was never in a situation where he felt he needed to be.

A situation like this one.

Shinsou was having a nightmare. It was clear in the twist of his mouth, the furrow in his brow. His hand was knotted in his own hair, making it easy to imagine what horrors were playing in his mind, even easier to know how to stop it. Aizawa could either wake the teenager or try to pull his hand away. He had done that plenty of times for Eri, pulling a blanket free from where it had wrapped too tightly around her, pulling her into his arms to cry it out afterwards.

He couldn't do that for Shinsou. For Shinsou, any touch that wasn't Eri's was violence, and in his terrified state, he would react in kind, on instinct. He had the police injury reports in his case to prove it. Aizawa could deflect, he could restrain, but either strategy only ended with another comparison to Chisaki. Even with a good reason, he would be subduing Shinsou all the same.

Aizawa heard it when he opened and shut the desk drawer, a measure he hoped would wake either ward without his interference. Distorted behind closed teeth as it was, that noise was still unmistakable. An imitation of a bark.

Aizawa moved to reach over Shinsou, to touch Eri's leg to wake her. Asking a 5 year old to comfort her former caretaker was cowardly, but logical.

Shinsou woke her instead, gasping with his eyes too wide, fingers running over his face in a manner approaching habit. Seeing if the mask was gone, seeing if his hair was still matted. Then his violet eyes darted around the room, shoulders rising as he spotted Aizawa, but falling when Eri wrapped her arm over his chest, holding him tight. "M' here, Twenny," Eri mumbled, alarmed but not entirely awake.

“Sorry, I’m sorry,” Shinsou answered, apologies spilling out in panic as he moved his hand to cover hers where it lay on her shoulder, brushing it over the length of her arm. Shinsou seemed to freeze, staring as Eri sighed and began to fall back asleep. There was something in that stillness that reminded Aizawa of the way Eri used to freeze up and shrink when she wanted something, something she wasn’t sure she could ask for.

Shinsou needed something, something he couldn’t ask from Eri. Something Aizawa wasn’t sure he could offer, but the pain held behind Shinsou’s clenched jaw made him speak regardless.

“Shinsou,” Aizawa would get better at not being hurt each time he was looked at with that kind of fear. “You’re okay now. It was a bad dream.”

Shinsou’s eyes darted between Aizawa and Eri, and Aizawa felt a bit too hopeful in thinking that Shinsou was considering him as a source of comfort now. Any port in a storm, perhaps. Shinsou moved his arm slowly, careful not to wake Eri as he pulled the trapped limb from beneath her, but he needed it to sign, ‘ E-R-I okay. ’

Aizawa nodded. “She’s been sleeping. No nightmares.”

Shinsou bit his lip, looking at Eri again. Still needing something, some comfort that Aizawa didn’t know how to give. ‘ Arm. ’ Shinsou made a fist after he signed it, shaking his head minutely. ‘ I am sorry. Will sleep. ’

“She will fall back to sleep if she wakes up,” Aizawa tells him, knowing that Shinsou knows that far better than he does, that Shinsou only needs some form of reassurance. Or permission.

It was enough. Shinsou took Eri’s arm and laid it back to her side, before rolling the sleeping child onto her back to expose her other arm. A quicker, more cursory brush of Shinsou’s hand finally let the kid relax, eyes falling closed before he pulled the blanket back over Eri.

Aizawa thought it had been a dream about the torture he went through at the 8 Precepts, one of the many that Sir Nighteye had listed when he asked for him to explain what he saw. He will be held under water by his hair, and if he doesn’t bark quickly enough for the torturer’s liking, he will be forced back under. This repeats 12 times. I believe the water is also treated with a chemical, as the other criminals complain about the smell before they...

‘ I am sorry. Will sleep. ’ Shinsou signs, and though Aizawa doubts he will do anything more than pretend to do so, he nods, keeping his gaze focused on the wall behind his ward.

“It’s fine. You didn’t do anything wrong,” Aizawa answers, realizing the reason Shinsou hasn’t laid back down after. He was waiting for permission again. “Goodnight.”

The kid is pretty good at slowing his breathing down, taking longer breaths and hesitating before he exhales. That much would fool most into believing he’s asleep, but Aizawa knows better. He knows that Shinsou would twitch away from Eri’s arm thrown back over him if he was actually asleep, that he would curl closer to her afterwards.

Aizawa knows he won’t sleep. He doesn’t either, on nights that he wakes up and runs his own hands over Hizashi’s arms, his face, the back of his head. The Nomu didn’t break his arms, it didn’t dig its claws into his scalp, it didn’t crush his skull while Present Mic was pleading for him to stop it, to use his quirk when his quirk was useless against that monster.

He doesn’t know what caused the scars on Shinsou’s arms. The autopsy results on the less fortunate members of the Nomu organization were inconclusive, the best theory being that something had burrowed underneath the skin, tearing the flesh apart in its wake. The result of someone's quirk, but they couldn't be sure what type, whether it was a burrowing creature or a tendril forced under the skin.

That won't be the first question they ask Shinsou, when the time is right. Aizawa wants to ask him what the real name of 'the bad place' is, and with any luck, his network of informants will be familiar with it, enough that the investigation will need little else from Shinsou.

Yamada has another question, one he wanted to ask since he heard Shinsou muttering in his sleep the first night he spent at the dorm. One that leads into another question if Shinsou actually answers it.

Who is '50'? And does Shinsou know that she's dead?

Iida nods as Kirishima and Bakugo enter Yaoyorozu's dorm room, completing the list of expected attendants. "Now that everyone is here--"

"Headphone bitch ain't," Bakugo growls, smirking at him. "You that fucking blind even with your glasses?"

"Jirou has another obligation, but she will be weighing in on the Class 1-A chat," Iida answered, gesturing towards the rest of his peers, who were feeling quite cramped in such a small space. If he wasn't the class president, he too would much prefer to be in his own dorm room, or on his usual morning run. He also thought that meeting in a place that wasn't monitored by cameras was a bit paranoid, but too many had insisted on it.

In all honesty, he would much rather not have this meeting altogether, but the Class 1-A chat had demanded it.

"Now that we are all here, we should discuss our concerns about the message that Shinsou sent, and how we should respond to it," Iida continued, taking note of the expressions he saw as he glanced at each young hero. Some were saddened, others concerned, and others had already jumped to conclusions, anger and betrayal clear on their faces. "And I think it would be best to keep in mind that the way Shinsou communicates is quite vague, and regardless, text messages can be very easy to misinterpret."

"He seemed really worried, though," Sato mumbles, offering an assortment of cinnamon rolls and doughnuts for Kirishima and Bakugo to take. "I mean, he could have just asked right off the bat, but since he took so long--"

"Isn't it kind of weird that he didn't ask, though?" Sero interjects, hand raising as if he were in class. "The way he worded it was like he was specifically trying not to ask a question."

Midoriya startles, and Bakugo looms over him with a glare. "You know all this secret shit, Deku, so start fucking talking."

Midoriya noticeably pales as he starts waving his arms in front of him, a nervous reaction that Bakugo rarely inspires these days. "I really don't know anything! But I've noticed that too. He's messaged me like that on our chat, but I don't know why he does that. It might just be the way that he talks?"

“Does he talk about his feelings toward Aizawa and Present Mic in that chat?” Tokoyami asks, leaning around Shoji’s arm to look at Midoriya.

“We really haven’t talked that much, but he hasn’t mentioned them,” Midoriya answers. “But I really don’t think that they would do something to make him afraid of them.”

“Maybe he’s thinking of doing something he knows they wouldn’t like,” Hagakure says, the long sleeves of her pajamas crossed over her chest. “I mean, you wouldn’t worry about being punished if you weren’t doing anything wrong.”

Kaminari nods, hand cupped around his chin. “He did go to villain school, after a-“

“FUCK OFF!” Bakugo snarls, hands pulling at his own hair. “There isn’t a fucking villain school! Shitsou lied to you dumb fucks and you fucking bought it!”

“Dude, it makes sense!” Kirishima argued. “How could he take us down if he didn’t go to villain school to learn how to fight?”

“Wait, he really went to villain school?” Yaoyorozu asked, muttering to herself, “I thought I just didn’t know a new meme.”

“He did! He told us so,” Ashido confirms, crumbs still present around her mouth despite Yaoyorozu’s miming to tell the acid hero to wipe them away. “Since he was taken to villain school when he was 4, and he’s known Eri for 3 years, he must have been almost a middle schooler when he, um. Graduated, I guess.”

It was unnerving to see Ashido seem to shrink with those words, her usual exuberance disappearing in a flash. “Maybe he’s confused because that villain school was stricter?” Ojiro wonders aloud. “I mean, there are some things we get away with here that would get me in a lot of trouble at my former dojo.”

Bakugo hisses behind his teeth, swallowing a mouthful of doughnut before he speaks. “You forgetting about that Chisaki bastard? If he did shit to the brat, he did shit to the corpse.”

Iida felt now would be the time to offer his thoughts on the matter, judging by the way his peers’ faces had paled at the thought. “My brother did confirm that Shinsou would likely be confused by his new environment. Most wards are told what to expect as consequences to their actions, both as reassurance and to also decrease the likelihood of the ward reacting violently against their assigned hero in a str-“

“Wait, that really happens?!” Hagakure interrupts, hands making imprints on the comforter. “Wards just attack their heroes?”

“Well, not often!” Iida tries to reassure without outright lying. “It happens frequently enough that several policies are in place, and the certification process has become more stringent, but a major deciding factor in whether a hero is assigned to a ward is whether that hero could disarm a ward if that situation occurred. Midnight-sensei is one of the most in-demand heroes for wardship assignments in our region due to her quirk’s versatility.”

“Perhaps Shinsou’s quirk is similar to hers,” Todoroki muses, though he had seemed distracted throughout the meeting thus far. “If he speaks to you, he can force you to go to sleep, and has a resistance to her quirk as a side effect.”

“That’s not his....” Kirishima starts to speak, then cuts himself off, angling away from the outburst building in Bakugo’s vibrating frame.

“WHEN THE FUCK did you find out what his fucking quirk is?! And what fucking is it?! Maybe you should share that shit before the voices in dead eyes’ head tell him to kill!”

“Aizawa-sensei told us not to!” Ashido says, earning a death glare as Bakugo whipped his head to look at her. “Kirishima and I went to elementary school with Shinsou, so we know what his quirk is. And he can’t hurt anyone with it.”

“He could,” Kirishima disagrees, raising his hands in front of his chest as he realizes he’s captured the entire class’ attention. “I don’t think he will, though! And Sensei told us not to tell anyone! Me and Ashido would get expelled if we told you guys!”

“That’s kind of extreme, even for Sensei,” Uraraka comments, glancing at Asui before she sighs. “I know Aizawa-sensei is trying to keep us away from Shinsou, but expulsion seems a little harsh. Is his quirk really that bad?”

“More likely, he’s worried that we will try to make him use it, kero,” Asui says, looking at the rest of the class. “Since his quirk relies on his voice, that would mean forcing Shinsou to speak. Sensei believes we wouldn’t be able to control our curiosity, kero, perhaps for good reason.”

“It is super cool, though,” Ashido says, beaming as she speaks. “It kind of feels like-“

Ashido pouts, collapsing back on the bed with her head landing in Hagakure’s lap. “AUGH! Tsu’s right, it’s just so interesting! I kinda want him to use it on me again to see if-“

“Ashido!”

“To see if it’s changed!” Ashido completes, turning to stick her tongue out at Kirishima. “But yeah, you guys might get freaked out if he used it and you didn’t know about it, so Sensei has a point.”

“Aizawa-sensei is probably more concerned with Shinsou’s mental well-being than our own surprise,” Yaoyorozu states, looking up from the messages she’s been sending to Jirou to keep her up to date on their conversation. “Pressuring someone with mutism to speak can cause them undue stress. And I think Sensei is right to worry that some of us would do that.”

“It’s dangerous for us not to know, though,” Hagakure says, bristling as she notices the looks she receives. “He almost broke Ojiro’s tail, and he didn’t even use his quirk! I don’t know if Shinsou is a nice guy or not, but I think that we should be more careful around him. He could be a villain for all we know, and just using Eri to get into UA. Maybe he even used his quirk on her and Sensei already.”

“Tooru, I don’t think-“

“TOORU?!” Ashido repeats, grinning with wide-eyed at Ojiro, who lashes his tail and looks away.

“I don’t think he’s... Well, he is dangerous, but I don’t think he’s a threat. And I don’t think we should treat him like one until he gives us a reason to,” Ojiro says, still avoiding Ashido’s stare.

“Seriously, we’re training to be pro heroes. If Shinsou freaks us out, then how can we say we deserve to be here?” Kaminari asks, earning a disdainful huff from Hagakure.

“Because he took down Bakugo, Sero, Ochako, and Iida, and almost did the same to Ojiro! Without his quirk! And he went to villain school!” Hagakure seems to shake her head with the way her hair tie moves in the air. “Maybe we shouldn’t just assume he’s here for the right reasons.”

“Likewise, we shouldn’t assume he’s here for the wrong ones,” Yaoyorozu states. “I think we should be more aware that Shinsou could be dangerous, but treating him that way without proof would be cruel of us. He already seems unhappy with how we’ve ignored him on the chat.”

Iida and several other students look to their phones to find several LNE notifications about user handles being changed. Iida has to disguise his laugh with a cough when the newest one appears, listening to Bakugo mutter a string of death threats under his breath. “I believe that brings us to the purpose of this meeting. How should we respond to Shinsou’s message when our situations are so different? Shinsou is not a student at UA, and would not be subject to any academic disciplines, but we do not know what kind of disciplinary structure our teachers plan to utilize at their home.”

“I don’t think they’d be strict,” Midoriya says, drawing more than his fair share of incredulous looks. “You know how Aizawa-sensei is around Eri, but when they’re out of class, it’s kind of... even more like that, you know?”

Todoroki is the only one who nods.

“He can be a little scary too,” Koda quietly adds, his fingers pressed together in front of him. “But I don’t think either of them would do something bad!”

“Jirou says that Present Mic would subject Shinsou to hours of awful music, and Aizawa-sensei would assign lengthy essays,” Yaoyorozu reads, looking up afterwards. “She also says that Present Mic-sensei has already punished Shinsou enough, and she won’t be leaving her room until she’s fixed it, but I haven’t been able to get her to explain.”

“Oh!” Midoriya exclaims, his fist meeting his open palm. “That must be why last night’s show was odd. The last Open Mic Night happened 9 years ago, and even then, it was announced well beforehand. Present Mic has never changed his set playlist so suddenly before, and his interview with Hawkes was later than it was scheduled for unknown reasons-“

“Did he fucking play that Nyan cat song because Shitsou did some stupid shit?” Bakugo asks, oddly devoid of anger.

“Non! It was a beautiful, touching moment, mon cher!” Aoyama says, leaning his elbows onto his knees. “L’amour de la musique va à celui qui ne l’a pas senti!”

“Yeah, That part was great,” Sero says, his smile strained as he looks up from his phone. “So, what? Do we tell Shinsou we don’t know or just tell him what we think will happen?”

“Or should we tell Aizawa-sensei, kero?” Asui asks, staring at Iida. “It appears as though this was a responsibility he was not aware of when he became Shinsou’s caretaker, kero. Perhaps it would be better for us not to interfere more than we need to, kero.”

“That is a very good point, Asui!” Iida remarks, raising his finger. “This is a domestic matter at heart, after all, and none of us are privy to Aizawa-sensei’s personal life enough to properly advise Shinsou in this matter.”

“But, he’ll probably find out about the chat if we do that,” Kirishima adds. “You know he’s all ‘don’t talk to Shinsou,’ so he’s not going to be happy that we went around his back like that.”

“I second that,” Ojiro agrees. “We should keep Aizawa-sensei from finding out we’re talking to Shinsou, for our own sakes.”

More students nod in agreement, and Iida takes that as a group decision to keep Aizawa from knowing about the chat. In truth, he's quite relieved, knowing that he would have to take responsibility for creating it. "Then, we should move to brainstorming our responses. Yaoyorozu has volunteered the use of her whiteboard so that all of our ideas can be recorded and voted on at the conclusion of our meeting."

A decision was reached by the time Shinsou had finished changing all of their usernames in the chat, though Iida noticed that he had taken several pauses, either distracted or perhaps waiting to see if further changes were necessary. Iida had to say he was amused by the results. Shinsou had an...expansive vocabulary.

Iida wanted to see more of it, more of that caustic sense of humor. When they fought, there was something approaching a grin on Shinsou's face in the split second before he swept his legs from under him, a joke he wasn't made privy to until it landed him on his back.

It reminded Iida of the ward that his father had been assigned when he was a young boy. He remembered the rules set in place, quite similar to the ones Aizawa made. He remembered the frozen fear set in that teenager's movements, the way he hardly seemed to move at all, making him wonder if he really had a speed enhancement quirk.

And Iida remembered how those frozen movements thawed over time. How the few interactions they had started drawing smiles from that ward, even compliments on Iida's success in school or quirk training. When the ward left their home, the investigation concluded, Iida's father had thanked him for helping him make the ward feel more comfortable during his stay. That he had been able to remind the ward of better times, though his father didn't explain what he meant by that.

Iida knew that wardships were a model of a hero's duty. Protecting and defending those that needed it. Bringing warm relief to frozen terror.

Iida wanted to do that for Shinsou. He didn't know how, not when he had forgotten how to approach others as casually and warmly as he had when he was a child. Not when Eri had clearly filled that role, and Iida floundered to find what Shinsou would want from him, how he could offer his help besides.

He was made into the unofficial authority on wardship cases for his peers, and as such was expected to guide them when Aizawa offered little advice, perhaps unaware that it was needed more than in Eri's situation.

Iida would do his best to succeed. To bring that smile out in Shinsou more often.

And he had an idea that could be beneficial to everyone involved.

One of the greatest resources available to a feral cat's guardian is having a domesticated cat who has bonded with the guardian. By demonstrating affection to the domestic, the domestic in turn becomes a social bridge for the feral. The feral learns how to interact with a guardian without fear by observing the domestic.

"Twenny! Zawa said the heroes made breakfast for us!" Eri tells Shinsou as he exits the bathroom, changed into the galaxy cat hoodie that Hizashi thought he liked the most out of all of his outfits, judging by the way his eyes kept wandering to it in the interrogation room.

Shinsou's gaze is unreadable, though his slight hesitation is clear proof that the sight strikes something in him. Aizawa just pulls the last few strands into his hold, gathering Eri's hair into a half ponytail. He takes the tie from his mouth to wind it around her hair, making sure the plastic butterfly decoration ends up on top. "That isn't normal," Shinsou groggily states, his new habit of stating something to be corrected if he's wrong.

Feral cats, like any other, crave routine. In a perfect world, each day would look like the last, but out of any change that occurs, it is important to avoid changes in feeding times. Food is one of a cat's most important needs, and your greatest asset in establishing a bond.

"The students don't do it often, but they occasionally make a dorm breakfast on Sundays," Aizawa explains, leaning forward so Eri can begin to brush out his hair, starting with the ends. "I have a few breakfast items stored downstairs, so that you and Eri can eat before we leave at noon every week."

"Zawa makes cereal," Eri says, pulling his hair together into a loose ponytail. "Yama says he can't make other stuff, 'cause he's not allowed."

"That's not a nice thing to point out, Eri," Shinsou scolds, though Aizawa is surprised to find little evidence of fear in his body language. "People don't like hearing others talk about things they can't do."

Shinsou sits on the cot, raking his fingers through his hair, which causes Eri to protest, snagging a tangle in Aizawa's hair as she pulls the comb back a bit too roughly. "Wait! I'm almost finished, Twenny!"

"It's fine, I can--"

"I wanna comb your hair, Twenny," Eri pouts, and immediately Shinsou pulls his hand away. "Your hair is really soft now. I promise I would've combed it before, but now I'm gonna comb it for you all the time, 'cause you always combed mine."

Shinsou glances away, his hand curling into a half fist before it relaxes against his knee. "It's okay, Eri. I probably should have let you do it yourself." Aizawa stiffens at another snag. "You used to be really tender headed when you were little, though."

That seems to remind Eri that Aizawa was also a bit sensitive on his scalp, and she pulls the last few locks into her hand more gently, winding the hair tie a bit too loose to stay in place. Aizawa tightens it when she jumps off of his lap to work on her next victim, standing on the cot behind Shinsou with comb in hand. "You remember a lot of stuff, Twenny. Todo said you were telling the heroes stories about when I was little, and I don't remember some of those."

The slight widening in Shinsou's eyes might be due to the tangle that Eri snags, pulling back hard enough to pull his head back with it, but fear is more likely as he glances at Aizawa. "I didn't tell them much."

"I wanna hear Eri stories too, though!" Eri says, trying to pull Shinsou's hair into a small ponytail as well. "Like how I liked chicken, or sleeping with that book. I don't remember that stuff."

"I can't think of any," Shinsou replies, his voice a bit strained. Aizawa notices his fist knotted tight, his teeth clenching as Eri pulls more hair together on top of his head.

Shinsou probably won't ask her to stop. Aizawa noticed the distress that Eri touching his scars had caused, but Shinsou did nothing to stop it. He seemed incapable of defending himself from whatever Eri wanted from him, something driven by guilt or a lack of his own bodily autonomy. "We don't have any more hair ties, Eri," Aizawa lies, hoping that she forgot about the sizeable collection he started storing in the Safe Room. "You won't be able to keep that hairstyle in place."

Eri frowns, but releases her hold, and Shinsou nearly sags with relief. She doesn't seem to notice, though, combing his hair in opposing directions to return it to its usual wild state.

"You didn't like green food," Shinsou says, glancing up as Eri paused. "Especially jello. You said it was weird."

"I don't like jello," Eri replies, shaking her head. "It is weird! It's jiggly and slimy and gross! The doctors gave me jello a lot before Zawa told them to stop."

"That's good," Shinsou says, putting his phone into his pocket when he notices Eri's feet have shifted closer to it. "I'm glad you don't have to eat it anymore."

Something in Shinsou's tone suggests it isn't just a childish whim he's relieved to know is catered to. Something only Shinsou remembers, that luckily Eri forgot.

When Eri finishes, they exit the Safe Room, and though Aizawa is somewhat relieved to find the dorm still appear to be deserted, he's a bit concerned by the gathering taking place in Yaoyorozu's dorm. 18 students wouldn't cram themselves into a room that could only comfortably contain 6 for no reason, and the commotion last night was a bit beyond Class 1-A's usual Saturday night behavior.

Particularly Kirishima waving to the surveillance camera.

But out of all the things that Shinsou could have told his class, the existence of the surveillance cameras wasn't the worst, he supposed.

Aizawa sucks down a jelly packet after making sure that Shinsou would eat the cinnamon roll Eri handed to him. He realizes a bit too late that the jelly packet would have been more nutritionally sound, but the jolt of sugar seemed to help Shinsou appear more awake.

Hizashi had planned to pick up the wards after breakfast, but he must have slept through his alarm. That was unsurprising, considering how Sundays were his designated rest days, often the only day that he could get more than 4 hours of sleep. How his husband managed to be so energetic, or even function with his work schedule was completely illogical.

The wards would be fine with a few more hours in the Safe Room, being unaware of the difference. Eri usually stuck to him like a burr during the last few hours of his weekend dorm shifts, and he had forgotten to mention the change in plan to Shinsou beforehand. Though Aizawa and Yamada tried to let Shinsou know what to expect, some details tended to get lost along the way. They should probably give him a weekly schedule, once things settled down into a more predictable routine.

Eri decided that she wanted to watch a few episodes of the cartoon that Midoriya showed her, settling herself on his lap as he watched the other screens, waiting for his students to leave Yaoyorozu's room. Shinsou glanced up to watch the show a few times as well, but otherwise seemed to be busy on his phone.

The feral requires an available escape route from social situations, or challenge line interactions.

Many prefer a cocoon to hide in, but all benefit from the ability to survey their surroundings from a vantage point high and distant from the comings and goings of the home. Observation is key to a feral's understanding of its new environment.

Perhaps the surveillance monitors weren't the only way Shinsou could observe his new environment. Messaging the students, as Aizawa suspected he was doing now, would also be a good way for him to become more comfortable in the classroom, learning a bit more about their personalities from a distance afforded by the phone.

Aizawa was still concerned that Class 1-A would overwhelm Shinsou at the first sign of interest from the ward, which he had apparently given in messaging them. He would have to make sure his class was kept occupied for the next few days to make sure they wouldn't have the opportunity to swarm Shinsou.

Luckily, quirkless combat drills were a useful way to do that.

Something about this dorm building made his owner behave strangely. Perhaps it was because they were confined to this small room for hours at a time, perhaps there was someone higher ranked than his owner who was keeping watch over him with more hidden cameras.

27 didn't like it. He had barely begun to read his owner, and his tells suddenly changed. In fact, he seemed to have no tells at all, simply staring at him with that same impassive expression, purposefully made harder to read.

27 did not like that.

He needed to know what his owner was thinking, any twitch in his expression or narrowing of his eyes was more useful now than it ever was before. He needed to know what he thought after seeing 27 so rattled and broken last night.

It had been a bad dream. A familiar one.

It began with Bug. Just Bug and him, standing in the Red Room, screams echoing off the walls as though the Numbers who died in there were admonishing him for letting the heroes know about them, about how they were named. But in a blink, Eri was there, held in Bug's grasp. Bug's smile twisted and darkened, growing feral as the skin on Eri's bare arms began to swell and move.

He was frozen, just watching, straining against the hold of the dream that had captured him as tightly as his own quirk's victim, before Hari grabbed him by the hair, plunging him into the bathtub. Even as no one spoke, the only sounds he heard were screams, but he knew what he needed to do.

He just needed to bark. Bark like Hari wanted him to, to drag that airy laugh out of him and those sick praises of what a good dog he was. Then Eri would be safe, she would be let go, Bug would let her go.

But he couldn't. Each time he tried, his mind was frozen on the fact that Hari shouldn't be here anymore.

He beat Chisaki. He had the tattoos removed. He shouldn't think of Hari, he shouldn't dream of Hari, he was supposed to be free .

He barked, once, and didn't need Hari to tell him it was too slow. He knew.

He knew that they were going to kill Eri for it. Because he failed, he couldn't bark right, he wasn't a good dog and they were going to kill Eri.

Eri's eyes were fading when he looked at her, he wasn't sure how he was able to since he was supposed to be in the bathtub, but he was watching her die when he woke up to a new nightmare.

His owner staring towards him, not quite at him, like he knew. Like he saw what had been going on inside his head, he knew that he didn't protect Eri.

But he gave him permission to check her arms, the only thing that would quiet the buzzing under his skin, the fear steeped inside his mind, making him unable to think of anything else.

27 said he would sleep, but he didn't. He kept his eyes nearly shut, but not shut.

He watched his owner and thought, turning his situation over and over in his mind. Who to play to, how to angle the game, considering more options for his end game. Death by The Miasma was still nearly certain, but not entirely.

27 could try to escape.

He had skills that few did, thanks to The Miasma. As soon as he regained the ability to talk, he could use his quirk to survive. Petty crimes like shoplifting and breaking into warehouses could keep him alive for a while, he could keep himself moving to evade the heroes and criminals alike who would hunt him down. He could become more than a Dog, become a Rat, an ugly and desperate thing, but one that would outlive a Number. He could kill if he needed to. 50 would understand.

But that meant leaving Eri all the same. Eri couldn't survive as a rat, she deserved to be a princess, and though he doubted himself sometimes, he couldn't be certain that she would be safe here with the heroes.

He needed to cling to the child heroes. They had loose lips, and a subtle animosity against their teachers. He could play to that, he could force himself into their group. It hadn't worked nearly as well against the 8 Precept underlings, but a far subtler game worked in his favor against the 8 Expendables.

Dog had rolled on his belly for them, had whined as loudly as he dared when they kicked him. Over and over, until there was a foothold in their conscience that he could use. That was Chisaki's downfall, afterall. He never had a sliver of a conscience, had never understood the concept of the word. He thought that his followers would plunge those needles into Eri's body every night if offered the chance, but 27 learned that they wouldn't if it was their choice. That they could look away because Eri was distant from them, but if he translated that pain through his own body, they were weakened by it.

He had earned enough pity from Nemoto and Deidoro that they answered his questions despite knowing better. Rikiya had beaten so many whimpers of pain from him at that point that he was pretty much 27's friend.

If his owner pitted him against the heroes in a spar, that was all the better. He knew when to whimper and yelp, even better than when to bark.

But now, 27 needed to bark. He hadn't given them enough opportunity to make him whine, but if they dragged out their silence any longer, he would.

Provost Piston: I apologize on behalf of the class for our delayed response, Shinsou. We were discussing the matter in depth as unfortunately, we have little definitive advice to offer. - Iida Tenya Adhesive Strips: No one is Marked for Death™ now and I feel oddly unsettled by that.

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum changed Teen Mom's name to DEAD FUCK

Adhesive Strips: sigh It's not the same.

Palpitation Projector: We have a rule against RP actions, Sero.

Voltage Vermin: Vote to kick.

Genesis: As you are not a student at UA, you wouldn't face academic disciplinary action like we would, but as a reference, Aizawa-sensei is known to utilize logical deceptions to cause psychological stress (for the eventual benefit of our class!), the threat of expulsion, difficult training exercises, and suspension from class as punishment. Present Mic-sensei has not had much opportunity to discipline us, except for a few students who were asked to sing English nursery rhymes in class after doing poorly on an exam and then not paying attention in class afterwards.

Deku: Kacchan you really need to stop this right now.

Deku: I know you think that you're helping but I really don't think you should mention Eri.

Shinny: The next breath you take to say anything at all about Eri will be your fucking last. You don't know SHIT about what she's been through and if you even THINK about Chisaki while you're in the same room as her, I will fillet your hands, each finger separated down to the wrist.

Shinny: Try being a hero after that. Or useful at all, to anyone. Like that League.

Shinny: You know I'm not fucking joking.

"Twenny," Eri called, and 27 realizes that the cartoon she had been watching had been turned off, his owner moving around the room to collect the few items Eri had brought. "Is the phone making you mad?"

"Bakugo is," 27 answered gruffly, drawing in a shaky breath. He didn't mean to let his anger carry through his tone with Eri, she didn't need to know what he sounded like when he was angry. He had never let himself slip like that before. He patted her head as some offering of reassurance, making sure to soften his tone. "Sorry, don't worry about it."

Eri just blinked up at him, then took his hand in hers, holding on to it as they left the Safe Room, trailing behind his owner. Eri waited for a while before she turned to whisper to him, "Bakugo makes me mad sometimes too."

27 considers carrying salt with him to go with the knife. It was a bit cliché, but he could attest to the fact that it was effective, thanks to Memory.

They had made it to the ground floor in blissful silence, 27 relieved to be able to avoid the student heroes in their own compound. Perhaps his owner was trying to avoid them as well, taking one of the service stairwells rather than the main one that the students preferred.

Before his owner reached the last step, Izuku threw open the door, panting from exertion. "Sensei! Don't be mad-"

"I am," his owner deadpanned, making Izuku jolt in panic. But the panic was short lived, and 27 found himself admiring the quick recovery. Judging by the scars on Izuku's hands and arms, he must be aware of the danger he was in to continue on with such a clear warning, but he must have a good reason to do so.

"There's an emergency in Todoroki's room, and we need your help!"

If it weren't for Principal Nezu's extraordinary security measures, this emergency would actually be one of the better ones that Aizawa has attended to for Class 1-A. Right now, he's afraid it will turn into one of the worst.

"How long have you had this cat in your room?" Aizawa asks, knelt in front of the opened floor vent. He pulls at his capture scarf, sending it into the air duct to wave gently in the air, hopefully entrancing the stray to attack it.

"Two months," Todoroki replies, seemingly unaware that he should at least pretend to be ashamed of breaking a dorm rule. "I rescued him."

"It's my fault, Sensei," Midoriya interjects. At least he and Koda are panicked enough to pick up Todoroki's slack. "Todoroki wasn't going to take him, but I told him he had to! Soba was so thin and hungry, and he curled up right next to Todoroki but wouldn't let anyone else touch him, and he has heteroch-"

“The reason that uncaged pets aren’t allowed in the dorm,” Aizawa interrupts, glancing over his shoulder to level a glare at each of his students. “Is due to this exact scenario. There are robots in these vents. They act as pest control.”

Aizawa still doesn’t feel a tug of interest on his scarf, and he’s beginning to give up hope. His students’ stricken faces aren’t any comfort right now, not when there’s a very real possibility that Aizawa will have to drag a cat’s corpse out of the walls before the robots dispose of it.

Even if he’s never met this cat, and he wasn’t particularly emotional about how any body was disposed of after the end of its use, Todoroki deserved the chance to grieve over it properly, and not be haunted by the knowledge that it was promptly incinerated inside the wall next to his bed. That much would drive anyone insane, and Todoroki of all people didn’t need another push.

His heart drops as the echoing yowl rises up, confirming the worst case scenario, until Koda shrieks. “Ghost ?!”

“What?” Aizawa asks, looking to Koda for an explanation as a warning growl rumbles from inside the wall, followed by the sound of claws scraping against metal and the heavy thud of flesh against the ventilation shaft walls.

“H-he says th-there’s a ghost! A d-d-dead b-boy,” Koda translates, his usually high pitched voice even more shrill as he quakes in terror, hands pressed against his jaw.

“That’s impossible, this is a new building,” Aizawa says, waving his hand to dispel that irrational thought. “Out of any place that would be haunted on campus, this is the least likely.”

Despite that, he twists his hold on the capture scarf to cause it to whip a circular motion down its length, to see if it strikes against anything other than the walls.

It does, but the cat doesn’t cry out.

There had to be a logical explanation for that.

The cat hisses, sputtering off into another growl. “H-he told the g-ghost to leave. H-he’s scared!”

Despite himself, Aizawa flinches at the sound of an even louder thunk, the crack of metal striking metal, and one of the robots beeping in alarm. Those things were armed to the teeth with lasers, taser prods, and anything else that Nezu could convince the Support Department to throw on it. But whatever was in the vents disabled it, causing those electronic shrieks that continued on until another metallic crash silenced it.

Aizawa looked to make sure his wards were still in the doorway, at a safe distance just in case whatever was inside that vent wanted to come out. Eri had moved to Koda’s side, staring blankly at the commotion, but Shinsou was nowhere to be found.

“Eri, where is-” Aizawa pauses while Koda screams when he notices Eri, for a second mistaking her white hair as a ghost. “Shinsou?”

Eri’s answer is cut off by the sound of louder thuds and accompanying hisses, the sounds moving along the wall then up towards the ceiling, growing more distant before it cuts off completely.

His personalized chirp identifies Principal Nezu’s text before Aizawa pulls out his phone, hoping that the robot had taken a picture of its attacker so that he would have a clue what he needed to defend the students against before reinforcements arrived. Instead, his words draw confusion, then relief.

Nezu: Please keep your ward out of the ventilation system until the next software update adds his face to the list of neutral parties in the security robots' configurations. Though I do appreciate his efforts to test our security system, I would prefer to remain aware of them beforehand. :3

That face would never cease to unsettle Aizawa. That face always promised a one-on-one meeting in the very near future.

Before he could text Principal Nezu back, Shinsou appeared in the doorway, his arms wrapped around a thrashing lump inside his hoodie. The teenager's cheek bore a scratch mark that was slowly weeping blood, and his forehead had a reddening welt that Aizawa felt particularly guilty looking at.

Judging by the way Shinsou's sleeves were pulled tightly around his hands, those weren't the only injuries that his ward had gained in the two minutes he was unsupervised. And though Shinsou wasn't even flinching against the cat's movements, that was no guarantee that he wasn't being eviscerated by a trapped feral cat.

"Give me the cat," Aizawa ordered, holding out his hands. A particularly nasty scream erupted as Shinsou trapped the animal tighter, trying to work it under his hoodie without allowing it to escape. Aizawa couldn't help but wince at the brief sight of the teenager's stomach, before he wrapped one hand in front of the cat's hindlegs and the other quickly scruffed it, making its movements quiet down though its cries did not.

Once he tucked the wild thing under his arm properly and released its nape, the stray just licked its lips and settled, though its eyes were still locked on Shinsou.

"I'm sorry for Soba's actions, he thought you were a ghost," Todoroki says, bowing low at the waist. "I can't thank you enough for saving him from the robots."

Shinsou just held up a finger. ' One R-O-B-O-T. Evil cat. Not cute. '

Midoriya busied himself by frantically looking through Todoroki's desk and drawers. "Todoroki, where did you put your first aid kit? I thought it was on the desk-"

"We'll take care of it," Aizawa says, pausing from his investigative caresses over the stray's fine cream colored coat. "He has fleas. You'll need to wash your bedding and clothes with hot water and buy medication to treat it. If you haven't taken him to a vet, do so within the week. He needs regular vaccinations and to be tested for diseases."

Todoroki snaps his head up at him, eyes widened in surprise. "I...can keep him?"

Aizawa turns the cat's face towards him, earning a slow blink from its mismatched blue and yellow eyes. "As long as I continue to be unaware of his existence, it's fine." He holds the cat out for Todoroki to take, and his student pulls the cat into the left side of his chest tenderly, removing any doubt that Aizawa had in his mind. "Do not let anyone know-"

"Ack! Okay, okay!" Midoriya hisses, one hand waving in the air as a distraction from pain, the other held in Shinsou's grasp, middle finger bent back just a bit beyond its limit. "I'm sorry, can you let me-"

His ward released Midoriya before Aizawa had to intervene, glaring at the student before he realized that Aizawa was watching, stiffly signing, ' I am sorry. '

"It's fine," Aizawa reassured, taking his turn to glare at Midoriya. "I said we would take care of it." Because Shinsou would react that way to being touched.

Midoriya shook his hand back and forth, gritting his teeth. It was his own fault for reaching out with his more damaged hand. Shinsou's hold was punitive, but when used against that hand, he might have dislocated the finger without meaning to. "Sorry, those scratches just looked really painful."

Shinsou glances at Eri, who luckily has kept her face hidden against Koda's jeans once she recognized a cat was in the room, and presses his sleeve against the scratches on his cheek. He was trying to hide the evidence of blood from Eri, which was likely Midoriya's goal as well, judging by the tissue that was laying on the ground between them.

Eri's fear of blood was certainly going to complicate matters.

Aizawa was able to pry Eri away from Koda by offering her his shoulder to hide her face against, submitting himself to carrying her back to their dorm despite the protest from his aching back. "Ask Toshinori to help you seal up that vent, but if the cat escapes again, I'm confiscating it."

Todoroki nods, but then walks forward and slowly puts his hand on Shinsou's shoulder, ignoring his full-body flinch when he does so. "You should come back to see Soba. He needs to thank you properly."

Shinsou gives him a withering stare, glaring down at the cat only to elicit a hiss. ' S-U-S-H-I good. S-O-B-A evil. '

At least he liked Sushi.

And Sushi was not available. Neither was Emi.

Perfect.

Aizawa frowned to himself, pulling the first aid kit from under the bathroom sink. He would have liked to have some backup in case it turned sour, but at the same time, he didn't want to disturb those deafening snores echoing through the dorm from their bedroom. Hizashi needed his rest day, and Aizawa wanted to avoid the scolding that was sure to come when his husband saw the state his ward was in.

He might be worrying over nothing. Perhaps Shinsou would be able to clean up his own wounds, and they could go on about the day as he planned to. Demonstrating the social bridge, speaking more than usual so that Shinsou could get used to his voice. Serving them food instead of Hizashi to deepen their tentative bond. Maslow's hierarchy existed for a reason, and Hizashi did have a better relationship with Shinsou, so perhaps the book that Emi gave him wasn't completely without merit.

When he set out the supplies from the kit onto the kitchen counter, Shinsou stared blankly at them. That wasn't a good sign, but he didn't want to give in quite yet. It wasn't until Aizawa turned away to look around pointlessly in the kitchen that he heard Shinsou pick up and use the spray bottle, followed quickly by a hiss. Aizawa turned to confirm that Shinsou had sprayed the sanitizer directly onto the scratches covering his hand, and was now frowning at the result.

Shinsou certainly wouldn't be the first teenager that Aizawa would have to teach the basics of first aid to.

“Here,” Aizawa said, putting his hand out to take the bottle back from Shinsou. The ward glanced back at Eri after he handed it to him. She was hard at work on the purposefully distracting task of putting stickers on Yamada’s graded quizzes, sitting at the kotatsu.

Shinsou seemed a bit more relaxed at the sight, turning back to Aizawa with the blank expression that the hero preferred over fear.

Aizawa picked up a cotton ball with tweezers, and sprayed it twice. “This spray is an antiseptic, and though it stings, it won’t hurt as much if you avoid direct contact.” When he glanced at Shinsou, adjusting his hold on the tweezers to hand them off with little risk of skin contact, he instead was surprised to see the teenager moving his hand closer, pushing the sleeve above his wrist to show the criss-crossed scratches and bites on the back of his hand.

It wasn’t exactly a touch, but it was a surprising invitation nonetheless.

Aizawa’s hands moved with a confidence he didn’t truly feel, waiting for Shinsou to react. For him to flinch away, for his eyes to go wide or his shoulders to tense, but none of that happened. Shinsou just stared at him, watching his hands, but also glancing toward his face in an almost inquisitive manner. Aizawa was curious himself, but he waits until he’s taken care of both of Shinsou’s hands before he asks, preparing a new cotton ball for the injuries on his face. “Is this the first time someone hasn’t healed you with their quirk?”

The corner of Shinsou’s mouth pulls down, but in a flash it’s gone, like so many of his tells and expressions. He seemed to only be truly expressive with Eri, though the flashes seem to hold a bit longer with the students. ‘C-H-I-S-A-K-I. Not always. Only bad. Not face.’ His hand hovers over his mouth, too long for it to be a sign.

“Mask?” Aizawa asks, stopping to sign the word. Shinsou nods, then repeats it for himself.

‘H-A-R-I. Useless to do.’

Aizawa focuses on his breathing, unwilling to let knowing why the scars on his nose and cheek were so deep to unsettle him. That little yakuza bastard targeted the mask to make those scars, and Chisaki thought it was useless to heal the wounds afterwards. Had even told Shinsou that.

He walks around the kitchen counter to crouch down in front of Shinsou, who lifts his hoodie up to his chest. The cat certainly made a mess of the kid’s stomach, but luckily nothing was too deep.

Those circular scars still unnerve him. Aizawa has developed a strong stomach over his career, and unfortunately an imagination to go with it. Though these scars were only lopsided circles, they had the same grooves at the edges that the ones on Shinsou’s arms did. This set of wounds didn’t have length, they implied depth.

He asks despite his better judgement. “Were you healed by a quirk before the 8 Precepts?”

There’s the flinch. Shinsou’s right hand tightens in the folds of his shirt. If Aizawa looks up, he knows what he’ll see on the kid’s face, so he doesn’t. He just focuses on cleaning up the dried blood, trying to avoid thinking about the wounds those scars must have been before they were healed.

His question wasn’t really a question he needed to have answered. If the kid hadn’t been quirk healed, he would have died from those injuries, after something burrowed inside his abdomen to tear at his arteries and organs. He doesn’t want to imagine what it must have felt like, doesn’t like knowing that Shinsou could have been as young as 4 years old when it happened.

Aizawa sucks in a breath and closes his eyes, returning to the first aid kit if only to distract himself by wondering if he should use an ointment that prevents scarring. It doesn't help.

‘ Yes. ’

Aizawa doesn't expect to see that, barely catches the movement of Shinsou's hands out of the corner of his eye. Shinsou tucks his hands under his arms afterwards, a clear sign that he doesn't want to continue this conversation, and he stares at Eri, likely finding some comfort in the sight of her picking at her sticker sheet.

It wasn't exactly new information, and it was useless without knowing more about the quirk, how it worked and who had it, but it was the first piece of information about the Nomu Organization to come from Shinsou. Willingly.

Naomasa had Shinsou for a month, and couldn't get a single word from him. Aizawa and Yamada hadn't even had Shinsou for a full week, and they had gotten this much.

Even if Shinsou begins to flinch again when he tries to apply the ointment, Aizawa isn't concerned. As that damn book put it, ‘ After the moment is over, allow it to end on good terms. Don't pursue more than what your feral can give in that moment. Simply allow them the space to recover, and thank them for the effort they made. ’

He watches Shinsou apply the ointment himself, and watches him secure the gauze pads with tape. The urge to take over rises in him each time Shinsou glares at the tape when it tangles and sticks to itself, but he lets it pass.

Shinsou made an effort, and he was grateful.

Chapter End Notes

Soba, Todoroki's cat, is a reference to an amazing Dadzawa fic that I hope all of you are familiar with. It is not at all a reference to hotandcoldsoba, the writer of The Last Resort!!! I just really couldn't think of a better name for Todoroki's cat, because nothing else would be more in character.

Chapter Summary

27 doesn't know why his owner has begun to act differently after returning to their dorm, but he doesn't like it. Eri isn't sure if she likes Twenny having friends, or if she's having a good day today.

Chapter Notes

Previously on The Wards of UA: Shinsou got scratched by Todoroki's cat when rescuing it from the ventilation system, and afterwards Aizawa used a sanitizing spray before showing Shinsou how to treat those injuries. Shinsou was also struck by the capture scarf when Aizawa noticed that something else was in the ventilation shaft and was unaware that it was Shinsou. In the Class 1-A chat, Bakugo tried to make Shinsou send a message with a question, and mentioned Eri not being able to say Chisaki's name, which resulted in Shinsou threatening to mutilate Bakugo's hands. Todoroki is allowed to keep his cat, Soba, as long as no one else knows about him according to Aizawa's instructions. In one of the first chapters, Aizawa guided Shinsou through a breathing exercise when he was having a panic attack after attempting to burn off Nemoto's tattoo. Shinsou changed Shoji's username to "Heroic Teratoma," which is a cancerous growth similar to Shoji's quirk. Shinsou's mother moved to France 6 years after she sold Shinsou, and her last known location was in France.

27's owner continued to act oddly throughout the day.

Even after 27 was punished, though 27 could scarcely call it that with how little the spray hurt using a cotton ball, his owner would ramble pointlessly about anything that caught his eye. He didn't even seem comfortable doing it. As soon as he would comment on the cartoon they were watching, that lazy slouch would stiffen up a bit, and sometimes his hand would rub the back of his neck, or twist the ends of his hair. Obvious tells like that didn't suit what he knew about his owner, and the sight of it unnerved 27.

Eri seemed a bit confused about it as well, her head tilting to the side when he went through each paper she had decorated, reading the name off the top with a mixture of 'Good choice,' or 'I like that sticker,' as praise. She looked back and forth between 27 and his owner, as though she wanted to question it, but then she seemed to figure out something that 27 couldn't, eyes widening before she asked his owner if he would read a story to her.

His owner hesitated before he agreed, saying that he would change his clothes while she picked a few books. When he returned, he was wearing a black long sleeved shirt with a V-cut collar. It wasn't that different from what he usually wore, but somehow the shirt and haphazard ponytail made the man seem smaller, in a way 27 couldn't really understand. The reading glasses he put on when he picked up Eri's first book out of the stack magnified that effect.

Even if his owner didn't seem to have difficulty seeing things, wearing those glasses implied a weakness in vision. Without the white scarf or tight collar of his usual jumpsuit, his neck was left completely unprotected, and his hairstyle brought more attention to that.

Was his owner intentionally trying to make himself appear vulnerable?

Was this a test? Did his owner want to see if 27 harbored enough animosity towards his situation that he would attack at the smallest chance? Did he want to see how long 27 stared at his neck, as though he could read his mind to see if 27 imagined his own hands around it, or a blade pressed against it?

It must be a power play. Showing 27 that he was such a small threat to him when he couldn't use his quirk that his owner could let his guard down. An odd strategy, but 27 was beginning to accept that his owner was a bit odd himself.

27 played to it. He watched the show as long as he could stand to feign interest, then pulled up the monster game, scrolling idly through the ones Eri had caught for him. There was a monster that popped up nearby, but 27 didn't have any more capturing balls to throw at it, not after he wasted them all last night on a thin cat monster that kept escaping from him. He shouldn't have, but the monster had purple eyes with white irises, just like he did, and that fascinated him to the point of being reckless.

Eri had told him that Mirio knows places that would restock those capture balls, but that wouldn't help him. 27 didn't have anything to trade for that information, and Eri didn't seem to have it herself. The only thing 27 could offer Mirio was the one thing he never would, and Eri was far too important to even consider the thought. Hopefully she wouldn't be too upset when she wouldn't get to play this game anymore.

27 wished he could be dismissed to his room, or that this phone also had access to the Internet. He wanted to research how to improve Eri's hand-eye coordination, if that was possible at this point, and re-check her other benchmarks. His books had been written over 20 years ago, and may have contained outdated information. There might be other books that were a bit closer to Eri's situation, things he could do to keep her from being so upset by the sight of cats or blood.

Or help her say Chisaki's name.

27 knew he shouldn't let what Bakugo said affect him, not when that loudmouthed bastard didn't know anything about what she had lived through. Ignorant as they were, his words struck a nerve. Eri's inability to say Chisaki's name was normal at the 8 Precepts, but it clearly wasn't here. Chisaki couldn't hurt her anymore, but she might have formed a new superstition thinking that his name would conjure him out of his prison cell. 27 wouldn't put it past her.

27 realized he was counting again, first the monsters he had, then the rows. There were only three columns, he couldn't count that. The buzzing beneath his skin rose to his skull, and he knew if he let it sit there, the feeling would only intensify until his body moved on its own to find some relief, jerking him to stand or pace around pointlessly so that he could count each lap he made.

Eri worried when he did that, and he didn't want to find out what his owner would think, what he would do. That half-punishment certainly wasn't the worst he could do to 27, despite how bizarrely defenseless he looked with his glasses on the tip of his nose, Eri cuddled comfortably against his chest.

He doesn't want to see that. He doesn't even want to hear his owner's soft voice, a dangerous feeling rising in his throat like bile, threatening to show on his face. It's a small mercy that Chisaki had never done something like that. If he had ever managed to make Eri seem as happy and content as she was now, 27 would have been killed for doing something reckless, a risk he still faces if he doesn't distract himself soon.

Luckily, there are more messages in the Class 1-A chat. Perhaps they realized Bakugo's amateur bluff was just that, and they were mocking him for it now.

Voltage Vermin: Can we have some cleansing memes in here?

Adhesive Stripper: @Kaminari There are no memes pure enough to save this chat. We should just burn it down and start a new one.

Voltage Vermin: If we do a bump chain, the messages will go away, and only the painful memories will remain

Voltage Vermin: bump

Deku: @Shinsou Kacchan is sorry, even if he won't tell you. Are you okay?

Todo: Iida don't interact: Soba is very sorry as well. I have pictures as proof.

Voltage Vermin: Todoroki that's not how it works, but I'm still proud of you for trying Provost Piston: Who is Soba? And what did they do to Shinsou? Did something happen at the dorm?

Deku: No it's fine! I can see how it's kind of confusing, and I don't mind if you'd rather call me Izuku too!

Adhesive Stripper: Oh god when Ashido sees this

Darkened Overcast: Don't speak that evil into being.

Todo: No one. Don't worry about it. Forget.

Adhesive Stripper: Todoroki is casting a spell. ~ Go to sleep, Iida~

Voltage Vermin: These are not the droids you're looking for.

Provost Piston: Shinsou was ATTACKED to the point of BLEEDING by this Soba person! Why are you hiding this villain?!?

Shinny: I'm insulted by the association.

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum: SOBA IS A FUCKING CAT DUMBASS. @SHITSOU HE SHOULD HAVE RIPPED OUT YOUR FUCKING THROAT

Himbro: @Shinbro uhhh What do you mean by that?

Provost Piston: A cat? Is this cat in the dorm?

Voltage Vermin: A cat? In this dorm? It's more likely than you think. ;)

Shinny: Explain the difference between criminal and villain. It's been bothering me.

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum: @PRES DUMBFUCK THE CAT'S BEEN IN THAT ICY HOT FUCKER'S ROOM FOR MONTHS. @SHITSOU SHUT THE FUCK UP

Provost Piston: Though both criminals and villains commit crimes, villains tend to do so to propagate a broader philosophy, either their own or the unifying belief of their organization. They also tend to wear costumes as a symbol, or as a mockery of a heroes. Criminals are classified more broadly as people who commit crimes, a subset being villains, but by and large they commit crimes for reasons unrelated to a personal philosophy, be it crimes of passion or desperation. Your question is a good one, as the boundaries are not often clear cut. - Iida Tenya

Shinny: I see.

Sweetened Steroid: Midoriya must be rubbing off on Iida.

Voltage Vermin: They didn't cover that at villain school?

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum: SHUT THE FUCK UP KAMINARI

Shinny: I wasn't a good student.

Voltage Vermin: I feel that.

More Than 33 Vertebrae: Did you do well in combat training?

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum: FUCK OFF OJIRO

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum: @SHITSOU YOU GOT YOUR INFO NOW YOU HAVE TO ANSWER MY QUESTION

Shinny: I answered Bolt's.

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum: IT WAS A FUCKING STUPID QUESTION

Voltage Vermin: :(

Deku: Since Iida answered Shinsou's question, he should get to ask his own. That's only fair, Kacchan.

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum: DEKU. FUCK. OFF.

Shinny: That's true. Zappy, you owe me.

Voltage Vermin: A Kaminari always pays their debts.

Adhesive Stripper: I don't like that reference.

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum: PRES DOESN'T HAVE SHIT TO ASK. WHAT'S YOUR FUCKING QUIRK?

Adhesive Stripper: Oh god please no

Voltage Vermin: VOTE TO KICK BAKUGO

Todo: Kick

Kakashi: Kick

Shinny: Kick. In the mouth, preferably. Teeth break easier than you'd think.

Adhesive Stripper: I don't like how you said that.

Adhesive Stripper: Kind of like you know from experience.

Shinny: Never said I didn't

Adhesive Stripper: ooooookay

Voltage Vermin: Sero has one (1) fear. It's Shinsou's vibe rn

Provost Piston: I would like to be clear in that I don't believe this question game should be seen as a clear reflection of how interpersonal relationships are modeled, and that you, Shinsou, should not be under the impression that friendships are merely an even exchange of any chosen currency. As Yaoyorozu has said, you should not feel pressured to answer a question that you do not wish to answer, and none of we HEROES IN TRAINING will be disappointed should you deign not to answer our questions. - Iida Tenya

Adhesive Stripper: Iida really wrote out a whole Terms and Conditions.

Shinny: Either your engine is stalling or you are.

Voltage Vermin: OOOOO BURN UNIT TO IIDA'S ROOM WEEE WOO WEE WOOO

Himbro: Bakugo liked thA

Voltage Vermin: SNIPED

Theocrat Thermonuclear Tantrum: SHUT UP

Adhesive Stripper: Bakugo is like tsun tsun tsun tsun tsun tsundere.

Adhesive Stripper: Once every three months, we see the dere.

Voltage Vermin: Unless he sees his shadow, then it's 6 more weeks of tsun.

Blackened Overcast: I find that hard to believe.

Voltage Vermin: COME TO BAKUSQUAD!!! You'll see it!

Adhesive Stripper: It's the 9th wonder of the world. You feel so blessed to witness it. Like watching a baby deer learn to walk.

Himbro: awww I love those videos!

Provost Piston: You can select any of these questions to answer: 1. What is your favorite food? 2. What can any of us do to help you adjust to your new situation? 3. Would you like to train with us in hand to hand combat? 4. When is your birthday? 5. What is your favorite 'Eri story'? - Iida Tenya Voltage Vermin: I wish we could pick just one question to answer :(

Voltage Vermin: POP QUIZ!

Blackened Overcast: That's not surprising, coming from you Kaminari.

Voltage Vermin: @Shinsou can you use your villain training to give me the answers for Mic-sensei's homework?

Deku: KAMINARI NO

Voltage Vermin: KAMINARI YES

While 27 was still considering which was the safest to question to answer, the phone's screen went black and it vibrated in his hand, the logo fading over it and then back out.

The buttons weren't turning it back on.

Did he break it?

27 glanced back at his owner, who was still reading to Eri. The phone might not be in his line of sight, for now he hadn't noticed, but he would. The next time Yamada took it from him, he'd know. He'd find out that he'd broken this phone, this expensive device that was used for the only job he'd been given so far, and he wasn't even using it for that job. He was just using it for his own purposes.

He broke the phone, and it was probably worth more than he was.

What was he even worth now? 112,000 yen when he was four years old, untrained but full of potential. 28 million after 7 years of training, and a quirk that Chisaki needed to control Eri.

He didn't have his quirk anymore. He couldn't use it. He was worth less than 112,000 yen, he knew that at least, but how little was he worth now? What had his owner paid for him? Did the information he had about The Miasma make him more valuable? What did his owner pay to get it? How much was he worth now?

How much did giving away 10's existence decrease his value?

He thought it was harmless to give that much away. Thought that they must already know, after he didn't know how to use the spray correctly. He only connected the dots for his owner, making sure to answer in a way that wasn't really useful. They didn't know anything about what 10 looks like, how his quirk worked. Just that 10's quirk was used on him.

But he gave it away for free, and now he wasn't as valuable. He would be worthless if he kept doing that, letting things slip out. He would be taken away from Eri, and disposed of.

He doesn't even hear his owner's words anymore, he doesn't feel that angry buzzing under his skin, he's too numb to anything other than the fear that sets into his bones. He wanted to test them, he wanted to see what they'd do to him, but not like this, not unless it was on his terms. He broke the phone.

"Shinsou? Is there something wrong?" his owner asks, sitting far closer than he should be, Eri still pressing herself against his chest though her eyes are turned to 27.

He tries to hide the evidence, even if he knows it's futile, trying to put the phone into the pocket in his hoodie, but his hands are shaking too much and it only draws Eri's attention to it. "Is your phone dead, Twenny?"

His gaze snaps back to her. Eri, how could you?

"Shinsou, it's alright. The phone turns off when it runs out of battery," his owner says, his hand held out to take the phone, before he pulls it back, another hesitation that doesn't suit the man he knew only a few days ago. "Eri, can you show Shinsou how to charge his phone?"

"Yup! Don't worry, Twenny! It'll come back on really fast, so you can keep talking to your friends!" Eri reassures, jumping off of his owner's lap to pull a cable out from under the side table on the right side of the couch. "You just put this thingy inside of it and it starts charging up again!"

27's hands were still shaking as he put it into the slot that Eri pointed out to him, but when the phone buzzed and flashed its logo again, the tightness in his chest finally relaxed. He hadn't broken it, at least not yet. He needed to be more careful.

"Sorry, we should have explained that beforehand," his owner says, glancing away with a hand on the back of his neck.

That didn't make sense.

“The phone requires electricity to work, and it’s stored in the battery inside of it. When the battery runs out of electricity, it powers off, but that doesn’t damage the phone.”

His owner apologized to him.

“Your phone is very fall resistant, so if it’s dropped, it shouldn’t be damaged either. If it’s dropped in water and doesn’t turn on afterwards, there’s ways that Hizashi and I can fix it before we have to take it to a repair shop. Rice works most of the time, but I know from experience that it’s not effective against quirk sludge.”

His owner shouldn’t have to. He shouldn’t feel the need to. He owned 27, he owed him nothing, certainly not an apology, not over something so small and inconsequential. Something that 27 had blown out of proportion, nearly falling out of his head because he was too stupid to know how a phone worked. And instead of mocking him for it, his owner was explaining it with that same even tone that was meant for Eri.

27 shook his head, still feeling too numb to the world after it had shifted so drastically around him. Nothing made sense anymore. His owner wasn’t acting like his owner, something had changed in him and it made no sense.

“I’ll be in the kitchen, but let me know if you need anything. Eri, can you bring Shinsou a glass of water?”

His owner knew he wouldn’t drink it if Eri didn’t give it to him.

27 thought he knew the game, but the game wasn’t like this. Chisaki wouldn’t have noticed, and if he did, he would have used that vulnerability against him.

Chisaki wouldn’t have changed so drastically in the course of a few days.

Chisaki would probably have taken him apart, starting from each fingertip down to his shoulders, stopping at each joint to hear him scream and leave him there for a while if 27 had ever broken something of his.

27 had been owned by a lot of people, but his owner was the most dangerous out of all of them. Too observant, too unpredictable. Too close to Eri for half of his strategies to work.

27 was a fool to think his owner was ever defenseless.

His owner was the most frightening person that ever had claim to him.

After his owner dismissed him to his room, 27 set to work. He finally had access to the Internet, and all the information it gave away for free.

27 really likes the Internet. With just a few minutes of research, he has several articles that explain that Eri is actually on track or advanced on her benchmarks, and several more websites dedicated to coping strategies for traumatized children.

Touch is important, it can reassure traumatized children. He's glad that he no longer flinches when Eri touches him, like he used to before he trained himself out of the habit. It might have kept her from being more traumatized.

Acting calm, maintaining routines - those are also things that he's already done, but maybe he should keep a better schedule for her studies rather than letting her do whatever she feels like doing during class.

Help the child enjoy themselves - maybe he shouldn't, then. Maybe the routine of going to school and going to the dorm was enough for her.

'Help the child with breathing exercises.'

27 freezes at those words. He hasn't done that. He's never thought about doing it, he's never noticed that Eri might have trouble breathing. That she might feel like there's no air to breathe, she might have felt that strange panic that comes over him sometimes.

He's never done what his owner did for him, for Eri.

Did his owner think he was traumatized? He hardly had any tells, and 27 had thought that was because he was just that skilled, hiding himself and his intentions even better than Chisaki without having a mask to hide behind. But that was because his owner was so unnaturally calm.

Even when Eri wasn't in the room. Even when it was just 27. He acted that way towards 27.

Acting calm, routines, breathing exercises, help the child enjoy themselves.

His owner said he was allowed to watch the movie. 27 was allowed to read books, Yamada taught him things that he wanted to learn, he was allowed to have the phone, and they hardly ever took it from him.

His owner and Yamada are treating him like he's traumatized.

But he's not. He's not a child, he's not traumatized. Eri is traumatized. Eri wasn't meant to go through what she had to, she wasn't meant to be dragged to The Chair, to be hurt day after day, year after year, isolated and trapped in that cold, concrete room. Eri can't say Chisaki's name because of that, because it's a way of 'coping' and even if it's an odd way, that's normal. Traumatized children cope in their own ways.

He's not traumatized, he's broken. He's not Eri, he's not anything like Eri. He's never been anything like Eri. Eri was a child, and he was a Number, he was a Dog. He's not sure what he is now, but he's never been a child like Eri. He's never been a person.

27 closes the Internet, trying to sort through this odd fog that's flooded his mind. He can't wrap his head around this, he can only hope that he's wrong. That they haven't noticed, that they only think he's odd. That they don't know how broken he is, how worthless that makes him, like some clients that would turn away Numbers who had passed 5 rounds with Bug and shook too much. Too defective, even with a discount, and if that happened too many times they would be disposed of before they could waste The Miasma's resources any further.

He should probably stop ignoring Engine X at this point. Not only will the distraction clear his head, but as the leader of the underlings, Motorhead was probably closer to his owner. He could lash out, he could secretly be a right hand, and 27 had too many of those to concern himself with already.

Stinky Boiii changed their name to King Explosion Murder.

King Explosion Murder: THE FUCKING CORPSE CAME UP WITH A BETTER NAME
FUCKING HALF N HALF BASTARD

Soba Boiii: It was very appropriate for you.

King Explosion Murder: DIE.

Provost Piston: You can ignore my questions, Shinsou. I apologize for placing pressure on you to answer. - Iida Tenya

Pure Boiii: Todoroki, has Soba been behaving aggressively or avoiding water? I don't want to be rude or say that Soba is mean at all, because he's not, but maybe you should have taken him to a vet because he might be sick and now Shinsou might be sick too? I'm sorry!

Ya Good Boiii: Holy shit Shinsou has rabies.

Pure Boiii: NO I DIDN'T MEAN THAT

King Explosion Murder: DUMB FUCK ICY HOT I'M COMING FOR THAT FLEA RIDDEN BASTARD

Mighty Boiii: No! Soba doesn't have rabies!

Sweet Boiii: Cat scratches can get infected though. @Shinsou, are you okay?

Quiet Boiii: Is Bakugo going to kill Todoroki's cat because he wants to kill Shinsou himself, or....

Ya Good Boiii: Shoji we've talked about this. ~Let them work it out~

King Explosion Murder: FUCK OFF I DON'T GIVE A SHIT ABOUT SHITSOU

Ya Good Boiii: Oof, so close to dere.

King Explosion Murder: FUCK OFF DUMB FUCK. YOU'RE FAILING CALC NOW, DEAL WITH IT.

Ya Good Boiii: MOM NO I'M SORRY

Crimson Boiii: @Todobroki just let me in? The ice is so not good for the door bro

Soba Boiii: No.

Palpitation Projector: Girls are back. Looks like a whole lot of stupid went on without us.

Ashi: i swear to fuck if another one of you hurts shinny i will go f e r a l .

Sparky Boiii: ashido pls. Ur doin me a frighten.

Ashi: THAT DOOR IS GOING DOOOOOWWN

King Explosion Murder: FUCK YES

Crimson Boiii: nO

Genesis: I'm not making another one.

Mysterieux Boiii: The phone died. Don't break the door.

Ashi: SHINNYYYYYYYYYYY

Crimson Boiii: @Yaoyorozu not even a little bit? Please?

Ashi: ARE YOU OKAY???????

Genesis: Fine. But someone needs to order pizza. I need a lot of carbohydrates.

Sweet Boiii: Can do! Also, me and All Might are making cupcakes. @Shinsou do you like carrot cake? All Might thinks you do?

Mysterieux Boiii: The cat didn't hurt me. And I've never had carrot cake.

Mighty Boiii: But Aizawa-sensei made sure to put sanitizer on it, right? Maybe that's a dumb question, as an underground hero Sensei has a lot of training on first aid techniques, so of course he would know to do so, but it seems that sometimes he doesn't utilize those techniques on himself or allow for proper recovery, but I'm sure he would for yo Mysterieux Boiii: He did.

Mysterieux Boiii: That was not

Sparky Boiii: SNIPER FIRE GET YOUR HEAD DOWN

Slappy Tail Boiii: Who sniped Shinsou? He's not at the dorm.

Palpitation Projector: @Kirishima where's your man?

Crimson Boiii: It wasn't Bakugo!

Mysterieux Boiii: My room doesn't have a window, and even if the sniper had a quirk to line up the target, the walls seem to be too thick to risk the shot. The only time I'm at risk is on campus, and I know where a sniper would set up.

Ya Good Boiii: Holy shit, please play Overwatch with me.

Ya Good Boiii: My SR needs you.

InvisiCutie: Why do you know that? Have you shot people????

Mysterieux Boiii: Training. And not really.

Ya Good Boiii: um how do you not really shoot someone????

Mysterieux Boiii: I have never shot someone.

Ya Good Boiii: why does that sound more suspicious????????

Ya Good Boiii: Hello????

Sparky Boiii: He's lining up his shot calm down.

Slappy Tail Boiii: Will we have weapons training at UA?

Provost Piston: Yes, beginning next year, though guns will not be covered or offered as an option to integrate into our hero costume unless a formal request form is filed, and none of us have quirks that would offer proper reasoning for it to be approved.

Ya Good Boiii: Unrelated but where's the safe room? Also Kiribro hold me? Like really tight with your whole body? And use your quirk while you're doing it?

Crimson Boiii: Sure! It's not gonna be super comfy tho!

Ashi: gaaaaaaAAAAAAAAAYYYYYYY

Mysterieux Boiii: 1. I don't know, but I dislike oatmeal. 2. I don't know, and I'd prefer if you didn't try. 3. Sure. 4. I don't know. 5. I can't think of one that you would like to know.

Provost Piston: Oh! You didn't have to answer all of them, Shinsou! I apologize for making you think that you had to, that wasn't my intention at all. - Iida Tenya Sweet Boiii: Does Aizawa-sensei know your birthday? We need to add it to the calendar.

King Explosion Murder: You're seriously full of shit. How the fuck do you not know anything?

Ya Good Boiii: No caps lock? Dere: 67%.

Sparky Boiii: 69%

Crimson Boiii: niiiiiiice

Ashi: niiiiiiice

Ya Good Boiii: This is why we can't have nice things.

Betrayed Buoy: I want to know all the Eri stories! Even if it's a sad one. If that's okay?

Choppy changed Betrayed Buoy's name to #1 Eri Enthusiast

#1 Eri Enthusiast: :) Thanks!

Mysterieux Boiii: @Sucrose Male Tell me where he would put that information.

Mighty Boiii: You could ask him! Or I could ask him instead!

Slappy Tail Boiii: Can we do a prayer circle for Sensei to allow Shinsou to train with us?

Ya Good Boiii: oh please god no Ojira no

Mysterieux Boiii: @Mighty Don't ask him.

Sweet Boiii: I don't know? Probably in a folder with the investigation stu

Provost Piston: I think it would be better to ask Aizawa-sensei, it seems like the easiest course of action. We could ask in a way that would keep you out of the conversation if you would prefer that, Shinsou! - Iida Tenya

Sparky Boiii: Did Iida snipe my sugar sweet man?

Pastry Boiii: Oui. In front of All Might, no less.

Sparky Boiii: In front of MY salad?!

Mysterieux Boiii: @Motor no. I would prefer to know where that information is. @Battery If you know, I can get the information you want.

Sparky Boiii: MIDORIYA MY GPA NEEDS YOU

Provost Piston: KAMINARI THAT IS A CRIME.

Mysterieux Boiii: It's really not.

InvisiCutie: @Midoriya I think you should tell us! Shinsou really wants to know, you know, and he deserves to! He deserves to know when his birthday is!

Crow Boiii: We have fallen from our chosen path and into the depths of depravity.

Mighty Boiii: I don't know where it is, but it's probably somewhere we shouldn't know about!

Sparky Boiii: shinsou pls i tried

Mysterieux Boiii: You failed.

Mighty Boiii: JULY 1ST

Mighty Boiii: Sempai made sure to ask just in case it was coming up soon!

Crow Boiii: Cancer? How amusing.

Quiet Boiii: Tokoyami it's fine. It was accurate.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: ERI'S IS DECEMBER 21ST :)

Mysterieux Boiii: Thanks.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: :) can I please have an eri story this essay is k i l l i n g me :)

Mysterieux Boiii: Give me a minute.

Genesis: :)

Choppy: :)

Mighty Boiii: :)

Soba Boiii: :)

Sparky Boiii: Everyone liked that.

Mysterieux Boiii: You don't mind an unhappy one.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: I know a lot of them aren't happy, so it's okay

Genesis: Eri reminds us why we have chosen to become heroes in the first place. We know that a lot of her history isn't pleasant, and it's why we try so hard to make sure she makes happy memories here at UA.

Ashi: I need to hug someone.

Crimson Boiii: B there in a sec!

Ashi: :)

Mysterieux Boiii: When Eri was about 3 years old, I would make her count when she misbehaved. I found out later that it wasn't a good idea, since it can make a child associate learning with discipline and do poorly in school later on, but she never really misbehaved much anyway. Only when Hari came to take her. One time, Hari came to take me out of the room for a bleach bath, and she tried to stop him by counting to him. She must have thought that if she completed her punishment, I wouldn't get punished. We were lucky that he ignored her, but she was really brave to do that. To try to stop him.

Genesis: Thank you for sharing that, Shinsou. Eri is a very brave girl.

Mighty Boiii: Hey Ashido where are you?

Ashi: my room

Mighty Boiii: I'm coming

Ashi: thanks

King Explosion Murder: what the fuck do you mean by bleach bath

Sparky Boiii: Bakugo maybe don't?

Provost Piston: You don't have to answer, Shinsou!

Mysterieux Boiii: You talk about how I don't know anything, but it's not a hard concept, Blasto.

King Explosion Murder: SPELL IT OUT SHITFACE.

Ya Good Boiii: I'd rather you didn't????

Sweet Boiii: PIZZA IS HERE. Also ALL MIGHT would really like you guys to COME DOWN HERE and eat these cupcakes and TELL HIM what you think about them.

Provost Piston: That is an excellent suggestion! I think we should all go downstairs and eat with All Might!

Mysterieux Boiii: Chisaki was a germophobe. Hari enforced that. Tell me when the lightbulb goes on.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: Is that why your hai

Mysterieux Boiii: Ho

Mysterieux Boiii: You shouldn't know that.

Choppy: Ochako and I saw a picture of you before you came to UA. We're the only ones that saw it.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: That's right!

Mysterieux Boiii: Explain how you got this picture.

Choppy: We volunteered at the hospital where you and Eri were. Though you weren't in the same room, the staff placed a picture of you by her bed, so she wouldn't be as frightened when she woke up, if she woke up before you did.

Palpitation Projector: Hey Shinsou, tell me what you think about this music:

<https://www.herotube.com/watch?v=1ox1GvNiwtc>

Palpitation Projector: I can fine-tune the recommendations after I know what you like, but this is just a broad sample.

Sparky Boiii: NO WAIT

Sparky Boiii: <https://www.herotube.com/watch?v=u5AUoTICTzg&list=LL75BHVjAoYOfbsOTa5rWnQ&index=23&t=0s>

Sparky Boiii: This one first :) Please.

27 waited for the heroes to say something else, but they didn't, and it didn't seem to be the right time to try to find out why his owner behaved so oddly, or why Choppy was lying to him. How they could possibly know what he looked like before his hair was fixed by Yamada. He would rather try to investigate that when their hesitation would be more clear if it came, and he could know when one of them tried to report it to his owner. Perhaps he could convince Provost Piston to create a chat just between themselves, now that he had stocked up enough answered questions to force him to answer.

The message Sucrose Hurry sent was clearly a code to call all of them to All Might, perhaps to tell them what he had said about the bleach baths. They must be very misinformed to think that was useful information to gather, but at least it proved that they were ill-equipped for their jobs to gain information about The Miasma from him.

27 tapped on the link that Sparky sent him first. Sparky was amusing, and a bit more interesting than Beat Dropper.

His music was also very bizarre. It certainly wasn't like the songs from Get Your Hands Up! and a lot of comments underneath the videos had the same code words that Sparky liked to use. Perhaps he was part of a cult, and the other heroes were unaware of it.

One video had a lot of comments calling the song it was attached to torture. 27 didn't see how, it wouldn't be effective with all the different sounds it had, repetitive as they were. He really liked that one, especially the little animation of the cat flying through the sky.

A few songs were in English, and this one seemed to pull from a lot of English songs. He couldn't tell if it was supposed to be choppy and unnerving because of that, but it seemed to make the lyrics simpler to understand, easier for him to pick out the words that he knew.

27 didn't have time to react when there was a knock at his door right before Yamada opened it, smiling at him before he stopped and stared, something approaching horror on his face. "SHINSOU WHAT HAPPENED?"

27 reached up to touch the gauze pad secured to his cheek. Yamada should have been aware he was injured, he thought his owner would have informed him. At least Yamada seemed concerned for some reason, rather than angry. Bug would often get mad when the other Numbers injured him outside of training exercises when he was younger. She disliked when it was severe enough to impact his training sessions with her. 'Cat.'

Yamada tilted his head, repeating the sign. "Cat? A cat did that to you? Was it Sushi?"

27 shook his head, which Yamada took as an invitation to approach. He fumbled a few times to turn off the music still playing, but after he succeeded, he noticed that Yamada's hands were twitching around in the air, and it seemed like it was frustrating the hero. ' S-O-B-A. New cat. Dislike. '

"Aw, Soba is such a sweetheart! I can't believe he did that- he didn't do that one though," Yamada said, glaring at his forehead while his finger pointed at the odd welt he had gotten. "That one looks very familiar."

That angry tone was far more familiar for 27. Yamada wasn't happy about that wound, far more than the others. Unfortunately, it was one that 27 couldn't really explain. ' White thing. I don't know. Not hurt. '

Yamada gritted his teeth, but then sighed, sitting in the computer chair while he looked around the room as though he wanted to find something out of place to comment on. It was odd to see Yamada acting this way, so similar to Hari.

27 thought that it would be a relief to see that kind of behavior, something so easily understood, but instead he found his gut knotted in worry. This wasn't something he could understand. This was another bizarre change, much like his owner's, and he liked it even less.

"Oh! Did you listen to my show last night?" Yamada asks, and like that he changes again. His usual tone, his usual smile, but now 27 knows not to trust it. "It's not my usual format, but I hope that hearing a wider selection was as fun for you as it was for my other listeners!"

27 nodded, though he thought that his owner had reported that information to Yamada. Perhaps he was testing him to see if he'd lie. It seemed too easy to pass, but that widening smile tells him he did.

"That's good! Did anything catch your fancy? I know you were listening to some, uh music before I came in, and you don't have to pause it if you don't want to. I'm pretty good at listening with both ears, you know?" Yamada says with a laugh, but something about the slight hesitation before he said 'music' tells him he shouldn't risk it. Not now. He might not approve of the songs he was listening to.

' Like song. Something Dance. Mumble words. ' 27 signs. He wasn't going to reveal which song he liked the most, but he did like that one. Perhaps if Yamada talked about it, he could begin to figure out why he only knew some of the words to it. It was a bizarre dialect, one he doesn't remember learning, but he should have understood more of the song if he lived in the region it was specific to before The Miasma.

Yamada seems to freeze up, then tilts his head curiously. "Mumble words? Do you mean French?" He signs the word for French, and 27 repeats it. Where was French spoken? Did he and his mother live there? "I didn't know you knew French! Comprenez-vous cela?"

' You. This, ' 27 signs. He recognized those words, but not the others. Why wouldn't he be fluent if he had lived where French was spoken? Aoyama was, maybe he came from that area and had lived there longer. He seemed to prefer using it when given the chance.

"That's right! You know a little bit, then. I could teach you more if you wanted, but I'm still learning myself," Yamada says, rubbing the back of his neck. He clearly doesn't want to, but he still offered to for some reason.

' No. Want to learn English and sign. I don't know. Place. ' 27 hesitates before he risks it. It might not be a good idea to ask right now, but at least his understanding of JSL was sloppy enough to be misinterpreted. ‘ I don’t know. I know. Live there. I don’t know. ’

“You don’t remember learning French?” Yamada translates, and 27 nods. The hero’s fingers tap against his knee as he glances at the door, a new tell. Perhaps he’s worried that he shouldn’t give away this information, maybe his owner didn’t want him to know it. “I don’t think you lived in France, before... But maybe your mother taught you a little?”

Why did Yamada think his mother taught him? How did he know his mother knew? Did he know where his mother was?

Did Yamada know his mom?

She would have told him how much she sold him for. His owner would know not to spend too much on him. He must have bought him for less than what she got for him. That made him less valuable. He was a small investment at The Miasma, he wasn’t worth as much as the other Numbers, and Bug made sure to tell him that all the time.

They paid next to nothing for him, and he was worth next to nothing in return. They could dispose of him whenever they wanted to, as soon as he gave them a reason to. Even if he didn’t give them a reason here, when they had all the information they wanted from him, it would be easier for them to dispose of him. He wasn’t worth as much as those books on his shelf.

He never realized that, but the contents of his room probably cost more than his mother received for selling him.

Which one was worth as much as his quirk? How many books were equal to the value of his hands? How much did that laptop cost, or his phone? Should he even touch those things? If he depreciated in value with every injury, had just touching those things made them worth less too?

‘ Away. ’

27 covers his hand with the other as soon as he can make his body obey him. He couldn’t do that around Yamada. Yamada knows what he means by that. Yamada probably knocks another thousand yen off of his value every time he catches him slipping out of his own head.

What is he even worth now? Was it even less than zero? Was he given away for free? When would they get tired of him? What would he do to mess up and make them think he wasn’t worth it, however little they spent on him?

“Can you tell me - I mean, can you make your hands into fists for me?” Yamada asks, his own hands moving to do it, as though 27 is too stupid to know what he means by that. “Just like this, just until you start to come back, alright?”

Come back? He already knows it then. He knows what ‘Away’ means.

27 does it. His hands don’t feel real, but he watches them move, slowly at first, but as though he’s sinking back into his body, he feels them more and more. He’s able to move them more quickly as he does.

Yamada notices that too. “Good, you’re doing good, little listener. Just like that.”

27 isn’t fully back, still on the edges of the fog, when he watches his hands betray him again. ‘

Mom. Do you know? '

He wants to slip back, he wants to slip away . He asked a question.

He asked Yamada a question.

There's a panic inside of him that won't let him slip back, every nerve singing like he's already strapped to the table in the Red Room, like Chisaki is taking off his gloves.

He doesn't even know what Yamada will do to him now, but he knows he won't like it, he knows it will hurt and he just hopes it doesn't kill him when he's worth so little. He doesn't want to die, he doesn't want to lose Eri, he can't die, he can't protect her if he dies.

"Hey, no no no! I'm not mad, I'm proud - Shinsou, please look at me," Yamada asks, and he looks oddly blurry. He's smiling like he's forcing himself to, worry threaded not only in his words but through the lines on his face as well. "Shinsou, you can ask me questions. I'm really, really happy you did. I'm really proud of you."

Why would he be? It doesn't even sound like he's happy to have a reason to punish 27, it sounds genuine. It sounds like he actually wants 27 to ask him questions, and he doesn't know why .

"I don't know your mom, I've never met her, but I know that she knows French. Naomasa told me that, he told me a few things about you before we picked you up at the station. You can ask me about those things anytime, kiddo. I'll answer any question you have, I'm just- I'm really happy about this, you know?" Yamada says, and his sincerity confuses 27 the more he insists on it. "I know that it's really scary for you. I know that - you know, I know why. But it's not like that here. It's okay to ask us questions. We'll never be mad at you for that."

It has to be a trap. He's reading Yamada wrong, there's no way that he means that the way it sounds. He wants 27 to ask questions because he wants to get 27 killed. 27 isn't allowed to ask questions to someone like Yamada, definitely not to his owner like he's implying.

"Did you know that- um," Yamada starts, then cuts himself off, hands dropping from a sign half-formed. "You know, I used to be really scared of talking for a while. Because of my quirk. I didn't know when I was going to get loud, it was hard for me to tell, so sometimes I'd just stop talking. Right in the middle of a sentence, I'd stop, and it would be really annoying sometimes. My friends made fun of me by saying I was the 'Master of Anticipation.' That didn't really help, because I always felt so bad about it afterwards, but I just couldn't trust myself not to hurt someone with my quirk, you know? My mom was the only one who could help me with it, because she was deaf, and my quirk was too weak to hurt her back then."

27 never realized it, but that was definitely a weakness in Yamada's quirk. One that he shouldn't give away so easily.

"We'd drive out to this really quiet field, outside of the city late at night. It was far enough away that I wouldn't really bother anyone even if I used my quirk. And she'd tell me to tell her about my day, about anything really, just as long as I was talking a lot. Even then, sometimes I'd freeze up, but the more I talked, the more I could tell when I was going to use my quirk. And I was able to control it better," Yamada stops while 27 wipes the tears from his face, trying to get rid of the evidence of whatever fit that had happened while he was out of his head. "I know that, you know, it's more than that for you, but I want you to know that I understand. And I really want you to know that I'm never going to be mad at you for asking a question. I want to be like my mom was for me, but for you. Even if it's really scary at first, you can ask me questions."

It's confusing. 27 can't wrap his head around what Yamada wants from this. He wants 27 to ask him questions, desperately, but he doesn't know why. Why he would risk being under 27's quirk. Why he keeps talking about how scary it is for 27, like he's trying to comfort him in a way that he would for Eri.

"Maybe we could start small, like, asking me what the sign for something is," Yamada says, leaning back in his chair. "You said that you have names for Ms. Joke and Midnight, and I really want to know what they are. Because as much as I just love all the attention my hero name gets, I really want to know what you'd do with their names. Especially Midnight, I need ammunition against her after all the names she's called me over the years."

27 at least understands that, somewhat. He wants 27 to come up with a mocking name for Midnight, and luckily he doesn't see her often enough to pose much of a risk if it got back to her. 'W-I-T-C-H. Hour. Lady Laugh. Single J-E-S-T.'

Yamada snorts at the last name, covering his mouth afterwards. "Oh my god, if I called her that while she was flirting with Shou. He'd probably laugh, and that'd make her even more jealous." Yamada beams at him, rubbing his hands together. "What about my sweet herolets? Surely you have some names that I can call them in class! Like, 'Crimson Fight!' Or 'Engine Man!'"

'Beat Drop. T-E-R-A-T-O-M-A. He disliked that.' 27 thought that one was pretty clever, though. It took him a while to remember the name from the textbooks 10 had let him read.

"For Shoji?! Oh, I bet he didn't, but it's kind of fitting in a really gross way," Yamada presses his hands together to beg, looking to 27 for more names. "Please tell me you have one for Kaminari or Bakugo. Bakugo could really use some motivation, and it would just soothe my soul to be able to get one over on Kaminari when he acts up in class."

27 wonders if Yamada will get frustrated if he doesn't ask through sign, like he wanted him to. The heroes he picked might have been intentional, as though somehow he knew that he didn't know the signs for them, and the names were too long to spell out.

Yamada notices his hesitation, and 27 is sure that he's about to be proven right. "You can use the phone too, Shinsou. Or, you know, it's okay if you don't want to ask today. I shouldn't have made it seem like that. I of all people should know...."

27 doesn't like the way he said that, or the way his eyes move down and to the side, that smile falling. It's disappointment, but it's such a subtle shift that he doesn't recognize it as dangerous. 'How. T-H-E-O-C-R-A-T.'

He avoided the last part of the question sign, just in case, but Yamada's eyes light up all the same. If his smile were any less enthusiastic, 27 would worry that he'd fallen headlong into that trap. "That's good! Bakugo, right? Mr. King Explosion Murder himself!"

27 repeats the signs for the hero's name, still curious why he would want to pick it when it wasn't heroic sounding at all.

"I... I guess this game doesn't really work, though. There's not a lot of synonym signs," Yamada says, frowning as he cups his chin. "King is just 'King,' and Murder can be 'Murder' or 'Death' or 'Die.' There's a few more for 'Explosion' -"

'All of them. How to sign all of them.' 27 needs that information too much to worry about the risks right now. He didn't make it into a question, he just made it a complete sentence, and if Yamada didn't react to 'How,' then a sentence should be safe.

Yamada smiles so hard that 27 feels like it's going to hurt him, and his hands move too quickly in answer at first. "I'm going to need the JSL dictionary, I might be forgetting some, but I am going to make sure that you know every sign that you need."

27 couldn't wait to use them tomorrow.

Eri thought that she'd be really happy if Twenny had friends, but she wasn't.

The heroes being friends with Twenny was making him act really weird. He talked to them on his phone a lot, instead of paying attention to Eri, like he always did when they were in the room. Eri tried not to be mad about that, but she kind of was. Especially after Twenny talked at her a little mean, after Bakugo made him mad. It wasn't even Eri's fault that Bakugo made him mad.

But maybe it was. Eri told all the heroes to be friends with Twenny, so he was trying to be friends with Bakugo, and got mad. It was Eri's fault.

Eri must have done something else wrong today. Twenny got hurt by that mean cat because the cat got scared. Eri must have scared it because she was scared of it, just like the cat guy on TV said. She made Twenny get hurt again, just like she used to before they got rescued.

When Eri noticed that Zawa was in a talk-y mood, kind of like Yama gets, she tried to help him by asking him to read to her. It was a little selfish, because Eri really just wanted to be close to Zawa or Twenny, but Twenny didn't like cuddling with Eri after he got hurt, so she was happy that Zawa let her. Eri thought that she was helping, but she wasn't doing it right, because Twenny was acting really scared after his phone died, and he wouldn't have gotten so scared if she was cuddling with him.

Eri was really worried because Twenny was still too scared to eat as much as he should. Zawa and Yama worry about that too, probably because not eating enough is a good way to get sick, and Twenny barely eats as much as she does. Twenny is bigger and older than her, so he needs to eat a whole lot more than her, not less.

Zawa must think that Twenny is getting sick, because he told him he could go to his room if he wanted to. Zawa was also really explain-y today, because he told Twenny that he could go anywhere he wanted in the apartment, and didn't have to ask permission. Twenny should know that though, because Twenny was older, but he still seemed a little surprised.

Eri was trying to be good. She was trying not to be mad that Twenny wanted to go to his room. She was trying to be happy that Zawa was still letting her cuddle with him while he read his book about cats, but Eri just really wanted to cuddle with Twenny. But she messed up a whole lot today and couldn't.

Yama went to Twenny's room for a while after he woke up, and when he came back, he didn't look happy, even though he was smiling. It wasn't a nice smile, and Eri held on to Zawa's shirt just in case Yama did something scary to her. Yama must be mad at her after all the bad things she did, especially everything she did to get Twenny hurt.

"Shou, my dear, sweet husband," Yama said, his smile getting a little scarier. "Why does Shinsou look like he went on patrol with you?"

Zawa closed his book, and started moving Eri closer to Yama, sitting up so she was right in front of his chest. “We shouldn’t talk about that right now. Eri and I-”

“Shou, don’t use a sweet little girl like Eri to get out of this!” Yama said, pointing at Zawa. “You’re practically using her as a human shield!”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about,” Zawa said, putting his arms around her with his chin on top of her head. He sounded a little bit scared, and he was holding her like Twenny does sometimes when he’s really scared, so Eri put her arms out to protect him better.

Yama gave her that look that he does when she does something he thinks is super cute, and rolled his eyes. “Aw, I guess Super Eri has saved Eraserhead from the scary villain Mic today!” Yama started talking with his hands, really fast with words she didn’t know, but they made Zawa sigh and nod. “So, we’re going to expel Kaminari. I hope you’re good with that, but tomorrow is his last day at UA.”

Zawa just sighed a little louder. “What did he do?” Zawa didn’t sound like he was surprised.

“Shinsou likes meme songs now,” Yama said, and Eri didn’t really know what memes were, even though everyone talked about them, but Yama must not like their songs. “Because Kaminari sent him some on that chat they have. He was listening to a mashup that uses ‘ Another One Bites The Dust ’ by ‘ Queen ’ as a backing track, and I don’t think he’s even heard ‘ Queen ’ !”

Yama was using English words, but Eri didn’t know enough of them to know what they meant. Zawa just hummed, like he was going to say something to make Yama play-mad. “You know, someone told me that people who try to say certain songs are bad-”

“No, they’re bad , Shou! I take it back, those songs are bad!” Yama says, but then he looks a little sad and pouty. “No, you’re right. Shinsou should have his own taste in music, I just- no, it shouldn’t be mine anyway! That’s not what I wanted in the first place.”

Yama sounded really sad about that. Maybe Twenny should try to listen to more of Yama’s music to make him feel better. Music was really important to Yama, and he really wanted to be Twenny’s friend. Twenny should try to be a better friend to Yama, especially when it was as easy as listening to music.

“He did like ‘ Deniere Danse ’ though!” Yama says, and his hands say a lot of words at the same time. One of them means ‘Mom,’ and that makes Eri really confused. Were they talking about Twenny’s mom with their hands?

“That makes sense. His family has communication-related quirks, so foreign languages are probably more interesting to him,” Zawa says, also talking with his hands.

Eri doesn’t like that they’re doing that. They do it sometimes so they can talk about things she shouldn’t know about, but they’re talking about Twenny. Or maybe they’re talking about how mad they are that she was so bad today, and she got Twenny hurt.

Maybe they’re talking about how much they hate her. They’re talking about how much they hate that they have to live with her, but they have to, because she has a cursed quirk, and they’re the only ones who can stop her from using it. They don’t really like her at all, just like all the other heroes, but they pretend to be nice to her to stop her from using her quirk.

Eri hides her face in Zawa’s shirt. She really isn’t doing alright, but she doesn’t want to tell Yama that. He'll hate her even more if she does, if she acts out and does something troublesome.

Yama touches her arm, like he's going to pull her away from Zawa, but Zawa shakes his head at him, and starts rubbing her back. "Eri, what's wrong?"

Zawa's nice voice makes her cry, and she doesn't know why it does. She doesn't want to, she doesn't want to be even more bad, but she can't help it anymore. "I'm sor-ry Twenny got hurt. I-it's my fault, I'm sor-ry!"

"Eri," Zawa says, like he always does before he tries to convince her she's wrong. "It's not your fault."

"But I scared the cat! I was bad!" Eri tells him, even though he should know. She thought he was already mad at her about that.

But Zawa didn't know that. His eyes get wider, and he holds her a little tighter. "You weren't bad, Eri. The cat didn't even know you were there. It was in the vents, right?"

Eri nods, because it was in the vents, but that doesn't mean it wasn't scared of her. Somehow.

"I know that seeing Shinsou hurt like that was very scary for you. But sometimes, scary things happen that you can't control. That doesn't mean they're your fault," Zawa explains, wiping away her tears while she tries to calm down like Twenny showed her to.

"You know, I used to think like that too," Yama says, sitting down on the floor in front of them. "When I was little, I used to think that I could turn off whether my foster parents liked me that day. If I stepped on a crack on the sidewalk, I wouldn't get desert, or if I didn't save an earthworm, they would be mad at me for not doing my chores. There were a lot of days that they were mad at me, and I didn't do anything wrong at all, so I figured that I must have thought something bad, and that made them mad! But when you think about it, it doesn't make sense, does it? Would you be mad at me if I stepped on a crack on the road?"

Eri shook her head. She wouldn't be, that would be silly.

"Of course you wouldn't, because that would be silly. And my foster parents weren't mad about that either. But when you're little, there's a lot of scary things that happen that you can't really understand yet, so it makes you feel better to find a reason for it. And that's not always a bad thing, because sometimes it can make you feel better. But whenever you find yourself getting sad about something scary, you can always come to me or Shou and talk to us about it," Yama says, smiling at her with his really nice smile. "We're always happy to tell you about the world, little bean, and sometimes knowing more about the scary thing will make it a whole lot less scary."

Eri nods her head. "Zawa likes explaining things."

Zawa laughs, ruffling her hair. "I do. Especially for you, Eri. You're one of the few people who actually listen to me."

Eri knows Zawa is complaining about the heroes, but she likes that he says that she's a good listener. "It wasn't my fault that Twenny got hurt? Or that he's mad at Bakugo?"

Yama laughs a little, but she doesn't think he's laughing at her. "I don't think he's mad at Bakugo anymore, and it definitely wouldn't be your fault if he was! Bakugo makes a lot of people mad at him, right? So he wouldn't need your help making Shinsou mad at him."

Eri nods. She didn't think about that, but Bakugo was so mad and mean that even Izuku got mad at him sometimes, and Izuku doesn't get mad at anything, ever. "Is he friends with Bakugo now?"

Yama's leans to the side as he hums, like he really isn't sure about that. "It's hard to say with boys that age, but I think Shinsou is trying to find a nickname for him, and that's always the first step in being friends with someone."

Eri already knows that. Some of the heroes get really happy and brag about how they get names from Eri to prove they're good friends. She doesn't know how Twenny is going to give Bakugo a nickname when he can't talk to him, but Bakugo better like it, or she'll give him a mean face again.

"Would you like to ask Shinsou about it? We should probably bring him some more water, since it's been a few hours," Zawa says, but that just makes Eri confused.

"Is Twenny like Beanie?" Eri asks. Zawa has been telling her to water Twenny a lot more than she has to water Beanie, but it's a little weird that Twenny doesn't water himself.

Yama tries to hide that he thinks that's funny, but she can still hear him laughing behind his hand. Zawa just tilts his head, like he does sometimes when he's not sure how to answer her. "Everyone is like Beanie, because we all need water. I'm just a little worried that Shinsou forgets to drink enough water, so I want to make sure to remind him. Zashi does the same thing for me when I work too much."

"Sure do! Shou is a very complicated plant sometimes. I have to remind him to drink water, to eat, shower, shave, sleep--"

"Zashi."

"Go to school, come home, fix up his injuries, take his medicine--"

"We get it," Zawa says, like he's a little tired of all the fun Yama is poking at him. "I'm very lucky to have Zashi around to remind me of those things, aren't I?"

"Yup! You gotta drink water, Zawa! It's important!" Eri says, even though she doesn't know why it is. She needs to ask Momo about it, because Momo knows all about sciencey stuff, and she explains it a lot better than Zawa sometimes.

Eri gets to pick Twenny's new water cup and carry it to him, and she thinks that he'll be happy that she picked one that has a bunch of scribbly cats drawn on it.

But he isn't. He looks up from his new laptop and his eyes get really big, and he's really scared for a little bit before his face goes weird. It doesn't look like he feels anything when he looks up at Zawa.

"Twenny?" Eri asks, walking over to him. She hopes he's not mad about something she did, even if Zawa said she didn't do anything wrong.

"Sorry, Eri," Twenny says, putting his hand on her head. "Did.... You're okay."

Eri nods, but she's really confused. Twenny tried to ask her a question, and he seems really upset about something, and he keeps looking at Zawa with a kind of mean look in his eyes.

"Eri was worried about what happened today with Soba," Zawa says, leaning against the doorway with his arms folded. "Is her horn unusual right now?"

Twenny looks really mad at Zawa, and it's a little scary to look at. Eri reaches up to her horn, and she didn't even notice that it grew a little. It's almost bigger than her hand now.

Twenny starts talking with his hands, but he gets frustrated, and pulls up something on his laptop to start typing. Zawa walks over to read what Twenny types. 'What I signed is the trigger for it. Explain' Twenny deletes 'Explain' and makes a fist. He seems to get really mad, but Zawa just leans back, like he doesn't want to get close to Twenny right now. "Eri was very worried, but you can see that she's fine."

Twenny looks at her really worried, and his eyes look all over her before he looks really sad, and pulls her into his lap. He squeezes her really tight before he looks up at Zawa, and talks with his hands again.

"It's understandable that you would be concerned," Zawa says, patting Eri's head even though he makes sure his arm stays really far away from Twenny when he does it. "I would like to talk to you about Eri's quirk later, since there's a lot we don't know about it. It would help us to avoid this kind of situation in the future."

Twenny doesn't like that, but he doesn't glare at Zawa for saying it. He just holds Eri tighter, and she tries to hold him back just as tight. Zawa leaves and closes the door behind him, and that makes Twenny relax a whole lot. "You're okay, Eri."

Eri nods, even though she's still a little scared at how mad Twenny was at Zawa. "What's a trigger?"

Twenny sighs, like he's still a little mad, but he pats her head to say he's sorry for doing that. "It's something that causes something else to happen. With my quirk, someone answering a question is a trigger for it to work. With yours... When you get hurt, your horn grows. And eventually, your quirk starts up. I thought..."

"You thought Zawa hurt me? Like..." Eri doesn't want to talk about Him. Not when Twenny is as scared and mad as he is right now.

Twenny just nods. "I thought they knew that already." Twenny sounds like it's a bad thing that he told Zawa.

"Zawa wouldn't do that! Zawa isn't like Him at all! Zawa is really nice, and he wants to be your friend, Twenny," Eri puts her face against Twenny's shirt, and she tries not to cry. "I really want you to be friends with Zawa, a whole lot more than Bakugo."

Twenny starts rubbing her back, because he knows when she's going to cry before she does it. Sometimes he can even stop her from doing it at all. "I'm not really friends with Bakugo. I just think making him mad is fun, because he's too scared of Aizawa to do anything about it. I think his head is going to explode if I do it enough. Maybe his head is full of candy, and everyone will be happy that I made him explode because they'll all get a piece."

Eri giggles a little, even though she doesn't really want Bakugo to explode. She just thinks that it would look silly if he exploded like a cartoon and candy went everywhere.

"I know you really like Aizawa," Twenny says, staring at his laptop. "He's never hurt you."

Eri shakes her head as hard as she can. Maybe if Twenny sees that, she'll know that she's really telling the truth. "NEVER ever ever! Not even on accident!"

Twenny nods really slowly, still staring at the screen. His lips are moving around kind of weird, and his voice sounds weird too, kind of like he's crying. "I'm just really worried about you, Eri. I really want to keep you safe. I'm sorry if that makes you sad, but I don't know anything about Aizawa, or Yamada. I think they'll keep you safe, but if I'm wrong...."

Eri knows that Twenny is really scared about that. He's a good TV mom, because he worries about her a lot, and he tries really hard to keep her safe. He was always trying different things to get them out before they got rescued, and sometimes he didn't tell her what he was doing because it was dangerous. Sometimes he got really hurt from trying.

It would be really sad if Zawa was like Him, and they never really got out. That would scare Eri too, but Eri knows Zawa's not like that at all.

"Zawa saved me, Twenny. When we were getting rescued, he used his quirk on mine 'cause mine was hurting me and Izuku. And then he came to see me a lot when I was in the hospital, and he protected me a lot. Even from the doctors," Eri pulls her knees up so she can feel smaller, and because Twenny always puts his arms around her to hold her better when she does that. "He's like you, Twenny. He's not like Him at all."

Twenny puts his arms around her like she wants him to, and she feels guilty because she forgot that he's hurt, and maybe that hurts him to do it, but he doesn't look like it hurts him. Twenny is still staring at the laptop, because he probably thinks she's wrong still.

She hopes he starts believing her soon. She knows that Twenny is scared, and he gets a different kind of scared when he's scared about Eri. But it would be really nice if Twenny and Zawa were friends.

It would probably be like living in a TV show, if her TV Mom and TV Dad were friends.

The Mondays

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Self Destructive Thoughts (Similar to self-harm, but without the "self" creating harm)

Previously on Wards of UA: Eri's horn grew to signify her quirk beginning to build up. Shinsou kept a tupperware container with cookies that were made with Toshinori and All Might, though they have an extremely high caffeine content and made Shinsou sick when he ate them. Shinsou has been unable to eat or drink anything that Eri doesn't hand to him. Recovery Girl offered some advice concerning Shinsou's poor diet and recovery from being force fed at the police station, and her strictest instructions were to not give him coffee. Shinsou also learned that his mother spoke French the night before, and wondered if Yamada knew his mother. Shinsou fought Sero, Iida, Uraraka, and Ojiro on Friday, and won the first three of those matches. Shinsou has been calling Midoriya "Izuku" after assuming that was the correct name to use, since Eri calls him that. Ashido knew Shinsou before Shinsou was sold, though she assumes that he was kidnapped and taken to "Villain school," and has been extremely protective of him on the group chat after learning this.

There are too many people who have access to Eri today, too many that could notice her horn. He should have thought about that last night, should have slept so that he wouldn't have to carry this ache in his joints, this familiar haze at the edges of his mind. He knows that it makes him slower to react, and he can't risk that now.

He planned on eating one of his mocha cookies to compensate. Just one should give him the edge, but not make him as sick as he had been after four. He had waited for almost an hour, crouched next to his bed listening for footsteps, for his owner or Yamada to walk into his room to find him out of place in the worst way. To find this stupid collection he kept adding to, even when he had far greater worries.

When he finally worked up the nerve, he lowered himself under the bed, and moved the blank notebook away from the corner against the wall, revealing the things that were too big to hide in his other caches. The note from Creati, the banana chips, a paper towel from the bathroom he fought Bakugo in, a clump of hair from his haircut - those were things he could hide far better. He tucked them in the pockets of his clothes in the closet, behind and inside his books. They were even more stupid to keep, but at least he could keep them hidden better.

He pulled the tupperware to his chin and opened the lid, but found that his cookies were all flecked with white and green fuzz, already spoiled. He knew what would happen if he ate them, even if he only ate one he would get sick, and he wouldn't be able to protect Eri.

Even though he knew just looking was a risk, that he could always be caught and his stash could be discovered again, he found himself touching each of his possessions, just to remind himself they were there. The goggles he stole from his owner, the shirt Emi gave him, the shirt that Yamada gave him to wear when he cut his hair, the knife he tried to burn himself with, his favorite cat hoodie that had blood crusted over it in places after being injured by Soba.

He knew he should have stopped this years ago, that Hari should have broken him out of this habit, but it just seemed to get worse. He knows the things he keeps are worthless, they're trash. He should throw out rotting food, not spend his time carefully arranging it into the darkest corner under his bed. He picks stupid things, he wastes his time on stupid distractions, and he needs to stop to protect Eri.

She's still sleeping peacefully when he rises, Mocha held tightly in her arms. He needs to stop thinking about how much he wants to put Mocha under his bed, his owner or Yamada would notice and they'd burn him again-

And he shouldn't care if they did. This is Eri. He shouldn't find himself wavering on this, but he knows he really doesn't. He's distracted, he keeps thinking odd thoughts, things he doesn't really mean. Eri is the only thing he needs to care about, she's more than his job, she's the only thing that matters to him.

But he keeps thinking of other things because he's distracted.

He needs coffee.

He knows how to get it too.

After Yamada wakes Eri up, he continues to pretend to sleep, just to keep up appearances, decrease suspicion. He doesn't want to be seen as a threat until he needs to be, and he thinks he knows how to take Yamada down if he's planning on using Eri's quirk. He thinks about that while she's gone, while he pretends to sleep until she wakes him up to comb his hair and pick out his clothes.

He stumbles into a wall on his way to brush their teeth together, but that should decrease suspicion too. He tries to reassure Eri that he's not sick by smiling at her more often, but somehow that makes him more aware of how sluggish his body is to react.

When they sit down for breakfast, just the smell of it makes him nauseous. It shouldn't, because Yamada has a way of arranging food so that it looks more appetizing, more colorful. It's an odd habit, but one he kind of likes.

Yamada hands a plate to Eri, and she puts it in front of him. He knows that doesn't make the food any different, it never has, but it's convinced him enough times before. Maybe it's stopped now, because all he can do is stare at the slices of strawberries and bananas that cover the top of his pancakes, finding more patterns in the arrangement than he thinks there really are.

Even if Yamada didn't notice that, he noticed that 27 didn't sign 'Good morning' to him, and 27 realizes that when he hears Yamada tell him good morning for the second time, his voice strained with worry in the repetition.

27 snaps his head up and signs back to him, folding his hands together afterwards. He had one job this morning, one goal from this interaction, and he's probably ruined his chances now. It was going to be a risk regardless, no matter how much Yamada tried to convince him it was safe, he would never be sure. But he also knew that this was worth the risk, that he needed it, and he's gotten hurt from getting the things he needed before.

"Yep, you've definitely got the Mondays," Yamada laughed, pointing at 27 with a spatula. "But you're dealing with it a lot better than Shou does. I swear, it's a constant battle to make sure he remembers he has a job on Mondays. He probably wouldn't wake up until Wednesday if I let him."

Eri tilts her head, a bit of whipped cream on her lip from the face that Yamada drew on her pancakes, "Are Mondays bad?"

"For grown ups, they kind of are," Yamada answers, working on placing the vegetables he was steaming into the row of bento boxes on the counter. "Some people think they're the worst day of the week, but that's usually because they stay up too late on the weekends. Shou has always been really bad about that, even when we were in high school, so by his age he should definitely know better."

27 had been taking advantage of Yamada's back being turned to practice the question he wanted to ask. Even if it was risky to ask in the first place, he imagined that missigning could make it even worse. But Yamada had turned around, mouth already open to say something, and caught him.

"Oh, shoot! I'm sorry, Shinsou, I completely - Jeez, I really should know better," Yamada stumbled, his previous excitement snapping into nervousness. "I'll try to remember from now on, but if you need to get my attention, you can always tell Eri to yell at me."

' No. Not- ' 27 just waved his hands, unable to look at Yamada now, nonetheless try to manipulate him. He was apologizing to 27 for something ridiculous, as though he should make sure his eyes are on him at all times just in case 27 wanted to tell him something. Something he should just be able to say.

When he glances up at Yamada, he notices that he's moved the whole lunch set-up onto the opposite counter, just so he can see any movement 27 makes out of the corner of his eye. And Yamada noticed that he looked up, smiling at him like some people do when they're inviting the other person to talk.

Very few people have ever smiled at him like that, though. 27 pushes away the uncomfortable feeling that smile gives him, trying to focus on his mission. ' How to sign C-O-F-F-E-E. '

Yamada freezes up a bit, which confuses 27. He picked this phrase specifically because Yamada seems to enjoy showing him signs, and he wanted 27 to ask questions using JSL. He said it was fine for him to ask questions this way, and 27 thought that was proof that this owner and Yamada were more confident in their own power than anyone else who owned him. That they knew he couldn't use his quirk anyway, so asking questions when there was no chance of it activating would be fine.

But he was wrong, he read Yamada completely wrong, he wasn't allowed to do that, he messed up-

“Hey, it’s fine! It’s really fine, Shinsou! You did a great job,” Yamada says, his hand rising up as though 27 was about to do something to him. “I’m just not really awake right now, is all. But here’s the sign for ‘coffee!’”

27 repeats the sign without hesitation, but finds himself still staring at his hands afterwards. He hadn’t seemed like he was tired before 27 asked him, but it wouldn’t make sense if he was angry when he was trying so hard to convince 27 otherwise.

Yamada was so confusing, and 27 didn’t have the energy to try to understand him. If this was dangerous, he might as well risk it, because if he didn’t have coffee by the end of this he should at least have some wounds to help him stay awake, something to hurt worse than those half-healed scratches from the cat.

‘ Can I have coffee? ’

Yamada doesn’t say anything, and 27 forces himself not to look, so that whatever Yamada does to him will be a surprise. Instead, he glances to his side and freezes when he sees Eri looking back at him, playing with her hands like she does when she wants to sign, but can’t pick one that she knows.

He forgot Eri was here. How could he be so stupid? After everything he’s done to protect her, he would risk getting himself hurt right in front of her over a stupid cup of coffee. That was the surest way to make her quirk erupt, he was trying to prevent that, not egg it on. It hurts when it builds too quickly and he knows that and he’s just so fucking useless-

“Look, Shinsou, it’s not that I’m... I just,” Yamada sighs, but he doesn’t want to look. He messed up. Maybe if he pretends it doesn’t hurt, Eri won’t be worried about him. “I really want to give you some coffee, but Chiyo says you can’t for a while, it might make you- you know?”

He doesn’t know, and he can’t even think of a reason why Yamada seems so frustrated. 27 is pretty sure he’s not going to be punished though, and even as he tries to think of a sign to guide Eri through, his head is getting heavier and he wants nothing more than to lay it on the table and close his eyes.

“Yama, Twenny has some really bad Mondays! You gotta give him coffee so he gets better, like Zawa does when he gets coffee!” Eri whines, putting her hands on the table so she can lean over it, probably because it makes her just the slightest bit more intimidating.

Yamada must be really weak to fall for it, as he makes some kind of strangled whining noise. “I know, I know! Look, maybe if you finish your breakfast, I can give you a little. Chiyo won’t get mad at me for that, right?”

He doesn’t know if she will, and it doesn’t really matter, because what he’s asking for is impossible. His pancakes are huge, and he’s not even slightly hungry, he doubts that he could eat more than a few bites.

But he needs this coffee, so he tries.

He honestly tries. Every bite tastes like ash, and his stomach rebels against him. He wonders if this is what it would have felt like if he remembered being force-fed, if he didn’t slip out of himself when they started until it ended. If he ever made Eri feel this way when he had to make sure she finished her meals before she went to The Chair.

He has to force himself to swallow before he gives up. He knows he’ll throw up if he eats any more, and he's only eaten less than half of it. Worse than having no coffee, he feels like he failed, he failed this stupidly easy task and he hates himself all the more for it.

He pushes the plate further up the table so he can lay his head on his arms. He doesn't care what that looks like, any implication or insult that Yamada could take from that. He's tired, he wants coffee, he can't do the simplest task, he can't stop wondering if his mother still thinks about him.

He feels like he's going to cry because he can't eat a normal fucking meal anymore.

There's something warm against his elbow, but he doesn't want to look up at it. If it hurts him, maybe he'll feel less useless. He'll remember that he has a job, to protect Eri, and nothing else matters to him, not even himself.

He hears his owner walk in, dragging his feet in long strides like he can't be bothered to lift them. 27 finds that he can't really be bothered to care, not even when he feels him stop behind 27's chair. "Zashi. He can't have-"

"I'm saying he can!" Yamada snaps, and 27 looks up, interested to know how this will play out. He's never seen a right hand like Yamada talk to an owner like that. But when he lifts his head, he sees the coffee mug at his elbow, half full. "Shou, I can only be so strong, and if you think I can really say no to Shinsou when he asks for something as simple as a cup of coffee, you're wrong! Shinsou has the Mondays and he's getting coffee!"

27 glances at his owner out of the corner of his eye, watching as the man just blinked in response. 27 doesn't think he'd stand much of a chance against his owner, because even if they'd both be fighting quirkless, he can tell that the scarf would be a huge issue. He's never fought anything like it.

But if he tried to hurt Yamada right now, 27 would probably risk it.

"Zawa," Eri whines. "You're not gonna be mean to Twenny, right? 'Cause Twenny likes coffee a whole lot, just like you do, and I don't want him to be sad about his Mondays."

27 can hear her lip wobbling as she talks, but he also knows by her tone that she's faking it. It's a little too high pitched, her words come out too evenly. She really shouldn't be doing this regardless, she knows not to draw attention to herself when things like this happen.

But his owner doesn't know she's faking, and he folds. "I'm not, Shinsou can have coffee," his owner says, a bit too quick for a man who seemed barely awake just moments before.

27 picks his mug up to take a sip, if just to hide the smile that he can't quite stop. The Numbers at The Miasma that he trained his quirk against told him it's creepy, the way he smiles when he feels like he's won something, and he's definitely won something here.

He doesn't even realize it until he's finished his coffee.

Eri didn't hand it to him, and he was still able to drink it.

Aizawa doesn't remember, but he thinks that USJ happened on a Monday.

As they walk across campus to the academic building, he can't help but feel overwhelmed in the same way he had during the battle. He feels like there's too many opponents, too many children that he needs to protect. He wants to cut himself into pieces to be there for all of them but all he can do is push his body to the limit, throw himself into fight after fight while he tries to find the head of the snake to end it.

It's far more overwhelming when his opponents are also the children that he wants to protect.

Shinsou doesn't help at all. The kid is a ball of nerves at the best of times, but right now, he's crouched over Eri to the point that even his arms are hanging around her, and throughout the morning, he's been looking at her like he wants to shove her into his hoodie to keep her close.

Aizawa knows the feeling, but he also knows that won't help. Shinsou knows that far better, but he can't blame the kid for being irrational. Shinsou knows the danger that Eri's horn poses more intimately than Aizawa ever will.

Aizawa knows as soon as his students see Shinsou, they're going to act familiarly with him, friendly even. And as soon as they invade his space, invade Eri's as well, Shinsou will probably snap. He will lash out, he will attack in what he believes is Eri's defense, and that will make him do far more harm than the broken bones he knows the kid can inflict when he wants to. He's more than a little concerned that the knife will come into play, and Aizawa will have to worry about something far worse than what Recovery Girl can mend.

That's why he texted Iida to make sure that his students will be dressed in their gym clothes and waiting on the track instead of meeting them in the classroom. He doesn't text Iida often, not just because he hardly needs to, but because he thinks Iida doesn't know how to lie to his peers about how he got his number. It would be easy enough to say that it's a requirement for his position as class president, but Iida gets flustered to the point of freezing up at the threat of his peers discovering that Aizawa has known the kid for years through Tensei.

He also dislikes that Iida doesn't know how to text back with less than 200 words, and this morning's reply is especially lengthy. Aizawa is highly tempted to stop reading after 'In response to your message regarding the preparations for training to take place during homeroom - I have dispersed your instructions to the members of Class 1-A and I am currently supervising their progress in meeting your requirements,' which really could have been boiled down to 'Understood.' But his eyes catch on Shinsou's name, and he forces himself to read the whole thing.

Iida is trying, poorly, to hide the fact that Shinsou expressed some amount of interest in training with them. Iida tries to make it seem like this is an idea that came to him naturally, that it would be beneficial for Shinsou to get more exercise and that martial arts is particularly well suited to that, as it improves self-confidence and overall mental health. He even cites several academic studies as evidence using MLA format.

Aizawa doesn't reply, not just because he hates MLA citations, but because Iida has a point.

And a far better reason to see what Shinsou can do than Aizawa does.

Aizawa has tried to dispel it as ill-advised curiosity, his own inability to sort Shinsou into a mental box labeled 'ward' or 'investigation witness' that causes him to think of Shinsou as a potential student at times. It doesn't help that Shinsou is the same age as his students, that he knows on the surface, Shinsou's training and quirk would make him into an exceptional hero. A student he would truly enjoy taking under his wing.

He also thinks that he should know what Shinsou is capable of, in a way that Naomasa's files can't tell him. He saw Shinsou fight off the rioters in his cell, he's read the injury reports from police officers who tried to shake him out of a trance and found that their own training was lacking against a half-starved teenager. He's never seen Shinsou fight with his own eyes, and he wonders if that would make it easier to trust him around his students, if he could pin-point every opening and vulnerability he had to take him down if necessary.

But honestly, he's getting a bit frustrated with Shinsou, especially when he sees that everyone else seems to have a way to relate to him. He's at the point that he's comfortable enough with Hizashi to ask him a question through sign, he's been glued to his phone most of the weekend to message his students.

His students probably know more about the teenager that's been living with Aizawa than he does.

He knew it wouldn't be easy, that it's entirely possible that Shinsou was able to make those connections more readily because he had already decided that Aizawa was the greatest threat to him. He should be able to accept it under that theory, but he finds himself rebelling even more.

Aizawa doesn't know a single thing about Shinsou that didn't come from someone else or his case files. And that needs to change quickly.

He needs Shinsou to trust him, for Eri's sake.

He knows more about her quirk than anyone else, and even if that information was painfully gathered, it's vital for them to have. He knew how to trigger it to build, and may also know how to slow it, or predict the moment it would erupt. If there was a way for her to focus or control it that she had never been told, but Chisaki had learned and manipulated.

Shinsou needs to trust him for his own sake.

Naomasa wasn't supposed to know himself, it was a mistake that the file was leaked to him, but now that both of them know, they need to make much greater progress in the investigation.

He won't tell Hizashi about it yet, taking advantage of how Naomasa, like many others, tend to underestimate his husband. It's not because he thinks that Hizashi wouldn't be useful in this, he would probably be Aizawa's best chance of extracting something useful from Shinsou about the Nomu Organization.

But he also knows that Hizashi would tear up his own hero license if he knew what The Commission was planning.

Aizawa pushes that thought aside, noticing that Shinsou's steps falter when they pass Class 1-A's homeroom. "We're meeting the students on the track today, for hand-to-hand combat training. I'll decide between grapples or joint-locks when I get there."

He knew that they definitely needed more instruction on restraining holds, and his decision was really based on how energetic they were. Throwing each other around to practice grapples came with a greater risk of injury, but he wanted to make sure his students would be too exhausted to give Shinsou more than a wave while they dragged themselves off to their next class.

He wasn't really expecting Shinsou to weigh in. 'L-O-C-K-S. More useful. Not recognize it.'

Aizawa knows that Shinsou might not have meant for him to see that, walking behind Eri with Aizawa's back turned to him. He wouldn't have if the kid didn't step closer to a student who was running down the hall, using his body to shield Eri from the perceived threat. But now, he couldn't help but ask. "They didn't know you were going to use a joint-lock on them before you did it?"

Shinsou looks up at him in surprise, confirming that he was sign-muttering to himself, then nods. ‘Long Spine did. Float once. Float too aggressive. Jerky.’

Aizawa nods in response, unable to hide his hum of approval. “I assume you’re referring to Ojiro and Uraraka. Ojiro has the most martial arts training out of all of my students, but Uraraka does have a habit of getting a bit too enthusiastic as the match goes on. More experience will help with that.”

He’s wondering if he should change his plan to keep the wards distracted, whether he should encourage Shinsou to weigh in on the training rather than avoid the sight of it, when Shinsou’s voice cuts through his thoughts. “Danger.”

Aizawa turns to look, to find the direction that Shinsou is looking so he can know where his opponent is, a danger familiar enough for Shinsou that he was able to speak in warning.

Instead, he sees Shinsou looking down at Eri, guiding her through the signs that she knows. “Bad. Friend.” He counts himself lucky that Shinsou didn’t notice, too attentive to their JSL lesson.

It’s more than a little odd that Eri never let them know that she knew JSL, given how much he and Hizashi have used it around her. He understands why Eri wouldn’t have asked Hizashi, given that ‘Yama’ is a new development, but Eri has always come to him with questions, with almost everything that she needs.

He’s beginning to think that Shinsou might have picked up on that, deciding that Aizawa was the new Chisaki because of it. Because proximity to Eri clearly makes him a threat in Shinsou’s mind.

But there’s almost a sort of rivalry at times. The way Shinsou glares at nearly everyone who seems close to Eri when she focuses her attention on them has a slightly possessive edge to it. Shinsou wants to keep Eri safe, but there might be a more selfish reason to keep her safe and close to him. That’s something that Aizawa can’t exactly blame Shinsou for, when Eri was the only source of comfort he would accept.

But the rivalry might not be entirely one-sided.

Aizawa has tried to be rational, to tell himself that he can’t connect to Shinsou because Shinsou fears him, because there’s little that they have in common, because Shinsou deliberately keeps him from knowing more about him.

But Shinsou knows more about Eri than Aizawa does, and there’s an irrational part of him that bristles at that. There’s a part of him that wants to know more about what happened at the 8 Precepts in a way that isn’t at all related to doing his job as Eri’s caretaker. A part of him that wants to know his wards history, not to evaluate their relationship or their needs, but just to know. To know more about Eri, the little girl that doesn’t feel like she belongs in a box labeled ‘ward’ in his mind anymore.

Aizawa busies himself with a headcount as they walk outside, trying to gauge whether his students are suffering from not only a Monday morning, but a morning that started far earlier than they expected it to at Iida’s instruction. He’s relieved to find even Kaminari swaying with the effort to stand at attention, Ashido leaning heavily on his shoulder while he does.

Joint locks it is, then.

“Good morning, Aizawa-sensei!” Iida calls, completely unaffected by the change in routine because not only is it hardly different from his usual one, he’s a morning person as well.

It's unfortunate that his energy seems to awaken most of Class 1-A, as they blink and look around. Unfortunately, their gaze finds Shinsou and locks onto him with a frightening yet entirely predictable intensity.

Aizawa steps in front of Shinsou on instinct. "After Iida guides you through stretches, run 5 laps and pair off to practice joint-locking your opponent. If I see that any of you have forgotten a lock, I will demonstrate it on you." He pauses to let the threat sink in, waiting a little longer than usual to adjust to their lack of sleep. "Unless I'm needed, I'll be in the stands. Don't need me."

As Aizawa walks away, he angles himself to keep an eye not only on Class 1-A, but on Shinsou as well. Only half of his students are paying attention to Iida's instructions, and more than half of them aren't pleased to deal with an enthusiastic morning person at this hour. The other half are still watching Shinsou like a cat who's found prey, but luckily Shinsou hasn't given them any interest in return. In fact, he seems to be avoiding their gaze, the tension in his shoulders and eyes focused on the ground gives the reason for it away.

Shinsou regrets talking to them.

Aizawa is familiar with that feeling. He's walked the halls of this very school with his shoulders raised to his ears, his eyes avoiding the expectant stares of his 'new friends.' Friends that were easier to make over the course of the week, trading little comments and interactions until a quiet weekend alone seemed to make him forget how to be comfortable with that.

But Mondays seemed to make everyone around him too energetic, too expectant. They crowded around him and told him they missed him, that they never hang out, that they should get together to do whatever they did over the weekend this coming one. Hands clapping his shoulders in a way he could tolerate on Friday, but never on a Monday.

It was a testament to Shirakumo's innate empathy that he never did that. He'd smile, wave at most, and try to distract Hizashi and the others, sometimes leaning completely over Aizawa to do it, which only gave him another excuse to lay his head on the desk and take a quick nap despite the cacophony above him. Even Hizashi never understood it, far too distracted by every single thing he had wanted to tell Aizawa over the course of the weekend. It was a report that he learned would be shorter and quieter if he simply gave in and met with Hizashi on the weekend, even if he just silently watched him record his podcast.

Shirakumo would probably be able to understand Shinsou at a glance, if he was alive. Just one look and he'd know exactly what Shinsou needed, what he wanted, and he would be able to give those things to him with that easy, utterly disarming grin.

But Shirakumo isn't alive, and Aizawa still fumbles to know what people want from him at times. He's just learned how to hide it better, no longer the awkward teenager who was still in the process of giving up on most people's expectations of him.

But he thinks that Shinsou wants some kind of distraction, one that he isn't seeking from his phone as though he's still under the assumption that he shouldn't use it during school hours, or Eri, who's happily drawing a picture of one or several of the members of Class 1-A. At this point, it's only blue and red scribbles, but she tends to put colors down before she defines them with black crayon.

"Did you notice anything else when you sparred with my students?" Aizawa asks, watching his class begin their laps with just the slightest regret that he assigned 5 of them. If picking apart his students' shortcomings was the bonding activity that worked, he was more than happy to do it with Shinsou. Toshinori always tried to argue in his students' defense, which irritated Aizawa to the point of avoiding that conversation.

Shinsou keeps his eyes trained on Eri as he approaches the railing Aizawa is leaning against, and probably dislikes the distance that's necessary in order to sign to him. But it's a good indication that he's interested enough to do it. ' Scared Tape not serious. Bad S-T-R-A-T-E-G-I-E-S. If he has one. O-V-E-R-E-X-T-E-N-D-S. '

Aizawa hums. "This is 'strategy.' I don't remember if there is a sign for 'overextend,' you might want to ask Hizashi." His eyes find Sero, who was trying to improve his running form, but his concentration is broken by the conversation he's having with Todoroki. "He hasn't practiced much with using his quirk for mobility. I think he was planning to rely on it for crowd control and restraining villains. There's a balance between pulling enough tension from something like his quirk, and leaving yourself vulnerable. He hasn't found it yet."

Aizawa's fingers play with the ends of his capture scarf idly, wondering if he should take Sero aside to see if some private instruction would help or if his student would be too terrified to take it seriously. He can't help but smile a bit when he notices Shinsou's eyes linger on his scarf a bit longer than they would if he were simply tracking the movement of his hand.

"The capture scarf works similarly. It was designed to simply restrain, but over the years, I've learned to manipulate it for offense, defense, and mobility. Though it was a long process to master it," Aizawa can almost feel the spiral-shaped bruises that he earned before he learned not to untangle himself by manipulating the scarf again. That happened a lot before he started asking Shirakumo or Hizashi to watch him train with it, so that they could pull him out of any messes he caused. "It responds to the unique signals that most emitter quirks have. It was also a long process to learn how to manipulate those signals, but not my quirk."

Shinsou's eyes widen like they did when Sansa showed him his toebeans, and Aizawa nearly moves to take his scarf off just to chase after that moment, that sudden and intense interest that Shinsou couldn't hide. But Shinsou turns to look at the students, eyes narrowing not quite in a glare, lip pulled between his teeth.

Shinsou must have forgotten that he hated his quirk for that brief moment, too curious to know if he could use the capture scarf or not.

Too curious to know if he could use another weapon , Aizawa thinks bitterly. The knife was one thing, he was very experienced at disarming someone wielding a knife. He also felt like the kid would probably feel safer if he had some way to defend himself in an environment full of powerful quirk users. As much as he wanted to trust Shinsou, handing him the capture scarf wouldn't be a good idea. He's never fought his own scarf before, and he doesn't want to anytime soon.

Iida finishes the laps first, unsurprisingly, and volunteers that he, Midoriya, and Uraraka take the 3-man match up. How selfless of him. "Your match with Iida must have ended quickly. Ojiro almost forgot about it when he told me," Aizawa says, more than a little impressed that Shinsou was able to take Iida down in the first place. Iida was a wall of meat while Shinsou was a twig underneath his oversized hoodies. It's a wonder that Iida didn't break Shinsou in half.

' President Exhausting predictable. Power in leg. Attack with leg. ' There's a sadistic little smirk that flashes over Shinsou's face while he looks at Iida. ' Stop leg. He stalls. '

Iida must be one of his favorites, then. Aizawa wonders how many car-related JSL signs Shinsou learned just to make a joke like that. "The Iida family has had the same quirk for three generations. They should have adjusted their training by now, but obviously, they haven't. Tensei should have prepared him, but sometimes I wonder if he knew I was going to be Tenya's teacher, and intentionally didn't."

Shinsou cocks his head at that, and Aizawa can almost hear the gears turning in his head, a question that he's trying to answer for himself or word in a way that it doesn't come across as a question at all. 'Names odd. T-E-N-Y-A. I-I-D-A. I don't know the difference.'

Aizawa holds up a hand to Shinsou out of a habit grown from having to interrupt Toshinori in situations like these. "Aoyama and Ashido, Bakugo and Kirishima. If you keep squabbling like 4 year olds, I will make you wear the hats."

Aoyama turns his nose up at the thought, but Ashido knows that his threat isn't an empty one, and throws her arms around Aoyama to haul him to another sparring space before he could think of wheedling Bakugo further into being his partner. Bakugo shoots Aizawa a pointed glare, but Kirishima pulls him into a shoulder-hug, saying something that makes Bakugo sneer, then soften into a haughty cackle.

Aizawa sighs, scratching the back of his neck. "Sorry, but that was going to turn ugly if I let it. You're..." Aizawa trails off, struggling to find a way to word what he assumes Shinsou meant in a way that isn't accusatory. "Unfamiliar with family names."

Shinsou nods, turning to look at Eri for a while after he does. Aizawa can't tell whether it's discomfort or embarrassment that causes him to turn away, but he waits until Shinsou turns back to the students to continue. He needs to be able to read Shinsou while he explains this, to make sure he doesn't come off as demeaning.

"'Iida' is a family name, and both Tensei and Tenya share it, as they're brothers. It would be confusing to refer to both of them as Iida, which is why I use their given names when I have to, though I'm not familiar enough with Tenya to be comfortable doing it otherwise," Aizawa explains, noticing that Shinsou's head tilts again at 'comfortable.' "Using someone's given name implies a level of familiarity or closeness. Only family or very close friends do so. You might have noticed that Hizashi and I call each other different names when we're at home or at school, and you might have noticed that I just called him Hizashi again," Aizawa folds his hands in front of him, running a thumb over his ring finger. "I tend to forget over the weekend. Some of the students would find our relationship distracting to their studies, and neither of us would appreciate the attention."

He made that mistake with his first class. 15 year olds lack any emotional maturity or self-awareness, and he learned that in the worst way. He knows Hizashi still has some of the drawings from the girl he expelled for sexual harassment.

Aizawa should be paying more attention to his class than he is to Shinsou, to enforce his previous threat if they didn't run through all the joint-locks that they knew. But he's mostly trying to figure out why Shinsou seems even more uncomfortable than he was under Class 1-A's stare.

That's probably why Eri was able to sneak up on him. "Twenny, Zawa!" Eri sing-songs, holding up her completed work of art. "I drew the heroes in their work-out clothes!"

"You did a-" Both Aizawa and Shinsou say, in unison, before Shinsou stops himself. "Good job."

Eri beams at that, probably finding some amusement in their combined praise. "Do you think they'll like it?"

"They will," Aizawa promises, knowing that if Eri offers to give the picture to them, a fight will probably break out over who gets to keep it before one of his more level headed students suggests that it be displayed in the common area of the dorm. Even though the pictures in the common area still seem to go missing after a few days.

“They better,” Shinsou threatens instead, and though he probably means it, he smiles at Eri to play it off as a joke.

Aizawa is more than a little pleased that Eri decides to give her picture to the hero students, as it plays out exactly as he expected it to and distracts his students from Shinsou in the most effective way possible.

He’s too busy trying to keep a straight face as Bakugo argues that he only wants the picture ‘So none of you shit heads can moon over it all damn day,’ and forgets to do another headcount. If he did, he would have noticed that Ashido had snuck behind him at some point.

He’s made aware of it when he hears her yelp, and turns to find the aftermath of Ashido’s infamous stealth-hugs targeted at Shinsou.

Ashido looks shocked, rather than in pain, with Shinsou holding each of her elbows in each hand, thumb pressing her forearms up and fingers tucked into the bend. There’s several ways to cause a considerable amount of pain in that hold, and he’s almost certain that Shinsou knows all of them.

But Shinsou seems shocked himself, though it flashes to panic and fear.

Aizawa isn’t sure how to diffuse the situation appropriately, now that his entire class has noticed, so he tries to turn it into a lecture. “Shinsou is demonstrating an elbow lock. In what situations would you choose that rather than a wrist or shoulder lock?”

Shinsou’s grip wavers before he’s able to release Ashido, and his hands move away stiffly but don’t quite rest at his sides. Ashido pulls her arms behind her back, shifting her weight between her feet nervously.

Aizawa doesn’t know what she’s working up the courage to say, but he’d rather she not try it. He focuses on staring down his class to force one of them into answering, though he sees a lot of disappointingly blank faces.

Unsurprisingly, Ojiro is the one who knows the answer. “An elbow lock is a bit more challenging to do successfully, but it’s more effective against an opponent that has a weapon, or a quirk that originates from their hands.”

And that was not the answer that Aizawa nor Ashido wanted to hear.

Aizawa sees her flinch out of the corner of his eye, having turned to focus his attention on his class after Shinsou seemed to stand down. He doubts that’s why Shinsou chose that hold, but Ashido could be uncharacteristically sensitive about her quirk at times. This was clearly one of them.

“It’s also effective for controlling your opponent’s torso if you keep the arms in an appropriate position for it, which can allow you to move your opponent more easily. And because it’s difficult to execute, it’s also more difficult to break,” Aizawa lectures, fully aware that Ashido probably doesn’t hear a word he says. “Everyone except Ashido is dismissed. You have 15 minutes before English.”

Aizawa considers dismissing his wards as well so that he can have this conversation with Ashido privately, but he sees a few too many students looking at Shinsou with suspicion or concern to risk it. Instead, he takes Ashido by the arm to guide her far enough away that Shinsou hopefully won’t overhear.

Ashido won’t meet his eyes when he stops and turns to face her.

“I understand that you have a unique history with Shinsou,” Aizawa says, struggling to decide whether Ashido needs firmness in his tone to remember this lesson, or comfort to keep from crying. “But that doesn’t excuse you from my instructions to not interact with him. I’m fully aware that you and your peers have ignored that, and I’ve allowed it to a degree, but I’m strictly forbidding touching Shinsou in any manner.”

Ashido’s hand rises to pull at the ends of her hair, glancing at Shinsou guiltily. “I probably scared him, didn’t I? I guess it’s kind of weird, to think we were still kinda friends, or we could be friends again-”

“That wasn’t what I meant,” Aizawa interrupts. He knows that Ashido translates physical affection into friendship in a way similar to but a bit more intense than Hizashi does. “Shinsou was probably startled, and if he was afraid, it wasn’t related to you. It’s logical to assume that he’s unfamiliar with a hug, or any other physical contact that wasn’t painful to him.”

He doesn’t entirely mean to tell her that, but he sees it click into place when her eyes widen. “That Chisaki guy... and the villain school....”

As much as he dislikes the implication that ‘villain school’ puts on Shinsou, he knows he can’t correct her. “He can react far more violently than he did. Now that you know that, take care that it doesn’t happen again, from any student in Class 1-A.”

Ashido nods, holding her hands together to either restrain herself, or out of a still-lingering worry that Shinsou’s hold was deliberate. That he chose it out of fear that she would have a quirk-slip and burn him.

She only relaxes her grip when they return to the wards, trying to smile brightly at them though it’s pinched at the edges. “Hey, I’m sorry! I’m just super clingy sometimes, ya know?”

Shinsou still doesn’t look at her, but Eri steps in front of him, arms slightly away from her waist in an almost protective manner. “It’s okay, Ashi! Shinsou said that he’s sorry, and he hopes you’re okay! He’d tell you with his phone, but he forgot it.”

Shinsou flinches, his right hand becoming a fist so tight that his knuckles whiten. Aizawa starts to regret not offering the capture scarf to him, even if he might have refused it.

Without the phone, Shinsou would be completely defenseless today.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: None

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou told Yamada that he liked 'Deniere Danse' from Open Mic Night on Get Your Hands Up! radio in an attempt to find out why he only knew some of the words, and Yamada explained that French was another language spoken in France. Principal Nezu is aware of Shinsou breaking into the air duct at the Class 1-A dorm to rescue Soba, Todoroki's cat, and vaguely threatened to meet with Aizawa concerning that incident. Shinsou has been avoiding using his right hand since coming to UA, after it was unmade by Chisaki and not made right, and visibly shakes when he tries to perform some complex tasks with it. Shinsou has been thinking more about his mother after learning that she knew French from Yamada. Toshinori organized a light sparring session with Class 1-A and Shinsou on Friday, which turned disastrous after Ojiro pulled Shinsou's hair and made him dissociate badly. Shinsou is aware that Mirio has lost his quirk, and Eri wants to use hers to return it.

Yamada is more than a little surprised that his husband and the wards beat Class 1-A to his classroom, strolling in as his homeroom filters out the door. But he also knows the reason for it. “Eraserhead, did you really put the herolets through Monday morning combat training?! On a Monday morning! ”

He doesn't like how Shouta follows Shinsou with his eyes while he scratches his neck guiltily. “Is that exam ready?”

Yamada knows that Shouta's best laid plans must have burn to ash in front of him to ask for that, given how obstinately opposed he had been last night.

“Still planning on doing combat drills first thing in the morning? On a Monday morning no less?” Yamada asked, watching Shouta pour over Shinsou’s statement about Chisaki at two in the morning, probably hoping to find something about Eri’s quirk that he missed the first five times he read it.

“Yes,” Shouta growls, though he’s leaning so heavily on his elbow propped on the desk that a long enough blink will probably put him to sleep. “Shinsou messaged them, so they’re going to come to class with the expectation that he’s their new best friend. And I do not want to have to deal with that on a Monday morning.”

“Lucky for you that I already had something planned. We can just swing by the staff room to pick it up, and you can spend your morning glaring at your little herolets whenever it looks like they’ll bother Shinsou, because he’ll be busy taking his General Studies exam.”

Shouta raises his eyebrows at him. “Zashi, you can’t be serious. It’s surprising that the kid can read, but do you really think this Nomu Organization taught him anything else? Enough for General Studies?”

“That’s the thing, we don’t know what he knows! And we owe it to him to find out! Trust me, the kid loves learning new things, he just has this look in his eye - and honestly, Shou, can we really call ourselves teachers if we have a 16 year old living under our roof that doesn’t even know that other countries exist?”

That had been the straw that broke the camel’s back for Yamada. The kid was so confused about French being another language, and his head tilted when he said the word ‘France’ like that too was a completely alien concept to him. There was a very real possibility that they had a teenager who had lived in the darkest recesses of the criminal underworld for so long that everything normal was new to him.

If nothing else, this was something that he could do for Shinsou. He could teach him what he had missed out on, he could fill in the gaps where school hadn’t been an option for him. Shinsou had missed out on his entire required education, and even if he remembered every lesson from his first year of school, that wasn’t even approaching enough for a boy who would become an adult in just a few short years.

“Actually, I’ve got a better one!” Yamada answers, pulling out the thick manilla envelope from the top drawer of his desk. “I talked to Principal Nezu, and he whipped this up in no-time flat! Actually, he might have already planned this, I didn’t ask- Oh, and he definitely wants to talk to you about some air duct adventures when you get the chance! So, uh, maybe you should stay busy for a while.”

Shouta sighs, glancing back at the wards to make sure that Shinsou is busy helping Eri with her science workbook. “I’ll have an excuse today. Naomasa wanted to meet with me after school.”

Yamada can’t help but look at Shinsou as well, even as he knows that carries the risk of Shinsou becoming suspicious of their conversation. “Is there something going on that I should know about?”

Shouta looks to the side, confirming his suspicions, but he knows he can’t pry right now. He just hopes that Shouta reminds Naomasa who Shinsou’s appointed hero is, since the detective seems to have forgotten to keep him in the loop. “I don’t know myself, but I will. Make sure to yell at Class 1-A if they try to distract him.” ‘ He forgot his phone. Seems scared to tell us. ’

Yamada nods, throwing a thumbs up with one hand while he adjusts the volume on his speakers with the other. Shouta finally breaks into a smile at the prospect of Class 1-A receiving some psychological conditioning to keep them from talking to Shinsou.

Shinsou seems a bit more jumpy than usual as Yamada approaches, but Yamada tries to reassure him with a grin, struggling to keep his own excitement to a minimum. “So, I’ve got a super fun project for us to start on today!”

Shinsou eyes the envelope warily, even as Yamada pulls the thick stack of papers from it. Eri’s eyes brighten at the prospect of grading more papers, and he feels a little bad for having to disappoint her.

“So, I know we’re making a lot of progress on English and JSL, and I’m still just so thrilled that you’re enjoying those lessons! It’s such a nice break from these knuckleheads I’m stuck with most of the day,” Yamada intentionally rambles, placing the first section of the exam on Shinsou’s desk so he can dig out the other tools for it. “But, I think we should see where you are in other subjects! It’s not really fair that Eri gets to study math and science while you’re stuck with languages, ya know?”

Shinsou’s eyes are still locked on the exam like it’s going to bite him, and Yamada hopes this wasn’t a bad idea. That maybe he’s more concerned with having to circle his answers than being unable to answer most of them. He knows that Shinsou should know how to add and subtract, since Eri was working on multiplication when she came to live with them.

“So, we’ve got this nifty little pen here that you can use to circle your answers! You just put it over the answer and click the top,” Yamada says, demonstrating on the top corner of the page. “And presto! All circled and everything!”

Shinsou takes the pen when he offers it, staring at it with wide and curious eyes before his mouth pulls into a frown. He was just a little too observant for his own good.

“A couple of students use that when they have to take really long tests, since circling all those answers can give you a pretty sore hand,” Yamada lies, shaking his hand for effect.

It was a pen that was designed for students who had trouble with using pencils for a variety of reasons, either their hands were too big due to their quirk or they had muscle or nerve issues. Which was something that Shinsou might also struggle with, but Shouta insisted that they shouldn’t bring up.

“And if you see anything that you kind of know, but don’t know how to answer, you can use this pink highlighter so we can go over it later. And this yellow one is for something that’s totally new for you. And don’t worry, I’m expecting to see a lot of yellow when you get to the end of this exam, since it goes all the way to Calculus! And all I know about Calculus is how to spell it!”

Shinsou still didn’t seem to be reassured by that, going stock-still at the thought of not being able to answer something. That was what Yamada was afraid of.

Shinsou had been so terrified of not remembering how to spell ‘job’ that he dissociated on Friday. It was something that Yamada wanted to chalk up to being put on the spot, as some of the most confident hero students tended to get a little stage fright in front of the chalkboard. He thought that Shinsou being able to do the exam on his own time might take enough pressure off of him, or that maybe he had gotten a little more comfortable with Yamada now that he could sign ‘I don’t know.’

It might be something deeper, but Yamada doesn’t have a clue what it is. He knows that it’s not the right time to find out, but before he can take back the exam, Eri pipes up.

“Yama, can I please grade Twenny’s test?” Shinsou turns to Eri, who has her hands pressed together in pleading. “I promise I’ll pick the BEST stickers! I don’t like using the cat stickers ‘cause I wanna keep them, but I promise I’ll use the cat stickers for Twenny’s test! I’ll use all of them!”

Shinsou’s expression finally breaks into a smile, and now Yamada really can’t refuse her. “Of course! In fact, we’re probably going to have to go shopping for some more cute cat stickers! I want to see a cat sticker on every single question! Do you think you’re up for the task, little bean?”

Eri gives him an enthusiastic salute, which he returns without hesitation.

“ ‘ God speed and God bless! ’ ” Yamada answers, pleased to see Shinsou picking up the pen to start answering the questions on his exam.

Relief finally sets in when he counts three clicks before he makes it back to the front of the room.

Twenny should get coffee a lot more often.

Twenny still seemed kind of scared sometimes, but he was trying to be good friends with Zawa and Yama, just like Eri told him to. That made Eri really happy, especially when Zawa and Twenny talked at the same time. The heroes made fun of each other when that happened, and said weird things about why it did. If Izuku and Toshinori talk at the same time, the heroes laugh because Toshinori is Izuku’s dad. If it’s just the heroes, they either say they’re ‘jinxed’ or that they must be really close. Ashi says that in a really weird way, and it sometimes makes the other heroes mad when she does it.

Eri doesn’t spend a lot of time with Ashi, because Ashi is kind of loud sometimes, but Eri is definitely going to spend a lot more time with her now since she’s Twenny’s friend. Twenny doesn’t really know how to make friends, because he didn’t know how to hug Ashi back, but Eri can show him how if she hugs Ashi for him. Just like it’s Eri’s job to talk for Twenny sometimes, it’s going to be her job to hug people for Twenny until he knows how.

And it’s also her job to make sure that Twenny does his tests, even though he doesn’t want to. He was giving the papers a really weird look, kind of like how the heroes look at their homework when they don’t want to do it, but if Yama wants Twenny to do his tests, he’s really got to do it. Yama was right about it not being fair that Twenny teaches Eri everything, because Twenny should get taught different things too.

Eri knows that Twenny will be a really good student for Yama, and he wants to have a lot more good students in his class. Especially because Kaminari wasn’t being a good student, and it seemed like he was being a really bad one today.

“KA-MIN-A-RI,” Yama yells, stopping at different parts of Kaminari’s name like he does when he’s really mad. “I see a beacon of light under your desk, and I don’t think it’s to catch any moths!”

Kaminari tries to smile, but it kind of looks like when Eri tries to smile and it doesn’t work. Eri doesn’t think that will work for Kaminari either.

“Since possessive conjugations are just so beneath you today, let’s try running through the alphabet! A!” Yama says, pointing at Kaminari so he knows to stand up.

Kaminari stands up, but he starts counting with his fingers while he starts saying the alphabet. “B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, M, N.” Kaminari starts to sound kind of embarrassed when the other heroes start laughing, but Eri knows they wouldn't laugh at him, because that's mean. "Q-"

"O!" Eri says. She's trying to be helpful, and stop the heroes from laughing and making Kaminari feel bad, but she doesn't do it right. Kaminari's head moves down like he's trying to look at his shoes, and all the heroes start laughing even louder.

But Yama smiles at her really big, like she was helpful. "Eri! I didn't know you knew English!"

Eri nods, and she's happy that she made Yama happy, but also because the heroes stopped laughing at Kaminari and started looking at her. "Twe- um, Shinsou taught me! He taught me the alphabet, and how to say some stuff!"

Twenny looks at her kind of scared, because maybe he's worried that Zawa would get mad at Eri for almost calling him Twenny. Zawa told her to try not to do that at school, and she tries not to, but she knows he won't get really mad like Him if she doesn't say stuff right. But not even Yama is mad about that, he's just really happy that Eri knows English. "Let's hear it! Take the stage, little, uh, listener!"

Zawa must have told Yama not to call her 'little bean' at school too, because it kind of sounded like he was going to. Eri stands up on her chair, even though she's not really supposed to, but the heroes wouldn't be able to see her if she stood up by her desk. "A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, M, N, O, P, Q, R, S, T, U, V, W, X, Y, and Z!"

Yama starts clapping, and some of the heroes do too. Some of the other heroes are still picking on Kaminari, but she tries to give them a mean face to stop them. Yama also gives them a mean look, and that stops them, but he's back to smiling when he looks at Eri. "Can you say 'Hello' or 'Goodbye'?"

Eri remembers how to say 'Hello', but Twenny didn't teach her what 'Goodbye' means. "Twenny didn't teach me a whole lot, 'cause-"

"I didn't," Twenny says, even though he doesn't look at her because he's too busy scratching the back of his neck. "I didn't teach you how to say it right."

Twenny sounds like he's kind of embarrassed about that, but Yama tells his class all the time that even if they don't know how to say something hard, they should always try. Eri pats his head to make him feel better.

"It's okay, Twenny! We're in English class, so we can learn how to say it right from now on!" Twenny still looks like he doesn't want her to say the words he taught her, but Yama looks like he really does. " 'Hello! My name is Eri! I'm a good girl!' "

A lot of heroes make 'Aww' sounds, and Yama covers his mouth like he does sometimes when he doesn't want to make a weird noise or laugh. But Eri knows he's not trying to laugh at her, he's probably just embarrassed to make that weird sound that he does when she does something cute.

" 'Are you from America? Can you take me with you?' " Eri wants to say everything she knows, so she can make sure she says them right, but Twenny pulls on her dress like he wants her attention, and makes the 'Danger' sign at her. It doesn't really make sense that he does it, but maybe he's worried that she's going to fall off her chair, so she jumps down and sits in it right.

Ocha stands up with her hand raised, but she doesn't wait for Yama to call on her. "Present Mic-sensei! We need to have a field trip to America!"

"My family's company will be able to offer a sponsorship-" Momo says, but a lot of heroes start talking over her while they try to convince Yama to let them go to America.

“HOLD ON!” Yama says, yelling really loud so the heroes stop yelling at him. When they do, he puts his hand on his chin in a Thinking Yama pose. “I can have a budget worked up just in time for the semi-quarter staff meeting, and if I work it around to say that you guys need more interaction with native speakers, maybe find a few exchange programs with the American hero schools-”

“ ‘ Florida! ’ ” Kaminari shouts, throwing his fists in the air. “ ‘ Disneyworld! ’ ”

Yama’s eyes go really big, and then he smiles super big too. “ ‘ YES! ’ Kaminari, you’re a ‘ GENIUS! ’ ”

The heroes get super excited, and all of them start yelling about how much they want to go to ‘ Disneyworld. ’ Even Twenny seems like he’s not scared anymore, since he starts working on his test again, and he’s even smiling.

“Aw man, thanks Shinsou!” Kirishima says, turning around to look at Twenny. “We’ve been trying to get Mic-sensei to take us to ‘ Disneyworld ’ all year, and thanks to you and Eri, he really can’t say no!”

“What’s ‘ Disneyworld ? ’ ” Eri asks. It must be a really fun place if all the heroes are excited about it.

“It’s the happiest place on Earth!” Hagakure says, bouncing up and down like she does when she’s excited. “There’s roller coasters and fun rides and American food and cute cartoon animals! Mickey Mouse is there too! If you go to America, you’ve GOT to go to ‘ Disneyworld! ’ ”

Eri looks at Twenny, and pulls on his sleeve because he looks like he’s really busy with his test. “I’m glad your plan didn’t work, Twenny! Now we both get to go to ‘ Disneyworld, ’ instead of just me!”

Twenny looks at her really scared, like she really messed something up, but she doesn’t know what he’s scared of. Nothing bad happens at school, but Twenny thinks that a lot of bad things happen here, even though she’s tried to tell him they won’t.

“Twenny made a lot of ‘get out’ plans for us! He taught me how to say stuff in English so if I got out but he got lost, then I could go to America and be safe! ‘Cause we thought He couldn’t go to America, but then we found out He could, so Twenny made other plans,” Eri starts squeezing her hands like Yama taught her, just in case she started thinking about Him and it made her dizzy. “Twenny even told me to talk to heroes if I got outside, and that’s how I met Izuku and Mirio! And that’s why we both got out, instead of just me!”

Eri looks up, because the heroes aren’t yelling anymore. A lot of them are staring at her like she said something weird again. Even Yama is kind of staring at her like that, and she really doesn’t like it.

“Y-You didn’t think Togata-sempai was American?” Izuku says, trying to smile at her but he always gets kind of nervous when he talks in class. “C-cause, I mean, he looks kind of like- with the blonde hair and everything-”

“I resemble that remark!” Yama says, like he’s play-mad. “It seems like you guys need a crash-course on what Americans look like before we head off to ‘Disneyworld!’ Let’s start by naming American actors, you guys call out a name, and I’ll put them up on the screen!”

Yama starts setting up the projector while a lot of the heroes start yelling names. After Yama finishes getting set up, he puts pictures of people up on the screen and picks a hero to tell him what they look like in English.

Eri doesn’t think that’s what they were supposed to do in class today, but she’s kind of happy that Yama does it.

But Twenny still looks really scared, even after the heroes stop looking at him.

What Shinsou didn’t know about coffee, was that it often caused a crash.

The kid put up a good fight. Aizawa noticed that he was dragging his feet when he walked into the staff room, that he was slouched over his exam so heavily that sleep would take him in just a matter of time. The teen kept glancing over at him, as though the movement could put off the inevitable, but in the end, his head fell against his arm on the desk and his breathing evened out.

Aizawa didn’t protest when Eri started glancing between the sleeping bag and Shinsou. He gave her permission to use it. She had to stand on her tip-toes to reach, but the sleeping bag was now tucked over Shinsou’s shoulders, and no longer an option for him to use.

The ache in Aizawa’s limbs might be put off for a few more hours if he indulged in a second cup, so he started brewing the sub-par coffee that Nezu kept ordering for the staff room. He probably did it out of spite, a lingering resentment to the humans that he couldn’t torment as well as the students, but UA certainly had the budget for something better.

Eri shifted her weight between her feet, the only indication of nervousness he needed to focus his attention on her. “Is something wrong?”

Eri tilted her head at him. “Twenny’s acting really scared today. Is it ‘cause he has the Mondays?”

Aizawa couldn’t help the smile pulling at his lips, a bit relieved that she seemed to think that ‘Mondays’ were some kind of illness, but not one that she considered dangerous. “I think that Shinsou had a rough morning. School can be overwhelming at times, but Class 1-A might be making it worse. They want to connect with Shinsou in ways he’s not ready for yet.”

Eri looks over at Shinsou, nodding. “He’ll feel better after a nap, though. He was kinda grumpy at Monoma, ‘cause Monoma really wanted to look at his test. Kendo had to chop him a couple times before he stopped.”

Aizawa hums, recalling Hizashi’s suspicions about that particular member of Class B’s interest in Shinsou. If Monoma wasn’t careful, his little crush might end up earning him far greater injuries than Kendo seemed to cause on a daily basis. “I wonder if Kan will let me move her into Class A. They could certainly use her firm hand.”

Of course, Kan had been vehemently opposed to the idea. “You had a reason to pass them over before, and you should have realized that having an uneven number would cause problems during training. Find a kid from GenEd instead of stealing one of mine! ”

At the beginning of the year, he didn't think having 19 students would be an issue. It wasn't unusual for him to expel or transfer half of the group that he started out with. His current class was the first to make it this far without a single change in the roster, and by this point, he had given up on waiting for one of them to fail. Even Hagakure was becoming more confident in being placed in the hero course, much to Powerloader's disappointment.

Eri started eying the couch against the wall, her eyelids starting to look heavier. She had been a bit more lethargic the past few days, and Aizawa had no doubt that her quirk building up might have affected that. Just like with Shinsou's quirk, he was surprised that she hadn't had any issues with it until now based on how often Chisaki had forced her to use it.

When he saw the small yawn and the glance in his direction, he gave up all hope for that second cup, and accepted the aching hips that would no doubt linger the rest of the day. Just like the coffee machine, he was sure Nezu selected a couch that wasn't well-padded in the middle, meaning that the cross beam from the frame dug into the spine of whoever was naive enough to try to sleep on it.

That might have been an attack on Aizawa, but the animal principal would never let him know.

At this point, he didn't need to ask if Eri wanted to take a nap. He knew as soon as he laid down, she would make herself comfortable, curled up on his shoulder and clinging to his side. With the narrowness of the couch, that wasn't exactly feasible, but she made it work out for her. She dug her sharp little knees into his stomach and pulled herself on top of him with a hand fisted in his shirt, and despite nearly knocking the wind out of him, she felt nearly weightless on his chest.

Eri sighed as though this was the most comfortable position in the world, right as he felt the sharp edge of that wooden beam on his lower back. He tucked an arm around her back, just in case she happened to roll off of him, and accepted his fate. He didn't have a patrol tonight, wouldn't have one tomorrow. His body shouldn't get used to this odd reprieve from injury.

Being beaten up by a sleepy 5 year old certainly wasn't the worst thing that could happen to him.

That would probably be waking up to Midnight's shit eating grin.

“Hm, daycare workers aren't supposed to nap during naptime. And you're out of uniform too,” Nemuri teased, earning a glare that she had built up an immunity to years ago.

Aizawa brushed his hair away from his face, finding the ends of it still trapped in Eri's hold. He couldn't feel his legs at this point, but he had a slightly greater concern. “Where's Shinsou?”

“Napping all by his lonesome,” Nemuri pouted playfully, before it cut into an accusatory smirk. “But I'm glad he has rights to the sleeping bag.”

Satisfied, Aizawa looked down at his current situation. There didn't seem to be a way to adjust his position without waking Eri up. He would have to accept that he wouldn't have the use of his legs until she did, even if that meant that there was no escape for him.

“There was this odd memo in my inbox this morning,” Nemuri said, pressing a finger to her chin. “I think someone stole your identity, and now they're trying to-“

“I have wards,” Aizawa interrupted, watching Eri's foot kick the cushion in hopes that the other would follow suit. “I don't have time for whatever you're plotting to do to me tomorrow, and they don't need the added stress."

Her smile, at first irritatingly amused, became sinister as she met his eyes. "Aizawa. Modeling behavior means that you have to teach them how to celebrate a birthday." Damn her. "Don't worry, I've already made the adjustments. We'll have party streamers and hats, and the cake won't even have a stripper inside. All you have to do is smile and be a happy little birthday boy."

He sighed, his head falling back on the arm rest as Eri decided that her foot was more comfortable on his thigh than at his side. "Shinsou does not need this right now. With Eri's quirk and..." He stopped, watching Eri whine and pull herself up a bit further, worried that she had heard her name or was having a nightmare. Another sigh and she relaxed, and he spoke a bit more softly. "We have a lead. One that he needs to talk about."

Nemuri's eyes were softened as she watched the 5 year old slumber on his chest, but they hardened when they looked at him. "I was worried you were going to say he doesn't need to know what a birthday looks like because he wouldn't be your ward by then."

That was something that Aizawa didn't want to think about.

It was the nature of wardships that they ended. There was an investigation to complete, and when the ward was out of danger, they were removed from the hero's home after a suitable one was found.

He imagined that he and Hizashi would have a fair amount of input to decide where Shinsou would be placed, what family would take him in. Hizashi would be thorough, he would know the signs to look out for from firsthand experience, and he imagined even Hizashi's mother would pull from all the contacts she had in the foster care system to make sure that Shinsou would be safe and well-cared for.

And the 5 year old sleeping so peacefully now would lose the only family she ever had.

He doubted she would ever forgive them for it, and he honestly wouldn't blame her. As unhealthy as it was beneath the surface, Shinsou and Eri's relationship was vital to each of them. They were safety to each other, a familiar balm to their wounds. Eri was only slightly better adjusted to the company of others, but if she had to be parted from him again and know that he wasn't missing, he was just away in a place that he belonged and she didn't, she would reject them.

She would hate them.

"I don't think Shinsou's the only one worried about Eri's quirk," Nemuri whispered, trailing her fingers over his arm, knowing that it was trapped around Eri's waist.

"Shinsou said it was triggered by pain. Emotional as well, it seems," Aizawa explained, running his fingers through the ends of Eri's hair. "He knows more about her quirk than I do, and I can't assume his anxiety is unfounded."

"Then you need to ask him about it," Nemuri says, as though it were that easy.

"He doesn't trust me," Aizawa whispers. "To ask him to trust me with Eri's quirk, after what Chisaki did--"

Nemuri chuckled quietly, her eyes wandering from his still numb feet to the arm around Eri's waist. "If he saw this, I think he'd be convinced."

"Or threatened."

Nemuri rolls her eyes, rising to walk to the coffee machine and help herself to the pot he brewed.
“So pessimistic-“

“Mom?”

Aizawa sits up before he realizes it, and though his arm is still holding Eri to his chest, she wakes with bleary eyes and a swaying head, before she lays back down. He still can't see Shinsou very well from this angle, only the edge of his shoulder and arm as it rises to touch his head. He wishes he could tell if he was checking for a muzzle after what he said, to tell Naomasa to add it to Shinsou Ui's charges.

Shinsou jolts to standing, his chair squealing against the floor before his head pops over the cubicle wall. Even the red imprint of his arm on the side of his face can't detract from his clear panic, which softens with an audible exhale when he sees Eri.

And that was honestly a bit surprising.

“Good morning, sleepyhead!” Midnight calls, making sure that Shinsou wouldn't be alarmed to find her presence later on. He still seemed surprised, a flash of a frown afterwards, but half-signed ‘Good Morning’ back to her before he remembered he wouldn't be understood.

“Shinsou signed ‘Good Morning,’ ” Aizawa translates, catching another glance in his direction from the teen. “Though he doesn't have to be polite to you. ”

Nemuri hummed, stirring the creamer in her cup as she leaned her back against the counter, making sure her body language was open, relaxed. Catching that Shinsou was still evaluating her threat level. “Shinsou is a very polite young man, despite the company he has to keep. Hopefully, he'll be a good influence on you.”

Aizawa noticed that Shinsou's attention had been caught by something, his eyes narrowing ever so slightly. Was it the whip at Midnight's side? Had he been-

‘ Coffee. ’

Aizawa considered turning his head away to give Shinsou the impression that he hadn't seen him sign that, but decided against it. “You can't have coffee. Chiyo was very strict about that, and you wouldn't like the flavor of that one. It's only slightly better than instant. ”

Midnight shot him a smirk, wordlessly mocking him for having a taste for good coffee. He didn't have one until he and Hizashi started dating, the blonde latching on to the one place that Aizawa would enjoy going to take him to increasingly expensive coffee shops. By their 6 month anniversary, Aizawa had lost the ability to stomach instant.

They hadn't told Shinsou that he couldn't stomach it either, not until his health improved. The purple haired teen didn't protest, but his eyes remained locked on Nemuri's cup, who wasn't cruel enough to drink out of it yet. Aizawa didn't doubt that the teen was trying to devise a way to get coffee despite his denial.

Before Aizawa could come up with a good distraction, Hizashi and Toshinori entered the staff room, Hizashi still laughing at a joke that seemed to be at the retired hero's expense. The sound of Hizashi's voice woke Eri completely, her heel digging into his hip bone when she sprang up to pull Shinsou towards the bathroom to wash their hands.

He trusted Hizashi to make sure the hall was safe as the wards made their trip while he tried to rub the feeling back into his legs.

“How underweight is he?” Nemuri asked, finally partaking in her coffee.

“Very,” Aizawa answered, hissing as a sharp pain announced the pins and needles running down half of his body. “Eri was in far better condition.” He’s almost certain that Shinsou was the reason for that.

“I happened to have a conversation with Recovery Girl about that,” Toshinori said, setting down a white box at the cubicle Shinsou had been sitting at. “It turns out that I’m a bit of an expert, considering my own condition. I have some supplements that will help, and these cupcakes are well-within his limits. I think they’re rather tasty myself.”

Aizawa hummed, sending his husband a pointed look. “Thank you, Toshinori. It’s nice to have someone take precautions with Shinsou’s health.”

Hizashi sputtered. “Look, I really couldn’t - it was the first real question he asked! If I didn’t reward that-”

Midnight tsked. “Whipped. Both of you are absolutely whipped, and it’s infecting the entire school. Even the students who haven’t met them yet are talking about making offerings to UA’s new mascots for good luck on their midterms.”

Aizawa wondered if Nezu would still receive a pile of anonymously sent teas outside his office door next week. If he would be insulted if he didn’t.

If he would have to defend his wards against his boss if he didn’t.

Midoriya finished the last of his dumpling set, wondering if he should return to Lunch Rush for a second serving or if the food just hadn’t settled in his stomach yet. He was still trying to catch up on the calories he burned from training with Kacchan so much over the weekend. Kacchan had a habit of approaching him or Kirishima to go out and spar when something irritated him, and Shinsou’s comments in the group chat seemed to bring that out a lot.

That was pretty concerning, but he knew Kacchan wouldn’t talk to him about it. And he trusted that after the fight he had with Shinsou, most of his threats were just bluster and pride. Most of them.

Midoriya startled as Ashido slammed her tray into the empty space between himself and Tokoyami, huffing as she did. “I’m sitting with the smart kids today, because NOBODY in Bakusquad has any brain cells at all!”

Midoriya looked to see Jirou slump further into her chair, and Kirishima send him a guilty shrug. Bakugo caught his eye for only a second before he kicked his chair out and started calling after Monoma.

“The name ‘Bakusquad’ gives the impression that you’re all very insular,” Tokoyami mused, sending a glare towards the window as the sky brightened, the clouds parting for a moment. “Perhaps it’s regrettably self-imposed.”

Ashido tore open a bag of chips violently, sending several scattering across the table. When she noticed, she gave a frustrated shout and buried her hands in her hair. “AUGH! Why is it Monday?! Why do Mondays exist?! Can’t we just stop having Mondays and name them something else?!”

“The assumption that Mondays are bad luck is a self-fulfilling prophecy, kero,” Tsuyu said, tongue darting out to snatch one of Ashido’s chips as payment for her two-cents.

Ochako nodded. “Just pretend it’s Tuesday! Then, you won’t be blaming bad luck on a Monday, so you won’t have to go through the day thinking that something worse is going to happen!”

Ashido took a deep breath, exhaling loudly. “Okay. That’s a good plan. It’s Tuesday now, the curse is broken-”

“Curses can’t be broken so easily,” Tokoyami chuckled, while Shoji rolled his eyes.

“Midoriya. Hug,” Ashido demanded, holding her arms open for him. Despite how awkward it felt to hug Ashido in such a public place, Midoriya did, tucking an arm around her shoulders while she squeezed him so tight that he worried that there might be a reason she usually went to Kirishima for this. Eventually, she sighed in relief, slapping his back hard enough that he could feel every bruise under her palm. “Much better. Now the curse is definitely broken.”

Todoroki stared at Midoriya, either forgetting that his ability to not blink for long periods of time was a little unsettling, or considering whether to have another theory talk to dispel any tension in the air. “Why have you abandoned Bakugo’s pack today?”

Midoriya really hoped this wouldn’t turn into another ‘Bakugo is a werewolf’ discussion.

“Because I need smart brains to help me with something,” Ashido answered, smiling as she tossed a chip in the air to catch it in her mouth. And didn’t wait to swallow before she started talking again. “So, I’ve got this friend, and he doesn’t like being touched-”

“Shinsou,” Todoroki assumed, and hit the nail right on the head, judging by the way Ashido froze.

“Jeez, I really am at the right table,” Ashido muttered, perhaps forgetting that she had threatened everyone in Class 1-A with both Aizawa’s and her own wrath in the changing rooms this morning. “Yeah, so I know that I said all that stuff already, and Sensei might probably kill me, like, for real, but... I need to hug him and I can’t so help?”

Iida looked up from his Hero Ethics textbook with a frown. “Aizawa-sensei is trusted with Shinsou’s care, and if he believes that physical contact with Shinsou would be detrimental, we should abide by his words.”

“But, it’s Sensei we’re talking about here!” Ashido said, chopping her hand over her tray to either mock Iida or just subconsciously mirroring his habits. “He probably doesn’t see anything wrong with that! Does he even hug Eri?”

“He does! He, um,” Midoriya trailed off, scratching his head nervously as he noticed everyone’s stares, his voice dropping to a mutter. “She says they cuddle a lot, so you don’t have to worry about that.”

“But does Shinsou get cuddles?” Kaminari asked, standing behind Midoriya with a hand cupped around his chin. “Does he even get the Good Boy pat?”

Ashido narrowed her eyes at Kaminari, but turned and huffed instead of acknowledging him directly. Yaoyorozu didn’t look up from her Art History textbook, still reading as she spoke. “Humans require 17 positive touches a day to avoid detriment to their mental health. Ashido might have a justifiable concern.”

Todoroki placed his chopsticks on his tray, meeting Ashido’s eyes. “I have a theory.”

Ashido nodded encouragingly, while Midoriya hoped it wasn’t the one Todoroki had told him and Koda about yesterday.

“I believe we were lied to about the nature of Shinsou’s quirk.” Midoriya fought the urge to cover his face, his suspicions already confirmed. “Eri’s fear of cats. Soba’s hostile reaction to him. Aizawa-sensei’s protectiveness. They’re all connected.”

Ashido started nodding more vigorously with every pause Todoroki took, and at this point, everyone but Midoriya was watching with anticipation.

“Shinsou’s quirk allows him to turn into a cat.”

Ashido froze, then collapsed face-down on the table, whining. “That’s not his-“

“He was supposed to keep Eri from escaping by transforming whenever she attempted it. She would be paralyzed with fear from the sight. Soba is very territorial, and could tell that Shinsou was an intruder in his domain. And Aizawa-sensei is a cat person. He instinctively knows what would make Shinsou uncomfortable, but he seems to be at a loss in some areas, which is why he had that book.” Todoroki explained, nonplussed by Ashido’s reaction. “ ‘Loving Your Feral Cat.’ Shinsou may not have been socialized early on in his life-“

“He was!” Ashido argues, springing up. “I know his quirk, I know- I knew Shinsou!”

“Feral cats are unique,” Todoroki continues, barely seeming to register Ashido’s outburst. “In that they don’t trust human contact at first. Trust has to be built through offerings, and small steps. By offering your hand like this,” Todoroki lifts his hand, fingers remaining limp. “They can decide whether to approach, to rub against your hand or smell it to get used to your scent.”

Ashido paused, then mirrored Todoroki’s hand. “So, they can choose, right? So it’s not scary....”

Kaminari held out his hand to Ashido, palm facing her. “High five?”

Ashido beamed, slapping Kaminari’s palm so loudly that students from the surrounding tables looked over. “Kaminari, you’re on a roll today! Looks like you’ll be sitting with the smart kids in no time!”

Kaminari grinned back, shaking his hand as he withdrew it. “So, coming back to Bakutable-“

“Nope!” Ashido rejected, crossing her arms in front of her for emphasis. “If I stay here, my GPA will get better just through that osmoso-thingy. And Ocha needs to give me her chocolate covered potato chip hookup.”

Kaminari’s eyes widened, then moved to sit in Ashido’s chair with her. They managed to make it work, both of them half-falling off the chair, and while Ashido talked to Ochako about the specialty snack shop in the mall, Kaminari laid his head on the table, stroking it as though to encourage the type of osmosis both he and Ashido were hoping for.

Midoriya didn’t have the heart to tell them that there was a vacant chair at the table right behind them.

Aizawa should have taken advantage of Shinsou's surprising friendliness towards Toshinori, and asked the retired hero to watch him during his free period.

While he ignored the other teachers who filtered into the staff room, something that Midnight had probably orchestrated so that both wards would be more familiar with them before tomorrow, Shinsou paid a great deal of attention to Toshinori. At first, it was to wave off the carrot cupcakes and apologize for Friday, which Toshinori in turn waved off as an accident and ill-planning on his part.

Shinsou didn't eat any of the cupcakes, and might have been making conversation to distract from that, but the things he signed had seemed like genuine attempts to connect with Toshinori. He even translated the retired hero's catch phrase into JSL, which Toshinori had apparently taught himself, sputtering that he was touched by the gesture before Hizashi could translate for Shinsou.

Now that Aizawa is faced with the threshold of Class 3-A's Hero Ethics, he realized that those attempts might not have been entirely genuine, but manipulative. Shinsou might have been under the impression that Toshinori was seeking to use Eri's quirk to regain the former strength of his own, and was deliberately making himself closer to the retired hero to determine whether he was truly a threat.

And now Shinsou would be sitting behind Togata, someone that he knew would need Eri's quirk in the near future. Eri had told Shinsou herself, and hadn't exactly hidden her excitement about her growing horn, as even now she had a hand raised to feel it. She might be considering hiding it to reveal to Togata with a flourish, promising the student that she would be able to fix his quirk soon.

A glance at Shinsou's stiffened posture and blank face confirmed that he wasn't likely to treat Togata with any friendliness, and the hand hovering close to his knife made Aizawa uneasy.

"Amajiki, switch seats with Togata," Aizawa ordered as soon as he entered 3-A's classroom. He didn't look to see if any students were confused by that, keeping his expression blank as he placed his notes on the podium. The sound of chairs being pushed back to comply was interrupted by Eri's predictable outburst, which immediately drew his attention.

"Look, Mirio!" Eri exclaimed, pointing at her horn and beaming at the blonde student. "My horn grew! My quirk is gonna work soon!"

Togata smiled back at her, too surprised to hide the hope apparent in his eyes, ruffling her hair excitedly. Amajiki's smile was a mix of hope, relief, and pleading for Eri's quirk to return Togata's before the semester ended, or else he would have to graduate without his oldest friend at his side. "I'm really happy about that, Eri-"

"Tell me if it starts to hurt, Eri," Shinsou interrupted, his voice too low and threatening to be truly meant for her ears. Aizawa couldn't see the expression on his face, but he knew by Amajiki's narrowed eyes that it just as threatening as his tone, and directed at Togata. "I know it can be extremely painful at times."

Eri turned to Shinsou with a frown, her eyebrows knitted together in confusion over why Shinsou would mention that now. Togata's falling smile was kept hidden from her, as was the way he withdrew his hand and shot a glance in Aizawa's direction.

But the smile returned when Togata spoke to Eri. "You should definitely let Shinsou or Aizawa-sensei know, Eri. I don't want you to be in any kind of pain. Even if it's just a little tiny ache, you have plenty of heroes to save you from it!"

Shinsou guided Eri to her desk, not so subtly moving it closer to his with his foot hooked around the leg. While Togata stared at the board, still refusing to let his smile drop, Amajiki glared at his desk. The other students of 3-A mirrored Amajiki's reaction, and Aizawa doubted that his lecture would truly be heard by any of them.

He tried to engage them more often to distract them, and more than once had to erase Shizuo's quirk when their spines subtly extended, taking Shinsou's locked stare at Togata as a more immediate threat than it was. He counted himself lucky that Shinsou didn't notice, knowing that an obvious threat from Shizuo wouldn't be taken lightly in his already heightened state.

Eri also didn't notice the tension in the air, distracted by a drawing that he hoped wasn't a gift for Togata.

The chime to announce the end of the class period came with only a brief moment of relief before Aizawa noticed Amajiki stand and turn to Shinsou, his back straightened from his usual slouch. Eri took advantage of Shinsou's attention being focused elsewhere to hand off her gift to Togata, which he accepted with his usual heartfelt appreciation.

"I don't think you know Togata very well," Amajiki said, his voice even and confident in a way that only seemed to occur when he was speaking about his friend. "I think if you did, you would know why even now he's a peerless hero."

Shinsou's jaw clenched, but he refused to break the staredown he was having with Amajiki until Togata clapped a hand on his friend's shoulder. "Tamaki, don't say embarrassing things like that! Just be direct and tell Shinsou that you want us to play Pokemon Go together sometime!"

Amajiki deflated, the redness on the tips of his pointed ears revealing that had been something the student wanted to do before today. Nejire took advantage of the other members of Big Three being distracted to scoop Eri into her arms, holding her to her chest like a teddy bear as she joined the discussion. "Right?! Tamaki's super embarrassing! And he's a super duper big nerd about Pokemon! It's embarrassing! You should see for yourself how embarrassing it is!"

Shinsou seemed to find something reassuring in Eri's contentment in being treated like an oversized doll, his glare flickering before he seemed to relax. ' Fine. I don't... '

His hands twitched before he laid them back on the desk, tension working its way back into his jaw while he stared at them. Before Aizawa could translate for him, Shinsou surprised him completely.

"Okay," Shinsou spoke, still refusing to look up from the desk. His eyes narrowed, his jaw working around another word that he wasn't able to form, but he was distracted by Togata's loud cheer.

"Yes! I'm excited! I can't wait to show you all the gyms me and Tamaki control! It's supposed to be super sunny on Wednesday, so maybe we can catch some exclusive sun-type Pokemon!"

Togata said, drawing Shinsou's gaze back to him though it lacked the hostility from before.

"You're Team Instinct, right? Or maybe Mystic, like Tamaki-"

"You three are going to be late for your next class," Aizawa interrupted, hoping to avoid the possibility of Togata asking to see Shinsou's phone to check. Nejire whined as she set Eri back down, begging to take her to their next class so they could spend the rest of the day playing with each other's hair. Aizawa wasn't sure why Shinsou didn't react to that as a threat, or why he waved goodbye to Nejire without prompting.

But if Shinsou's attitude could flip so quickly between threat and friendliness, Aizawa could only assume that they were both used with the same intention. To protect Eri by violence or manipulation, whichever suited his perception of the situation.

He found himself hoping Shinsou chose to be threatening when they met again for Class 1-A's homeroom.

Yamada could have found himself a little disappointed in Shinsou wordlessly deciding to work on his exam rather than taking a break for an English lesson, but the budget he committed to planning wasn't going to make itself.

The silence from his wards as they worked on their lessons seemed a little stifling, though. Yamada found himself glancing up from his phone just to make sure they were still there, the pauses between Shinsou's pen clicks and Eri's page-turning seeming to grow a bit longer as the period went on.

And just as both wards seemed to have something they were worried about, they both looked up to bring it up at the same time. 'I don't-'

"Yama, can you teach me English?" Eri asked, unaware that Shinsou had started signing.

Yamada looked to each ward, unsure who he should address first until Shinsou folded his hands and looked at Eri. A wide smile overtook Yamada's face with the decision made for him. "Of course! I'd be happy to! I'll have to find some workbooks for us to do it right, because I've only taught high school level English. But is there anything you want to learn today, like numbers or how to say good morning?"

"I wanna learn how to say the stuff Twenny taught me right," Eri answered, unaware of the clench in Shinsou's hand.

Yamada tried to keep his own uneasiness from becoming noticeable. Eri said that Shinsou had taught her to approach a tourist if he got 'lost' during an escape attempt, but Yamada knew what he really meant by that. He didn't like thinking about what Shinsou must have felt when he made those plans, didn't want to know how many he made with the intention of laying down his own life for Eri's.

How close he was to doing something reckless before the raid took place, and the heroes he had given up on finally arrived.

"I don't really have anything to teach you there," Yamada said, leaning against the back of his chair. "English is pretty tricky to speak sometimes, but you did a really great job! You and Shinsou must have practiced a lot."

Eri looked to Shinsou, expecting him to be as pleased with his praise as she was, but the purple haired teen refused to look up from his desk. "Twenny, Yama said I did it right! You did a good job teaching me, so don't be sad."

"I'm not sad," Shinsou answered, resting a hand on Eri's head while he turned to look at her. "I'm happy about that."

Neither Yamada nor Eri were convinced by Shinsou's flat tone. "Were you going to sign something, Shinsou?" Yamada asked, hoping his answer would distract Eri from prodding further, and Shinsou from the memories that her interest in English seemed to bring up.

Shinsou pulled his hand away with a flash of a frown, hesitating before he answered. 'I don't have plans.'

He might have wanted to sign more, but his hands were shaking too badly for it. Shinsou pressed them together on his desk and shrank in on himself, still not looking up from his desk.

Yamada wished it had been just painful memories that caused Shinsou to recoil like that. That he had tried to stop Eri from speaking in 1-A's English class because of those memories, or even a fear of disappointing Yamada somehow. That Shinsou had refused to look at him during lunch because he wanted to talk to Toshinori.

That Shinsou wasn't trembling in fear of Yamada like he would if Chisaki had discovered those plans.

Yamada had no idea how Shouta could stand it.

He could feel his own heart being ripped apart, betrayed by that comparison and desperate to prove it wrong. Not because Yamada didn't want to be seen as a villain, or was hurt that Shinsou could think of him that way after all their progress, but because the kid was safe. Shinsou was safe, but so used to terror that he didn't recognize it, couldn't know the difference between heroes and villains when both had failed him in different ways. He wanted to scream that it was different, that this was what Shinsou had always deserved, but words were nothing in the face of what Shinsou had been violently taught to expect.

"It's okay, Shinsou," Yamada tried to keep the distress from his voice, tried to be reassuring even if he had no idea how. "I wouldn't be mad if you did. You shouldn't feel trapped here. I'm really proud of you, to be honest. A lot of people wouldn't have had the guts to try to get out, but you did. And in the end, you beat him, right? You both came out safe."

Shinsou flinches at the vague mention of Chisaki, too vulnerable to hide it, but he looks at Yamada with wide eyes that aren't entirely out of fear. That bit of surprise in his expression gives him hope that Shinsou might remember this, might trust it just a little bit more.

"Yeah, Twenny! We're safe now," Eri adds, closing the distance between them to wrap her arms around his, holding him tightly. "We're really really safe, I promise! You can't be scared because we live with heroes, and they keep everyone safe! It's Yama and Zawa's job!"

"That's right," Yamada said, trying to distract Eri from trying to force Shinsou to believe her through her desperate pleading, sure that the kid would fake it for her sake. "Shou and I have one job that's more important than all the others, and it's keeping you guys safe. And other than a few slip ups with Soba and the students, I think we're doing alright so far--"

'S-O-B-A not dangerous. Hero students not dangerous.' Shinsou paused, considering though his blank expression didn't betray what was on his mind. 'I'm not weak.'

That expression couldn't tell Yamada whether he meant that as a threat, out of pride, or an attempt to convince himself of it. The kid hadn't given them any indication that not being able to use his quirk bothered him, his muteness only seemed to be an issue when he tried to communicate with others who didn't know JSL. But Shinsou was a little weaker because of it, and he hoped the confidence he had now wouldn't break later on.

"I know you're not, kiddo," Yamada reassured. "I've never thought you were. We're not protecting you because you're weak, it's because you deserve it. Because I want you guys to feel safe."

The bell announcing the end of the period came at the worst time, just as he caught a flicker of Shinsou's eyebrows rising and knotting, eyes wide in a confused and desperate way. And that was all covered up by the mask before Yamada could think to soothe it, to insist once again that Shinsou was safe in the hopes that his vulnerability would let him understand it.

Yamada would tell him as many times as he needed to, would prove it every chance that he had.

Shinsou was safe now. And he would start to believe it in time.

Chapter Summary

27 is having a difficult Monday, and a familiar threat arises to make it even worse. But 27 has long since learned how to spin threats into opportunities, and while intending to avoid Yamada, he makes a risky play. And the information that both he and Aizawa gain from it changes things for them drastically.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Near anxiety attack, desire for harm (not self-inflicted), references to sexual abuse that are not described in a healthy manner (Specifically: Bakugo thinks that Shinsou was "bad touched and can't do shit anyway", asks "They do shit that you fucking had to show on a doll or some shit?", and thinks to himself that Shinsou wears hoodies like a survivor of sexual abuse might, and if he "perpetuates" that onto Eri, that Bakugo would kill him.) Bakugo is concerned that Shinsou might be self-harming, and specifically references a knife that he finds, and dissociation.

Previously on Wards of UA: Eri's horn has grown, causing Shinsou to worry that she could be harmed for her quirk. Shinsou has been messaging the students of Class 1-A, but avoiding interacting with them at school. Shinsou verbally agreed to play Pokemon Go with the Big Three in the class before this. Yamada gave Shinsou a math test to see where he scored, with a pen made to overcome his injured hand and color coded highlighters to mark new concepts for him. In the previous chapter, Yamada said that Shinsou beat Chisaki when he was terrified after telling Yamada that he didn't have plans to escape from UA. Shinsou threatened to mutilate Bakugo's hands if he looked at Eri, while in the chat. Bakugo wants to meet with Shinsou, and justifies it as part of his 100 page essay on trauma related disorders when he requested it from Aizawa. Shinsou told Eri that he doesn't want to be friends with Bakugo, he just wants to make him so angry that his head explodes and sprays candy everywhere. Shinsou learned that using someone's first name was a sign of being close to them, and has been trying to stop thinking of Midoriya as 'Izuku.' Uraraka and Asui mentioned in the chat that the reason they knew Shinsou's hair was damaged from the bleach baths was because they volunteered at the hospital that Eri was staying at, and saw a picture of him that the staff provided in her room. Yamada gave Shinsou coffee that morning. Aizawa asked how his students fought in the sparring matches that Shinsou had with them, which Shinsou interprets as advising him in their training. Shinsou revealed the existence of surveillance cameras in the 1-A dorm in the chat. Shinsou also revealed to 1-A that he doesn't like oatmeal. Todoroki said that the reason Aizawa couldn't pay for surrogacy services in Shinsou's conception was due to Aizawa being an underground hero, and which is one of the lowest paid positions in the hero industry. Shinsou said that he knew where a sniper would set up due to 'training,' but was not referring to knowing how to shoot a gun. Shinsou doesn't need to talk to Eri to bring her under his quirk, but has had quirk slips from asking her a question, and thus refrains from doing so. Shinsou did research on traumatized children, noticing that Eri is traumatized, and also noticed that Aizawa and Yamada use some techniques for helping traumatized children on him, but he refuses to believe that he is traumatized.

27 wanted this day to be over.

His nerves sang with his attention too divided. Eri working on her science workbook, each of the hero students in turn, his owner glaring up from his book, the clock on the wall that didn't seem to move like it should. That clock was trying to torture him, keeping him in this place with the heroes and Eri and if they moved he couldn't protect Eri from all of them.

He forced himself to look back at his test. A job. An easy one, he thought at first. It could be a distraction, it could be a way to worm under his skin like an oversized splinter, like Yamada knew that it would.

He knew it. That's why he gave it to him. He wanted 27 to fall out of his head so they could take Eri, take advantage of her horn, her quirk, force her to use it.

He couldn't answer this fucking question .

Failure. Stupidity. Those weren't things that 27 could accept from himself. Dangerous. Dangerous things. He couldn't risk it, he couldn't-

Why won't that damn clock move?

27 tries to breathe, tries to convince himself he can before he forgets how and makes a fool of himself in front of these hero students. Make himself look weak.

He focuses on Eri. She's warm, and he's too relieved that she wanted to sit on his lap instead of at her desk, even though he knows it's because she's worried about him. She's happily reading her science workbook now, learning about rocks. She's learning things that he doesn't know now. He knew about sand and concrete and stones, not that stones break and weather into sand by the slow movement of the tides. Every minute, every thoughtless motion from the sea eroded millions of pieces of rock into something round, something soft when they were grouped together. Something unnatural for rock, to become soft like that.

He didn't need to know that. He checks the hero students again, his owner, the clock on the wall. It still doesn't move like it should. His time here should be over, but that's just a lie his body tells him. His nerves are running wild under his skin like a fight isn't going the way it should, and it isn't. He's been losing the fight all day, and he'd cry tears of joy if it ended like it should, if Chisaki would grab him by the mask and tear him up, tear into him without worrying about death because death is just the nothingness and Chisaki pulls him out of it just to tear into him again-

He can't be nothing here. He has to fight. He can't be weak, he can't be away. He has to focus.

The heroes make that impossible. He looks again to see if they've crowded around him somehow because at times he can feel them breathing on him, but they haven't. Ashido glances at him again and he doesn't want to know what that means, he feels bleach soaked, he feels weak and he can't be weak here he can't-

Another minute passed. The time should add up, he shouldn't have lost any. Fifteen more minutes and the heroes will stop being so large for a few hours, they'll turn back into those little words on a screen that enticed him into this stupid game in the first place.

He shouldn't have started it, he knows that now. He didn't have information but he gave it to them. He didn't need a distraction but they gave it to him. Stupidity. Dangerous. He can't afford it, he needs to end it but he has no idea how.

He can't focus. He can't play the game. He's lost and lost and lost today, he spoke just to prove that he could, he promised something he didn't want to give. He needs to keep Mirio at a distance but he didn't, he invited him in and he shouldn't have. Stupidity. Dangerous. Nejire was dangerous, he mistook her for a moment and that was all it took, she was too familiar and she had to know that, had to take advantage.

Two minutes passed. That doesn't feel right, that feels too quick. He needs to focus, focus on something else. Find a way to play, find anything to do to recover from this.

The test is his best chance at that. Yamada was distractible, especially when he was trying to train 27. This was training, he knew that. An evaluation of what he could do, but it felt crueler than any other he had done. No one wanted to know what 27 knew like this, Numbers didn't need to add or subtract. He knew that, he taught himself how. He felt proud when he proved it on this test, when the first few pages were finished with ease.

Then multiplication. He knew that, mostly. Eri didn't always like his hovering when she studied, and he didn't want to mess up her work. He knew enough to answer those questions, bringing him to five completed pages out of 103.

He didn't know what this symbol was. There was a word, 'divide,' used over and over again in the next two pages. Then fractions. He knew what divide meant, to divide someone's attention to take advantage of their distraction. To divide his opponents. To fracture something, or someone. A fraction of someone's worth.

What was he worth here?

He looks at the hero students, his owner, the clock. Not even a minute has passed.

Eri cocks her head when he touches the pink marker. He doesn't want to use it, doesn't want to admit any weakness, but he needed to distract Yamada from his plans, and five pages wasn't enough for that. But Eri cocked her head, he shouldn't use it. That was the wrong choice, he pulls his hand away. He looks at the clock, the minute finally passed. 11 more, just 11 more minutes.

"Tw- Shinsou, you know that one. It's easy."

Why does Eri talk so loud? The silence of the room is shattered, he can feel every stare boring into him. He doesn't look up, doesn't need to. He can feel it under his skin, nerves that were screaming are mute now in the numb shock of it, the betrayal. He focuses on Eri's presence to keep himself from going too numb, becoming more useless.

"You take the 6 and cut it in half, so it's 3," Eri says, reaching for that pen Yamada gave him. He was supposed to do enough of this test to be sore afterwards, but he wasn't, he failed in that, but even worse, he failed Eri. "You know that, though. You know all kinds of stuff, Twenny."

He doesn't.

He doesn't know anything useful. He's out of his depth and he doesn't know how to play that off, he doesn't know how to hide that. He's tried to slip behind masks all day, tried to be someone who doesn't feel bothered by these too-large heroes surrounding him. He can't pull it off without a mask, without something to hide a part of him that doesn't play the part. He's exposed, he's too vulnerable here, and he can't hide that and they know .

Eri is doing his test for him, and she shouldn't. Even if it earns him more completed pages, he can't lie to Yamada, can't be caught in a lie. "You can't do my test, Eri." He pulls the pen from her hand, placing it on the desk beside the pink highlighter he has to use now. "I'm really glad you know that, though. You're really smart."

He gives in, he threads his fingers through his hair and lets the softness soothe him, lets his arm shield his expression from the hero students for just a brief moment. He can't cry here, even if he does it silently, and he shouldn't feel like crying over this, but that brief moment to let his eyes water scares him enough. He blinks back the tears and remembers his job, remembers to not feel it.

He looks at the clock, 5 minutes. He doesn't know if that's right, if he lost any time. He wonders if rocks feel the pieces of themselves being eroded away, if they do then what it feels like, if it feels like this, before he realizes he's putting off the inevitable.

Neither hand makes a straight line, even when he risks switching them in a place that people will notice. Eri doesn't, she's turned back to her work book with a stiffness that betrays how unhappy she is to not help him with his test. That shaky pink line, the brightness of the color, those simple little words and symbols that Eri knows and he doesn't. It hurts, it hurts, it hurts.

He thought he was smart. He thought that was one thing they couldn't take from him, one thing he could keep for himself. Even if he was a silent Number, he knew how to read. Even if he was a Dog, he could twist the game and beat Chisaki.

"And in the end, you beat him, right?"

What did Yamada mean by that? 27 has to know, he has to be smart enough to piece that out, especially from Yamada because Yamada hides nothing , but he couldn't. Yamada had hidden how he could slip behind a mask too, he could hide his meaning behind a wincing smile that reads 'this is painful, but believe this smile,' but that wasn't what he meant.

Yamada knows something, knows something about 27 that he didn't want him to find. 27 can't play the game with him, not when there are pieces he doesn't know, there's something he has that 27 doesn't know about. He doesn't even know what he could know now, but Yamada knows that 27 has plans. That he's made plans. He's tried to escape, he's disloyal, he's stupid because they've never worked, but he's always been too stupid to stop himself from trying.

The first time he tried he had 98 and 65 under his control, and what he got from that was his first session with Bug. He didn't have a plan, he was moving on a whim, grasping at the hope that he could get out. He could get out of The Miasma, he could find 50's body before they took it away, he could tell her all the things he never could because his mask was open. He could tell her that he-

"Oi." Something kicks at his desk. The shoe still resting at the edge of it connects to a leg, connects to Thermal Expansion staring at him, not at Eri and that's why he's still standing. Even though 27 is still tempted to throw him into the desks behind him. With that leg so close, it would be too easy. "Earth to Shitsou, I'm talking to you."

27 slides on the mask, leaning back against his chair and forcing himself to meet Fulmination's beady red eyes with a blankness tinted by boredom. He's not a threat, he's too weak to be one, he's just a bother, he tells himself as he works it into his limbs, opening his arms to drape lazily over his desk even though he wants to hide his test, hide Eri still sitting on his lap.

She puts a hand on his shoulder and pulls herself closer to Bomber, the same way she leans closer to intimidate. Explosion ignores her, and that's the only reason he's still breathing.

"Bakugo," his owner growls, closer than he should be but 27 can't break the staredown to check. "Class is dismissed."

"You said I could talk to him on Monday," Bakugo answers, his lip curling into a smirk that 27 wants to shatter with his fist. Neither of them break the stare. "So Shinsou's gonna stop pretending to be a fucking mute and tell me he's going to study with me."

27 has to stop himself from rolling his eyes when he realizes it. This was bullying. He never had the chance to truly experience it for himself, but now that he does, it feels even more juvenile than he expected. He pulls his hands from the desk, and ignores the flicker of relief in knowing that Detonation is one of the few people who understand JSL. ' You have nothing in exchange, Explosion. '

Salvo cackles at that, sneering down at him. "That right, you wannabe Yakuza bastard?"

27 raises an eyebrow. Wannabe? He took Sakazuki, he's lived with the 8 Precepts for 3 years as something lower than a kobun. He's done things for mafias before that, learned how to speak the languages for each family well before Nemoto gave him his tattoos. If anyone was a wannabe here, it was Ignition.

"You're that fucking predictable," Fulmination sneers, his hands moving to repeat 'Exchange' in jerky, ill-placed motions. Something that might be taken as mocking, but 27 doesn't think that's entirely the case. "How about I teach you how to fucking count, since you're stupid at math? That a good trade off, 'boss'?"

27 narrows his eyes, ignoring the insult that cuts a bit too deep for him. Ignores that the heroes should probably learn enough about the Yakuza to know that addressing him as Boss is a serious offence. There's something there that 27 wants to test. ' Crimson. Lavender. Strategy. Fuck you. Apple. '

He can see the vein throbbing on the blonde's forehead as he scowls. "Oi, I'm trying to be helpful and shit, watch your fucking mouth."

27 can't hide his own smirk, though he tries to play it into his mask and that works, earning a few frustrated pops from Ignition's quirk. 'Kacchan' wasn't the only one who only remembered how to sign swears. ' Watch my hands. You don't know sign. '

Bakugo seethes. "Don't talk shit about me with that creepy fucking grin, just nod your fucking head. You want me to teach you math shit?"

' K-A-C-C-H-A-N. Ka chan. Katsu chan. Blast chan. '

"Shitface," Blast-chan grinds his teeth around his words, the pops from his hand start giving off more heat, enough for him to feel it on his shoulder. "Answer. The fucking. Question."

A stack of papers obscures 27's vision, ending the staredown. 27 takes the opportunity to blink, his eyes stinging when he does, and looks at his owner whose attention is focused on Blasty. He doesn't know why his owner is still holding the papers between them, keeping him from seeing what Detonation is doing. "Class is dismissed. I suggest you return to the dorm and work on your assignment the way that I assigned it."

The papers finally lower, Bakugo having turned his scowl to his owner before he turns his head back to 27 with a hiss. “Fine. I know how to fix that mute shit, but since you keep talking shit with your hands, I guess you don’t wanna know.”

27 watches the teen kick off from his desk, storming across the classroom while he runs the word over and over through his mind. It worked before, it's always worked for him, even with Chisaki.

“Fine.”

Blast-chan stops, turning slowly with a smirk that belongs on a perverted street-hustler instead of a potential hero. He's aiming it at his owner, and despite how much 27 wants to know what Blasty knows, wants to use him to avoid Yamada, wants to use him as a pawn in a hundred different half-formed plans, he also hopes that his owner will knock that smug look off of his face with the capture scarf. Not just to see the weapon in action.

His owner looks at 27, evaluating him for something that he doesn't find, which causes him to ask. "Do you want to meet with Bakugo?"

He hates that his owner could strip every hint that he needs from his words. He knows there's animosity between his owner and Bakugo, that there's an assignment that Bakugo is supposed to be doing for him. His owner didn't want Bakugo to talk to him in the first place. The answer should be 'no,' but he's not sure. This should be an easy test, but he can't answer it, he's too tempted to say 'yes.'

Eri seems to know the answer to this too, while he struggles to understand the question. “Twenny wants to make Bakugo’s head explode, but if he does it on the phone, he won’t get any candy. I think Twenny wants to get the candy today, Zawa.”

27 bites down on his lip in a bid to keep from laughing, especially as he watches Salvo's impotent fireworks, jaw working around a threat that he can't speak because as stupid as he is, he knows better than to threaten Eri. He didn't even look at her earlier, suggesting that 27's earlier threat to mutilate his hands if he did was understood.

His owner raises an eyebrow, but doesn't force 27 to answer, turning slowly to the underling still throwing a temper tantrum. "5 o'clock, at the staff dorm. Even if you still have access, wait for Present Mic to buzz you in. Don't get candy on the-"

“FUCK OFF, I’m not-fucking,” Blast-chan levels an amusing glare at him, and despite the distance, he can still see that vein throbbing. “Get ready, bitch, you’ll be shitting Algebra by the time I’m done with you.”

‘ Childish. Threats better now. Fight on. ’ 27 fights to keep the smile off of his face, and the sudden realization that he has over an hour until Bakugo comes as a distraction helps. His owner looks at him, that stare still evaluative, still searching for something that he can’t find.

“Twenny, it’s okay if you don’t want to be Bakugo’s friend,” Eri tells him as she slides off of his lap and begins putting her things back into her backpack. “Even if he’s Ashi’s friend, you don’t have to be his friend.”

“I know,” 27 says, plucking the pens and highlighters into his hand, unsure where he should put them until Eri opens her backpack in invitation. “But, he knows stuff that I don’t, so I might as well hear him out.”

“He thinks it’s due to your quirk,” his owner says, hand tucked in his pocket and eyes focused on something to the side. “There’s little evidence to suggest that. If that changes your decision, let me know.”

‘ How does- ’ 27 stops himself, folding his hands together while he hopes that his owner didn’t see that slip, only catching the the last part of his signing. ‘ They know my quirk. ’

Izuk- Midoriya does. Ashido and Kirishima do as well, but unless something changed, they weren’t supposed to tell anyone else. Those were the three heroes that knew, the three he had to keep an eye on, but he thought that they were threatened well enough not to tell Bakugo.

His owner is taking too long to answer. There’s something he’s not supposed to know, not supposed to read into, but he tries to piece it out. He hates that his owner doesn’t let him, the pause is the only tell he has because his owner betrays nothing else.

“I told them that you have a voice activated emitter quirk. They would have asked otherwise,” his owner finally says, tucking a thumb between the pages of the papers he’s still holding, might be nervousness. Guilt doesn’t fit him, it doesn’t fit an owner. “Asui, Uraraka, Kirishima, Midoriya, Togata, Amajiki, and Nejire were told that it requires a verbal response, but not that it was triggered by a question.”

How? Why? 27 can’t find a way to ask without those words coming to his mind. He needs to know why those seven heroes are different from the others, why they were told something more specific. Told at a different time. Especially now, now that there’s a chance .

“They participated in the raid on the 8 Precepts,” his owner answers for him, as though he was reading his mind. “That was all the information that we had at the time.”

The raid. They were there. He knew Mirio was there, he knew that he saw him. He knew that Mirio knew, but Froggy and Floaty.

Lied to him.

There wasn’t a picture at the hospital. They saw him. They saw his hair, they saw his mask.

He doesn’t remember them. He barely remembers when the officer told him about how the raid ended, how Eri used her quirk to pull him out of the nothingness, out of Chisaki and Nemoto. He doesn’t remember any of that. He remembers being in a white room but that memory is short, just a blink and then he’s in a car. Wearing handcuffs. The officer that knew his name beside him.

He met the heroes and he doesn’t remember it, and they never told him. Hid that from him. There was a reason they did that, and he doesn’t know what it is.

27 shakes his head before he can decide whether that’s safe to do. He wonders if he can play it off casually, can play the part of a more useful underling now that he’s advising his owner’s training strategies. ‘ Long day. Need coffee. ’

The barely noticeable huff of amusement is pure relief to his nerves. “This is Hizashi’s fault.” His owner rubs at his eyes, his tone dropping back into its usual neutrality. “I have hero work to do, so I won’t be there when Bakugo arrives. If you want Bakugo to leave, or if he uses his quirk while he’s there, tell Hizashi and he’ll take care of it.”

Eri starts pulling at his sleeve, but after he stands she still looks at him, and he realizes that she’s playing with her hands again. “Friend,” 27 says, signing the word so she can copy him, but she shakes her head at him.

“What you said. I wanna know those words,” Eri says, her hands still doing the circular motion for ‘friend’ despite her disinterest in it.

“Long day. Need coffee,” 27 says slowly, making sure that the signs match up to each word. He repeats it as they walk through the hall, and every time she fumbles, she catches herself and looks up for the correct sign. By the time that they reach Yamada’s classroom, she has it down perfectly, and she decides to demonstrate that.

“Yama!” Eri yells, running up to the hero with determination written on her face, and wordlessly signs what she learned.

Yamada covers his mouth with his hand, his eyebrows knitted together to try to keep himself from losing his composure. Once he regains it, he smiles brightly at Eri, his hand ruffling her hair so vigorously that the ends dance around her shoulders and back. “Eri, that’s so CUTE! You did such a good job! Who taught you that?”

“Shinsou,” his owner answers, crossing his arms. “So, are you going to give her coffee or-”

“Shou! Don’t be mean, let me have my moment,” Yamada snaps, turning back to Eri with a soft smile. “Shinsou is a very good teacher. Having him around must have inspired you to learn more JSL, so you can be just like him.”

Eri nods her head sharply, her eyes nearly glowing with the smile behind them. “Yeah! I wanna talk with my hands like Twenny does! Can you teach me that too?”

Yamada beams at that, brushing a finger at the corner of his eye. His voice comes out a little more choked up when he speaks. “Of course! I’d really love to do that, little bean!”

27 bites the inside of his cheek, watching another thing that Eri gets from him being given by someone else. Another way she doesn’t need him, another person who can give her something better than he can offer.

He hopes she doesn’t succeed. That she never becomes anything like him.

That she only plays with her hands, instead of having to talk with them.

Aizawa thought he had escaped any more interactions with his students today, but Bakugo had a tendency to appear just as the relief from that thought began to settle in him.

His student was still engrossed in his phone, leaning against the security guard's booth as he waits for someone to leave campus. This is apparently a habit of his, if the complaints he's ignored from other members of UA's staff are any indication. As a student without a provisional hero license, Bakugo can't leave campus without an escort, which most students arrange beforehand.

Bakugo has apparently found that harassing anyone unlucky enough to pass by this exit is a way to circumvent that.

Aizawa nearly makes it. He keeps his footsteps light, slow, movements to a minimum. Bakugo shouldn't have noticed him with the distraction of the phone, but he must have smelled the relief that came to Aizawa too early. "Oi! I need to go to the combini, sign off on that shit."

Aizawa closes his eyes, regretting that he wanted to leave early. Someone else could have fallen victim to Bakugo's brand of highway banditry. "You should arrange these trips beforehand." He pointedly doesn't offer the teen to arrange them with him, or say that he should have mentioned it during homeroom.

Bakugo just stares him down, finger pressed on the sign-out sheet until Aizawa gives in and fills it out. "Just because I'm being treated like a fucking 5 year old doesn't mean I need to ask permission from Mommy."

Aizawa hopes his blank stare as he clicks the pen and places it back on the clipboard reminds Bakugo that he's still asking for permission, and that Aizawa certainly isn't his mother. "If you're wasting my time to buy something that's already at the dorm, I'm adding 10 more pages to your assignment."

"How the fuck would you know?" Bakugo asks, shoving his phone and his hands into his pockets as they walk through the gate as it opens. "Got cameras in the cabinets and shit? You should tell me who's eating my Takis, haven't caught the bastard yet."

"There aren't any cameras there, but I suspect Ashido is the culprit," Aizawa answers, trying to walk ahead of Bakugo to avoid any further conversation, but his student just walks faster to keep the pace. "She has enough prior offenses to justify it."

"She can't fucking handle mild curry, so it's not her," Bakugo defends, forgetting that 'mild' to him was a level of spiciness worthy of being a food challenge. Luckily, his investigation into snack theft holds his interest enough to keep quiet for a few blocks, until they get to the convenience store. "Oi, this is the shitty one, the good one is-"

"It's a combini," Aizawa interrupts, struggling not to roll his eyes. "Get what you need here, or I'm taking you back to campus."

Bakugo snarls at that, hands splayed open at his sides, but another escort thankfully informed him that using his quirk would end the trip immediately. "Fine."

This time, he follows Bakugo, trying not to sigh when he notices his student pick up two baskets to carry his items. This was becoming a much longer trip than he anticipated.

Aizawa knows the cashier but doesn't acknowledge his greeting, scanning the store for any other customers who aren't as reformed as Bokuto has become. He never thought he'd have to buy first aid supplies and energy drinks from the pickpocket he arrested on a near-monthly basis, but if their interactions were ever as awkward for Bokunto as they were for him, he had a true talent for customer service by never letting him know.

Bakugo tips a few energy drinks into his basket, pausing before he tosses in a few bottles of tea, soda and coffee as well. At the candy aisle, he grabs three large mix-bags, seething as he does. Apparently, Eri's comments struck a nerve but didn't put too much of a damper on his absurd cravings. At the snack aisle, he fills the first basket with three Taki bags, but seems to be at a loss for what should go into the second. "Oi. The fuck does Shinsou like?"

Aizawa truly regrets wanting to leave early. Bakugo wouldn't have asked any other victim, and if he did, their response wouldn't be as incriminating as his. "I don't know."

Bakugo raises an eyebrow at him. "The fuck you mean, you don't know? He lives with you. You feed him, right? He ain't so damn twiggy because-"

"It's touching that you would make an effort like this," Aizawa interrupts, pleased to earn that frustrated growl that he intended with his words, as genuine as they were behind the mocking tone. "But Shinsou can't eat any of this. Just buy your own snacks so we can leave."

Bakugo plucks at one of the candy bags, glaring at him. "Tch, you don't know this shit? When he gets a question right, he gets a piece of candy. Positive reinforcement shit."

That must be why Kaminari's grades improved after what he thought was Sato's stash doubled in size. "As a teacher, I'm aware of that method." He's also aware that his students don't deserve it. "You can't feed Shinsou junk food, and he won't eat it anyway."

His statement of facts seems to be taken as encouragement to defy him, as Bakugo starts grabbing snacks at random, including things that he knows Bakugo doesn't like. And Aizawa doesn't like the reminder that he knows each of his students' preferences in food, but he still doesn't know Shinsou's.

Eri told him that she didn't like jello the second time he met her. It took a bit more time to work out what she liked to eat, but even before the festival he knew that she liked ketchup, especially because he used it to draw cats on her omurice.

"He doesn't like oatmeal," Bakugo mutters, shooting a glare at him that isn't nearly as impressive as he thinks it is. "So don't feed him that shit."

Out of all of the students who could have slipped up, he didn't think it would be Bakugo. He expected Midoriya to come to him with a concern, a battle between self-preservation and the urge to protect dancing behind his frozen green eyes when he asked, "How do you know that?"

Aizawa eagerly awaits a flustered denial from his student, even if he knows it won't be half as entertaining. Bakugo disappoints him, not for the first time. "The chat that Four Eyes set up. He talks a lot of shit in there, so I'm not being rude or shit by talking shit back to him. If he can dish it, he can take it."

Beyond the disappointment, he finds himself a little surprised that Bakugo had some level of self-awareness regarding his abrasive personality. That his student knew that it should be tempered for someone like Shinsou or Eri, for children who wouldn't know how to take his swearing and shouting for anything other than anger. Something that should be taken as a sign of danger, but Chisaki seemed to have kept his rage quiet.

“What kind of shit was he talking anyway? I’m learning, don’t make a fucking deal out of it, but if he said some off-the-wall bullshit earlier I need to beat the shit out of him,” Bakugo asks, his tone unnaturally demure in a way that can’t quite be blamed on his attention being focused on a box of fruit gummies.

“He was testing whether you could understand JSL, and encouraged you to work on your ability to threaten others,” Aizawa answers, wondering if he should have answered more vaguely to further encourage Bakugo’s interest in JSL. “I believe he also gave you a sign-name. It’s the first one he’s given, so you should feel honored by that.”

There’s an obvious fight to keep from smiling playing on his student’s features, before he turns it into that smug leer that someone should really tell him to stop doing. It’s incredibly villainous, especially from a hero in training. “Oh? I get a name before the brat does? Or you?”

It’s a fight to not betray his own amusement. “It appears so, ‘Blast-chan.’ ”

The pay-off is glorious.

Frozen indignation gives way to rage, which in turn causes Bakugo to start destroying the box of fruit gummies as his hands turn into fists, struggling not to bring his quirk into play out of habit. And when he realizes that he has to buy the gummies now, despite how he seemed to still be unconvinced beforehand, the ensuing screech is deafening.

Aizawa has nothing else to say, keeping his attention on the customer swaying from intoxication as he enters the snack aisle. It’s not someone he knows from his own hero work, not a quirk that he can predict, but he’s relieved to put some distance between them when Bakugo stomps into the toy aisle, cackling to himself as he picks up a miniature purple haired Troll doll and throws it into the basket with childish glee.

Bokunto repeats his greeting as he begins scanning, which Bakugo dignifies with a surprisingly pleasant “Yo.” Aizawa keeps his eyes trained on the wall behind the check-out, finding himself a bit proud of Bokunto when he finds his picture under several ‘Employee of the Month’ slots, including the current one. He’s glad that he’s found honest work to be something to take pride in, instead of the number of wallets he could snatch by making his victim’s hips go numb with his quirk.

Before Bakugo takes out his wallet, Aizawa plucks the troll doll out of the pile to place in front of his student, handing his card to the cashier to cover the rest of the purchases. “Oi, I can pay for that shit-”

“You’re not spending your own money to feed my ward,” Aizawa interrupts, fully aware that several of those items were still meant for Bakugo. “Especially when he won’t eat any of this.”

Bakugo smirks at him, spinning the doll around by its hair. “Sure you can cover that, Mr. Lowest-Paid-Hero-In-The-Industry? Don’t want you breaking the fucking bank on some Takis.”

Aizawa seethes when he notices that Bokunto applied his employee discount. “It sounds like I need to assign a financial responsibility project, so that each of you can be prepared to make a budget with whatever income you find after graduation.” 30 pages. At least .

And a maximum of 50 for Midoriya and Iida.

He still makes Bakugo carry the purchases, his arms decorated with bulging plastic bags that look even more ridiculous when he shoves his hands in his pockets, out of habit it seems. The silence doesn't suit him anymore, now that he remembers that the student who has the least quirk control will be in the same space with a ward who both knows how to trigger it, and will probably dissociate if he succeeds. "Present Mic will tell you again, but the moment you use your quirk, this study session will end."

Bakugo scoffs behind him. "It's not a fucking trigger. He didn't fucking flinch earlier."

As true as that was, Aizawa wouldn't trust it. "Regardless, that's my stipulation, and I expect you to not disappoint me. Don't take this as an opportunity to pry into the investigation either."

There's a falter in Bakugo's steps that worries him, but he doesn't have to wait long to know the reason for it. "He said some shit about bleach baths. You know about that, right?"

Aizawa regrets not having Shinsou's phone bugged, and wonders if it was possible to do so after the fact. Even if it contributed little to the investigation, he would at least know about these kinds of incidents, be able to help his students afterwards when he should have known to prepare them beforehand. "I do. How many of you know about that?"

"Everyone. All Might gave us the fucking rundown, how to handle trauma spills like a pro. Ashido cried, but she knows to keep that shit to herself from now on," Bakugo answers, his use of the term 'trauma spill' a good indication that some part of this Trauma Project was working as intended. "Is that useful information shit or-"

"Report it to me, and I'll determine that," Aizawa interrupts. As much as he wants to keep his students away from the investigation, if Shinsou did tell them something relevant, he needed to know. "Was there anything else said in the chat?"

He glances over his shoulder when Bakugo doesn't answer immediately, relieved to find his student cocking his head in thought. "He had a codename, '27.' And he might have shot someone, I don't know. Bitch talks too vague. He had gun training."

"Training accidents aren't usually fatal," Aizawa lies, and hopes that much is enough to keep his own students from feeling the sick mix of guilt and horror inside himself.

Shinsou might have killed people.

That was something that Aizawa hadn't allowed himself to fathom, stopping himself when he realized that he clearly knew how. Shinsou had been trained, he had been trained well and for a purpose. A purpose he chose to ignore, chose to focus on the lesser ways he could have been used for it.

He could have been used to kill. His quirk could incapacitate someone much like a paralysis quirk. By the time he had the weapon ready, he would be too close to the victim for them to fight back. The pain that would interrupt his control would be a fatal blow regardless.

It's very little relief to know that Shinsou had likely never made that choice on his own. That Shinsou had likely never done anything out of his own free will. But the blood on his hands would never be washed away, if anything, it would be more difficult for him to bear as time went on. As he further integrated into honest society, and found fewer and fewer people around him with hands that were still stained that way.

He hopes that he's wrong. That no matter what Shinsou had done, he had never been forced to go that far.

"Sensei," Bakugo calls, and Aizawa looks up to see the front gate of UA in front of him. "Zoning out or some shit?”

“It’s been a long day,” Aizawa says, answering Bakugo’s unspoken concern. As the gates began to open, he plucked a bottled coffee from Bakugo’s bag, frowning to himself about the brand though he knew it was better than what the police station would offer.

“Oi, get your-“

“I bought it,” Aizawa reminds him, cracking the seal on the lid. “Behave yourself, or I’ll double your page count.”

Bakugo glares, then turns his head to the side with a hiss. “I’m not some fucking extra. You think the next number one hero can’t handle Shitsou? I’ll screw his head on so tight you’ll be begging him to shut up.”

As unlikely as that was, Aizawa would truly appreciate it.

Shinsou needed to talk.

Shitsou wasn’t stupid, and holy fuck, was that refreshing.

Kaminari wasn’t stupid either, but his dumbass made it seem that way because the little shit couldn’t focus right. Sero tried to distract him whenever shit got too hard for his bitch ass, and Ashido whined too goddamn much. But Shitsou got shit. Explain something once and he fucking got it.

“Six candies over ten, divided by two over eight. Reduce that shit too,” Bakugo ordered, setting up the next problem on the floor. Shitsou only had one chair in his room, and there’s no way in hell he’s sitting on that bed, there’s no telling what that freak was into. And holy fuck, was his room boring as shit. Too fucking organized, too much gray. It looked like the bedroom for a serial killer or some military guy who never got that shit out of their system.

As soon as Shitsou leaves to take a piss, he’s definitely fucking up his lights to spell out ‘dick’ or something. Give this place some kind of fucking personality other than the creepy fucking cats on his desk.

And the one on his bed, but that might be Eri’s. It’d be fucking weird if Shitsou slept with a stuffed animal. He couldn’t even bully him for it, it’d just be that fucking weird.

“Two and two-o fifths. Or two hu-undred and fo-orty perce-ent .” Shitsou’s creepy fucking Alexa app is going to give him nightmares if he keeps using it. It’s probably a good thing he hasn’t shown it to Kaminari, dumbass wouldn’t be able to handle himself.

“Oi, this shit too easy for you now? Talking shit about percentages?” Bakugo goads, but he’s fucking impressed. He mentioned that shit once and Shitsou has it down. “Fine, let’s start some fucking Algebra. Congrats on passing second grade.”

Shitsou’s still too stupid to know he’s supposed to eat the candy after Bakugo throws it at his face, but Sensei must know something about that. He just catches it and puts it in his pocket, but that’s probably some kind of reinforcement shit going on. Fucking irritating that his reflexes are that good, even when he's talking shit on his phone.

It's stupidly fucking irritating that the bitch never cracks a smile. If Half n Half was the queen of resting bitch face, then Shitsou's the fucking emperor. He just stares with those creepy dead eyes and doesn't say shit, and that's probably why people thought he was stupid in the first place. It looks like there isn't a single fucking crayon in that box, but apparently, it's a fucking megapack in there.

Shitsou looks at the door, which Flaccid Mic said had to be open like he's expecting some gay shit to go down, then goes back to his phone. Fucker hadn't put it down the whole time, but he barely fucking used it. “You kno-ow about my quirk o-or talki-ing shi-it.”

Bakugo rolls his eyes. He's not about to catch some attitude from fucking Alexa's bitch ass. “It's ‘Do you know,’ I know you know that shit. Got this whole fucking library over here, so fix your fucking grammar.”

Shitsou keeps doing that creepy fucking stare while Bakugo opens another energy drink. This bullshit project was kicking his ass, and if he pulled another all-nighter he'd probably have more eyebags than Shitsou. He could use the study break anyway. As smart as Shitsou was, shit would stop sticking if they just kept at it.

Shitsou's face twitches, which is the closest fucking thing he's gotten to showing a real fucking human emotion this whole study session, and keeps typing shit on his phone that he keeps deleting. Bakugo just waits, even if it's fucking irritating because apparently there's some processing shit going on, and he knows he can't interrupt that shit. “Pa-art of quirk wo-orks. You're wro-ong.”

Bakugo raises an eyebrow. “Part of it? The fuck does that mean? There's still some shit you can do without talking?”

There's another fucking processing thing going on, and holy fuck does Bakugo feel bad for therapists and shit. They must be bored as fuck at their jobs having to wait for people to talk instead of just making them say shit and shoving them out the door. “Qui-uirk slips are a symptom of what you-ou're talki-ing about.”

Bakugo groans, he's fucking tired of this bullshit. “Seriously, can you fucking talk right?! Ask a fucking question instead of saying this shit, I'm not gonna beat your ass for it, alright?!”

He can't tell if it's the energy drink or just Shitsou getting on his fucking nerves, but he needs to blow off some fucking steam before he blows something else up. Shitsou's used to this by now, he doesn't fucking blink when Bakugo gets up and walks through this creepily normal ass apartment to the front door. Seriously, he didn't think Shitsei lived in a place that had lightbulbs, but apparently the loudmouth civilized him or some shit.

It's just so fucking creepy to see Flaccid Mic doing something so fucking domestic like cooking. He figured he just screamed until a flock of birds dropped out of the sky and then started eating them off the ground or some shit. The fact that his teachers are so fucking normal is too fucking weird for him.

“Smoke break?” Flaccid Mic asks, and Bakugo only nods because he might lock him out if he doesn’t. Eri still tries to mean mug him before he even gets in the way of her Sailor Moon marathon, and the brat needs to stop because it’s fucking adorable.

He should feel bad for thinking that, since the brat can’t fucking smile and shit so she probably doesn’t know how to glare at people either, but he can keep that shit to himself.

And probably teach her how if Shitsou ever learns to calm his little sister complex down to a normal fucking obsession.

He fires off bigger explosions than he usually would, because if Shitsou wants to talk about his quirk being fucked, he’s probably going to get into what happened during the raid. And Bakugo’s going to be fucking pissed that he never got the chance to tear Overhaul’s bitch ass codpiece wearing face apart. After he did shit to Eri, did shit to Shinsou, nearly got Kirishima fucking killed with that bitch fucker Rappa, he hopes that he sees that trash bird ass bitch for himself. Hands or no hands, he’ll tear that fucker to shreds.

Shitsou does this creepy fucking thing where he never fucking relaxes. He hasn’t even fucking moved since Bakugo left. Shitsei probably has to give him permission to scratch his nose sometimes, and that’s just fucked up.

“Fuck it, you know what? I’ll give you a freebie but next time you have a question, say that shit,” Bakugo says, taking another drink while he flexes his hands, making sure that the nitroglycerin channels feel sore and drained. “I don’t have fucking research on that because no one’s fucking done any. No one’s figured out that it might be a fucked up quirk instead of a fucked up head, but if you’re having quirk slips, it’s probably a sign that it’s your quirk being fucked up.”

Shitsou doesn’t look up from his phone, apparently he knows where the letters are now. “Your turn. Two que-estions.”

Right, this shit. Fucking yakuza bastard needs to keep his books balanced. “What’s the fucking deal with you and eating shit? Shitsei said you can’t eat shit and you won’t eat shit, but you’ve got to be eating something.”

“I do-on’t eat shit. I eat foo-od. Stra-ange concept for you-ou, apparently.”

Fucking smartass. “That’s not what I fucking meant.”

Shitsou tilts his head, looking at his phone while he types, like there’s some big fucking revelation that he’s programming into Alexa to say. Like that villain school place trained him out of eating or some shit, and now he just photosynthesizes. “Ca-an’t eat. Was fo-orce fed. Me-essed up no-ow, I gue-ess.”

“That trash bird fucker force fed you?” Bakugo asks, and he doesn’t expect Shitsou to fucking giggle at that.

He looks fucking terrified for a second, then he huffs and covers his mouth with his hand like that’ll stop his shoulders from shaking. He’s fucking giggling, and it’s only half as creepy as it is when he’s trying to be a fucking robot.

“‘Trash bird’ really that fucking funny? Ask Deku to roast him sometime. I don’t know how Endeavor pissed in his Lucky Charms, but that shit was hilarious,” Bakugo decides candy isn’t big enough for Shitsou finally emoting and shit, so he grabs a grape soda that was going to be Sero’s, but fuck it. Shitsou deserves it.

And Shitsou still doesn't fucking get the whole reward system. He takes it, but it looks like he's trying to figure out how to put it in his fucking pocket.

"Pop the top and drink it, dipshit. Unless you're gonna break your fucking fingers, being all malnourished and shit," Bakugo tells him, and finally Shitsou gets with the program. Basic fucking instructions work with everything but candy, apparently.

He takes the tiniest fucking baby sip and nearly spits it out, hand over his mouth like he didn't fucking know....

Fuck, this bitch has never had a fucking soda before. "Oi, it's carbonated, so it's got tiny fucking bubbles in it. Is it too fucking spicy for you or some shit?"

Shitsou shakes his head, like it's a fucking ordeal to swallow the three fucking drops he's got in his mouth. He just stares at the can like it fucked his mother and shat on his Christmas presents, then picks up the phone to explain that shit. "Ba-ad taste. Carbona-ation weird, but I do-on't hate i-it."

"Grape tastes like shit, I'll get something else next time," Bakugo thinks about handing him the bacon soda that Shitty Hair likes, but that'd probably put him off soda forever. "Answer the fucking question though."

"Po-olice did." Well, wasn't that just fucked up? Villains fucked up Shitsou's head, hands, quirk and probably everything else, then the fucking police finished off his digestive system.

Shitsou doesn't look like that bothers him, but he'd probably look that way if someone was tearing his fucking toenails out and salting them in front of him. "They're investigating that villain school bullshit? And yeah, I know it's not a fucking villain school, but whoever fucked you up before Overhaul needs to go down. Whatever Stockholm bullshit you've got going on--"

"My tu-urn. How o-old are you-u?" Alexa's bitchass can fuck right off, that distraction is fucking weak.

"The fuck you mean--" Bakugo stops himself to grab a couple pink Starbursts to throw at Shitsou's head, the bitch fucking earned it. "I'm 16, same as you. Congrats on the question shit."

One of them goes into his fucking reward pocket, but Shitsou actually eats the other. He looks the whole thing over first, like he fucking believes those razorblades-in-candies hoaxes, but he still eats it. Fucking progress. He throws another one at him after Shitsou doesn't spit it out immediately.

"They really didn't tell you shit," Bakugo says, mostly to himself, because he's the only fucker in this room that knows Shitsou doesn't know anything he's supposed to. He doesn't know how fucking old he is or when his birthday is, probably doesn't even know his address and every fucking toddler on the street knows that shit about themselves. Shitsei and Micsei just fucking put him in this boring ass room and figured Shitsou would ask for shit, but he fucking doesn't, because he has issues about that shit. And how the fuck is he supposed to know what he doesn't know?

"Chewy. I mi-ight have eaten the-ese before. A-and they di-idn't te-ell me much. They thi-ink I'm trau-umatized." Shitsou keeps staring at the other candies on the floor like he doesn't have 50 of them in his fucking pocket.

And he's fucking stupid.

They're all fucking idiots, this is the idiot dorm, fucking Eri is the only one who should shower alone, holy fuck.

“Okay, bitch ? You’re fucking traumatized. If you came out of that shit without some screws rolling around, that’d just mean you didn’t have any to begin with,” Bakugo explains, and starts counting down the reasons why Shitsou’s fucked for him because now he knows the fucker can count. “You’re jumpy as fuck, you probably don’t sleep and if you do, you have fucking nightmares, you fucking ascended to a whole new stratosphere because Ojiro grabbing your hair freaked you that fucking bad, you probably get sweaty and pissed off for no reason, and it’s not the fucking hormones, it’s because you’re fucking traumaumatized. ”

He sees the fucking lightbulb flicker on before Shitsou throws a cinderblock at it. “ Eri i-is traumati-ized. I’m no-ot. ”

Bakugo throws his head against the bed - fuck it, Shitsou probably got bad-touched and can’t do shit anyway - and tries doing that massage-thing on his forehead that Shitty Hair said would help. And it fucking doesn’t. “You’re both. Fucking. Traumatized. Dipshit. PTSD isn’t a fucking sharing stick that only one of you gets to have, you both went through shit and you both need fucking therapy.”

Shitsou seriously doesn’t get the reinforcement shit, because he starts tossing candies at Bakugo while he’s trying to have a fucking moment before he quirks out. He swats one back at Shitsou and he still catches it, the fucker.

“Fine, answer these questions and it’s fucking interview hour starring me, I don’t give a shit. You got beat to shit, right?” Shitsou nods, and it’s fucking creepier because he doesn’t look bothered by that shit at all. He was more fucking bothered by carbonation than getting beat to shit. “They used their quirks while they were beating you?” Bitch fucking rolls his eyes like he’s saying ‘What else are they gonna do?’ and nods. “Yelled at you and called you names? Targeted your emotions and shit? Didn’t feed you?” Nod, shrug, nod. The shrug is probably a fucking nod because emotions are still fucking alien to the fucker. “They do shit that you fucking had to show on a doll or some shit?”

Shitsou doesn’t understand that, and he hopes they fucking asked those questions at the police station. He wears enough hoodies for Bakugo to start thinking shit went down, but he’s not fucking sure. One of those mafia fuckers might have just tattooed dicks all over him after they put that giant fucking logo on his back. At least someone took that shit off of him over the weekend, wearing their fucking label like a billboard for the bird fuckers probably fucked with his head even more.

“Did someone touch you in your.... Like, your fucking-” Thank fucking god , he shakes his head. People don’t get over that shit easy, and sometimes it perpetuates and shit. And whether he thinks Shitsou’s cool or not, if he perpetuates any kind of shit on Eri, he’s fucking dead . “Did a mental quirk get into your head a lot?”

Shitsou freezes. Not even fucking breathing, and that’s probably some fucking dissociation shit going on. It must have been fucking awful if it was worse than all that other shit, all the shit that Overhaul could have done and probably did since he was a fucking necromancer.

“It’s fine, don’t fucking answer that,” Bakugo tells him, looking at Shitsou’s feet to see if he took his socks off, and he didn’t. He’s not sure if he’ll eat the Takis, eating is apparently a fucking process, and that naming shit in the room thing probably won’t work either. “If you can hear me, take off your fucking socks, I don’t wanna touch that shit-”

Shitsou comes out of it, doing something with his hand like he has a specific fucking sign for ‘I’m logged the fuck back in, what happened?’ which is just fucking great. Dissociation is some heavy fucking shit, and he does it so regularly that he has a fucking code for it. Fuck therapy, bitch needs some institutionalization shit going on.

“Cool, we’re back now,” Bakugo says, trying to play it off but fuck, what kind of quirk got into his head to do that shit? “There’s some grounding shit I can tell you to do when that shit happens. Don’t know if it fucking helps, sure as shit doesn’t for-”

“Mental qui-irks. Why ask?”

Shitsou doesn’t look like he can handle that shit, despite what Alexa says. He still looks like he’s about to piss himself, and Bakugo is trying to project that neutral, calming bullshit to help, but he knew it fucking wouldn’t. It’s fucking unnatural. “I’m not fucking answering that. You’re going to log out again and I’m not dealing with that shit. Ask something else.”

Shitsou talks some shit with his hands, then gets up, and Bakugo’s fucking surprised he can do shit like that of his own free will. And then he just fucking leaves.

And Bakugo doesn’t even feel like fucking with his lights anymore.

He can hear Shitsou talking to Eri, so he knows he’s not taking a piss or anything. He can’t hear what they’re saying until the brat says ‘Chewy.’

And then he remembers that Shitsou’s not fucking stupid.

He kept putting shit in his pocket for Eri. Bakugo probably should have told him there’s a whole fucking bag for the brat, but it probably wouldn’t have made a difference. It’s not even fucking creepy anymore, it’s just sad. They need to make a whole new fucking disorder for this fucking Eri Obsessive Compulsion bullshit, and Shitsou is patient zero. He’s fucking terminal at this point, and hopefully Deku’s next. Hopefully Deku actually dies from it.

Bakugo starts pulling out his phone to see if Shitty Hair ever texted him back about Ashido’s bitchfest. Apparently she had some fucking grand scheme to fix Shitsou with high fives, and he ruined that shit, but she can get over it. But when he grabs it, his hand fucks up and his phone goes flying under the bed.

Bakugo groans, and hopes Shitsou doesn’t hide some fucked up shit under there, then he realizes he’s so fucking tired. He needs some fucking sleep because this carpet feels fucking plush. UA seriously fucked over the student dorms if they had this shit on hand for teachers.

He slaps at his phone and manages to grab it, even if he has to drag himself halfway under the bed, and then he sees it.

Shitsou has a diary.

It’s probably fucked up that he wants to read it. People need to keep some shit private, but he also knows Shitsou is fucked in the head, and someone needs to know how bad it is. He might be thinking about doing some stupid shit like hurting himself, and if he is, he’d write about it in his secret fucking diary. And Bakugo could find someone to help him with that shit, because Shitsei and Micsei don’t seem to be doing shit for him.

But as soon as he grabs it, he realizes that shit might be too fucking late.

There’s a huge fucking knife sticking out of the pile of crap under there. He grabs it to see if there’s some kind of sign it’s been used for that shit, but there isn’t. It’s warped and burned, with the serrations folding in places and black marks around the end. Fucking weird, but there’s a lot of weird shit under here.

He grabs the Tupperware next, wondering if Shitsou has drugs or something, but instead it's moldy cookies. The fuck. A knife and cookies and....

Shitsei's goggles .

Bakugo grabs them because there's no fucking way. There's no fucking way Shitsou actually stole these from Shitsei. Even when Shitsei sleeps, he uses some sonar detection bullshit to know where everyone is, but Shitsou must have hacked that shit and snatched them off his head. But why the fuck would Shitsou want them? Why the fuck does he have this shit-

Someone grabs his ankle and pulls him out from under the bed so fast his chin gets rug burn, but before he can kick the fucker for that, they knee him in the back and pulls his fucking hair to go in for a chokehold.

Fucking what the fuck fucking-

Fucked up hands too close to his face and someone behind him and he can't fucking get out and he's fucking getting out just watch he'll destroy this whole fucking building he'll fucking destroy it all tear it to fucking pieces he's getting the fuck out they can't keep him here

“-of Bakugo.”

Flaccid Mic.

He's up. Shitsou let him go. There's something burning his hand.

Sensei's goggles. He melted the shit out of them, black all over except for the bits that are sticking to his skin like microwaved putty. He shakes his hand so it fucking drops, maybe it takes some skin with it, he doesn't care.

Flaccid Mic looks like he doesn't know if they should have some fucking heart to heart bullshit or if he needs to keep Shitsou from going postal, keeps looking between them, but Bakugo makes that decision for him. “I'm fucking leaving before you murder my ass over some moldy fucking cookies.”

Brat doesn't even try to mean mug him, and he wishes she did because she's fucking crying.

Fuck.

Fuck.

He can't even quirk that shit out of his system when he gets outside.

Overwhelming Emotion

Chapter Summary

27 breaks down after the events of the previous chapter, but Togata has a surprising solution. Yamada makes a desperate call, and Eri finds that having her quirk at UA is still unpleasant, even if it isn't as bad as at the 8 Precepts.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Suspicion of self-harm

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou hid items that were important to him such as a clump of his hair from getting a haircut in Chapter 5, Aizawa's goggles, and Yaoyorozu's note from the first day of school. Bakugo found part of his stash in the previous chapter, and after Shinsou attacked him, drew Yamada's attention to it. Eri's horn has been growing, indicating that her quirk has been building up, and her horn grows in moments of pain. Bakugo asked Shinsou several questions to determine how many traumatic experiences he had gone through, and Shinsou dissociated after learning that mental quirks "getting into your head a lot" was one of them.

Trash trash trash he doesn't care he doesn't it doesn't hurt trash trash it's trash he doesn't care

"Shinsou," Yamada doesn't even know where to start. He's not as good at this as Hari, or maybe the things he's picked are just that stupid just trash trash trash.

He doesn't even know about the things he's pulled from the trash he'll laugh he'll make him eat some of it it's trash he'll laugh it's stupid it's trash he's trash

"Yama, don't say mean things!" Eri whines, she's crying, she shouldn't. She knows it's trash, she's more important. It's trash trash trash trash

"I-I'm not, I just--" knocking. Something more important. Someone to mock him, ' Look at what our little trash collector has this year. '

"Twenny," Eri whines, holding onto one of his legs. Holding him there. Her toes are curling into the carpet, she's unbalanced, she might fall, she's important, shouldn't worry about him, worry about trash.

"It's fine," 27 says, his voice is odd. He's odd, he doesn't care. Eri's worried. "I don't care. It's trash."

Trash trash trash trash trash trash

“-not wo-orking please Mi-irio!”

27 turns around, he still can't breathe, can barely see but if Mirio is here he'll kill him taking Eri taking her while he's away he knew never doubted Mirio is

Is holding Eri while she cries.

Weak useless weak useless useless useless . Eri doesn't need him anymore she has heroes he gave them to her he's nothing he's trash they'll get rid of “-reathe, just like this,” Mirio says, he smiles he still fucking smiles he hates that smile it's not right it's abnormal it's Kind.

He hates it.

27 is crying. Has been for a while, he wipes his tears away with his still unreal hands, still without any weight, without sensation, tries to hide it. Breathes, he was told to. In. Out. Stupid , so stupid he needs to be told how to breathe .

“In. And out,” smile. That smile he doesn't trust, doesn't understand. Threat. Where's Eri? “Eri's in her room with Mic-sensei. Let's just do a few more breaths together. In. Out.”

In. Out. In. Out. In. Out.

“Good.” Training word. Mirio looks around, doesn't look down but he wants to. He's waiting for Yamada to come back so they can go through it together. “It's probably really frustrating for you, isn't it?” He doesn't say it the right way, the way he means it, just like he doesn't stop smiling when he should. “You know, Tamaki showed me a really neat trick for when you feel really overwhelmed. Do you want me to show you?”

Anything. Anything to make him less useless. He can't afford to be, and if it's anything like the tricks that Nemoto taught him, the way he pinched and pulled at his flesh to demonstrate how to inflict that same mind-numbing pain on others, he'd be grateful. Pain, he wants pain, it will clear his mind and make him remember.

“We'll use the laptop, I'll just...” Mirio stops, hands hovering over the laptop before he pulls out the chair, knocking into the food and drinks that Bakugo left. “Just take a seat and turn on the laptop, so we can get started.”

Long orders. He's not used to giving them, but 27 doesn't care, he obeys. Watches the logo for the computer appear, goes to the places that Mirio tells him to click. Blank document for talking. He wants to trick him into talking about The Miasma.

“Now, you can just start typing whatever comes to your mind. Everything you're feeling right now, you can just type it out and get it out of you. Right now, you probably feel like a balloon ready to pop, but eventually you'll feel like the air is getting let out, you know?”

He doesn't know, but he knows this is a distraction. Mirio looks at the door, thinking he's won, thinking he can use Eri now for her quirk, force her to use it. He turns back and sees that 27 saw, that he knows, they both know, they can stop playing this game. 27 will kill him, he will, he's going to use Eri if he doesn't and he needs to protect her, even from the heroes that were supposed to save her.

Mirio crouches down on the balls of his feet - bad move, limits his mobility, if 27 takes out his knife right now he'd be dead in minutes, but 27 doesn't. Should, but doesn't. Useless. Useless useless - "You know, I never told you why I wanted to be a hero," Mirio says, picking at the hair next to his ear. Embarrassment, maybe, but that doesn't suit him.

No. It's pain. Painful for him to talk about, but he's distracting himself from that.

"I picked the name 'Lemillion,' as a promise to save one million people. That's not all that much, considering how many people All Might has saved, but I wanted to have a goal. And honestly, I kind of thought I'd beat it," Mirio laughs, barely a huff of air as his smile turns to a grimace for a moment. Pain, it's that painful for him. "But that doesn't really matter now. Even if I saved a billion people, I couldn't call myself a hero if I had to use a little girl's pain to do it, you know?"

It hurts.

"But, it's not so bad! I can do a lot of things even without my quirk! I'm sure I can even find ways to still be a hero. But I'm not really worried about it." There's a real smile, not that mask, and he knows it's the real one because it hurts Mirio to wear it. "I think that saving you two is enough for me. And I think that Sir Nighteye would be very proud to see that."

It hurts because he's not lying.

Mirio is a hero. And 27 hurt him. He's hurting him. He could save him from that, but 27 isn't a hero.

27 is trash. Useless. A criminal.

27 types.

Yamada is trying not to lose it.

He's also trying very hard not to blame himself or Shouta. Shouta didn't really think Yamada would agree to have Bakugo over for this study session, and even if he wasn't entirely on board, there was no way he could say no.

First, Shouta should know Yamada is not going to be the bad guy here and tell Shinsou he can't have friends - that's Shouta's job. Second, Yamada knows that he and Shouta are absolutely terrible at math, and Bakugo isn't. Third, Eri wanted to learn JSL. From him. How could anything bad happen after something that he's wanted for so long just came out of the blue like that?

Shouta should have known better. That pessimistic streak of his is great for avoiding situations like these.

Shinsou seemed a little nervous when they got home, which was understandable given that this was a pretty big step for him. Even if Bakugo wouldn't be Yamada's first choice as a friend for Shinsou, he could tell that Shinsou liked him. And Bakugo did know a little JSL, which probably made it easier on Shinsou, especially after he spent the entire day as a mute without his phone, unable to talk to his friends in 1-A like he had all weekend.

But when Bakugo finally arrived, it turned out a lot better than he expected. Bakugo didn't yell half as much as he usually did, and whenever he or Eri spied on their little math lesson from the hallway, it seemed like it was going well. Shinsou was learning a lot, and Bakugo was behaving himself as much as he could. Things were going well.

Then he heard screaming. And explosions.

And saw Shinsou holding Bakugo to his chest with a forearm around his mouth, a hand around one of Bakugo's wrists while Bakugo's free hand was trying to reach for Shinsou's face, his quirk muffled by whatever he was destroying in his hand.

Shinsou wasn't dissociating but he was panicking close to it. It took Yamada a while to convince him to let Bakugo go, but once he did, Bakugo snapped out of his rage between one breath and the next.

Then he dropped Shouta's goggles, and Yamada realized there was a knife on the floor. His missing bread knife, the one he thought Shouta got rid of after Shinsou tried to burn himself with it.

Shinsou was getting closer to the edge, and Bakugo wasn't that far off from his, but the sight of the knife kept Yamada from protesting too much when Bakugo decided to leave. They needed to talk about that, now, and Yamada should have known, should have kept a better eye on it. Shinsou wears a lot of hoodies and there's no telling what he could have done to himself by now.

But then Eri threw her arms around his legs, begging him not to be mean, and Yamada remembered the goggles. The cookies that Bakugo mentioned.

And he really should have known about this beforehand.

Mirio, the hero that he was, came just in time. Eri was upset, Shinsou was having a meltdown, and as much as Yamada wished he had a cloning quirk, he didn't. He thought that Mirio could calm Eri down while he talked to Shinsou, but it didn't work out that way.

Shinsou wasn't coming out of it. Eri could only get him to say a few words before he shut down again, and when she started begging Mirio to fix Shinsou because 'it's her job,' Yamada's heart broke.

They had encouraged that. They relied on Eri to keep Shinsou grounded, and she picked up on that and took it to heart. They put that weight on a 5 year old girl, and now they needed to undo it. They were the adults, they were the caretakers, and Eri had enough to worry about.

Her horn grew again before it finally took its toll, and between the tears and exhaustion from her quirk, she finally found a fitful sleep. While Yamada had been hoping Mirio could just keep an eye on Shinsou, make sure he didn't hurt himself during that spell, he was surprised to hear the sound of the keyboard coming from Shinsou's room and the sight of Mirio sitting on the couch.

Mirio had gotten through to Shinsou during that spell. As much as Yamada loved and appreciated the young hero, it kind of felt like a slap in the face. But Yamada needed the wake-up call.

And with both wards taken care of and Mirio ready to let him know if that changed, Yamada went to his bedroom to make a very belated phone call.

'Hi Mom! Been a while! Life is crazy.' Yamada signed. As much as he prefers using JSL, PSJ was easier to slip back into than any other language he learned. It always came from a special place for him.

'Hi-Hi! Sweet baby, how are you?' His mom signs back, her signs far more fluid from everyday use.

Yamada smiles, but he still has to blink back a few tears. It really has been too long since he called her. 'Doing okay! I have very big news for you! I feel bad that I didn't tell you before. Me and Shou have wards!'

Instead of the big smile and a conversation about how his mom doesn't technically have grandkids yet, she gives him a sly grin, slowly signing, 'I figured. You're on the news for radio show. Had to listen. I knew it already, Hi-Hi. Hiding from your mother, tsk, tsk.'

Yamada covers his face with his hands, part of it because he must have been embarrassingly obvious on his show. And part of it was to let a few tears out, because his mom never listens to his radio show anymore.

She used to listen to every podcast, and she tuned in to every big event, but as she got older, her hearing aids became too painful to wear all the time. She never wears them now, and never listens to his shows, except the Christmas special. But out of any show she could have tuned in for, he's glad it was that one.

He's probably not hiding his tears very well when he wipes them away, but his mom doesn't comment on it. She just gives him that same look she always did right before she hugged him tight enough to squeeze the rest of his tears out. And he wishes that she could.

'Not hiding, just busy. Kids are a lot of work!' How his mother managed to have eight kids still amazes him. Eight kids, some with issues not too dissimilar to the two he has now, and not a single one of them ever doubted that she loved them. Dammit, he really should have called her sooner. 'E-R-I, or Eri is five. Picked her own sign name. VERY sweet, adorable, cute, and smart-'

His mom starts nodding her head with a knowing look in her eye, and he sighs. This really might turn into the 'No, legally, we kind of have to give them away' conversation if he's not careful.

'S-H-I-N-S-O-U is the boy from the show. So smart, learning JSL really quickly. He's 16, fibbed on radio show. He's not HOH or anything, he's...' Yamada curls his fingers in a bit before he puts his hands together, taking a much needed breath. 'Mom, they've been through a lot. I don't know if I'm doing it right. I need advice.'

His mom reaches up a hand to pat her phone, and despite the distance, he can feel it on his shoulder, before she pulls her teacup into view. He called at just the right time. 'I'm all ears, Hi-Hi.'

He can't help but crack a smile at that old joke. 'S-H-I-N-S-O-U has a stash.'

His mom smiles, holding her face with her hands before she signs. 'I love stash-ers! So many stories. How did you handle it?'

'I haven't, he was having an episode,' Yamada frowns, running his hands through his hair to make a loose ponytail before he realizes he's just stalling. 'He had a knife. Last week he tried to burn himself with that knife. I can't take it from his stash. I can't let him keep it. What do I do?'

His mom nods, taking a sip of tea while she looks off in thought. 'Hard. Can't let him harm, can't violate stash. '

' I think he had stashes found before, ' Yamada explains, frowning as he remembers how upset Eri had been. How convinced she was that he was going to 'be mean' to Shinsou because he had a stash. ' The situation he was in was bad. REALLY bad. He didn't have a lot, so I kind of expected stash-ing, but Eri said something that makes me think that people found his stashes and made fun of him for it. '

His mother shakes her head, full of pity for a boy she's never met. ' Very bad. Awful. Stashes can be the heart. All the things he loves. Can be control. Tell me about burn incident. '

' Shou caught him, no harm, ' Yamada explains, pressing his hands together again before he decides that his mother should know this, even if he's not really supposed to disclose this much. It's his mother, and if she were a part of the criminal underworld, he would know by now. He's also pretty sure that the criminal underworld would be a lot smaller and better behaved if she was a part of it. ' A quirk put him inside two other people. Came out with patch of their skin. Tattoo. They were abusers to him. He tried to burn it off. Didn't tell anyone that it was there. Don't know if he harmed other times, but he might. '

' Shou close to him? ' His mother asks, bumping into that little sore spot that still hurts, even if the situation seems to be improving.

' So-so. Rough going. Not Shou's fault, Shinsou afraid- '

His mother sign-whispers his sign-name for Shinsou with a knowing smile, and he tries not to blush.

' Shinsou is afraid of him, sees threat. Getting better though. '

His mother nods, and the look in her eye tells him she already knows the answer. ' I don't think he will harm. Leave in stash. Could be control. Could be heart. Tell me about stash. '

' I didn't see a lot. Cookies he made with other people. Shou's goggles. They were damaged. Should I replace? Ask to look through- '

' No. Invite only. Invite to take things, don't look without invitation. Show him your stash. Memory books. Tell him it's normal to keep things to remember. ' His mother smiles softly. ' Heart. I think it's heart. Control a little, because heart is frightening thing. Shou protected, may not understand, but he knows it's a feeling. He wants to keep it safe, to himself, own it. Understand it. '

Yamada smiles. He thinks she's probably right. He's not surprised that she knows Shinsou that deeply, even if she's never even met him. She's loved a lot of kids like him. ' Eri worries me. Shinsou and Eri were in bad situation together. Kept each other safe. Eri keeps Shinsou level. Helps from dissociating. She noticed. Eri thinks it's her job to wake out of dissociation. Guilty. I relied on Eri. How do I help her? '

His mother's eyebrows furrow, sadness creeping into her smile. ' Very sad for you all. Very sad for Eri. No control over situation. Very scary. Good helper? '

' VERY good. LOVES helping, ' Yamada brags, smiling to himself about every little chore Eri had assigned to herself with pride. But the more he thinks about it, the more tainted those memories become. ' Helps a lot. Too much? Eri was told she was helping at bad place. Perpetuating that. Stressing her out. My fault- '

' No, ' his mother signs, shaking her head. ' Happy helpers want to have reassurance. Yes, they're good. Yes, they're useful. Not bad thing! Learn confidence! Sometimes, can't help. Helpers feel bad. Helpers need tasks they can do. Not ones that fail. Job not to wake Shinsou. Job to help Shinsou help self. Then good job. Reassure. Eri walk away as good helper. '

Yamada feels like the world has been lifted from his shoulders as he sighs. It was that easy. Eri could help and not have that burden, Shinsou could keep his stash. His mother hadn't even met his wards and she knew how to help them far better than he could.

He knew she would, she had fostered and adopted a lot of kids and dealt with the issues that came up from that enough times to be an expert. That's why he called her. But, still...

' Hard, mom. ' Yamada signs, try to fight the tears with a smile. It's a fight he's won plenty of times, but it hardly ever works with her. ' I'm a hero. Want to save them. It's hard. Slow, I know. Process. Want them to be happy. They're not. '

His mom shakes her head, her eyes becoming a little more glassy, and now he really can't fight it anymore. He's an awful sympathy crier when it comes to his mom, and they've broken down sobbing in enough movie theatres to get banned from a few of them. ' Hi-Hi, you love. Your heart is so big. They feel it. That's enough. That's what I tell myself. Now tell yourself that too. '

Yamada sniffs, wiping away his tears again as he laughs. ' This is not my style, mom. Making my mom cry. Awful villain. Never showed you pictures! You need to see my wards! Eri poses, so cute! Will kill me. Will die of cute overdose. Not lying, mom, she is too cute I can't stand it sometimes. '

His mom laughs, the same loud and boisterous laugh that she's always had, while she wipes away her own tears. ' Will see! You can't hide them now! You win Christmas lottery. I will cheat. '

She gives him a sly look that suggests that all the Christmas lotteries have been fixed, and he doesn't doubt it. They've always tended to favor whichever sibling had the youngest children for her to spoil, or whoever had been going through a rough patch.

He feels a little guilty for being so excited about that. His mother had a lot of obligations during the holidays with every family she had to visit. Since he and Shouta didn't have kids, and usually worked through Christmas anyway, they were fine with whichever day worked out best for his mom. She always seemed so frazzled when she arrived, but by the time she left she was swearing that their Christmas was her favorite, because everyone was fluent in sign.

He hopes that Shinsou would still be with them by Christmas.

He tries to ignore that thought, and everything that comes with it. He's crossed a line with the way he thinks about the wards, and he knows it could come back to bite him, especially with Shinsou. Eri wasn't likely to gain control of her quirk for a few years, but Shinsou's investigation couldn't last that long. He wouldn't be surprised if Naomasa was putting the pressure on Shouta right now, even though it's only been a week.

He knew that he should want that, he should want to catch the people who hurt Shinsou, the people who were creating Nomus out of hundreds of other victims just like him. But he didn't want to lose Shinsou either.

Yamada shakes his head, smiling at his mother. He wouldn't be able to hide this from her anyway, and he's pretty sure she's already figured it out. ' I'm excited for you to meet my kids. '

He hasn't even admitted that to Shouta, but he was right. His mother just smiles at him like she already knows.

Eri doesn't like her quirk.

She really wishes she didn't have a cursed quirk. People tell her it's not cursed, and she knows she should believe what the heroes tell her more than anything that He told her, but the heroes don't know what her quirk is like.

It hurts sometimes, a lot. It makes her really tired. It makes her really mean sometimes, and that's the worst part. She's really mean to Twenny sometimes, and she doesn't want to be. Even when she's being mean, she's scared that she'll be so mean that he leaves, but she can't stop being mean because her quirk makes her mean. She really hates how that feels.

And she really hates how people look at her because of her quirk. She makes Yama scared sometimes, and she makes people pretend that they like her because they're scared that her quirk will start working if she gets upset.

And she doesn't like that they're right.

Twenny said when she gets hurt, her quirk starts working, but he might be a little wrong. Eri hasn't gotten hurt at all, and her horn is already too big. It's bigger than both of her hands, and it makes her head tilt to the side if she doesn't try to keep it up. She doesn't like that at all. Her horn makes her look even more ugly.

Eri hopes that Twenny doesn't think she's ugly.

She's been really bad, and she couldn't do her job right. Yama or Mirio saved Twenny while she was asleep, and even though they're heroes, they need Eri to save Twenny because it's her job. She was really good at it too, but her quirk makes her really bad at it now.

Eri stops at the door to see what Twenny is doing. If he's busy on the computer, then she probably shouldn't bother him because he might be doing investigation stuff, but he's cleaning his room up after Bakugo left it so messy. Eri hopes that she can help Twenny clean up, so he won't hate her so much for being so bad.

Twenny is a really good TV mom, because he has eyes in the back of his head, like TV moms do. Eri didn't even say anything, and he knows she's there. He stops putting things in the plastic bag and looks at her, and his face does a lot of weird things before he sits down on the floor and lifts up his arm to her.

Eri runs to hug him, and his arm wraps around her and his hand is on the back of her head. She sniffs and tries to breathe really deep, because she doesn't want to cry anymore. It really hurts to cry when her horn is this big. Twenny hugs her, and that means that he still likes her, even though she's ugly and bad.

Twenny is the best TV mom, because he knows all about Eri's horn. She doesn't even have to tell him it's hurting, but he pulls her back and starts rubbing around the bottom of it so it starts to feel better. And he tries to smile at her, but it's a whole lot like when she tries to smile, and it makes him look really tired. "I need to teach your heroes how to do this, just in case I'm not around when it starts hurting."

Eri shakes her head and throws her arms around Twenny again, and she's trying really hard not to cry, and stomping her feet kind of helps. "Mom, please don't leave, I'll be really good-"

"Eri, shh," Twenny starts rubbing her back and hums while he holds her really tight, and when she sits down on his lap he curls his legs up behind her. It makes her feel really warm, and safe. "Eri, I'm not going to leave. I'm sorry I scared you. I just think that other people should know about your horn tricks."

Twenny gives her a napkin to blow her nose into, and then gives her another before he flicks her horn really hard, hard enough that a lot of snot comes running out of her nose and her eyes get really watery and full-feeling. But after she blows her nose, she feels a lot better, and her head doesn't hurt nearly as bad as she thought it did.

"Now you feel better." Eri nods, because Twenny's voice gets kind of low and weird sounding when he asks questions now, just so Eri knows it's a question. "That's good. The heroes should know how to do those things if they're going to take care of you. If you're on a date with Mirio and your horn starts hurting, he needs to know how to make you really snotty."

"No!" Eri whines, and her face feels really hot. "I don't wanna get snotty on Mirio! Don't tell him!"

Twenny kind of laughs at her, but she really doesn't want him to tell Mirio. Mirio is a really cool guy, and everyone tells him that, but if Eri snotted on Mirio, then he would think that she's not cool at all. Even if Mirio wasn't mean, and didn't laugh at her or bully her, she'd still be really embarrassed.

"It's okay if you get snotty on me, Eri!" Mirio says, and Eri really wishes she was a TV mom so she would know he was standing in the doorway. "Tamaki always gets snot on me anyway. There was one year his allergies got REALLY bad, and every time he hid his face in my shirt, snot would get all over it. By the time I got home, my shirt was so snotty and crusty-"

Eri hides her face on Twenny's shoulder and whines, hoping Mirio would stop talking about gross stuff. This must be why Jirou and Momo always complain about boys being gross. Even Twenny is acting like a gross boy because Bakugo is a bad influence on him, so he definitely needs to stop being friends with Bakugo and start being friends with girls.

Twenny just pats her head, and Eri wonders if Kendo knows how to do that with her kids too. Maybe Kendo would be a really good friend for Twenny, because at least she wouldn't leave his room all messy after they hung out.

Eri looks up to tell Twenny that he should invite Kendo over the next time he needs to learn math, but he's looking at his phone. Before she can turn around to read what he's saying, his phone talks for him. "An o-overwhelmi-ing emo-otion cau-uses the build u-up. I-it could a-also be the tri-igger. Tra-ash bird didn't te-est that tho-ough. Cou-uld be wrong."

Twenny bites his lip like he's really worried, but he shouldn't be, because Mirio was here to protect him. Eri looks up at Mirio, and he's smiling but it looks a little weird. "It could be overwhelming happiness?"

"Cou-uld be wrong. Do-on't get yo-our hopes up."

"Well, that doesn't really change anything for me," Mirio said, smiling at Twenny like he really wants Twenny to see that it's okay, so he'll stop being so worried and shrink-y. "I already wanted to make Eri so happy that she can't stand it!"

Eri tilts her head, because that sounds kind of mean. “I don’t wanna be so happy that I don’t like it! I wanna be happy and like it.”

“It’s not like that, Eri,” Twenny says, and he starts rubbing her horn again before it even starts hurting. “You know how you get a lot of snot when your horn gets-”

“Twenny,” Eri whines, and she covers her face. She’s getting really mad that Twenny keeps being gross around Mirio.

“Your horn grows because it stores feelings up, kind of like that. If you start hurting too much, your horn grows to store some of that pain, but if you get too happy, it stores it up the same way,” Twenny explains, and he’s not as good at explaining things as Zawa, but Eri still kind of understands. “So, you might be able to make it start growing by being really happy, the same way hurting too much triggered it.”

“And I think that makes a lot of sense,” Mirio says. “It’s just like in The Prettiest Unicorn Princess! The unicorn princess’ tears only helped a few people, but her smile saved the whole kingdom! So, I think that if your quirk was full of your happiness instead of pain, my quirk would be even better than it was before!”

Eri doesn’t think Mirio knows that her horn doesn’t make her a Unicorn Princess, and he really should because it looks so ugly now, and it’s full of snot. But she doesn’t want to be mean and make him sad, so she tries to smile at him. “I’m gonna work really hard on being happy, Mirio!”

“And we’re all gonna help!” Mirio promises, and Eri’s really glad he will. It’s really hard for Eri to try to be happy sometimes, but the heroes and Twenny make that easy a whole lot of the time.

“Don’t worry so much about it, though,” Twenny tells her, but his voice gets kind of shaky like it does when he’s trying to talk to other people by talking to her. “It will take a long time for it to work like that.”

Mirio smiles at Twenny, and Eri kind of likes the way he smiles now. It’s not a really big smile, but his eyes look different in a way that kind of makes her feel funny. “I don’t mind that at all.”

Eri doesn’t think it will take too long, though. Her horn is already really big, so it should start working again soon, and then she can fix Mirio. She just needs to be really happy a few times, but that shouldn’t be too hard. Especially because Twenny seemed like he was trying to be friends with Mirio, and if Twenny and Mirio were best friends, that would be even better than living on a TV show.

Maybe, if her TV mom and TV dad and other TV dad and two big brothers were all friends, she would really feel like a unicorn princess.

27 felt hollow.

It was unnerving. After he typed out his thoughts, placing all of those painful words onto the screen, he started feeling like he should keep some of them. Something to fill this gaping wound in his chest.

He tried to ignore it, tried to clean his room to see if getting rid of any trace of Bakugo's visit would settle him, but when he started, he realized this was his chance. Just like he had thrown away those distracting thoughts by typing them out, he could throw away his collections, and avoid learning what Yamada thought of the items he hadn't found yet.

He felt stupid for hesitating, for wavering with each item. He knew he needed to move quickly, that he didn't know when Yamada would return. But he kept turning Creati's note over and over in his hand.

'It's not fair that you can't talk to Momo. You used to talk to him.'

Momo tried to talk to him through this note. She could have just talked, she wasn't broken like 27 was, but she talked like he had to. Talking without talking. He still doesn't know why she did that, but it doesn't matter anymore. The heroes all know he's stupid, that Eri was smarter than him. Creati would never try to talk to him like that again.

It's harder to throw it away, but he does.

He finishes collecting everything, every piece of trash he's tucked into his pockets or utensil he's hidden in his sleeves. He leaves the knife, the cookies, and his owner's goggles out. There's no point in hiding them and if they went missing, Yamada would find the rest of it. And he'd much rather eat moldy cookies than a clump of his own hair.

When he sees Eri, the guilt threatens to overwhelm him. He worried her over this, over all of this trash, and hurt her enough for her horn to double in size. He hurt her with his broken mind, with his trash, with his quirk most of all. Everything else that Bakugo asked about were ways that children could be abused, could be traumatized. Mental quirks must be a form of abuse too.

He abused Eri with his quirk.

He tries to hide it. He tries to calm her down, to soothe her, but when she calls him 'Mom' again, he nearly breaks. She trusted him, she believed in him more than anyone else, and he abused her. There were scars inside her mind that were all Chisaki's doing, but there were also some that were his. What he did to her with his quirk.

She still needed him, for now, and after what he had done, he wouldn't dare let her suffer even the slightest amount of pain.

But Eri had her heroes. And some of them were pure, they could be trusted. He thought that way about Mirio the first time he laid eyes on him, and he was stupid to allow himself to forget that.

Eri had Mirio. There would come a time that she wouldn't need 27 anymore. There might even come a time that she didn't want him, when she realized what he had done to her. And 27 wouldn't fight when that time came.

He would let himself be thrown away like the trash he was.

Yamada surprises him when he returns. He asks Mirio and Eri to finish cooking while he helps 27 clean his room. 27 figured he would want an audience for this, he was a radio show host after all, but he was at least kind enough to spare Eri from watching him go through 27's collection.

27 remains seated on the floor, and Yamada joins him. It's an odd choice, especially when there was so much power that could be conveyed just by looming over someone, but Yamada was acting odd already.

His hands were already signing before he started talking, and he didn't usually translate and speak unless something truly worried him. "So, I know that today has been pretty rough for you, and if you don't want to talk about it right now, that's completely okay. You just say the word and we can drop it. But I wanted to talk to you about your stash."

Of course he did. 27 had known that this was coming the entire time. He knew it would come when he picked up the goggles to start this stash. But despite what he knows, he finds himself feeling sick, his stomach knotting around a black and bitter feeling. He's cried too much today, but he feels like he will again if Yamada's words are as sharp as he expects them to be.

"I'm really sorry that Bakugo found it."

Those aren't the words that he was expecting.

27 looks up, because he must have misheard Yamada somehow, or Yamada must have chosen those words just to confuse him so that 27 will watch him sign, and his words and signs could tear him apart twice as efficiently. But Yamada just gives him a bitter smile before he looks to the side, scratching the back of his neck. "I haven't really told you guys about my family, but I have an older brother, Ueno. And he had stashes too! He collected a lot of really neat stuff, and all of it meant a lot to him. There were some things he didn't want to share, but he did show me a few, and I really enjoyed hearing him talk about them."

Yamada truly is the Master of Anticipation, but he doesn't need to be. What he's asking 27 to do is cruel enough and he certainly doesn't have to make it crueler by dragging it out.

Not even Hari asked 27 to talk about the things he hid. He didn't need to. All Hari had to do was pick up a few things and wave them around, laughing all the while, and 27 would begin to break. 27 tried to avoid it, tried to prepare. He knew it happened every year, but there were still things that he couldn't bring himself to throw away. Eri's drawings. A button or scrap from a fight he was proud of winning.

The dog treat.

Hari went still when he found that, and for a moment, 27 felt like he won. He found himself tilting from a sickening apprehension to vicious glee, feeling like it hadn't been a mistake to forget that one. He thought that Hari might feel satisfied, feel like Dog had been broken enough and now it wouldn't be worth his time, but then Hari started laughing. Full, gasping laughs that turned sharper and louder before he grabbed Dog by the mask and forced the biscuit through the slot, forcing him to eat it or choke. Still laughing all the while, as Eri cried.

It was funny. 27 had kept it because he thought it would remind him of the worst thing Hari had forced him to do, and then Hari used it to do something worse.

"It's okay, what I meant to say was—" Yamada stops, folding his hands into each other as they both sit in this unnatural silence. "You don't have to tell me, you know? Because I know that this is really personal to you."

27 is too tired and worn and hollow for this. If Yamada doesn't know how to start it, 27 will, just to get it over with. ' Trash. I know. Trash. '

Yamada starts shaking his head, glancing at the tied up plastic bags. He's probably figured out that's where the rest of it is. Maybe it will help 27 to keep from breaking if Yamada finds Eri's used tissues when he digs through it. "I don't think it's trash. I think it's a pretty neat way of keeping 'pieces of happiness.' That's what Ueno and my mom called it, 'pieces of happiness.' I keep my pieces in scrapbooks and pictures, and a lot of people have stashes like that but... That kind of wasn't an option for you. So, I don't think it's weird or bad or anything to have stashes like yours, you know?"

27 is impressed. He doesn't even collect trash the right way. He doesn't collect happiness, he collects anything that interests him, and none of it makes him happy.

"I'm not going to be mean to you, Shinsou, or make you feel bad about it," Yamada says, his voice dropping lower and softer, becoming an odd thing. Something 27 doesn't understand. "And I really hate that someone did. That someone would try to take away your happiness."

27 feels his lips twist against his will, and before he can miss the way the mask would have hidden that, miss being able to understand the people around him, miss not feeling so stupid, he reaches for the plastic bag.

If Yamada doesn't understand what he means, he will show him.

The glove from the tattooist's trashcan. ' Trash. ' A sticker that was on Eri's apple. ' Trash. ' A piece of chalk from Yamada's classroom. ' Trash. '

"Shinsou," Yamada calls sharply, but 27 refuses to look up. He waits, he waits for it to begin, when will this be over? "It's not trash."

It is. All of it is trash. Freedom from Chisaki, being able to feed Eri her favorite food, the first time he was proud to know a skill that wasn't useful to a Number - it's all trash. It's his, and he's trash.

Yamada sighs, and points to the sticker that he dropped on the floor. "Tell me about this one."

27 had been so afraid to do that when this conversation began, but now he was too frustrated for Yamada's command to come across as anything other than relief. ' On apple. Took it. Trash. '

He should know better than to sign the way he did, with sweeping and sharp gestures that betray too much of his own irritation, but Yamada doesn't seem to notice, smiling softly at him. "Eri's favorite food is apples. So when you took the sticker, it was a way to keep that piece of happiness."

His words sting, but not like they should.

They ring in the hollowness inside of him, in a way that almost fills it. He's too tired to stop himself from chasing it, even if his hands move stiltedly through his signs.

' Made for E-R-I. At hero dorm. First. ' His hands curl in on themselves and he tilts his head further down, just in case the wet stinging in his eyes overwhelmed him. ' First time. Made food for E-R-I. ,

He doesn't look up, doesn't have enough energy to be awed by how skilled Yamada must be to make him admit this, to make him bare his own wounds to be salted. No one had played him this well, had made him so hollow and raw and desperate. "That's really beautiful, Shinsou."

27 doesn't feel as hollow anymore.

Yamada smiles at him when he risks looking up, that kind yet wincing smile that he can't quite figure out. "That's a really beautiful moment, and I think you should keep it. I think it would be a real shame to let something like that go."

Yamada always confuses him. He twists him up too often, and right now, it's horrible. 27 is torn in so many directions, to hide these things, to show them, to bury his face in his hands and cry, but Yamada doesn't let him.

"I ordered a box online that should be coming in a few days. It has a lock on it, and you'll be the only one with a key. You can put it anywhere you want, and put pretty much anything you want in it. If there's something that me or Shou really need, we might ask you to give it back, but there's a lot of stuff that we can replace. Even if it's part of our hero costumes," Yamada says, eyes glancing on the goggles before he looks away.

27 finds himself touching them again, trying to ignore how stupid he feels to be so attached to a piece of plastic, something so easily destroyed. 'Sorry. I won't do it again.'

Yamada frowns in an oddly playful way, tilting his foot in 27's direction. "Aw, come on! You haven't taken any of my hero gear! You know, I'm starting to think you don't like Present Mic. First the name calling, now you don't want any of my gear. Next thing you know, you'll be calling in to my show to call me a washed up, loudmouthed has-been."

Despite himself, 27 raises an eyebrow. 'Can't. I'm mute.'

Yamada freezes up, then slaps a hand over his mouth as he leans forward, curling in on himself almost as though he were in pain. "Ugh, me and my big mouth. I just--"

'Joke.' 27 signs, and repeats it when Yamada glances up at him, just in case he hadn't seen it. 'Joke. I don't care. Learning sign. Talk to Eri. It's fine.'

It is fine.

27 is fine with being quirkless, with being weak. He hasn't lost all of his teeth, and his quirk was a liability in a fight more often than not. He doesn't need his quirk. He doesn't want to use his quirk ever again.

He never wants to hurt someone like that.

Married, With Children

Chapter Summary

In the aftermath of 27's stash being discovered, Yamada tries to show him his own "stash" over dinner. A trip down memory lane has some new revelations for 27, and new plots begin to form because of it.

Yamada looks so happy as he points to the pictures in his scrapbook, his 'stash' as he keeps calling it. Eri leans over the table, staring wide-eyed at this glimpse into the past, and Mirio leans over her to offer his own comments from time to time, though he often goes back to the kitchen to keep cooking.

"That's me when I was Shinsou's age! I had a podcast instead of a radio show, and I just finished recording my 1000th episode!" Yamada says, tapping a picture of a younger version of himself throwing up peace signs in front of a messy desk covered by various pieces of equipment and a laptop.

His hair makes him look like a duck. 27 can't stop thinking about that, and his fingers twitch at his sides because he knows the sign for duck. It might be funny to call him that, or it might be hurtful. Yamada likes his jokes even less than Eri, and 27 is beginning to wonder if he knows how to make jokes the right way.

He wishes this were easier to understand, that it was simpler. He doesn't even know what he's supposed to feel when he looks at these pictures, but Yamada is clearly looking to find some kind of reaction. He doesn't know what it is.

Eri looks at him, then to Mirio, before she looks at the picture again. He doesn't know what she sees, what she looks for. If she understands that he doesn't look like them because the mask left scars on his face, or if she thinks he was born with those scars the same way he was born with purple hair. If she wants him to look more like Mirio and Yamada, if she's disappointed that he doesn't.

Yamada turns the page, and he can see that the next two pages are black - black backgrounds and black shapes with a sharp contrast of white - before he flips past them. But Eri puts her hand on the book, her thumb trying to turn back to what Yamada wanted to hide. "Yama, you're skipping! You can't skip pages in a book!"

Yamada turns to her with that wincing smile, a hand keeping her from turning back. "Oh, those are kind of sad pictures. I'm not sure if you guys want to see them."

Eri pulls her hand back, sitting back in her chair in a way that's almost a pout, but the tilt of her head betrays nervous curiosity. "I kinda want to. I like seeing pictures from when you were Twenny's age, even if they're sad."

Yamada's smile becomes something more fond while he pats Eri's head, nodding after he glances at 27. "Well, Shou and me had a friend named Shirakumo Oboro. This is what he looked like."

Yamada's finger points to the young man with wild white hair who smiles widely at the camera, arms wrapped around younger versions of his owner and Yamada. His owner stares off to the side, seemingly uncomfortable with having his picture taken, which seems to be a theme so far, but Yamada seems more enthusiastic than usual. The picture's color has been stripped away unnaturally, to match others on the page. People wearing dark suits on a rainy day, the blue sky turned light gray and somber.

'It will always be the three of us.'

27 wonders if that's true. If there has been a ghost living between Yamada and his owner, unnoticed before now. If Yamada still felt that way, after the years that had passed, and the funeral.

"He passed away before we graduated. He was going to be an amazing hero, and I kind of wish you guys could have met him," Yamada says, his eyes half-closed to look beyond those pictures, to memories made vivid in his mind that couldn't be shared with anyone else. "He was a really great guy, and always had a way of making everyone around him smile. Even Shou, as grumpy as he was back then."

'I'm sorry for L-O-S-S.' 27 signs. He thinks that's what people are supposed to say, though he's only heard it with a mocking edge tainting those words. Numbers weren't supposed to mourn each other, they weren't supposed to get close enough because the pain when someone didn't come back from a job could be a distraction in their own work. Hearing those words was meant to be a reminder of that, that it shouldn't be a loss. That a Number shouldn't get attached to anyone, to never lose them.

Yamada flashes a somber half-smile at him, then shows him how to sign those words correctly. "Thank you, Shinsou. I think you two would have really gotten along."

27 doesn't know if that's the response that's supposed to be given. If there is something that's supposed to be said. Maybe that's why no one talked about 50 after 98 told him that she died, because they knew he wouldn't be able to give them that response, his mask kept tight for months before Bug allowed him to train with his quirk again.

He wishes that someone did. That someone else remembered her here. In this place that feels too much like their shared dream at times, that sometimes feels like their escape. He knows it's not, he's not young and naive enough to believe in escaping The Miasma anymore. But he finds himself missing her now more than ever, wondering what she would think of all of this.

If she liked coffee. If she would go to school with them. If she would joke with Yamada, or even with his owner. If his owner would own her too.

If he would fall asleep with his head resting on her arm, while Eri slept on his. If her other arm would cover them both, keeping them safe in a way he's never been able to do for Eri.

He's always known that she would have liked Eri, and he used to dream that she had lived, that he could see 50 holding Eri in her lap the same way she used to hold him. That she could give Eri that same fond smile that he's never forgotten, even if he's not sure if he remembers the rest of her correctly.

'I want you guys to feel safe.' Yamada wanted that. He's sure that Yamada wants Eri to feel safe because she deserves to be, that he wants 27 to feel safe so he'll slip up and tell them about The Miasma.

27 hasn't felt safe since 50 died. There were a lot of things that he lost with her, and that was one of them.

Mirio places a large bowl in front of him, and 27 looks up to see that everyone else has been served the same steaming, broth covered noodles. The scrapbook is still open on the table, as though Yamada still intends to keep showing it.

27 looks at the broth, trying to find an appetite for it. Trying to reason with himself. Eri's hands never changed his food. He was able to drink the coffee that she didn't give him. They haven't poisoned him so far, he hasn't given them enough information for him to be disposed of yet. Mirio might give him that same nervous wince that Toshinori did when he didn't eat the cupcakes. He might be insulted, or hurt.

He tells himself that it smells nice. That it looks delicious. It does, on the surface, but the back of his broken mind keeps twisting it into something different. Something dangerous.

Eri slurps at her noodles with gusto, and he flinches as he waits for the droplets of broth to land on the scrapbook, but Yamada pulls the scrapbook to stand up at the head of the table, so that everyone can see it. "Here's me and Shou after we graduated! I had to wrangle him into letting me style his hair, but I cleaned him up pretty nice, I think."

"Pretty!" Eri cheers, leaning over the table to get a better look. His owner's hair was longer than it was in the other pictures of him, but it seemed straighter and smoother, pulled into a half-braid at the top. His owner didn't look pleased, but the solemn way he faced the camera seemed to be deeper than being forced to look nice and have his picture taken. "But your hero clothes are wrong."

Yamada laughs, and he should. As impractical as his hero costume was as Present Mic, the clothes he was wearing in that picture were absolutely garish. Bright red streaks in his leather jacket and huge speakers on his shoulders, a fishnet shirt screaming to every villain he faced 'Hey! Stab here! I don't have any protective gear!'

27 hadn't been on a job in years, and he's never truly faced a hero on one, but he found himself picking apart how easy a target this costume made Present Mic.

"Yeah, my first agency was a little wild. Shou hated that look. And Shou..." Yamada trailed off, his hand twisting his chopsticks away from the bowl, probably unable to sign while holding them. "Shou didn't have an agency lined up, so he just wore some sweatpants and a sweatshirt. But the look kind of stuck, I guess."

Mirio's chopsticks click as they drop into his bowl. "Aizawa-sensei didn't have an agency? Even if he didn't have any offers from internships, with his quirk and graduating from UA - how could anyone have turned him down?"

Yamada scratches the back of his head, laughing nervously. "Well, Shou decided that he'd rather do his own thing as an independent underground hero. It was kind of rough for him at first, with no money and no coworkers, and definitely no one teaching him the ropes of hero work post-grad. But, he definitely made it work out for him!"

27 notices Mirio's glance, and tries to make it seem like he had just been distracted by the conversation. He picks at the pieces of meat and vegetables, as though he's trying to decide which one to eat. His uncoordinated left hand makes stalling a little easier.

“Oh! I made ramen! It’s my favorite thing to eat, so I kind of couldn’t help myself,” Mirio admits nervously. “I didn’t think to ask if you liked that, though.”

His favorite. Now 27 has to eat it, he has to eat all of it. It would be insulting if he didn’t. He lifts his hands to sign, careful to set the chopsticks on the side so they don’t fall in. ‘ Thank you. I don’t know if I like. Never eat. ’

“Shinsou said ‘Thank you.’ He’s never eaten ramen before, so you better have done a good job,” Yamada translates, pointing at Mirio accusingly.

“I did my best! I should definitely take you guys to the best ramen spot in town, though. It took two years of searching, but Tamaki and I finally found one that we agree on, so that has to mean it’s the one!” Mirio says, his smile waning at the edges. “The one in Osaka might be better, though.”

Yamada sees something that 27 doesn’t in those words, and flips through several pages while Eri is distracted by her meal. 27 brings himself to pull a few noodles to his mouth, telling himself that this might help. That Mirio wants to see him eating his favorite food. “Here’s the pictures from me and Shou’s wedding! I cleaned him up a little better this time.”

27 has long since learned not to choke and cough from that long sickness, but the broth trickling down his throat catches him by surprise. He manages to close his mouth, keeping the noise to an odd, strangled sneeze, hand curling around his mouth as he looks up to see those pictures.

They were married?

“So pretty!” Eri says, entranced by the sight. His owner and Yamada both wore suits, both looked at each other with a fondness that 27 was unsettled to see. It felt too private to look at, as though he was intruding here even with Yamada’s invitation. There were flowers braided into his owner’s hair.

His owner. With tiny pink flowers. In his hair. Smiling softly while he looked at Yamada so intensely, so reverently. It betrayed something that 27 wasn’t meant to understand.

“I, uh,” Yamada trails off, the scratching at the back of his neck turned furious. “Did we mention that? Jeez, with the ‘Present Mic’ thing and the-”

‘ Fine. It’s fine, ’ 27 signs, even if it’s not fine. Yamada being a hero didn’t change things nearly this much, this.... 27 couldn’t understand this.

“Present Mic thing?” Mirio asks.

“Well, I was kinda dressed up as ‘Yamada’ for the first few days, and I guess I forgot to mention it, so it was kind of a shock to see me all done up as Present Mic for school,” Yamada explains, waving his chopsticks around as he waves his arms. “And - you know, me and Shou aren’t always really- it’s caught a few people off guard, I guess.”

“Oh. That was supposed to be a secret?” Mirio asks, laughing a bit. “I don’t think most of the first years have figured it out, but most of the upperclassmen know, or at least suspect. We just thought it wouldn’t be polite to bring it up.”

“Yeah, Shou had a few herolets that didn’t know the meaning of the word,” Yamada grouches.

Was 27 supposed to know this? Did his owner intend to hide it from him, to hide that expression he wore in that picture? Hide how Yamada was clearly his weakness, how much Yamada meant to him, how....

Yamada wasn't a right hand. He was closer than that, in an unfamiliar way. His owner cared for Yamada deeply, and Yamada cared for his owner. That wasn't something that owners and right hands did, that wasn't how power translated.

He had no idea who Yamada was anymore. Was he allowed to give 27 orders? Was he allowed to punish him? Was that why he hadn't?

Yamada was looking at him nervously, obviously wanting some kind of reaction from him. Something far more soothing than the confusion that was twisting inside 27, even as he tried to ignore it.

' Cute . '

Is that the right thing to say? Would Yamada think that he was mocking him the same way Bug did when he tried and failed to break out of her hold as they trained? That word meant that he failed in a safe way, an amusing one, but here it seemed to mean something different.

Yamada laughs, even if he didn't mean it as a joke. "I think Shou prefers 'handsome,' but we do look pretty cute here," Yamada stares at the picture, again finding memories that he couldn't share. 27 wishes that he could, that he could try to understand this if he saw more of it.

His owner and Yamada were in a relationship. A romantic one. They were married. There was a history there that 27 had never guessed, never expected, and he found himself more interested to know it with all the implications it carried. He didn't care how Hari and Chisaki met, that never mattered to how they dealt with him. He knew that Boss had worked with Memory in other business ventures before The Miasma, and that Memory had recruited Bug, but that didn't change how the Numbers were treated.

His owner and Yamada were married. Married couples usually had children.

His owner and Yamada took Eri in right after she was rescued.

27 recoils at the thought, even as the pieces slide into place, as what he always knew comes into focus with a blinding intensity. They didn't want to use Eri's quirk. They would have been able to trigger it by now, or there would be some evidence that they were trying to figure it out.

They gave her a room filled with softness. They knew her favorite foods. They read her stories, held her while she slept, looked at her so fondly and never once hurt her.

They wanted to be Eri's parents.

27 should be happy about that. He should tell them everything he knows, her night terrors, her quirk, how to take care of her horn, the fits that come after her quirk erupts. He should tell them about The Miasma, everything that they need to know, everything they're waiting to hear before he's disposed of, before he's taken from Eri again and disposed of.

But 27 is selfish. Selfish to the core, deep inside the rotting mess inside his mind, he's already figuring out ways to play against this for his own benefit.

They wanted to be Eri's parents, but 27 was Eri's mother. That wasn't why they took 27 from the police station, they still wanted him only for what he knew about The Miasma. But Eri was a foothold.

He could make them want to keep him too.

This. This was the game he could play. He could manipulate them. He could cleave onto them, he could amuse them, he could make them pity him. He could prove himself worthy of the space he made for himself here, dragging out the investigation until it was forgotten entirely.

He didn't deserve it. After everything he'd done, especially to Eri, he didn't deserve to be here. He didn't deserve to want this place.

But he wanted.

He ate half of his food, and that pleased Mirio, enough to draw promises to find which flavor of ramen he preferred. He signed his own censored opinions to each picture that Yamada showed him, though that didn't keep the man from being upset that his mother had removed the pictures of herself from the wedding photos.

He sat in a chair he didn't belong in, stomach full and warm with broth, and tried to pretend he was someone who deserved to be here. To sit at a table with Eri and drift in this strange, warm happiness.

He wanted to stay here.

He wanted to become someone who deserved to.

Chapter Summary

27 and Eri receive their missions from Yamada, and try to perform to the best of their abilities in such a high stakes environment. Monoma makes his move, to surprising results. 27 tries to gather information, and to do that, must reveal a great deal of it to Aizawa.

Chapter Notes

Previously on Wards of UA: Toshinori provided nutritional supplements for Shinsou to take with food to help with how underweight he is and how little he eats. Eri's horn has grown twice, and now requires "Horn tricks" to help her blow her nose. Ashido has a plan to try to give Shinsou a high five instead of a hug, and Bakugo left the math tutoring session with Shinsou after revealing the existence of Shinsou's stash. Bakugo did not see the resolution of that situation, but did know that Eri was extremely upset. Bakugo had been calling after Monoma at lunch the day before. Shinsou was able to speak to Bakugo during their fight, and while he was dissociating after fighting Ojiro.

Aizawa doesn't look up when Sansa places another cup of coffee on the desk, but he can see the officer shaking his head from the reflection of the screen. "Happy birthday, Eraserhead."

Aizawa rubs at his eyes, looking down at the sketch again to make sure he hasn't forgotten what that face looks like after hours of searching for it through various databases of human traffickers. He glances to the side to see that Sansa didn't just hand him another dose of the station's brew, but something from the coffee shop down the street. It really is his birthday.

Sansa sighs, settling into a chair behind him, and intentionally bumps into the Aizawa's chair to convey how unhappy he is to lose access to his computer. "You know, most people spend their birthday with their families. They spend time with their loved ones, looking back fondly on another year well spent, or just drinking themselves sick to forget that old age is coming for them. You could try doing something like that. Something that will get you away from my desk."

Aizawa waits until Sansa starts sorting through his paperwork, lifting the papers up off the desk, so that they spill out of his hands when Aizawa pushes his chair back against Sansa's. The cat officer glares at him, but Aizawa ignores it. "What did she know?"

"Nothing, just like we knew she wouldn't," Sansa snaps. Aizawa would like to doubt that he even met with that informant, but he knows Sansa well enough to know he wouldn't douse himself in glitter just to make that lie believable. "A big fish like that one wouldn't travel in the grey. The informants can't help us here."

"If it's a big fish at all," Aizawa mutters, picking up the sketch again. Large, jagged nose. Blue and green lips. Short, stubby limbs and rounded torso. This could all be a meaningless figment of the imagination, and the way it was so easily given to them only makes him doubt it more.

"Naomasa has to chase it anyway," Sansa says, staring at the sketch over Aizawa's shoulder. "Look, you know you have time. His lawyer is gunning for a full pardon, and as big as this is, it's not big enough for that. But it'll take a while for the greedy bastard to realize that."

"I don't have time," Aizawa grouses, turning back to the mug shots of convicted human traffickers from the Ukraine. "Shinsou won't talk, and I won't let them--"

He already knows who's calling when he hears his ringtone, but he still has no idea what to say to him. "Babe, come home. I don't know what Naomasa said to keep you out this late - and by the way, I SHOULD know - but you need to sleep. We can tackle it on Wednesday. Together."

Aizawa leans his head forward, closing his eyes. He could fall asleep like this. Just a few hours to rest his eyes, then turn back to this impossible and desperate mess. As much as he wanted to, that wasn't logical.

He needed his husband for this.

"I'll be there soon. There's been a--"

"A break in the case, I figured. I might be blonde, but I'm not stupid," Hizashi laughs, and Aizawa can tell by how quiet the sound is that both the wards are asleep. They should be, considering that it was after midnight, but after reading the keylogger he didn't think that Shinsou would tonight. "Tell me when you get home, alright?"

"Alright," Aizawa sighs, closing out of his searches then standing to gather the sketch and his birthday gift from Sansa. "I love you."

"Aw, Eraser-" Sansa gushes before Aizawa kicks his chair to push him out of his way.

"I love you too, Shou," Hizashi answers, and he can tell by his tone that he didn't miss how irregular it was for Aizawa to say it first.

He hoped that would make him more reasonable when they talked about this.

Yamada was upset by something.

27 knew that Yamada wasn't as open as he first thought. Yamada had a lot of tells that pointed in opposite directions at times, and he tended to smile to hide his true feelings and intentions. He didn't use it as well as Mirio did, and he dropped it too often for it to be effective.

He dropped that smile again when he turned to the rice cooker with a glare, gathering a serving in a paddle with rough and jerky movements. Yamada was angry about something.

27 looks back at his breakfast. He ate half of the omelette, and didn't pick around the parts that had gone cold from the ketchup's chill, even though he wanted to. He took the supplement, even though he faked doing so last night, tucking the pill under his thumb when he took a drink to swallow it. The memory of Yamada smiling so gratefully at him after being lied to made the thought of repeating the action too bitter.

Despite his best judgement, he doubts that Yamada is angry because the pill was poisoned, and didn't take.

He takes Eri's finished plate and his own to the sink, then stands behind Yamada, still unsure whether he should approach. Yamada was angry, and even if 27 hadn't done anything to make him angry, he could still pay the price for it.

Yamada turns around and jumps back with a gasp, the rice paddle pressed against his chest leaving white grains behind on his shirt. "Oh jeez, you and Shou. Nearly gave me a heart attack, little listener!"

' Need help. ' 27 frowns when he sees Yamada straighten, eyes widening in slight concern. ' Do you need help? '

Yamada smiles at him, flickering into that softer, smaller smile he still doesn't understand. His hand rises, but he drops it back to his side, looking around nervously. "Thanks for offering, but I think I'm pretty much done here. Wait, what time..." Yamada winces as he looks at the clock on the stove, dropping the rice paddle back into the rice cooker before he waves for Eri to come to him.

27 notices the tilt of her head when she walks towards them, and grabs a paper towel for her to use once Yamada is done with whatever he needs from them.

"So, I probably should have told you guys earlier, but today is Shou's birthday," Yamada whispers, caught in a half-crouch as he tries to find the right height to talk to both 27 and Eri. 27 finds himself leaning down a bit to make it easier for him. "Birthdays are really special days-"

"Yama, I know what birthdays are," Eri grumbles, and 27 presses the paper towel under her nose, ignoring her glare. She whines and stomps when he flicks her horn, and though he should cater a bit more to her new-found embarrassment about this, her apologetic eyes meet his before they glance at Yamada, and she blows her nose to find a bit of relief. "I'm sorry."

Yamada's smile twists a bit, probably finding this small taste of Eri's Quirk Grumps adorable. "It's alright, little bean. I just didn't know if you knew, so I got all explain-y at you."

' Books. ' 27 signs after he throws the used napkin away. ' I tried. I don't know day. I know now. Floaty told me. '

Yamada grins at that, giving him a thumbs up. 27 thinks it's directed more towards the promise that Eri's birthday now holds, rather than his failed attempts to give her one at the 8 Precepts. "Shou doesn't know what we're doing, so we've got to keep it a secret. We'll just pretend that we're not doing anything for his birthday while we're at school, and at the party after school, so when we get home, we can surprise him."

Eri's eyes gleam at the opportunity to be involved in such a scheme, curling her hands in front of her chest. "Is it a present for Zawa?"

Yamada nods. “Sure is, little bean! You’ve definitely got this birthday thing down, so I know you’ll do a great job! Your part of the present is to make Shou a birthday card, just like the cards you made for Midoriya and Mirio. I made sure to put a lot of paper in your backpack, so you can get it just right.”

Eri beams at that, while 27 tries not to think about how he hasn’t received a single drawing from Eri since they began living here. He might stoop to asking for one at this rate, even if the heroes are far more deserving.

“And your present,” Yamada says, drawing his attention back to him, just in time to see that nervous flutter in his hands. “You don’t have to do it if you don’t want to, but if you want to—”

‘I want to.’ 27 signs, staring at his hands in the hopes that his worry won’t become apparent on his face. This project was clearly important to Yamada and Eri, and he wouldn’t want to ruin that by failing whatever task Yamada assigned to him.

“You can make a name sign for Shou,” Yamada says, smiling as though it were an easy task. “I know he really wants—”

The sound of a door opening from the hallway causes Yamada to stop, then shoo them back to the table with one hand brushing them away from this gathering, and a finger pressed to his lips, to remind them to keep their silence.

27 sits, glancing between his glass of water that promises a temporary distraction, and Eri who threatens to bring undue attention to their plans with her excited fidgeting. Even if she was only a few years younger than he was when he went on his first job at The Miasma, she handled pre-mission nerves far better than he ever did. He feels those nerves more acutely now than ever before.

A name . Yamada wanted him to name his owner.

27 knows that this is his mission, that it’s instrumental to whatever Yamada has planned. It’s a job, he shouldn’t think too much about it, he should be able to complete the task that was asked of him like a professional.

Naming his owner . He can’t get over how unnatural that feels.

That’s just not how it worked. Owners gave names, clients gave names. Names were ownership and power and expectation. Meaningless and meaningful. Names were utterly confusing to him now, in a way that made him miss only having to answer to one, ‘27.’

Yamada said that his owner wanted to be given a name by him, and he was trying to trust Yamada. Yamada had so many opportunities to hurt him and never took a single one, and that had to mean that he could be trusted. 27 was trying to be rational, to believe that he might have been wrong to doubt some of the heroes that he knew. He was trying to believe in Eri the same way she believed in him, because he owed that to her.

But naming his owner was an impossible task. Especially when it was meant as an offering, a gift. The name he picked needed to please his owner, and 27 had never picked a name meant to please. He picked names to irritate, to insult, and that was all he knew how to do. If he didn’t pick the right name, if he insulted his owner, he wouldn’t just face his vengeance.

He would hurt and disappoint Eri. Again.

His owner sits at the table and smiles softly at Eri, who has probably made him suspicious with her intense gaze. When his owner sips at the coffee Yamada wordlessly places in front of him, his eyes meet 27's, and he finds himself glancing back at his water, trying not to read too much into that brief stare.

Nerves. He gets them before every job. He just needs to run through what's expected of him enough times, plan for every way it could turn out. Focus on the job.

It's probably the most difficult one he's ever been assigned.

Aizawa's favorite birthday was the day he turned 19.

Everyone forgot about it.

Hizashi was busy as a sidekick, and working himself to death trying to find a better agency, to start his radio show, to change everything that he hated about his current situation to better fit the dreams he had when he graduated. Kayama relied on Hizashi to remember, and Tensei was quickly becoming Idate's pack mule to prove himself worthy to inherit the agency from his father. Aizawa had already changed his phone number and address to keep his parents from contacting him, and his grandfather didn't own a phone out of paranoia that the government could use it to track him down.

Aizawa treated himself to a cup of coffee after he woke up that afternoon, petted one of the friendlier strays that called his crappy shoebox apartment complex home, and went back to sleep. It was everything he ever wanted from his birthday. It was peaceful.

This was not going to be a peaceful birthday. It wasn't even going to be a good one. Aizawa didn't particularly care, he's had 30 other birthdays that weren't good or pleasant to endure, but if it had fallen on any other day, he might have been able to endure it a bit better.

If it had fallen on a weekend, he would stop feeling so resentful every time he had to glare down his students to keep them from bothering Shinsou. He could have done another training exercise, but this was one thing he would allow himself for his birthday. He was going to take a nap in homeroom, and Class 1-A needed to allow him to do that.

Yaoyorozu's signed greeting was fine. Shinsou seemed surprised, but repeated the 'Good Morning,' back to her and took his seat. Yaoyorozu didn't press any further.

But Ashido was another story.

Everytime his eyes began to close, or he glanced at another student, he saw her move. She seemed to have a plan to bolt as soon as he was distracted, choosing opportunity over strategy. He's certainly tried to teach her better, but he's beginning to wonder if she forgets everything he says when she goes to sleep at night. He's told her the consequences, but he doesn't want to enforce them, especially not today.

Bakugo seems more sullen than usual. Hizashi hadn't told him much about how the study session went, especially when he was too eager to know about the lead in Shinsou's case. It went well until it didn't, there was an altercation that wasn't quite either of the teens' fault, but the way Bakugo frowns when he glances at the wards suggests that he doesn't see it that way. He feels guilty over something, and Hizashi hadn't told him enough to know, and probably wouldn't until this odd 'I Want To Give You The Cold Shoulder But It's Your Birthday' silence boiled over.

Aizawa would prefer if Hizashi did give him that angry silence. Hizashi had a unique way of making even silence seem loud and unbearable. But at least he knows what to expect from his husband tomorrow.

But he doesn't know what to expect from his wards.

Hizashi planned something with them. Eri made that obvious, and he expected little else. She seemed to be working on a picture, and he was highly tempted to slip out of his sleeping bag to look at it, to judge by her reaction whether it was for him, but he imagined that she wouldn't be happy if he did.

Shinsou also seemed to be distracted by something. He had his test on the desk, but he was reading a book instead of working on it. Hizashi must have roped him into this scheme as well, hopefully finding something that Shinsou could do more easily than drawing a picture.

He knows it's not what he wants from Shinsou. The only thing that would save this wreck of a day would be if Shinsou gave him information about the Nomu Organization. Real, credible, actionable information. If not that, then information about Eri's quirk.

But he knows Hizashi wouldn't tell Shinsou to do that, because Aizawa is the only one who's rational enough to.

He didn't remember falling asleep, but the chime to end the class wakes him into a panic. He bolts up, sure that he'll see Ashido trying to smother Shinsou into another disastrous embrace, or Bakugo attempting to resolve whatever issue he had with Shinsou the same way he deals with any interpersonal conflict - explosively.

Instead, he sees Koda of all people startling under his glare, leaning away from Shinsou's desk before he bolts for his own. Shinsou's blank stare reveals nothing as he sorts his items to place in Eri's backpack after she finishes putting away her own supplies.

That was promising, at least. He had a nap, and none of his charges caused any problems to deal with while he did.

He didn't have high hopes for the rest of the day, but at the very least, this was bearable.

27 doesn't want to do this.

He stares at the phone, willing the information he wants to simply appear on the screen, but he knows it's hopeless. He knows that he has to play this game again, that it's naive to think he could avoid it when he's surrounded by these hero students every day.

Koda had been helpful to a point. He had noticed the hero student looking at him while he tried out a few sign-names, and invited him to his desk with a confidence he didn't truly feel, slipping into another mask that wore it. Koda read the section of his JSL Handbook that went over name-signs, and immediately asked who 27 was trying to name.

He needed the information that Koda had, so he answered by pointing at his owner who was sleeping on top of his desk. Koda seemed flustered by that, and downright terrified when he asked if Koda had a name for him already. And he didn't.

Koda didn't have the information that 27 wanted, but it was possible that the other hero students did. Yamada certainly did, but 27 didn't want to give him the impression that 27 was unfit for the job he was given.

He just needed to open that chat, and ask for it. Piston and Zappy both owed him, and Piston especially would know.

It just seemed odd to ask this way, when the hero students were in the same room as he was. It made him feel broken, in a way that he shouldn't. He should find relief in not being able to speak to them, that his quirk couldn't be used. That he was quirkless. That whatever swallowed his words before he spoke them was a kinder mask than the ones he was used to.

Yamada zeroes in on Kaminari again, and the phone seems less frightening with the possibility that none of the hero students will see his message until they leave the room. He opens the chat, scrolling through the more mundane messages that weren't meant for him to see, that they still sent regardless, until his new name caught his eye.

Ya Good Boiii: Sooo is anyone else kinda scared that Shinsou was talking to Aizawa-sensei while we were training?

Ya Good Boiii: @Koda pls tell me there's not going to be a training exercise where Shinsou kicks all of our asses Slappy Tail Boiii: Please tell me the prayer circle worked.

Pastry Boiii: Bonne blonde, you have a masochistic streak in you, oui?

Sparky Boiii: SENSEI IS GOING TO USE SHINSOU'S VILLAIN TRAINING ON US I CALLED ITTTT

Sparky Boiii: @Shinsou pls handle me gently I'm baby

Palpitation Projector: ew.

Provost Piston: Shinsou, Koda has informed me of your observations regarding my current combat abilities. While I am in the process of adjusting, it is a stark reminder that my efforts in this area are lacking for that weakness to be so easily recognized, and I thank you for pointing that out to me. Also, I believe there was a joke that Koda did not explain, and I hope that you wouldn't mind telling me. -Iida Tenya Slappy Tail Boiii: @Shinsou Do you prefer elbow locks? You seem very practiced.

Slappy Tail Boiii: I don't know if I have information that you want, but do you like a certain food? Is there something that you want? I just kind of want to know more about your fighting style.

Quiet Boiii: @Sero ?

Ya Good Boiii: Nah, him and Hagakure are kind of a thing??? I think???

InvisiCutie: We're

InvisiCutie: IT'S NO

InvisiCutie: MIND YOUR OWN BUSINESS. OJIRO ISN'T FLIRTING WITH SHINSOU OMG

Ya Good Boiii: See?

Quiet Boiii: Got it.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: @Shinsou What about me??? Is there something I should do differently???
Can you train with me??? Please?????

More messages that weren't meant for him. Ashido seemed quiet on the chat, her only contribution being to tell the hero students that he didn't have his phone yesterday, and that they shouldn't bother him.

Then an odd message.

King Explosion Murder has removed themselves from the chat.

InvisiCutie: What?

Crimson Boiii: It's a thing, don't ask.

Mighty Boiii: @Shinsou, I know you check this chat more often than the others and if you want to talk about it on another one that's okay but can you tell me what happened? Kacchan just seems really upset and

Mighty Boiii: FUCKING IGNORE THAT. AND THE REST OF YOU EXTRAS BETTER
FUCK RIGHT OFF AND MIND YOUR OWN FUCKING BUSINESS

Sweet Boiii: Even if I know Bakugo stole Midoriya's phone, it's still weird to picture Midoriya saying that Choppy: Ochako wouldn't react well if he did.

Ashi: Shinsou are you and Eri ok?????

#1 Eri Enthusiast: WHAT HAPPENED

Genesis: Everyone please calm down.

Ashi: Bakugo went to Shinsou's place to tutor him but he won't really tell any of us what happened.

Ashi: But he's kind of worried about Eri?

Mighty Boiii: Togata-sempai visited them, they're ok!

Pastry Boiii: Brouyant is a poor tutor, no?

Ya Good Boiii: Aoyama don't.

Pastry Boiii: Violette, vous pouvez me dire ce que vous pensez vraiment et ces imbéciles ne sauront pas mieux.

Pastry Boiii: Ce sera notre secret ;)

Palpitation Projector: Google translate exists.

Pastry Boiii: *~

Palpitation Projector: @Shinsou avoid Monoma.

Slappy Tail Boiii: @Jirou What's that about?

Palpitation Projector: Something stupid.

Ya Good Boiii: Solid advice anyway. Monoma's kind of a jerk.

27 noted the suggestion, and still found himself glancing up at the hero students while he typed his messages, as though they would instinctively know that he was trying to communicate with them.

Mysterieux Boiii: @Piston it wasn't that funny the first time.

Mysterieux Boiii: @Excess Vertebrae it's not a preference, it just works. And no, I only want information.

Mysterieux Boiii: @Floaty Many things. I don't know if Aizawa plans for that to happen, but I'm not opposed to it. It would be easier to show you what you're doing wrong than telling you here.

Mysterieux Boiii: @French Non.

Mysterieux Boiii: @All of you Tell me what you know about Aizawa, specifically things that he likes or positive aspects of his personality, and in exchange I will tell you what happened yesterday.

Mysterieux Boiii: And tell Blasty he's an idiot and to come back to this chat. He doesn't seem like the type for silent tantrums.

27 stared at the pages of his book while the chimes drew Class 1-A to leave and 1-B to enter. He looked up as soon as he heard Monoma's voice, and kept an eye on him as he took his seat, but found that the manic blonde didn't return his stare.

Beat Dropper was right. He was definitely planning something.

But 27 had time before Monoma could make any moves. The Red Haired Bug would keep him from interrupting class, and Monoma only seemed to approach him after 1-B's English class ended.

Eri drew his attention when she huffed and pulled out another piece of paper to start her task anew. He wasn't sure what she found issue with on the first three pictures that she drew, but he itched to take at least one of them from her backpack to keep in his stash.

It was pathetic. It wasn't even a 'piece of happiness,' like it should be. He just wanted a picture from Eri.

Every picture used to be his. Even if he never gave her blank paper, his favorite pictures were the ones that had plenty of blank space around the parts she was supposed to color. They contained more of her doodles on the edges, more of her personality. More of Eri.

He hated the ones where she drew him. He shouldn't have, and he knew to never let her know that, never let her suspect. But the pieces of himself that he hated the most were the ones she drew the largest. His ruined, matted hair depicted in messy scribbles larger than his face. His scars from Bug drawn in red as though they were still bleeding. The dog-like snout of his mask made even more apparent. She even added a dog's long red tongue once, during one of those spells where The Pokey Little Puppy was her favorite book.

He wonders how she would draw him now. If she still sees him that way, even if his appearance has changed. If the scars from the mask would still be bleeding when she drew them.

He would treasure it even if they were. Even if he didn't deserve it.

It takes a while, but as he suspected, Zappy responded first.

Sparky Boiii: CRYPTID SIGHTED

Sparky Boiii: @Iida LET BAKUGO IN. LET HIM IIIIN

Sparky Boiii: Uhhhh stuff about Aizawa-sensei is kinda hard to know. He likes to sleep? I think?

Mysterieux Boiii: Not useful. Give me something else.

Sparky Boiii: He likes traumatizing us.

Mysterieux Boiii: Not that I've seen. I need positive aspects.

Pure Boiii: Most name signs just come up naturally, and I'm sure that Aizawa-sensei knows enough about JSL to understand that. You don't have to worry about it so much, Shinsou!

Mysterieux Boiii: I need to have a name by the end of the day. This was my assignment for his birthday.

Sparky Boiii: wat

Sweet Boiii: WHAT

Pastry Boiii: QUOI

Sweet Boiii: WE HAVE A CALENDAR FOR A REASON WHY DIDN'T ANYONE

Ya Good Boiii: MIDORIYA WHY DIDN'T YOU TELL US???

Mighty Boiii: I DIDN'T KNOW THAT'S NOT PUBLICLY ACCESSIBLE KNOWLEDGE

Ya Good Boiii: HAGAKURE WHY DIDN'T YOU HACK THAT KNOWLEDGE????

InvisiCutie: THAT'S NOT HOW IT WORKS OMG IT'S HIS BIRTHDAY

Provost Piston: You should not be on your phones i

Provost Piston: We have a great deal of work to do in very little time. @Everyone Please disregard your usual seating arrangements at lunch so that we can meet to rectify this situation.

Mysterieux Boiii: I've given you a lot of information. Valuable information. It doesn't seem like you're returning the favor.

Sparky Boiii: @Midoriya DO THE THING.

Ya Good Boiii: COMMENCE THE INFODUMP

Mighty Boiii: I don't know how name signs work but that sounds really nice of you Shinsou Aizawa-sensei likes coffee, cats, sleeping, he has a very particular smile when he tricks someone so I believe that deceptions are fun for him

Mighty Boiii: I don't really have anything else?

Mysterieux Boiii: Barely useful.

Soba Boiii: You should call him a cat.

Sweet Boiii: You kind of live with Aizawa-sensei, though, so you probably know him better than we do.

Mysterieux Boiii: I don't.

Sweet Boiii: What kind of cake do you think Aizawa-sensei would like? I hope it's something that we have, I don't have a lot of time to work with.

Crow Boiii: It seems we have taken for granted that which has become a common presence, and found that we lack the knowledge to truly appreciate it.

Crow Boiii: Truly a mad birthday of darkness.

Ya Good Boiii: Maybe he likes frogs? He seems to like Asui better than the rest of us.

Choppy: I think that's due to how little I cause trouble for him, compared to the rest of you. I doubt my appearance has anything to do with it.

Mysterieux Boiii: Amphibian Fibber, tell me what you know.

Choppy: That's an odd choice for a nickname, Shinsou. I can add that Aizawa-sensei is a blunt and honest person, and that his family name means 'Swamp.' If name signs have anything to do with legal names, perhaps that might help.

Mysterieux Boiii: Decently useful. I know that you lied about the picture in the hospital. You were part of the raid, and you saw me.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: Do you remember that?

Mysterieux Boiii: No. You're not a convincing liar.

Choppy: I apologize. Aizawa-sensei made it seem as though we shouldn't tell you.

Mysterieux Boiii: But he's an honest person.

Genesis: I can add that the phonetics of Aizawa-sensei's given name can mean 'Fly' or 'Big.' And taking apart the syllables of his family name, Ai can mean 'Affection,' 'Indigo,' or 'Mugwort.' And Zawa can mean 'Murmur.'

Mysterieux Boiii: Useful.

It was. He hadn't considered breaking apart his owner's name to reuse it, to take the meaning to guide his selection of the second sign for his name. It would seem more clever if he did, it might carry across how much effort he put into it.

But now he had to carry through with his promise to tell the hero students what happened yesterday with Bakugo. Certainly not everything, he didn't want to talk about the stash or the questions Bakugo had asked him. He didn't particularly want to admit that he had struck first while Blasty was still under the bed.

But he had to. It had to be an even exchange.

Mysterieux Boiii: Blasty was being nosy. I overreacted. He overreacted. It's fine. Eri wasn't really involved. If she was, Blasty wouldn't have hands anymore.

Ya Good Boiii: That is. The vaguest thing I've ever read.

Ya Good Boiii: Shinsou, I know that's kind of your thing? But Bakugo's my friend and he's seriously not okay right now so I kind of need more detail.

Mysterieux Boiii: He tried to look through my stuff. I tried to put him in a sleeper hold without really thinking about it. He tried to explode my face. It's fine.

Ya Good Boiii: Sleeper holds are just a normal overreaction???

Mysterieux Boiii: He reminds me of Rikiya. Maybe that's why. That was the only way I was ever able to take Rikiya down, even Rappa could be flipped when he overextended himself.

Crimson Boiii: what whatwhathefuck

Sparky Boiii: holy shit you FOUGHT THEM????

Slappy Tail Boiii: You faced the members of the 8 Precepts in combat?

Provost Piston added Bakugo Katsuki to the chat

Provost Piston: I believe it would be more conducive to organize our preparations in this chat, so that Shins

Provost Piston: You don't have to answer these questions, Shinsou

Bakugo Katsuki: WHAT THE FUCK DO YOU MEAN YOU SHITFACED MOTHERFUCKER I'M THE FUCKING FARTHEST FUCKING THING FROM THAT FUCKING

Bakugo Katsuki: I WILL MURDER YOUR ASS FUCK FACE I'M. NOT. FUCKING. PLAYING. AROUND. WITH. YOU.

Mysterieux Boiii: It's the swearing. Rikiya never had your temper.

Bakugo Katsuki changed their name to Shitsou's Reaper

Shitsou's Reaper: FUCK YOU. YOU'RE FUCKING DEAD. I'M NOTHING LIKE THOSE MOTHERFUCKERS, GET THAT THROUGH YOUR DENSE FUCKING SKULL BEFORE I SMASH IT IN

Mysterieux Boiii: It's not that insulting. Rikiya was nice. He was my friend.

Shitsou's Reaper: SAY ONE MORE FUCKING WORD AND I WILL LOG YOUR ASS OUT PERMANENTLY

Ya Good Boiii: @Shinsou I'm your friend now. You kind of need better ones.

Sparky Boiii: Sending friend request

Soba Boiii: We're friends now. I will fight you at your convenience to make it official.

Mighty Boiii: Can we be friends? Please?

27 closed out of the app and ignored the subsequent buzzing. He needed to focus.

Class 1-B's English class was coming to an end.

Monoma Neito wasn't one to do any favors for those Class A swine, despite the impression that he gave the ill-tempered knave yesterday.

He always intended to do this, but Bakugo's request simply inspired him to move his plans up a bit. It had still been deliciously amusing to see him grovel as Monoma forced him to wheedle and attempt to charm.

And, more alarmingly, show Monoma a face that didn't suit the barbarian of Class A at all.

' His quirk's fucked, that's why he can't talk. No one's doing shit about it, but if your bullshit quirk can figure some shit out, fucking tell me. Corpse face can't do therapy if he doesn't fucking talk. '

Vlad King had been rather sparse with the details of Shinsou's wardship, despite how much Monoma pried.

' He's selectively mute, yes. That means that you should represent Class B's superior professionalism by respecting the rules that are set in place. I know that you want to help, and I know that it comes from a good place, Monoma, but part of being a hero is trusting a fellow hero's word over your own instincts. And trust me when I say that the best way to help him is to ignore him. '

Monoma respected Vlad King, and of course he trusted him. But ignoring Shinsou simply wasn't something that he could accomplish, even for his teacher.

Shinsou was captivating. Enthralling, even. When he saw him that first day, still under the impression that he was a transfer student, he chose his words specifically so that Shinsou would be enthralled back. Even if it started in anger, in insult and even rivalry, he wanted those eerie violet eyes to look at him. He wanted to pick apart a history made apparent and mysterious all at once. How did he get those scars? How did he come here? Why was he so attached to the small child that seemed to be hoarded by those Class A gremlins?

Monoma always had an irritating itch to know someone far more intimately than most were comfortable with. It was comforting to know how the people he surrounded himself ticked, and he's often heard that he comes across a bit prickly to those that he hasn't dissected.

And there was nothing closer to a person's heart than their quirk, was there?

He agreed with a popular theory in Quirk Studies that a quirk was either a manifestation of it's user's personality, or that a quirk could subconsciously affect that said personality. Kendo had a heavy hand, literally and in most of her interpersonal relationships. Shiozaki was a creature out of mythology, a goddess of nature forced to live among mortals as punishment for some long forgotten sin.

Monoma liked to steal things, and creep under people's skin. It was an itch that he's never needed to resolve, and knew that it wouldn't help to try. It was a manifestation of his quirk in his personality.

And he wanted to use it to hold a manifestation of Shinsou.

Tetsutestu performed his role admirably, becoming a far better actor than he was on stage. "Hey. Fight me."

And Kendo was caught off-guard, like she should be. She knew that Monoma was plotting something, and had been watching him like a particularly hungry pit bull would eye a steak on the edge of its fence, but she couldn't ignore Tetsutestu's declaration. "Tetsutestu!"

While she rushed over, Tetsutestu leaned back from Shinsou's desk, admitting the smallest amount of defeat. That was fine, he would still have plenty of time to make his move. "Kirishima said Shinsou can talk if he fights someone. We just need to fight him so he can talk."

Sweet blank-faced Shinsou nearly betrayed nothing, but the line of his shoulders relaxed just a bit at those words. Monoma could feel bad for scaring him later, but for now, he had to focus on creeping along the wall to slip past the child and get close enough to touch Shinsou.

Kendo's quirk was usually reserved for Monoma, but Tetsutetsu had received his fair share of blows as well. This one played out just like the others, a heavy chop met an instinctively iron-clad defense. "Kendo! I'm sorry, are you hurt?"

Kendo was, but she wouldn't show it any further than shaking her now deflated hand. "I'm so disappointed it hurts. Out of all the bullheaded ideas you've had, why on Earth would you want to fight Shinsou? He's a ward of UA!"

And Shinsou, unfortunately, was very perceptive. Monoma had kept his eyes away just so Shinsou wouldn't feel his stare, but as soon as he crept behind the little girl, Shinsou's head whipped around to face him.

Those eyes betrayed a suspicion that his face didn't. How utterly enthralling.

He knew the proper strategy would be to exit stage left. Make some unimportant remark and strike again when Shinsou's guard eventually lowered. But Monoma itched, and he never learned how not to scratch.

He was aiming to place his hand on Shinsou's shoulder, close enough to his neck for an 'accidental' caress that Kendo would no doubt catch immediately for what it was. But that wouldn't matter, not when he would have 5 whole minutes to explore a part of Shinsou's ever-so-secretive personality.

But his hand barely drifted towards Shinsou before it was grabbed, and he felt an explosion of pain.

Not from his hand. He could see how far his finger was pushed back, more than he could feel it, and he knew that a broken finger wouldn't wrack his entire body with agony.

Monoma had stolen enough quirks to be able to sort out any sort of mystery bag just by touch. Duds fell into him with the hollowness of a Faberge egg, transformation quirks had an ache and sharpness like a tooth breaking through the gum.

This wasn't any quirk that he was familiar with. He was loathe to agree with any member of that inferior class, and especially to use the language of that uncouth delinquent, but this quirk?

This was a fucked quirk.

Not mutant, not emitter, not transformation, not a dud and certainly not quirkless.

This was a quirk that hurt.

"MO-NO-MA!" Kendo's chop didn't carry much weight, probably because her hand was still sore, and Shinsou hadn't let go of him yet. It wasn't until Present Mic approached that Shinsou finally did, and Monoma flexed his fingers more for show than to carry out any evaluation, still unable to feel them through this sea of pain.

"Present Mic-sensei, I sincerely apologize-"

"Kendo, it's fine. You and Tetsutetsu let Vlad know that Monoma will be running a little late," Present Mic said with a thumb jabbing at the door. Monoma didn't know who's glare was fiercer, Kendo's or Present Mic's.

No, it was definitely Present Mic's.

"Is your hand alright?" Present Mic asked, probably more out of obligation than concern, while he crossed his arms and almost seemed to grow taller to become more intimidating. It was wholly unnecessary. Monoma shook his head, still biting back against another wave of pain. "Do you have his quirk right now?"

Shinsou, as a rule, didn't seem to move much. Didn't seem to emote either, but he spun to face

Monoma with an expression caught between rage and terror in a way that Momona didn't have enough space left in this haze of pain to parse though. "I don't, Present Mic-sensei."

He couldn't keep his tone even enough to hide the agony, and he imagined that his skin was flushing into a lovely white pallor as the seconds dragged on. But Shinsou, as pale as he already was, seemed to lose his own color while his hands began to move with more words kept hidden from Monoma.

But that mysterious terror seemed to translate more clearly in his trembling hands.

"Shinsou, it's alright, he would only have it for 5 minutes and he won't try to copy it again," Present Mic said, tone changing from oddly soft and paternal to sharp for the words addressed to him.

That was a familiar song, though he never liked to hear it at UA.

He's been struggling to do it for quite some time, but right as Present Mic's eyes widen into an unsettling display of worry, asking if he needs to see Eraserhead, he manages to unclench the metaphorical hand that had grabbed on to Shinsou's quirk. Monoma sighs in relief, waving off Present Mic's concern while he fixes his hair, more than displeased to find his brow dewy with sweat.

"I'm sure that the hero tasked as a zookeeper for those animals in Class A has more important matters to see to," Monoma said, flexing his fingers again to find a pinch of soreness, but nothing broken. Shinsou glares at him, and while he's aware that most people would find that kind of anger off-putting, Monoma positively preens under it. "I do apologize for taking liberties, but I was simply overcome with concern when the most uncivilized of Class A requested my expertise. Even a rabid dog might bark in true alarm."

Present Mic scowled, and beckoned to follow him outside of the classroom, closing the door afterwards. Monoma awaited a dressing down of epic and ear-bleeding proportions, and tried to focus more on the vengeance coming swiftly for him from Vlad King and Kendo combined more than the sickening trickle of guilt lingering along his spine.

He might have gone a bit too far this time.

Present Mic sighs, possibly warming up his quirk, before he crosses his arms and looks down on Monoma. "Did you notice anything with Shinsou's quirk?"

It had been impossible not to. "Something is very wrong with it," Monoma answers, unable to hide his own concern when Present Mic can so clearly wear his.

Neito's father was a quirk specialist, and in preparation for his hero training, he had become a veritable nuisance at his father's office. It might be a bit arrogant to say, without any true passion or training for the occupation, but Monoma was nearly a quirk specialist himself. He had held thousands of different quirks, and with the appropriate amount of time, he could pick out the frays of an ailing one, or feel the strain of a quirk factor gone too wild for its host.

He's never held a quirk that was painful the same way Shinsou's was, though the chest ache of a rejected one was close. "He certainly needs to see a quirk specialist. My father is a very busy man, but with a case as interesting as Shinsou's, I believe I could convince him--"

"Monoma," Present Mic interrupted, hands raising then falling back to his elbows, glancing around the hall. "I appreciate that, but I already have someone in mind. Just tell me what you saw about it that made it ‘wrong.’”

Monoma couldn’t help but chuckle a bit, that the agony so apparent to him was so carefully hidden from everyone else. He sobered when he wondered if Shinsou felt that agony constantly, if part of his allure was an instinctive pull to save him from it. “I couldn’t even determine what type of quirk he had. As soon as I stole it, it began to hurt. And I’ve handled my fair share of unpleasant quirks, but nothing even approaches his.”

Present Mic nodded grimly, and as quick as a costume change, shifted back into a scolding teacher. “Then, I trust that you won’t do that again! Using your quirk against a ward is a pretty serious offense! Even if your quirk isn’t offensive, you’re using it against a civilian, which could be grounds for assault, not just expulsion!”

Monoma played his part as recalcitrant, knowing he’ll have to repeat it at least three times before the day is out and Kendo and Vlad King both have their pound of flesh.

“But, I know that your heart was in the right place, little listener. Shinsou probably won’t be too happy with you for a while, but I think he might appreciate it if you tried picking up a bit of sign language. I’m sure it’ll be a breeze with your language skills, and honestly,” Present Mic winced, looking back at the door. “Shinsou’s kind of lonely.”

Lonely?

Of course.

Those uncivilized, moronic, barbarous attention-mongers that called themselves heroes only to stain UA’s pure reputation in Class A wouldn’t possibly fathom that Shinsou would feel left out like a sad, wretched puppy in the rain watching them do something so insulting as talk in front of him. Or talk to him, as though to do something as abominable as rubbing his nose in the fact that he couldn’t.

“Well, of course, being raised trilingually has given me a natural talent,” Monoma preened, hiding a hatred that he didn’t think could build any farther, as it did so exponentially. “I’m sure that I can assist you where Class A seems to have fallen short. In fact, I do believe all of Class B can make the effort to be conversationally fluent before the end of the month.”

They would become fluent or die trying. Monoma would make sure of that.

Class B couldn’t afford to take a loss here, not when Class A had so clearly failed their ward.

Eri was on her fifth paper.

27 wasn’t even allowed to look at it. Every time he tried to peek, she huffed and pulled it away. He was so sorely tempted to slip his hand into her backpack now, to take one of the rejects to know what she was working on, to have one, but he bit back against that thought.

It would be reckless to steal something in plain sight of a pro hero.

His owner was working on something, and the subtle way the screen was tilted from 27’s usual seat before he took it made him suspicious that he was working on the investigation. As much as he ached to know what Eri was working on, he needed to know what his owner was looking at.

Perhaps that necessity would make this plan a little less terrifying to play out.

27 stared at his owner's hands, working up the courage to move to his shoulders, then to his ear. Not his eyes, there was a lot of power in his eyes and it wasn't just from his quirk. It was uncomfortable to look at. He signed, still unsure whether he wanted his owner to see it or not, and what he would have to do if he didn't. 'The like game.'

His owner turned to him, slightly raised eyebrows betraying a mix of surprise and confusion. "The like game?"

He needed to play it, even if it was embarrassing, and even if his owner didn't seem to want to play it by pretending he didn't know what it was. 'You play with E-R-I. I like. You like.'

His owner paused, then nodded, turning his chair around to face 27 fully. He wished he didn't. 27 wished he didn't bother him, that his owner would go back to ignoring him. His full attention was terrifying. "And you want to play that game with me?"

He didn't. At all. And he still hated that his owner's words didn't tell him whether his response would be the correct one. 'Yes. I like coffee.'

He could probably still manipulate Yamada into giving him coffee, even if his owner tried to stop him. "You can't have coffee," his owner mutters, half under his breath as he glances away and twists the ends of his hair. He seems nervous for some odd reason, before he turns back to 27. "I like cats."

27 knew that, and he hated that he picked one of the few responses that wasn't useful at all. Apparently, his owner's love of cats was as commonly known as his name. 'I like cats too. I like using sign.'

Yamada certainly wouldn't allow his owner to take that from him. Something odd flashed over his owner's face, too quick for him to catch, before he raised his hands to sign what he spoke. "I like using sign too. I like working."

27 didn't know whether his nerves were tinged with relief or guilt, but it seemed that this awkward game was finally over. 'I am sorry. Will study.'

"No, it's fine," his owner said, a bit too fast and with a rare tell of a waving hand, a plea for his earlier words to be ignored. "I meant that I like working. You're not interrupting anything."

27 knew he was lying. An honest person indeed. 'I like learning.'

"Hizashi says that you're a very quick study," his owner says, somewhere between praise and observation. His eyes glance back at his computer screen, then to Eri, before they fall on 27's hands. "I like Eri."

"I like Zawa!" Eri chimes, still focused on her work, unaware that the game has twisted again.

27 knew he wouldn't like playing these games with his owner, already knew how little he could anticipate the turns. He didn't need to read him to know that what he said wasn't what he meant, and there was a question there that didn't need to be asked.

He didn't know if he would win anything by surrendering without being forced to, if his owner would spot it, if he would think 27 was clever if he did. If this risky play would work out the way he wanted it to.

27 slipped into a mask that shouldn't tremble to approach his owner, that should be able to slide his chair closer to his desk without feeling his heartbeat thudding in his throat. The mask cracked at the edges, he knew, and the play nearly failed him entirely when his owner closed the program he had open before 27 could see anything more than rows and columns of indiscernible faces.

All of that was almost for nothing, but 27 wasn't playing a simple game anymore. He had two goals here, and one was still available to him.

He willed his hands not to shake, for his eyes to be able to look at his owner instead of at Eri, and failed both. ' Type to talk. '

The flash of whiteness on the screen drew his attention to the keyboard, and he tried to convince himself that this was a good play. It was an offering, a show of trust. It would tell his owner that 27 was loyal to him, and loyal to Eri. That 27 trusted Eri to him.

27 tried to convince himself that he did.

'Eri's quirk is triggered by pain, but builds through emotional responses that pass over a certain threshold. I can't remember the names for the chemicals associated with those emotions, but the mixture of the emotions that forced the build up affect the quality of what was,' he pauses, swallowing hard as he tried not to think of a sight that was all too common for him just a little over a month ago. 'harvested.'

His owner says nothing, and 27 forces himself to continue.

'Chisaki didn't test her quirk directly. I don't know if the emotions affect how it works. It's rare that happiness is an emotion that causes the build, but it could be a possible trigger. Mirio seems to think it would improve'

"You told Mirio about this?" his owner's voice cuts through. Again, too neutral, but tinged with something slightly sharper. Something he still doesn't know.

'Yes. I shouldn't have.'

His owner waits, letting him sweat under the pressure. A familiar play, and not one of his favorites. "No, it's fine. I was just surprised."

27 isn't sure if those words are honest either, but he continues after erasing his previous words. 'the quality of her quirk. Like a unicorn princess. I told him it would be a longer process, but I'm not sure if it will work at all. Her quirk causes her pain at a certain point, even without stimulus, so it will never be completely purified. At 12 centimeters in length, the cartilage separating the horn from her sinus cavity begins to dissolve, and mucus begins to build up in her horn. The sinus pressure causes pain, and sometimes the horn needs to be tapped to release enough of the mucus to be drained. Usually three times a day. And she's very emotionally volatile after the eruption.'

Please let me deal with her , he wants to add, but can't find the courage to ask.

He'll make sure that they don't see it. He'll isolate her in one of the rooms with him if that's what it takes, so that whatever reaction she has - Blank, Crying, Rage - he'll be the only one who sees it. They can have the brighter parts of Eri, the ones that they wanted to keep, that drew them to taking her in in the first place. He wouldn't risk her future here by letting them see the painful pieces, they were meant for his eyes anyway. They were the punishment for his crimes.

“Thank you for telling me this, Shinsou,” his owner says quietly, and 27 can see out of the corner of his eye that his hands fold in on each other, but he doesn’t have the courage to look for any other tells. “I really appreciate it. But I want to know something.”

What did he leave out? Did his owner want to know how many times that Eri had been harvested? 27 counted many things, but he’s never tried to keep track of that painful number. Did he want to know how he could control Eri’s quirk, bring it up to the surface? He didn’t want to tell him that, he would refuse, no matter if he lost the game or whatever else his owner did to him, he would never tell him.

“How do you know all of this? The chemicals, the exact length,” his owner trails off, waiting for 27’s answer.

It’s not one he particularly wants to give, but it’s far easier to admit than the other questions he was afraid of. ‘Chisaki told me to copy the test results. Not often.’

It was one of Chisaki’s better plays.

He never truly understood the way Chisaki looked at Eri, but there was a piece of it that was clear to 27. He was possessive of Eri. He wanted to own her fully, but as long as 27 was in the picture, he never could. 27 had part of her that he couldn’t take.

But Chisaki thought he could change that. He could separate them, and he thought that 27 would either jump at the chance for his own room, or be cowed into submission when Chisaki insisted on it. 27 refused it, even when his limbs shook and ached and broke and splintered and fused again, cycling over and over until Chisaki realized that a dog’s will was stronger than the hour-long quirk training session, and had to allow 27 to stay with Eri by his own word.

Then, he tried to torment 27 with the heart he had recklessly laid bare by that. He tried to wrack 27 with guilt to see when he broke, when he couldn’t stand the sight of Eri because it reminded him too much of the pain.

He made 27 copy the reports while Eri was still in The Chair, only releasing her when he was done. He forced them both to play that damn tea pot game that he called ‘Sakazuki.’ He started reducing their food portions and making 27 pay for trips outside with his meals, betting that eventually, 27 would turn on Eri like a starving dog for her food.

But 27 wasn’t a Dog.

He endured, and he played Chisaki back. He hated that play, he hated that he stooped to involving Eri in it, something that he promised himself from the beginning that he would never do, but it worked. He flaunted that Eri cared for him, and Chisaki made a reckless move. He took her outside, probably thinking that Eri would cling to him, be curious about the world she’d never seen instead of being terrified.

She slipped away, and put into motion a plan that he had long since given up on. Calling down a dream, a childish wish that there were heroes in this world, and to his surprise, it worked.

The irony doesn’t go unnoticed. In his last game with his last owner, he used Eri as bait, to make Chisaki want to steal her, so that she could escape. In this game, with this owner, he’s using Eri as bait so that he might keep them both.

He doesn’t know if it’s working. Chisaki hid half of his face and most of his tells, but he still knew how to read him better than this owner. The silence drags on, to the point that it’s no longer a power play, it's just confusing.

"I'm sorry that you had to do that," his owner finally says, almost too quietly for 27 to hear.

He wonders if that's the way people are supposed to say 'I'm sorry for your loss.' He wonders what tell slipped beneath 27's mask to prompt those words, whether he's inspired the pity that he wants to earn from Yamada, but hadn't been as hopeful to gain from his owner.

"I like talking to you," his owner says, a bit closer to his normal tone of voice. A change in subject, a distraction. A rather poor one, but it betrays how deeply unsettled his owner is. "Especially about how Class A needs to improve."

It's not useful to the most pressing game he has, to find a name for his owner, and it's not useful for his game to find out what they know about The Miasma. But it's a good indication of how the most important game is playing out.

His owner doesn't like him, not the way he likes Eri. 27 expected that, and he hoped that his best efforts would bring him close to it. But his owner liked something about 27 that wasn't relevant to the investigation. He saw something useful in 27's advice.

That was a foothold he would be stupid not to take. 'I like talking about hero students. They need work. Can help.'

Out of the corner of his eye, he sees the twitch, his owner's carefully constructed mask pulling into that smirk. Not the fond smile, not that he would expect it, but a smirk meant plans, and 27 was part of them. "I think we can work with that."

27 certainly would.

Need Lunch

Chapter Summary

27 has dealt with the side effects of Eri's quirk building up often enough, but UA makes it impossibly difficult to manage them. When Eri plans to challenge him during lunch, he finds that he can't quite rise to the occasion.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Mentions of 50 and her death being compared to a weight, self-deprecating spiral, mention of anorexia used to describe Shinsou's eating habits, severe anxiety attack

Previously on Wards of UA: Eri's horn growing causes mucus to build up in the horn, necessitating a tap to release the sinus pressure, which is referred to as a 'Horn trick.' Today is Aizawa's birthday, and Eri was told to draw him a picture as a present. When Shinsou was having a mental breakdown after his stash was discovered, Mirio encouraged him to use the laptop to type out what he was thinking, which the keylogger recorded. Aizawa and Naomasa are the only ones who have access to the keylogger. Shinsou accidentally informed Class 1-A that Aizawa's birthday was today, and Iida called for all the students in that class to gather together during lunch to make plans to celebrate it. Eri calls Shinsou 'Mom' sometimes, which is a recent development that began after they were reunited at UA. Monoma tried to copy Shinsou's quirk at Bakugo's request. Shinsou's name-sign for Bakugo is "Blast chan."

27 liked Eri, in a way that really couldn't be contained by such a small and meaningless word.

But 27 hated Eri's Quirk Grumps.

He knocked on the door for the women's bathroom again, still seething that bizarre social etiquette made an unlocked door into an impenetrable fortress. "Eri, come out."

"No!" Eri yelled, still in the middle of her fit though the anger would fall into tears eventually. "Go play The Like Game with Zawa 'cause you like him so much, and leave me alone!"

27 tipped his head back, trying to remember how to de-escalate this kind of fit. He had calmed her down from pain, stress, fear, and exhaustion too many times to count, but jealousy was a new one. He's not sure if he ever read that section of the book, it seemed too ridiculous to imagine that she would ever be jealous of him. And it was incredibly ridiculous now.

He was tempted to tell her that she told him to be friends with his owner, but he knew that would only make her shut down. She didn't want a rational explanation, and he struggled to find a way to play into this fit so that he could control it.

"Okay, I'll never talk to Aizawa again." He waited, and there was no response. He tried to push the door open, social rules be damned, but he felt her push it back. "Okay, I'll leave. I'm going to go away, forever."

He backed away from the door, just to test her, sure that she would come running out with tears in her eyes now that he had called on one of her worst fears.

And it hurt that it didn't work.

She didn't care. He should be happy about that, that she needed him less. That she had the heroes, and if he lost all of his games, she wouldn't be sad to see him go. She wouldn't carry that weight that 50 gave him. She would be taken care of.

He should be happy instead of feeling like he was spiraling into a fit of his own, frustration and hurt and disappointment that made it nearly impossible to hold himself back from kicking the door in and holding her close, and hope that she didn't thrash away from him because if she did he would break.

"Shinsou?" Floaty calls to him, one of many students in this hallway but the only one that's stopped to notice. "Do you need to, um."

She trails off, turning her head between him and the bathroom door, and he realizes that she must think that he's an absolute idiot. That he doesn't even know which bathroom he's supposed to use.

He sighs, unwilling to dig out the phone for this, and knocks on the door again. "Go away!" Eri, predictably, answers. She's getting close to the end of the fit, rage bubbling in her voice, and pretty soon it will boil over into tears.

Floaty looks shocked, then twists it into some form of nervous amusement, scratching the back of her head. "Oh, you and Eri are kind of having a fight, I guess. Do you want me to try to talk to her?"

Floaty seems a bit too enthusiastic about that, and he's starting to wonder if her attachment to Eri is some sort of neurosis. And he doubts that it will really be able to withstand the full force of Eri's Quirk Grumps.

27 points at the door, then places his fingers together in imitation of Floaty's quirk, and sweeps his hand to mime the image of Eri floating right out the door and into the hallway. Floaty seems a bit uncomfortable with his plan. "You want me to use my quirk to make her come out?"

He nods, even though he wished that Floaty could have just done it instead of letting Eri know. As much as he hated his quirk, if he used it on Floaty, Eri would be out of the bathroom by now. And as he predicted, Eri whined miserably, "I'm not coming out! You're gonna make me snotty!"

At least with a door between them, 27 can roll his eyes. "I won't make you snotty if it makes you upset. We can figure out how to do your horn trick later. If you want, you can teach Yamada or Aizawa-

"No!" Eri whines, kicking the door to prove that she's found the fuel to spiral back into the angry part of her fit. "I'm not doing horn tricks! Never ever ever EVER!"

“Eri,” Floaty calls, her voice soft as she knocks on the door. “Can I come in? It’s just me.”

27 bristles as that works, Eri opening the door to glare at him and pull Floaty inside. In fact, the glare and subsequent tug were probably meant to hurt him.

She’s gotten very good at that over the years, as her eruptions allowed her to release built-up anger and hatred instead of just fear or sadness. And she showed him just how much she hated him during those fits, even if she hid it all too well when she was calm and soothed.

Even if he deserved it, it hurt.

“Eri, I know you’re kind of upset right now,” Floaty says, both of them are still close to the door, making it too easy to overhear. “But you know that Shinsou really cares about you. He wouldn’t do something that would make you upset, or hurt you. I don’t know about your horn trick-”

“Don’t!” Eri whines, sniffing afterwards. “It’s gross! I don’t like it! I don’t want to!”

“Do you want me to come out with you? If Shinsou tries to make you do the horn trick, I can stop him!”

She absolutely could not, but 27 wasn’t going to try it anyway. If Eri was intent on getting a horn ache, he would just have to let her, and deal with the fall out later. And judging by Eri’s watery eyes and tilted head, she was going to get one soon.

Floaty beams and gives him a thumbs up, which he half-heartedly returns. “Eri, I’m not going to do the horn trick until you ask me to. I promise.”

Eri clings to Floaty’s leg, pouting at him. “Ocha, I wanna stay with you!”

Floaty keeps turning her head between the child clinging to her leg and 27, unable to tell Eri ‘No’ but unsure whether 27 will allow her to keep Eri. And 27 absolutely will not.

He crouches down to Eri’s eye level, and hopes that he doesn’t become a casualty of those reckless speed quirks by reducing his ability to dodge. “If you ask nicely, she might walk with us back to the staff room, but if you stay with Ocha, you won’t be able to eat with Aizawa. And that would make him very sad, especially because it’s his birthday.”

27 should feel bad for manipulating Eri like this, but her continued rejection stings just enough to keep him from that. She turns her head away, pressing her face against Floaty’s leg. “I want to stay with Ocha! Zawa can eat with you, ‘cause he likes you better!”

“He doesn’t,” 27 argues, still baffled that Eri would think that. “He likes you a lot better. He might even be crying right now because he misses you so much. Or he might be looking at the picture-”

“No!” Eri yells, stomping her foot before she grabs onto Floaty’s hand, intent to drag her down the hall. “He can’t! He can’t look!”

27 follows behind Floaty, knowing he should definitely feel bad for making Eri worry about her project being discovered, and he does. But it was also an effective strategy, and he could make it up to her later.

He’s not sure if he can make it up to Floaty for dragging her into this fit, and he’s not sure if he wants to. She’s still a liar. But the way she goes stock-still and nervous in the doorway of the staff room makes him feel a little bad for her. This might be a room that the students were punished in, and he’s very familiar with the way that a room like that can carry echoes of long-healed wounds.

Yamada and his owner seem surprised to see Floaty, but their attention is quickly captured by Eri when she shrinks in on herself, apparently disappointed that his owner isn't crying or rooting through her things. He's just sitting at his cubicle, turned to face a blank screen that 27 doubts was blank before they entered.

"I wanna eat lunch with Ocha," Eri declares, shaking the hero student's still captured hand to demonstrate exactly who she means.

Yamada glances at his owner and 27 in turn, hoping to find some sort of explanation, before he looks back at Eri. "Are you sure? I know it's a little boring in here, but I think Midnight and Toshinori were planning on stopping by."

Eri doesn't even consider changing her mind, too set on this course of action, too intent on whatever she plans to gain from it. "I want to eat with the heroes today. Can I?"

Yamada folds, only looking to Floaty to make sure that would understand her task now that Eri has indirectly assigned it. "Think you can keep an eye on her, listener?"

"Of course!" Floaty cheers, that neurosis flaring back to life as she brightens at the prospect of having access to Eri for the entire lunch period. "I'd be happy to!"

'E-R-I going. I'm going.' 27 signed, unable to care if this was reckless, if it was allowed. Even if he lost the game here and now, he refused to imagine leaving Eri in the care of those hero students without his supervision. Especially with the odds of her horn causing her pain.

"Uraraka is capable of-" his owner begins to say, before Yamada cuts him off.

"Sure! You guys can have lunch with the students," Yamada says, grabbing two bento boxes to hand to 27. "And if you want something from Lunch Rush - not coffee though, we sent out a memo - don't be afraid to ask! I'm a pretty decent cook, but he's definitely got me beat on a lot of dishes!"

Eri shoots him a far weaker glare, then runs to grab her backpack, having already packed away her work. She wavers when she looks at his owner, tilting from one foot to the other. "Is it okay, Zawa? I don't wanna make you sad."

"No, it's fine," his owner reassures, and probably finds it odd that she darts away under his outstretched hand, running back to Floaty's side. 27 realized then that this was not just a fit.

And he has no idea if he can fix it.

He can practically hear Hizashi straining to hold back his irritation, but between his birthday and Eri's skittish rejection, there's no way he would let it loose. He would rather that he did. He doesn't need pity from his husband.

Aizawa sighs, turning back to the United Kingdom database, wishing that Naomasa could have pulled together the resources to have a team of human eyes doing what technology could not, but the detective seemed resigned to The Commission's plan. He picks at his bento box more for show than any desire to eat it. As much as he enjoyed Hizashi's cooking, jelly pouches were far more efficient.

"I'm going to ask Toshinori to see if there's anything he can do," Yamada declares, stabbing at his rice more than eating it. "I don't care who is on The Commission right now, they can't just ignore it if All Might himself tells them to bug off."

"It's the best lead they have so far," Aizawa argues half-heartedly. He knows it's the rational course of action, but half of him only says that just to see if his words are enough to provoke Hizashi into being honest with him.

It almost works. Hizashi glares at him, lips becoming a firm line that should be the precursor to one of their louder arguments, but he looks back at the door, forcing himself to relax in a shuddering breath. "Shou, I know that. And it's still messed up. We became heroes to stop this kind of thing, not be accomplices in it."

"That's why you became a hero," Aizawa counters, and he knows he's cutting a little too deeply here, but it needs to be said. "You haven't dealt with investigations like this as much as I have. There are times that the system works like it should, and there are times that it doesn't. Naomasa probably kept you out of the loop because he knew you wouldn't be familiar with that."

"So, what's your excuse?" Hizashi hissed, almost too quietly for Aizawa to hear, but he's spent too much time around teenagers for his ears not to pick on up words muttered under someone's breath.

"Maybe I agreed with Naomasa," Aizawa snapped, the faces on the screen now completely unimportant, even though he still stares at them. "Maybe I wanted to keep you out of it because I knew you would react this way."

The dam that Hizashi had built up started with a crack, but now it crumbled. "Oh! Of course! Why should I know what's going to happen to my ward when everyone else has that covered! It's not like I have a responsibility to Shinsou or anything! No, I just need to play babysitter and let you guys do the investigative work, a dumb blonde like me belongs in the kitchen after all!"

Aizawa looked up in time to see Midnight's face through the window in the staff room door, wincing before she turned and walked down the hall. "Maybe that's what Shinsou needs from you. If one of us has to do this, I'd rather have it on my hands than yours."

Hizashi shook his head, his mouth twisting over words that he didn't have the fuel to say anymore, before he sighed, pulling his chair closer to Aizawa's. "Fine, I get it. I get why you did that, but you can't do things like this, Shou. Shinsou is my ward and you... you need to act like you trust me."

Hizashi didn't need to use his quirk to make his words into a weapon. Aizawa reeled as they stung and struck true, closing the distance between them to lean his head on his husband's shoulder. "I trust you, Hizashi. I just don't want you to have to see this."

Hizashi leaned his head against Aizawa's, before he patted his cheek playfully. "Too bad, babe. If this is my ward and your investigation, then we're partners in this, just like everything else. So stop hiding things from me, and read me in."

Aizawa shook his head. "I don't know anything else. We might have a week, we might have a month. We were told the head of the organization is an undocumented foreigner, but the databases can't run a search based on a sketch." He sighed as Hizashi ran a hand through his hair, trying not to find comfort in the gesture when he felt like he didn't deserve it. "Shinsou needs to give us something better."

Hizashi sighed. “Yeah, and that’s not going to happen in a week, or even a month. He’s still pretty shaken by what happened with Bakugo.”

Aizawa noticed. He would have liked to take those friendly overtures that happened during the free period as something other than a drowning child trying desperately to find a friendly port, and still hated that he had taken advantage of it. He still didn’t know what caused the spiral, but the keylogger told him how deeply it wound into Shinsou.

‘ Trash trash TRASH USELESS dispose they’ll dispose of you TRASH USELESS hurt everyone you hurt your own WORTHLESS WORTHLESS you HURT ERI everyone CURSED YOU’RE CURSED should die die die death too good for you should suffer hurt deserve TRASH USELESS STUPID STUPID STUPID CURSED YOU’RE CURSED cursed existence cursed quirk dispose of you should die death too good suffer deserve it dispose of you USELESS TRASH TRASH TRASH TRASH STUPID STUPID STUPID .’

He read all seven pages of Shinsou’s mental breakdown, hoping to find something useful to the investigation to justify his intrusion, and found nothing. Nothing but seven pages of reasons to find something to offer The Commission. The kid couldn’t handle a bad day at school, and he certainly couldn’t handle what they had planned.

“Read me in on that,” Aizawa asked, straining to pick at his cold tofu so he could eat while Hizashi explained.

“Nah, I’m handling it,” Hizashi said flippantly, patting his head still resting on his husband’s shoulder.

“It involves my student...” Aizawa trailed off, then rose to level a half-hearted glare, which Hizashi countered with a toothy grin. “You can’t be mean to me on my birthday.”

“Babe, I can be mean to you every day,” Hizashi said, a finger hooking into the chain that he wore under the capture scarf to pull the ring hanging on it out of his shirt. “It’s one of my favorite husbandly duties.”

Aizawa rolled his eyes, but honestly?

He wouldn’t have it any other way.

Breathe. In. Out. Eri.

Breathe. In. Out. Eri.

27 was grateful that Eri decided to sit on him instead of the seat that Floaty had pulled over for her, even if he was still irritated that she forced him to come to this unbearably noisy, excessively populated area.

Full of hundreds of powerful quirks and he hardly knew any of them, his back had to be turned to several of them. He hated this .

Breathe. In. Out. Eri.

At least his mask seemed to be intact, or the hero students were too preoccupied with making their plans to celebrate his owner's birthday to notice. Piston was trying, and horribly failing, to gain control of the conversation, but his underlings ran wild knowing that he was unfit for his role.

Eri would probably make a promising head of Shie Hassaikai, if she ever wanted to claim her birthright. She didn't have to make a single demand of these heroes, and they continued to offer her tributes of apple slices and other sweets. Floaty in particular seemed to be making a play to become her right hand, though she would be wholly unfit for it. A right hand needed to strike fear into the hearts of the underlings, and that face would never be able to do it.

"Hey, why don't we ask Aizawa's other kids, since we're all here to plan his birthday bash," Sparky says, interrupting the loudest shouting match concerning what cake his owner wanted. Sparky grinned expectantly, and 27 didn't even have the energy to taunt him for expecting him to answer verbally.

Eri kicked her feet, too slow to be excitement, just a sign that she was thinking hard about something. "He likes the red cake, but I don't remember what it's called."

"Red velvet?" Creati asks, offering payment for Eri's intel by sliding her yet another juice box, as though she didn't have two unopened ones already.

"Yup! Yama gets him cupcakes like that when he doesn't get hurt at his job for a whole month!" Eri says, swinging her feet back and forth proudly.

"Hatsume said she'd help, but are you sure you want to do this, Sato?" Beat Dropper asked, looking up from her phone with the faintest traces of concern as she looked at Sucrose Processor. "You know what she's like. It's probably safer to wait until we get to the dorm."

"I know, but I might be able to have it done before homeroom," Sweets Dealer answered grimly, breathing in as though he were facing a suicide mission rather than baking a cake. "You guys better appreciate this."

Several heroes bowed or gave him a salute as he stood, walking away with a stiffness that he should be trained well enough to hide. Even if his job was that risky, even if it would cost him his life, he should know better than to show it and rattle his comrades. He should be a professional, and die with pride.

27 glanced over at Blasty, who had dragged Crimson Shark into his self-imposed banishment to another table. Even if his tantrum made the table a bit quieter, it grated on his nerves, and Blasty didn't seem skilled enough to have intended to do that. Which only made it more irritating.

The hero students went back to arguing over a gift. Their lack of preparation meant that Genesis' abilities were limited, but some were against using her quirk entirely, arguing that if she created the gift, then it was an offering from her alone, rather than a group effort.

If Genesis didn't press her advantage here and use one of their better ideas to separate herself from the pack, he would be severely disappointed in her. She could probably overthrow Piston's position if her gift carried favor from his owner, but she might be too soft to risk that. Piston might end up being killed as an example to the others, teaching them not to fail to live up to expectations.

27 could see why she didn't want that pressure, even if it was easily within her reach.

“What about a coupon book, kero?” Amphibian Fibber asked the group, eyes glancing at each of her peers in turn. “Each page could have a redeemable coupon from each of us to avoid a behavior Aizawa-sensei dislikes, kero.”

“Like the coupon books that you make for your mom on her birthday or mother’s day,” Ashido says, entirely too enthusiastic about the idea. 27 wonders if she ever made a coupon that promised not to melt anything with her quirk. If she had ever made good on that coupon’s promise if she did. If he had made his mother one too.

“Yeah! Like, Midoriya can promise not to break his bones or go on a mumble rant!” Tape Joint adds, and while he sounds like he’s trying to be helpful, Izu-Midoriya kicks off into a muttering spell as though he was trained to do so.

“I believe that is a very good idea, Asui! Let us take a vote to decide whether to take this course of action. All in favor, please raise your hands,” Piston shouts, his own hands moving in amusing half-signs before he raises his own, soon followed by the rest of the hero students, including Crimson Shark. “That would be 17 in favor of a coupon book. Each of us should endeavor to have a coupon ready before homeroom. I will send a text message to Sato to inform him of this new development, and I have no doubt that he will be able to prepare his coupon as well.”

“I can create a cover page and book binding materials to make it look more professional,” Genesis adds, and 27 doesn’t miss the way that she gains more attention from the underlings than Piston does.

“We should also include a few coupons from the whole class,” Zappy says, spreading his arms out to gesture to his peers. “Like, we can have a coupon saying he can sleep during all of our classes, and we’ll still do our work, or something.”

“As long as there’s a coupon saying you’ll stay off your phone,” Beat Dropper jabs with a smirk. “But Present Mic-sensei will probably try to steal it from him.”

27 was still curious what Sparky was trying to do when he couldn’t recite the alphabet, but he didn’t want to draw any attention to himself by trying to ask. Unfortunately, Eri was doing that for him.

“Twenny,” Eri called, finally ending her tantrum to look up at him, tugging on his sleeve as well. This must be an important question. “Do you want a coupon book?”

27 struggled not to let his face reflect the feeling of his stomach dropping, hoping that these heroes were too stupid to connect the dots. Midoriya’s startle wasn’t helping, at all. “Not really,” 27 answered, and was disappointed in himself when he quietly added. “I’d rather have a picture.”

Eri found something to be upset by in his words, frowning before she reached for her backpack laying next to his feet. “Momo, are you a good draw-er?”

Genesis gave a pinched smile in answer. “No, I’m afraid I’m not a very good artist. I focused on improving my penmanship in my free time, while others might have pursued art to relieve stress.”

27 catches Eri’s hands before she can do it, shooting a glare at Genesis. Even if she didn’t know, and she should, being one of the heroes Eri must have spent a lot of time with during that month he was away from her. She should choose her words more carefully. “You can say ‘draw-er’ Eri. It’s not wrong.”

Eri didn’t seem entirely convinced, but she trusted him enough not to do it when he let go of her hands. Instead, she hugged her backpack to her chest, squirming nervously. “I need help with my picture. I am not a good dra- artist.”

27 bites down on the inside of his cheek to keep himself from reaching for the knife to take it out on Creati. He hated when she talked like this, like Chisaki wanted her to.

He never should have gotten sick. And when he did, he should have shown Chisaki that he could still do his job, that he could control Eri without speaking. Even if he had to go back to having his jaw wired shut, the mask only opening for him to eat, it would have kept her from doing this.

It would have kept Chisaki from taking another piece of Eri. A piece that he still had.

“Izuku is a pretty good draw-er!” Floaty offers, while Midoriya nervously disagrees. 27 appreciates her choice of words enough to give her a nod, which she returns none too subtly.

“Hagakure is really good at drawing too! Her doodles are so cute!” Ashido gushes, wrapping her arms around the floating uniform beside her, who also tries to protest that she only doodles, which doesn’t make her an artist.

Eri seems to be indecisive, torn between Izuku - someone she’s familiar with - and Focus Imperceptible - someone she isn’t as comfortable with, but has the skillset she requires. She shrinks in on herself as she continues to waver, looking at each of them in turn.

Then Izuku makes it worse. “You don’t want Shinsou to help-”

“No!” Eri yells, kicking her feet back into his legs. It doesn’t hurt the way she means it to, but she might be pleased to know it hurts him all the same. “Twenny can’t help! He can’t give Zawa two presents!”

Divided Temperature looks up from his notebook, blinking slowly at Eri after her outburst, before he mutters to himself, “Sibling rivalry.”

Amphibian Fibber cocks her head to the side. “Eri, Aizawa-sensei wouldn’t mind if Shinsou helped you with your present, kero. It would still be from you.”

27 glances at Koda, making sure to catch his eye. ‘ It’s fine. Bad anyway. Tell them to stop. ’

“Shinsou said he’s not a good artist,” Koda translates, pressing two of his fingers together in front of his chest. “But I’m sure that you could be if you tried! Or wanted to....”

‘ I don’t. ’ 27 signs. His unmade hand would make that impossible anyway.

“Hey, Bakugo, you’re pretty good at-” Zappy begins to say, turning to track Blasty as he stalks towards 27, his usual scowl a bit thinner and deeper set before it curls into a snarl when he slams a tray on top of 27’s unopened bento box.

“Eat, dumb shit,” Blasty growls, hand curling into its usual position for his quirk to fire off before he clenches it into a fist. “It’s fucking pissing me off to watch you turn into a fucking skeleton. If anything’s going to end your shit, it’s going to be me, not anorexia. Dumb fuck.”

‘ Look away. Dumb fuck. ’ 27 signed, glad that Eri was too upset with him to want to copy his words. ‘ Plan failed. M-O-N-O-M-A. Stupid. Try again. Blast chan. ’

Blasty grinds his teeth, then lifts his hands to sign. ‘ Eat. Dumb shit. Fuck you. Fuck M-O-N-O-M-A. Shit chan. ’

27 couldn't stop the beginning of a grin, biting his lips together to keep it from spreading any further. ' Congratulations. Learning new words. I have hope for you. Blast chan. '

"Kacchan! Eri needs help drawing a picture for Aizawa-sensei," Izuku says, drawing Blasty's glare from 27 towards himself. "Since you're pretty good at--"

"I'm great as fuck at art," Bakugo hissed, a bit less heat behind his words than usual. He eyed the empty chair behind him warily, only sparing a glance at Eri before he pulled it between 27 and Floaty, kicking a foot onto his knee once he sat down. "What the fu-frick do you want help with?" Even though his words were directed at Eri, he still didn't look at her, glaring at the table instead.

There was hope for Blasty.

Eri tried to glare, but after Izuku's endorsement, she couldn't do much else. She huffed, pulling out the pictures that she had drawn, keeping them rolled in on themselves so that 27 couldn't see them before handing them to Blasty. "I can't make Zawa look right and the cats need to be cuter."

Blasty flipped through the pictures, still keeping them angled away from 27, as though he was also aware of how much 27 wanted to see them. "The cats are cute as fuck," Blasty muttered, tilting his head to the side as he examined the drawings with a serious look on his face. "I'll show you how to do that stipple sh- stuff, for his scraggly ass beard. Is Sensei supposed to be quirking out or are his eyes supposed to look demonic?"

Eri kicked her feet together a few times, tilting forward towards the table. "They're just red in the picture," she muttered under her breath, and 27 could hear the sad pout without needing to see it.

She was being ridiculous .

"Eri," 27 begins to say, intent to tell her what she hadn't already guessed, what he had only parsed out last night. That Yamada and his owner wanted to keep Eri as their child, there was no reason for her to be insecure about her position. She had her place, and it was with them, and his owner would be happy to see that she wanted it too, enough to pretend that they had the same red eyes. That she already saw him as her father.

But 27 doesn't say any of that because it's cold and it's loud and he's drifting and there's fog and it's so loud loud loud loud.

Eri. Standing close to Blasty, watching him draw, that technique loud. Speaking, it's not that loud but it's loud there's no words no air either just sounds too much noise for there to be air why don't they realize there isn't any air in this place it's too loud for air.

She looks at him when he stands, her head tilting, she still needs her horn trick but she'll find him, she'll ask, she's safe, she has her position no air.

She's not upset, not yet, but she hates when he leaves the room for a trip outside, so he signs her another promise, one that Chisaki's camera can't overhear. ' Heroes. ' He leaves, his lungs aching. This sickness is going to kill him, it will probably kill him before he gets outside but at least she won't see it, won't see his body.

He can't breathe, his lungs have stopped working. He needs to make it outside. He can't let her see.

Why is it so loud? Chisaki hates noise, he doesn't let the underlings get this loud, it's so loud, too loud, too busy. He doesn't recognize any of these underlings, they're wearing odd clothing. None of them have masks. Chisaki is going to kill all of them, he needs to keep his head down, not associate with them, he doesn't want to remember any of them when they're dead.

Loud loud loud no air can't breathe starting to hurt can't breathe just past those doors, don't let Eri see when I'm dead don't let her remember me don't let me be like 50 to her don't let her carry that with her.

“...o I'm okay, Aizawa-sensei. I'm way more worried about Shinsou.”

Something moving his hands. Tendons working against his will. He remembers what they look like, Chisaki showed him. Maybe Chisaki is playing with them right now. He should probably open his eyes to see. “...oming around, I think.”

Not Chisaki. Woman. Familiar. He should open his eyes.

His body comes back to him with an odd ache. Every muscle is tensed, as though he tried to hold himself inside his body. It didn't work. It must have been bad. He must have been away for a while. Maybe days. That shouldn't happen.

He tries breathing. His lungs are cleared, he remembers that they stole the sickness. He thinks he's been breathing for a while, but when he concentrates on it, when he makes it less instinctive, his eyes open oddly. Like they were open, just covered. It's odd.

Witching Hour is moving his hands, Yamada hovering at her side, looking at him. His owner and Crimson Shark in the doorway, Crimson Shark seems nervous about his owner's proximity. He might have done something wrong.

No. 27 did something wrong.

He pulls back his hands, realizing that he might not have been given permission to use them yet as a secondary thought, but he needs them to sign. ‘I'm sorry. I'm sorry.’

What did he do? He did something. He did something wrong, something crept into his skin while he was away and did something with his hands. Witching Hour kept looking at them like something was still inside of them, something that wasn't him.

“It's alright, Shinsou,” Yamada says, hands flying up before he tucks one behind his neck. “The lunch room might have been a little too much, you know. I should have warned you about that.”

Midnight hums in agreement, cutting her eyes to Yamada sharply. “It can be a little overwhelming with over a hundred students in one room.”

He looks at Crimson Shark, trying not to look at his owner. He doesn't think he could withstand it if he knew what his owner thought right now, not with the fog still so close. Crimson Shark smiles and gives him a wave, and 27 breathes a sigh of relief.

He knows that sometimes, something creeps into his skin while he's away, and does something unsettling. He's seen it on the faces of the underlings, the way they refuse to look at him, instinctively pull away when he approaches. It's a sickness that inspires pity and horror, and he might not have been cured of it when they took his other sickness.

“It was nice eating lunch with you, Shinbro! I think it was super manly that you came by!” Crimson Shark says while he crosses the boundary of the doorway, turning down the hall after he finishes. 27 could appreciate that Crimson Shark didn't expect him to answer, but he's too concerned right now with trying to avoid his owner's gaze while trying to pick up any tell that he was angry.

His owner only seems tired when he walks back to his usual seat, settling behind Midnight and Yamada. But he doesn't cast a single look in 27's direction.

He's angry.

'I'm sorry.' 27 wants to sign more, but his words can catch here too, like they do when he tries to speak. He did something reckless for Eri's sake, when she didn't want him to, and failed anyway. He left her unprotected. He fell out of his head and troubled an underling for it.

And it happened on his owner's birthday.

All of his efforts to complete his job are worthless now, that hopeless game is over. There's no place for him here, not when he's insulted his owner that thoroughly. He doesn't know what will happen to him, but he knows that he won't like it. But he also feels like he deserves it.

His owner grunts, and 27 looks up to see Midnight's arm pulling away from him. He doesn't have time to wonder if he's supposed to retaliate against her for striking his owner, before his owner's eyes meet his, forcing him to look away instinctively.

"Shinsou, I'm not angry," his owner says, an odd lilt to his tone as though he's confused, but 27 knows that can't be right. He just doesn't know how to read his owner. "I... feel responsible. My students are overwhelming at times."

27 looks up to see Midnight turned towards his owner, her arms crossed and body language hostile. He never considered that she might be ranked high enough to do that.

His owner glances at 27 again, and he realizes how unnervingly demure he looks, slouched in his chair with the bottom half of his face obscured by the scarf. 27 doesn't like it, doesn't understand it.

'I'm sorry. Trouble. Birthday. My fault.' The words come easier, pleading for his owner to react in a way that he understands. But again, his owner doesn't, snorting as though he would have laughed if his words were more amusing. As though he wasn't used to finding amusement in the way 27 is too broken to speak.

"I honestly don't care that it's my birthday," his owner says, and he's not sure if it's a lie, if it's a trap. "And my students make far more trouble than you do, regardless of what day it is."

'Hero students trying not to. Plan-' 27 wants to see if giving him this information might make his owner forgive this slight, but Yamada starts waving his hand to cut him off.

"Ah! No no no, if the herolets have something planned, don't tell him about it!" Yamada pleads, but a rather sadistic grin betrays his true intentions. "I'm sure Shou is looking forward to being surprised."

If Yamada thinks that the hero students deserve the wrath of his owner if their now highly anticipated gifts don't live up to expectations, then 27 will have to trust his judgement. Though his owner seems to shudder at the thought, shooting a glare at Witching Hour. "You leaked that intel, didn't you?"

Midnight grins as she examines her red tinted manicure. "Me? No, never! What would make you think that, Eraserhead?"

27 appreciates that she seems to have a ploy to antagonize his owner, which draws suspicion from him. He's not sure if he would have been able to hide his own guilt if his owner so much as looked at him now.

But he's only truly relieved when he sees Eri run into the staff room, Floaty still hesitating in the doorway. Eri throws herself into 27's side, sniffing and watery-eyed when she looks up at him. "Twenny, I'm sorry! I was being mean and I don't want to be a rival and I like that you and Zawa are friends and my horn really hurts -"

27 pulls out a tissue from the collection in his pocket that he's already prepared, pressing it to her nose while he gives her horn a solid tap. She goes through three tissues before he uses the fourth to wipe away her tears, but luckily, they've avoided a horn ache judging by the way she doesn't wince when he massages the base of her horn.

"I'm sorry, mom," Eri whimpers, and her eyes start watering for another reason, her hands clenching tight on the hem of the hoodie she picked for him to wear. He doesn't care if Floaty or Witching Hour hear her say that, not when he's sickeningly elated to have Eri back in his sight, and over this first fit of many.

"I'm sorry," 27 says, smoothing a hand over her hair. "I shouldn't have left like that."

He shouldn't have left at all, however broken his mind was. If Eri had gotten a horn ache from his negligence, he wouldn't be able to forgive himself. And making a fool out of himself in front of the hero students was one thing, but he probably embarrassed Eri just by association. Embarrassing her in front of her friends.

Eri whines and pulls herself into his lap, wrapping her arms tight around his neck. "It's scary and loud. Even with the heroes."

He knows that she shouldn't feel that way. She shouldn't be broken like he is, and it's his fault that she is. He wraps his arms around her to help her feel safer, to forget that the lunch room was too much. He hopes that the memory of all those voices, shouting and screaming and laughing, doesn't still ring in her ears like they do in his.

But those voices fade further away the longer he holds her, and the easier he finds it to breathe.

He hopes Eri feels the same way. Mostly, because he wants her to feel safe, the same way he wanted her to more than three years ago when he had to train himself out of flinching away from her touch. He had to make that effort so that he could imitate the way that 50 had comforted him. He's happy that she doesn't remember that, doesn't remember how hard it was for him or how often he made her cry with those silent sobs when he jerked away from her.

But there's a selfish part of 27 that hopes she always needs him like this.

Because he'll always need her.

A Heroic Gift

Chapter Summary

Aizawa receives all of his gifts, and Shinsou's in particular is surprising. 27 is eager to know how well his efforts paid off, but machinations beyond his control may prevent that.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: PTSD related flight response

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou and Eri were told by Yamada to make a name sign and card for Aizawa's birthday. Shinsou asked for Class 1-A's help to get information about Aizawa's personality to make the name sign, and Yaoyorozu and Asui gave him different meanings of the kanji that make up Aizawa's name. Shinsou has asked for coffee on several occasions, and while Yamada has caved, Aizawa hasn't because Shinsou is supposed to be restricted from coffee due to his poor nutrition while in police custody and at the 8 Precepts. Yamada's name sign for Aizawa is 'Sho Sleep.' When Eri asked Aizawa about family names, Aizawa mentioned that he and Yamada kept their names unchanged after getting married because he didn't want to be Yamada Shouta, because he knew someone that he disliked with that name, and Yamada didn't want to be Aizawa Hizashi because it had too many 'z' sounds. Midnight told Aizawa to take his birthday party as a chance to model how to have a birthday for Shinsou and Eri, and specifically to act like a "Happy birthday boy."

“So, what have we got so far, listeners?”

27 has been dreading that question all day.

Yamada must have noticed it, because he looks over at Eri and probably sees the same reaction. She went through three more sheets of paper during the Hero Ethics class, and still doesn't seem to be satisfied.

He's not satisfied either.

He's ruled out using his owner's given name - he won't assume that they're close or familiar just because they live together, despite the hero students assumptions. He doesn't want to use 'Aizawa' because there's no way to make 'swamp' into something positive. 'Ai' has three meanings, and none of them are viable. There's nothing about his owner that can be associated with 'indigo,' he doesn't know what 'mugroot' is used for or what it looks like, and he doesn't want to call his owner 'affectionate' when he only seems to be that way with Eri.

Hopefully she won't mind that he's stealing her nickname for his owner, but he has to. His owner likes being called that, even more than his hero name.

'Zawa' means 'murmur,' and his owner does seem to murmur things to himself. He seems to mutter a lot about how 27 isn't allowed to have coffee. He's not sure exactly how a name sign is supposed to feel when it's right, but 'Zawa Coffee' has a nice flow to it.

But his owner seems to be suspicious of him every time he signs 'coffee,' so 27 rules that out as well.

'Zawa cat' doesn't feel right. 'Zawa sleep' is too similar to Yamada's name sign for him. 'Zawa work' seems insulting, as though he's commanding his owner to work, and translated literally, he would be.

He hasn't gained enough information to do this job, but he doesn't want to let Yamada know that. Even if Yamada might be his best source of information, after knowing his owner so long and being married to him.

"I picked out Shou's hero name, you know," Yamada says, his smiling at 27. "So, if you need any help, I'm definitely the guy to talk to! Well, except for whoever came up with 'Delete Face.' I was so sure that Ms. Joke was behind that one, but apparently-"

"Yama, why didn't you pick out a married name?" Eri asks, kicking her feet under her desk. "Zawa said you didn't want to have each other's names, but you could've made a different one, like heroes make different names."

Yamada turns a bit red at that, rubbing the back of his neck. "Oh, Shou told you about that? Well, I guess we didn't really think about doing something like that. Some married couples hyphenate their names, and if we did we would be 'Yamada-Aizawa' or 'Aizawa-Yamada,' but then we'd have the same problems as before."

"What if you mash them up?" Eri asks, cocking her head to the side. "Ashi does that sometimes to people I don't know about, and sometimes it sounds silly. But maybe some married people do that too."

"That's a really good idea, little bean!" Yamada praises, though he clearly has no intention of following her advice, wincing after he smiles. "But, we'd probably still have the same problem. It's probably just better to keep our own names."

"But if you were 'Aiyama,' then it wouldn't be like that guy that Zawa doesn't like," Eri argues, oddly insistent upon this name change. "And it wouldn't hurt your teeth 'cause there's no 'z's in it!"

"That's...a really good idea," Yamada says, his head tilting as his voice becomes more strained. He seems to be uncomfortable with Eri's suggestions, and somewhat confused by her argument, but unable to refuse her directly.

'Sounds like French Shine name,' 27 signs, hoping the suggestion would help Yamada ward her off.

"But it sounds a lot like Aoyama, and that would be kind of confusing," Yamada says, a bit quicker than he usually talks. He gives 27 a thumbs up before he looks back to Eri, walking towards her desk. “Do you need any help with the letter part, little bean?”

Eri is distracted from her former line of questioning, shrinking in on herself when she looks back at her card. “I should’ve asked Momo to help, she has really good pena-penma...”

“Penmanship,” 27 corrects, making sure to catch her eye when he smiles at her. “It’s a hard word to say, but you did a good job.”

Eri nods, then turns back to her paper. “I wanna have good penmanship, but I don’t, and Bakugo said I should make people who are good at stuff that I’m not do stuff for me, because I’m little, and I can get away with it.”

27 struggles not to laugh, and between Eri’s innocent voice and Yamada’s shell-shocked expression, he has to hide his mouth behind his hand to muffle anything that slips out. It was a good lesson for her, though, and one that he should have probably taught her more directly.

And a bit surprising, coming from Bakugo, but he might not be the temperamental idiot that 27 first assumed he was. At least the idiot part seemed to be wrong.

Eri fidgets nervously as she looks at her picture, then hands one of the pages she had been working on to Yamada. “Is it okay if I write that, Yama?”

Eri beams at that, and folds her picture in half to make it into a card, intent to finish the project before homeroom now that her draft has been approved. 27 can’t help but smile, pleased to know that whatever she wrote was touching for Yamada to read. He has an idea what it was, and Yamada’s reaction couldn’t have been more promising.

They would have to secure her place with them once his owner read it too.

Yamada looks back at him, reminding him that his own position here was tenuous, and his gift not as likely to please. He needed to do well, to have his own foothold rather than clinging to Eri’s. Yamada had given him a great opportunity to do that. If his name was well-received, he would be able to remind his owner that he did well at his task every time he signed it. It needed to be clever, and well suited to his owner. It needed to endear 27 to him just enough that he might waver when the time came to dispose of him. To consider keeping him.

Even if 27 had to be the family dog, it would be better to be a dog here than at the 8 Precepts.

Before 27 can ask, the chimes announcing the end of the period sound to cut him off. He had wasted his time, his own rough drafts unapproved. He had a few more names to choose from, none of them seemed to stand out enough, to strike the same way ‘Zawa Coffee’ did, but there was nothing for it now.

He could only hope that he had some time between homeroom and the party for Yamada to hear him out.

Aizawa had been dreading his homeroom.

He could deal with being bothered on his birthday with parties and social obligations that were exactly that - something he was obligated to attend, but had no real desire to. But the worst part of having a birthday was receiving gifts. There was no way to be comfortable with it, to be the center of attention like that, holding a present in his hand while the giver waited to earn some positive reaction from him. It felt like a trade that he didn't want to take part in.

He especially didn't want to do that with his students. It was unprofessional, first and foremost, and he suspected a majority of his class might hope that this will make him go easier on them for their midterms. But he also didn't know how to react in a balance of honesty and insincerity. Even if they prepared something truly nightmarish, he couldn't let them know his honest opinion, and he knew that if he acted too appreciative, they might be disturbed by his sudden change in personality.

But he knew that he couldn't let them know if he was disappointed, because of the new, incredibly uncomfortable dynamic that had begun to take shape after they moved into the dorms. He's not just a teacher anymore, not a future coworker, not a hero - and if any of them were fans of his work, he's relieved that he still doesn't know it.

He's something approaching a father figure to his students.

It's rational that they would begin to think that way - their own family histories laying a foundation for some, and the distance created by living away from home cementing it for the rest.

They're children, and they need that from him, even if it makes him uncomfortable. He can't brush it away as something that they need to overcome, to push them over the metaphorical cliff so that they learn how to fly - because this isn't an aspect of their hero training.

This is a group of children who need approval from an adult figure, who need praise and affection, and UA isolated them from getting that from their real families. As much as he wanted to ignore that, it wouldn't be rational for him to expect them to grow into exceptional heroes when their emotional development was stunted.

He's just as unyielding during training, but he does find himself offering praise more often than he did before. He finds himself patting their heads or shoulders, and he's overheard Kaminari refer to the gesture as 'The Good Boy Pat' in a way that's reassuringly fond, if not a bit overexcited to earn one. He knows more about this class than any of his previous ones - their favorite foods, hobbies, childhood memories - and he could blame that on his dorm shifts, but he can't blame Principal Nezu for the fact that he keeps track of those things.

It's uncomfortable and taxing, but when he enters the room, he pretends he doesn't suspect anything so that he can at least give them the thrill of surprising him. He's still not sure if he can give them approval in the way that they need, but surprising a hero who specializes in stealth should make them happy.

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY, AIZAWA-SENSEI!" 19 incredibly loud idiots cheer in unison, and he doesn't have to fake a startle as much as he planned to.

Half of them pull off the excitement and cheer, the other half are clearly trying. Todoroki doesn't quite smile, but his eyebrows are raised in some approximation of an expression. Bakugo looks like he didn't cheer, scowling towards the window, but Aizawa definitely heard his voice. Tokoyami and Shoji can't wear their emotions as plainly as their peers, but he knows by the shape of their eyes and body language that they, just like the rest of the class, are all at once excited and desperate for a reaction from him.

But Aizawa is mostly concerned about Sato's injuries.

"Do you need to see Recovery Girl?" Aizawa asks, still taking in the busted lip, coin-sized bruises that indicate shrapnel, and scorch marks that have ruined the student's uniform. It's technically a dress code violation, but given that some UA classes are a war zone, he's never enforced it.

"I'm fine, Aizawa-sensei! It looks worse than it feels," Sato insists, wincing when he looks down at the somewhat cake-shaped object on the plate that he's holding. There was clearly an attempt to fashion it into a cake using copious amounts of icing, but it's still bulging and rough, with a crater in the middle of it.

He knew they wouldn't make this easy for him, but he didn't expect it to be this difficult. He meets their expectant stares, not quite able to smile, but he doesn't have to fight to soften his tone for them. "This was wholly unnecessary, but appreciated. Thank you."

He takes the plate from Sato, noticing the welted burns on his fingers and intent to send him to Recovery Girl for treatment, and sees that Asui is offering him a small booklet. "This was a group effort, and I hope that it's put to good use, kero."

Aizawa can't help the toothy grin when he reads the title, 'Aizawa-sensei's Coupon Book for Making Class 1-A Behave.' At least they were somewhat aware of what little shits they could be. "I'm sure it will be."

Iida thankfully takes over to direct his class to take their seats, and run through attendance. Eri stares at the cake when he places it on his desk, head tilting to the side, but thankfully doesn't comment on the odd shape. With his wards and students settled, and self-occupied in silence, Aizawa cracks open the coupon book to know what tools he has at his disposal now.

But it's not exactly a coupon book.

'We members of Class 1-A are heartened by the reminder to demonstrate our appreciation to you, Aizawa-sensei, and hope that our efforts do so effectively! Happy Birthday!' Iida wrote that, clearly, but every single one of his students signed their names around his message.

The first few pages are coupons to make Class 1-A do their work without any supervision from him. There are also some that aren't assigned to any student in particular, with vague commands to 'Stop.' He wishes there were more of those, but the capture scarf works just as effectively.

There's one redeemable from the girls of Class 1-A for a nondescript and utterly terrifying 'Spa Day,' which Ashido's handwriting betrays her as the creator. Kaminari must have read that and then been inspired to offer the boys of Class 1-A up as pack mules to carry him around in a palanquin for a day.

He's not using either of those coupons, but he might give the palanquin one to Midnight for Christmas.

Each student gave him a coupon to avoid a certain behavior, or do him a favor. Aoyama's is good for a traditional French meal, and he recommends Coq au Vin. Bakugo will 'talk like a fucking nun' if he demands it, but only for one class period. There are quite a few students who added an additional coupon to watch Eri for him, and he doesn't believe that's entirely selfless of them.

But after the coupons, there's the notes. Letters of appreciation, and as much as this entire situation is uncomfortable, he can't deny that it's incredibly touching.

He only reads half of Asui's before he has to close the book, mind circling over ways to get out of here.

He can't afford to think like this, to go back to that place when he doesn't control it, doesn't predict it. It's not often, but this happens, his mind stutters and whirs and wants to find a path to a vague escape. Sometimes his scarf moves without his command, just reading his mind to react as though it's needed to make that escape, but he doesn't want them to see that. He doesn't want any of them to see that from him today.

He gathers enough of himself after going through his usual process. A headcount, five times. Aoyama, Ashido, Asui, on down the line. Again again again again. They're here. In their uniforms. They're safe.

"Class is dismissed," Aizawa says, drawing more than his fair share of surprised expressions. "I have a cake to eat, and you have better things to do."

That earns him a far louder cheer than the one that greeted him at the beginning of class, and in between well-wishes for him to have a happy birthday, he makes sure that Sato is going straight to Recovery Girl, and tries to tamp down on that still too anxious urge to run.

His students don't notice, but an irrational part of him worries that his wards can see through him too clearly right now. It's something he doesn't want, that they don't need, but Eri runs to pull herself into his lap in a way that makes him afraid that she can tell. She can see that they're too similar, that he looks a bit too much like Shinsou for her not to notice. "Zawa, it doesn't look like the red velvet cupcakes, but Sato tried really hard to make them for you!"

He finds himself snorting a laugh, looking between his ward and the misshapen cake, and wonders if the relief sinking into him can be explained because it's Eri. He didn't know Eri before USJ, and her presence, so clear and present, is the evidence he needs to remember that he's here. He's past that. "I could tell. Sato is a very good chef, so I'm sure that I'll enjoy it, no matter what the cake looks like."

Shinsou helps Eri into her backpack, having taken it upon himself to clear their desks while she ran to him. ' H-A-T-S-U-M-E involved. I don't know that person. Might have caused injuries. '

"She probably did," Aizawa answers, looking towards the cake a bit more warily. He hoped that he wouldn't also become a casualty of one of her 'babies.' "We can wait until Hizashi is done with class to eat it."

His husband could afford to be slightly poisoned before the party tonight, but Aizawa couldn't.

He had to act like a happy birthday boy.

27 is wearing a very flimsy hat.

He's also wearing an outfit that Yamada picked, rather than Eri. A button up shirt, brown leather jacket. It's supposed to 'look nice,' but this flimsy, uncomfortable hat doesn't look nice.

Everyone has to wear one, though. It's a bit like the masks at the 8 Precepts, but rather than enforcement coming from Chisaki under pain of death, the partygoers seem to police themselves by making a game out of placing another hat on whoever tries to take theirs off.

27 doesn't want another hat, so he keeps his on, even if the string under his jaw is uncomfortable.

His owner seems to be compelled by some mysterious authority over him to pretend that he likes being here. He glares at the partygoers when Eri is occupied, but she's attached herself to his side often enough that 27 can pick apart his fake smile, and find notes of other feelings that come through the strain of wearing it.

The mouse-bear, who asked how 27 liked being at UA, gave his owner a paper. The paper was evidence of his owner's sick leave and vacation days being doubled. His owner's jaw clenches, and there's a slight twitch in his eyebrow that suggests that this offering isn't useful to him at all.

All Might, who come up to ask 27 several times if he's enjoying the party, gave his owner another cake like the one that Class 1-A made. But his owner's smile isn't quite so fake, his eyebrows rising to carry through his gratitude when he thanks All Might for it.

Witching Hour, who has been glancing over at 27 often but hasn't approached, cackled under her breath when his owner opened her gift. He sighed in relief when he found a large yellow padded suit, similar to his sleeping bag. He must have been expecting something more dangerous.

Yamada told 27 that he could 'mingle' or 'hang out' at this party, and to let him know if he needed anything. If he wanted to talk to anyone, Yamada could translate or he could use the phone. He was welcome to talk to any of the heroes gathered here.

But 27 doesn't have the energy to attempt to comply with that half-command. He initiates no conversation, endures any that comes, and tries to stop picking at the string of his hat while he keeps watch over Eri and his owner. Both are the center of attention, even when they're apart, and this room isn't nearly as secure as the rest of the building that they live in. Two staircases, two elevators, and a large set of doors at the front, glass paneling everywhere.

With all these distracted heroes and environmental vulnerabilities, Boss would have made a lot of money to sell information about this party. Millions, just because All Might was here, but the other heroes probably pushed that value up into the billions.

27 seems to be the only person aware that this situation could turn dangerous, because he's aware of Provost Piston and his nearly identical twin long before they reach the edges of this gathering. The heroes seem surprised to see them.

"Tensei! I didn't think you were going to make it!" Midnight yells, running up to the older Iida to perch on his lap, taking advantage of his wheelchair to make a seat for herself. She must be regretting wearing those high heels in a place that didn't seem to have many seating options. She looks from one blushing brother to the other, her grin turning wicked as she addresses Provost Piston. "What a naughty student, breaking in to a teacher's party. This is a place for adults only."

Provost Piston seems to be vibrating in place, his face turning a disconcerting shade of red. "I apologize for the intrusion, I merely wanted to make sure that the staff dorm had the proper accessibility features on behalf of my brother-”

“Tenya, it’s fine,” Tensei said with a wave of his hand, which he then uses to tap a finger under Witching Hour’s chin, his voice dropping to a deeper tone. “Don’t tease my little brother like that, sensei. Not when I want to have all of your attention to myself.”

Midnight seems to blush at that, before she bursts into laughter, jumping off of his lap while she tries to shoo him away with her hand. “Tensei, you’re horrible! ”

“TENSEI!” Yamada calls, his attention drawn to them after Midnight’s outburst. “And you brought the other Iida too!” Yamada glances in 27’s direction before turning back to Provost Piston, clapping a hand on his shoulder. “Jeez, you really are a glutton for punishment. You see enough of us, and we see enough of you at school, so why don’t you hang out with Shinsou for a bit? I’ll be sure to keep this one out of trouble for ya.”

Tensei looks up at Commander Diesel, smiling playfully. “See? I told you not to come. My old friends are now your worst nightmares.”

Tensei smiles widely back in the face of that discomfort. “I’ll make sure to meet your friend before I leave. Now, go have fun with kids your own age.”

Piston doesn’t react to Tensei slapping the back of his hand into his stomach, and seems to be avoiding looking directly at 27 while he approaches. But when he comes close, he smiles widely, in a way that 27 wishes were fake, but he knows it isn’t. It’s too similar to the one his brother has. “How are you enjoying the festivities, Shinsou?”

He doesn’t have a hat. 27 fixes that for him with his own, popping the string under his jaw a bit farther back than necessary, because he’s had to answer that question all night. And now he has to pull out the phone to answer Piston. “ Fi-ine. Do-on’t take tha-at off. Punishment ga-ame. ”

“I’m very aware,” Piston says, his tone oddly grave as he recalls something that must have been unpleasant to endure. He begins picking at the string as well, proving that it’s uncomfortable, though no one else seems to mind it.

Piston keeps looking at him as though to say something else, but never does. He shuffles awkwardly to 27’s side, and they both keep watch over the party. Piston doesn’t seem to be trained well for surveillance, he stares dead ahead and never checks the entrances. That’s surprising. With his quirk, build, and personality, he would be a good fit for bodyguard jobs.

“Eri seems to be enjoying the activities,” Piston says, his hand chopping in her direction.

There seemed to be a game made up with the few chairs that were available in the room. While the music played, the players paced around them, but when it stopped, they vied to gain a chair for themselves, resorting to trickery and physical violence to assure their win. Eri seemed to be unaware that the heroes not only weren’t taking her seriously as an opponent, but were ensuring that she always found a chair. She almost lost a few rounds before a hero either toppled themselves out of their chair, or were forced from it by a subtle attack from their colleagues.

He’s trying to keep his attention on that game, because even if the heroes didn’t intend to injure

Eri, she's less than half their size and a few of them could step on her easily. But Piston's nervous fidgeting and stilted arm movements are distracting him.

"You-u don't ha-ave to sta-and guard, Muffler."

Piston startles, his hands flying up before he adjusts his glasses and hat in turn. "I'm not standing with you to keep watch over you, Shinsou, though I can see where you might have gotten that impression. I simply seem to be at a loss to find a topic of conversation that isn't related to school matters, or wouldn't be considered prying, or otherwise unenjoyable for--"

"You-u talk a lo-ot. You-u sign mea-aningless things." It was a little amusing to translate his hand movements, even if 27 knew he didn't know JSL. 'Cut from you there to there cut' was a nonsense sentence that came up often.

"I have heard that same sentiment often, though I hope that those signs aren't insulting, as that wouldn't be my intention at all. I have considered learning JSL, but I believe that I may be ill-suited for it," Iida says, 'Cut cut from to from to cut from,' he doesn't intend to say. "It's a very difficult habit to break." 'Cut.'

27 didn't mean that he should stop. "It's amu-using."

Iida rubs the back of his neck, and 27 makes a note of how easy it would be to bully him, if the opportunity arose. "I'm curious about your progress towards the name sign for Aizawa-sensei."

27 tried to hide his glare as he noticed how stilted and awkward Motorist's words were. It was familiar. "A-are you mo-ocking me?"

His panic was amusing enough to ignore it. "That was not my intention! I noticed - or rather, assumed that questions seemed to bear a different meaning or connotation, or rather--"

"It's fi-ine." Piston was getting a bit too loud, and could draw unnecessary attention to them. "I-I'm worki-ing on it."

He still wasn't comfortable with it. Even if he knew his quirk wouldn't rise, couldn't activate through a phone or sign, there was still a sting of apprehension every time he asked a question. But he had to overcome that, he had to become less odd to these underlings so that they would be less fascinated by him. They would ignore him a bit more.

But he still needed them for some things. "You-u know Aiza-awa be-etter than the o-others."

Piston seemed to freeze up at that, tucking his hands into his pockets before they inevitably sprang out when he began talking. "I would prefer to avoid any suspicion that my position as class president was due to any improper relationship between myself and Aizawa-sensei, as there hardly is one. He and my brother were classmates, and they remained friends after graduation, but I've hardly met with Aizawa-sensei outside of gatherings such as this one."

27 was starting to feel his eyes glaze over. Useless information. Apparently, he needed to be direct. "Te-ell me somethi-ing the chat di-idn't. I ne-eed the seco-ond si-ign."

Piston cupped his chin, hopefully firing on all cylinders to give him something useful. "The second sign is meant to encompass Aizawa-sensei's personality, or the manner in which you relate to him. I don't believe I have much to offer in that regard, but my peers didn't mention that Aizawa-sensei can be quite passionate about the philosophy and ethics of his profession as a hero. He has a unique, if not blunt opinion that the entertainment aspect of the pro-hero industry is detrimental to the profession as a whole, which I and many others can agree with to a degree."

All that Piston could tell him was that his owner was a hero. As if that wasn't the first thing that his owner told him, as if he couldn't tell by his job as a teacher at a hero school, or the fact that this room was full of heroes. And that he had opinions about the ethics of being a hero, as if 27 didn't sit in that class almost every day listening to them.

Hero.

‘ Zawa Hero. ’ It didn't fit, at all .

It didn't flow, it didn't have meaning or cleverness. His owner wasn't a ‘murmuring hero,’ and he didn't seem to be a hero at all. Heroes had patrols, 27 knew that because The Miasma liked to sell that information, but his owner didn't leave the dorm often enough for him to have one. Heroes had merchandise and fans and gaudy, eye-catching costumes to bring more attention to themselves, and his owner had none of that.

27 has been trying to piece out more about his owner through other people's eyes, because if this party has taught him anything, it's that his inability to read his owner is intentional. He has tells with everyone else. They're small but they're there, but not with him. Not to him.

He doesn't know anything about his owner, and it's intentional. His owner is guarded around him, withdrawn in a way that's different from indifference, which is a far more familiar play. His owner doesn't want to share anything with 27, and hardly wants anything from him, but he needs his owner to want something from him. To be pleased by something.

‘ Hero. ’ The enemy of a Number, of a yakuza, of a criminal or villain. His owner knows enough of what 27 did to know that he's at least a criminal and yakuza. His behavior towards 27 is normal, it's almost kind that he isn't crueler, that he hides his animosity behind neutrality. It's a play to make 27 talk, to tell him about The Miasma. It's necessary, and that's the only reason that they live together.

‘ Hero. ’ To people like Eri, heroes are something different. They're saviors, rescuers. A childish wish and a childish dream, and 27 has never been cruel enough to take those things from her. She enjoyed living with heroes, being surrounded by them, and probably felt a bit awed by them at times. By their sincere smiles and affection, all of which she deserved in greater measure than 27 could give her.

‘ Hero. ’ The heroes saved Eri. He couldn't deny that. They did in two weeks what 27 had been struggling to do for years. Even those untrained children, even Floaty , had been a part of the operation that ended the 8 Precepts of Death. That had taken Chisaki down.

His owner was part of that operation as well.

His owner was honest with others and dishonest with 27. He smiled then turned into a blank face. He was clear with his expectations, then gave 27 none. He wanted nothing to do with 27, but the police wanted him to make 27 talk, and that was the only reason that they tolerated each other and ignored how unnatural it was for a criminal to live with a hero.

His owner was a hero that saved Eri, and 27 had never given him any gratitude for it. Never acknowledged it.

And this was a way to do that.

‘ Zawa Hero. ’

It didn't fit, it didn't flow, and it wasn't clever. But it was honest, it was the most honest sign he could come up with. Whether it was a line drawn in the sand, an admission that 27 knew another piece of the game between them, knew that the boundaries of it had only drawn tighter and the prize he still sought to win further away, that kind of honesty could be dishonest in its interpretation.

And 27 wasn't too prideful to steal another foothold from Eri when he wasn't stealing it in the first place.

Aizawa had pretended to be a happy birthday boy until he was counting down the minutes until midnight.

He had endured this horrible, uncomfortable day with uncomfortable obligations and unnecessary attention, and for the sake of his wards, he had endured. But he knew that this day wasn't over yet, even if the most difficult parts of it were.

Eri's insistence to keep her party hat on for the rest of the night made his efforts worthwhile, and he was eager for her gift rather than dreading it, even as she seemed nervous to present it to him. She kept shifting from one foot to the other, her picture hidden behind her back while her bright red eyes sent a plea for him to be pleased by her efforts. He didn't need to see it to know that he would be.

"Happy birthday, Zawa! I really really really hope you like it," Eri said as soon as Hizashi had lit the final candle on the cake that Toshinori had made. Her eagerness had allowed him to avoid yet another round of singing, and that enough was a gift.

"Thank you, Eri," Aizawa answered, taking the picture to find that it was actually a card, the third one that she had ever made for a hero. But the front of it wasn't a portrait of himself in his hero costume, not like the ones that Midoriya and Togata had received.

His eyes were red, but his hair was in a ponytail, his stubble drawn around a smile that everyone else in the picture was wearing. Hizashi's hair was braided, and Eri was wearing the cat-themed outfit that he had bought for her when she was discharged from the hospital, further evidence in his ongoing argument with Hizashi that she liked it. She liked it enough to draw Shinsou wearing it as well. There's an abundance of cats drawn in every available space around them. Some are just faces or vague shapes, but four of them are black, white, yellow, and purple, hovering in the air over the heads of the people they were meant to depict. His cat is better than Hizashi's, in his opinion.

He opened the card to read her letter, and wasn't prepared for what it said.

'Happy birthday Zawa! I'm really glad that you were born, so I could meet you and live with you! It's the favorite part of my whole life, and I'm so happy that you saved me and Twenny. You're one of the best heroes in the whole world, and I hope you have a lot of happy birthdays, because you deserve all of them, and I'll work hard to make sure that all of them are the best, and that you get red velvet cake every year! - Eri'

Aizawa ignores the flicker of anxiety that rises when he remembers that they haven't told her that her wardship wasn't permanent. It's a conversation that they should have, eventually, but he refuses to venture down that line of thought, and couldn't even if he tried.

She returns his smile when he looks at her, and that is another gift that he treasures. "This is the happiest birthday I've ever had. Thank you, Eri."

She clings to his leg before he pulls her into his arms, holding the card out for her to point at the cats that she worked hard on, and the stipple technique that she learned from Bakugo. He praises all of her efforts, and she beams at each remark he makes, but neither of them mention the red eyes.

It's another conversation that they don't need to have right now.

When Eri runs out of steam, Hizashi catches his eye and looks to Shinsou, who has been watching Eri's presentation with a rare and unguarded smile. It fades when he realizes Aizawa is looking at him, the corner of his mouth pulling in a flash of nervousness that still remains in his slightly raised eyebrows when he lifts to sign. ' Happy Birthday Zawa Hero. '

And that was a gift that Aizawa did not expect.

From the corner of his eye, he can see that Hizashi didn't expect it either, which is surprising. He had thought that Hizashi had been the mastermind of this entire operation, and had been more than a bit uncomfortable with suggesting to his wards that they owed anything to him today. Especially Shinsou.

But if Hizashi was surprised, that meant that this was an honest effort on Shinsou's part to connect with him. This name was what Shinsou honestly felt towards him. Shinsou thought that he was a hero, in a way that the word didn't convey as well as the sign did when used in a name sign.

Aizawa was honestly a bit overwhelmed by the implications of it. That he was a hero to Shinsou, in whichever way he meant that. And none of those interpretations had anything to do with him being a stand-in for Chisaki.

"Thank you, Shinsou," Aizawa answered, because he had to answer with something even if he couldn't find the words to say what he felt at that moment. "I truly appreciate that."

Hizashi only let the silence hang for a moment before he jumped in, as he always did to fill what Aizawa couldn't. "Don't tell me that I have to wait until my birthday to get a name sign! It's almost a year away, and I can't wait that long!"

' Current Loudspeaker. '

"No! I - ugh," Hizashi sighed, slumping over in an exaggerated fit and missing the flicker of a smirk on Shinsou's face. He rose to level a jealous glare at Aizawa, which he met with a very smug grin. "Blow out your candles and make a wish, so you can finally stop being younger than me."

"That's not how it works, cradle robber," Aizawa teases, and asks Eri to help him blow out his candles, taking advantage of her proximity to let her practice before her own birthday.

He's rarely made a wish on his birthday. Even as a child, he knew that it wasn't rational to expect them to come true, and on the birthdays that he did, he's never made one for himself. This birthday is no different.

He wishes that Shinsou still believes in heroes, in whatever way he sees them. That he could meet whatever expectation that his name sign has placed on him.

Even if the investigation wouldn't make that easy for him.

Birthdays began and ended at the stroke of midnight, and this one was no different.

Hizashi checked his phone while he was in the shower, and he doesn't need to read it to know what the message likely said. It was in the tenseness of his husband's shoulders, the furrow of his brow, and the devastated look in his eye.

'Chisaki's lawyer accepted the deal. We have until Friday to come up with something better. - Naomasa.'

Vent Day & Missing You

Chapter Summary

Aizawa tries to take action before The Commission's plans come to fruition, but separating Shinsou and Eri for the school day results in consequences far beyond what he could have predicted.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Concerns for self-harm, Gory imagery

Previously on Wards of UA: The night prior, Aizawa was given a sign name (Zawa Hero) from Shinsou, and found out from Naomasa that Chisaki's lawyer accepted a deal. Chisaki had given the police a sketch of the Boss of The Miasma and information that he was an undocumented foreigner. While in police custody, Shinsou didn't give them any information about The Miasma and refused to eat, which resulted in him being force fed. Eri's horn has grown to the point that she needs "Horn Tricks" to dislodge any built up mucus in her horn, otherwise she'll get a horn ache. Aizawa received a book from Ms. Joke, who has had several wardships in the past, that she explained would help him learn to help Shinsou, and that book is about caring for feral cats. Shinsou had hoped in the previous chapter that if he manipulates Yamada and Aizawa into keeping him despite the investigation, that he could become the "family dog." Todoroki has a cat named Soba that Shinsou was scratched by when it escaped into the vents at the 1-A dorm, and Shinsou rescued it. Class 1-A tried to help Shinsou create a name sign for Aizawa, and Todoroki suggested that he use the sign for 'cat' as part of it, since Aizawa likes cats. Todoroki proposed a theory that Shinsou's quirk allows him to turn into a cat, and thus he is part feral cat. After Shinsou arrived to UA, Aizawa told him a little about the security system, and Shinsou wondered to himself if robots answered questions. Part of Shinsou's training at The Miasma was learning to navigate ventilation systems silently, while Bug attempted to scare him. That first night Shinsou was at UA, after Yamada learns that Shinsou stole discounted books from the bookstore, he likens him to Jean Valjean from Les Misérables. The morning that Shinsou asked for coffee, he was intentionally signing when Yamada's back was turned, but Yamada felt bad for not recognizing that Shinsou was trying to communicate with him. When Monoma stole Shinsou's quirk after 1-B's English class, he told Yamada that it was painful to have while it was copied. Bakugo was assigned a project by Aizawa to write a 100 page essay about trauma related disorders. Shinsou revealed in a previous chat that he thinks Bakugo is somewhat like Rikiya, because they both swear. Bakugo is the only member of Class 1-A to reveal the existence of the group chat to Aizawa, and Aizawa asked him to tell him if Shinsou said anything on the chat that could be relevant to the investigation.

Hizashi still didn't agree with him.

"Shou, I know you want to make progress, and I want that too," Hizashi insists, beginning a braid just to unravel it again, even though he's already arranged for his classes to be covered and wouldn't have enough time to fix his hair even if he didn't. "But I think we should put some distance between what happened last night and the investigation. It's - how do you think he's going to take that?"

"He might feel obligated to answer," Aizawa admits, even if he hates that he's resorting to this. "And we need him to."

The time that Hizashi wanted to give Shinsou was the time that Aizawa needed to verify any information he gained from him. He wanted anything, anything credible and actionable, but he hoped that Shinsou would give him the information that Chisaki claimed that he would, to shut that down any chance that the mobster had of reducing his sentence.

Aizawa knew that wasn't Chisaki's true aim, and Naomasa knew it as well. Even The Commission couldn't be so blind, but they acted like they were to expect this 'formal apology' to be anything more than a ploy to force Shinsou into the same room as that monster. Chisaki's real goal was to amuse himself by digging into Shinsou's wounds before they had any time to heal. To take power over Shinsou again as a brief reprieve from his powerless confinement.

Hizashi knew that too, had called it out immediately, but when faced with their plan of action to avoid it, he wavered. "And will keeping him out of school until he talks make him feel more 'obligated?' "

Isolation was one of the kinder tactics at play here, but it wasn't entirely for the investigation. Aizawa turned to his husband, taking in the irritation, the frustration, and the way it was folded neatly into a glare meant for someone else, but was aimed at him. "Hizashi. I don't know what Shinsou will see when I show him this picture. I don't know what this man has done to him, and I don't know how Shinsou will react. But whatever comes of it, I don't want my students to be involved."

Hizashi glares at the sketch in his hand, the real target of his animosity, but not the sole one. It forces Aizawa to admit what he wanted to leave unspoken.

"And I don't want him to be left alone afterwards."

Hizashi nods slowly, understanding that at least. He needed to be the one to stay here with Shinsou. He needed to be the caretaker to his ward, to protect him even from himself, while Aizawa dealt with the atypical aspects of this case.

Heroes weren't meant to be part of the investigation like this. They were only meant to protect, to offer sanctuary, and leave investigating to the police. But Naomasa knew before he began looking for a wardship designation that Shinsou couldn't be afforded that separation, not when he had shut down time and time again at the hands of the police. After what they did to him, necessary or not.

Aizawa feels a bit more sympathetic towards Sansa when he walks to Shinsou's room, to do something harmful, but necessary.

Hizashi tries to make it easier for him, distracting Eri with getting dressed before she's awake enough to notice that he's not Present Mic today, or that it's unusual for Aizawa to be awake yet. Shinsou doesn't.

' Good morning Zawa Hero, ' Shinsou signs, his expression blank, his eyes still a bit unfocused from waking up.

Aizawa doesn't think he will see that name sign again. "Good morning. Come with me to the office."

He doesn't look behind him as they walk down the hall, but he notices that Shinsou's footsteps start to become lighter and harder to detect. He wonders if the abrupt change in routine has called up his training instinctively, or if he hadn't noticed that Shinsou was a bit less guarded in the morning. If the edges of his training chipped away when he wasn't there to see it.

Shinsou watches him close the door behind them, and only sits when Aizawa prompts him to. Aizawa keeps the sketch folded in his hands, half hopeful that the reveal could startle Shinsou into telling him what he needs to know, and half to put off the inevitable. "I know this will be difficult for you, but I need you to tell me who this man is."

As much as he wanted to believe that Chisaki had nothing of substance to offer, Shinsou's stock-still and naked terror was the most damning confirmation he could have asked for. His eyes are wide, locked on that picture, fingers curling into fists that only grow tighter, knuckles white. He keeps track of Shinsou's breathing, hopes it doesn't stop and slow, hopes that his eyes remained focused, present.

"He's someone you know," Aizawa says. He has to walk a thin line here, unable to say anything to lead Shinsou and compromise the evidence, yet he knows that Shinsou won't answer without prompting. "Shake your head or nod."

Shinsou's eyes flicker up to him, a silent parting of his lips twisting his expression into a flash of betrayal. Aizawa expected nothing less, and also expected that shaky, dishonest denial.

"The organization that Naomasa is investigating," Aizawa says, placing the sketch on the corner of the desk, still visible to Shinsou. He watches his violet eyes follow it, hopes that he'll give him something he can use about that man, to take that option away from Chisaki. "Is still active. Still hurting innocent people. I need you to give me information to stop them."

Shinsou doesn't shake his head, only moves it to the side once, just barely. This is a tactic that Aizawa will regret taking, even if it proves to be effective. Even if he needs it to be to save Shinsou from Chisaki.

"Tell me the name of the person who runs it."

Shinsou was trained to follow orders. He does anything resembling one, from anyone, even Eri. There's a clear fight behind his eyes, because Aizawa knows that he was trained not to give that information away. It might have been brutal, it might have been drilled into Shinsou deeper than any other order that he was given, but Aizawa is trying to make himself into a greater threat than what the teenager in front of him fears.

He knows it's not working, which only makes it harder.

' I don't know .' Shinsou's hands are shaking, stuttering through the sign. He looks at Aizawa again, betrayal turned to desperation, but Aizawa can't let up. Can't listen to the voice that tells him to give up, and let Shinsou keep some form of peace and sanctuary until it's torn away by Chisaki's hands again.

"Tell me where the organization's base is." Shinsou's hands lift to repeat the sign, but Aizawa can't allow that. "I know that you know that, Shinsou."

His tone is too sharp, and he knows that, but he needs to play on anything available to him, even if it's as instinctive as wanting to avoid disappointing him. He knows that it's likely deeper than that for Shinsou, but he refuses to acknowledge it. He needs Shinsou to give him something, anything better than what Chisaki has to offer.

But he went too far. Shinsou's hands lower, not into fists but to curl around his own wrists, fingers at the ends of one of his scars. He knows that this line of questioning is over now, Naomasa told him that this is a warning sign.

Shinsou will dissociate, badly, if he presses any further.

"Hizashi will be staying here with you today," Aizawa says, standing and leaving the room before he tells Shinsou that it will be the same every day after that, until he gives them information or Friday comes.

He doesn't need to tell Hizashi how it went. His husband just frowns and keeps an eye on the door to the office. The office doesn't have any instruments that Shinsou could use, but if he leaves to go to his room, Hizashi will have to follow him.

The lie they end up telling Eri is that Shinsou has a project to work on with Hizashi, and he can't go to school until it's completed. She's clearly not pleased with that, kicking her feet under the table while she glances at the office, and when it's time to leave, he should have been better prepared to stop her from bolting towards it.

"Twenny!" Eri calls, running to place her hands on Shinsou's knees. If there was a moment before Shinsou smiled at Eri and curled a hand around her shoulder, where he still wore the terror that Aizawa had left him in, neither he nor Eri saw it. "You've got to be a really good helper today, so you can go to school with me tomorrow, okay?"

"I'll do my best," Shinsou says, the clench of his jaw afterwards a crack in the deception he's created for Eri's sake. "Horn trick."

Eri sighs in resignation as Shinsou pulls a tissue from a box on Hizashi's desk for her. The only time that Shinsou acknowledges Aizawa is to glance at him before he begins the process, his expression blank, but less guarded. He taps a spot between two ridges of her horn before he flicks it, and Aizawa nods his understanding.

He's not surprised that Shinsou would ignore what happened earlier to make sure Eri would be taken care of in his absence.

In this, they were in perfect agreement. Eri wasn't aware of the investigation, and she shouldn't be. Shinsou was a skilled enough actor to keep up the illusion, Aizawa was as well, and he hoped that Hizashi wouldn't slip too often into the Present Mic persona to become one.

Because Aizawa knew that the moment that Eri knew what was going on, he wouldn't be able to continue the investigation.

He could only afford to be a villain in Shinsou's eyes.

Yamada might have messed up, but he still wants to blame Shouta.

After Shouta and Eri left, Yamada tried to get Shinsou to eat, to try to pretend that this could be a normal day. Shinsou was quiet, too quiet, just staring at his plate while he left Yamada too much room to ramble. Yamada couldn't deal with silence, he always tried to fill it, especially when the atmosphere was that heavy.

But he knew that rambling wouldn't help Shinsou, not when he looked so heartbroken. Not when Yamada knew that the timing couldn't be crueler, for Shouta to pressure him the morning after Shinsou had given him a name sign, a name that he knew the kid had worked so hard on. Shinsou had put his heart into it, when Yamada had only meant for him to create a sign to make fun of Shouta's hero name.

He thought it might help to explain it, to tell him that Shouta didn't want to do that. That he was still trying to be a hero for Shinsou, that he was trying to save him from Chisaki again.

“ The people in charge of the investigation made a deal with Chisaki, and it's... We're not going to let it happen. ”

But Yamada kept rambling.

“ Chisaki said he would tell them about the organization if he saw you, and that's why Shou is trying to stop them. If we tell them something - anything! Then Chisaki can't do that, they won't let him, and that's why- “

‘ I want to. ’

Shinsou signed that he wanted to meet with Chisaki. Yamada had still been trying to find the words to say to that, something other than, ‘No, you don't and I won't let you,’ when Shinsou left to go to the bathroom. Yamada followed to the hall, just to make sure that he wasn't going to his room, to tell him that he would have to give up the knives or find another room to do some well-deserved sulking in, but he was distracted by a text message from Toshinori. And he didn't see Shinsou sneak into his room.

And into the vents.

He noticed the bathroom door was open, and only knew that Shinsou was in the vents because he caught him pulling the cover into the opening to flip it upside down so that it didn't fall off. And no matter how long he spent talking to his ward, trying to convince him that this was unnecessary and a little dangerous, considering that the heat was turned on, it didn't matter.

His ward was in the vents , and it was all Shouta's fault.

And Shouta, again, was completely unhelpful.

Shou: Will ask Nezu to block access. The book from Joke isn't helpful, Shinsou isn't food motivated.

Yamada had stared at his phone for a while after reading that text message, struggling against the urge to throw it at something. Shinsou wasn't a cat stuck behind a dresser, he was a scared kid who had his heart brutally torn out when Shouta interrogated him about the Nomu Organization. And if his fragile trust in heroes had survived that, Yamada had surely crushed it by telling him about what The Commission was planning to do with Chisaki.

That's why he's not surprised that coffee doesn't work either, even if he desperately wanted it to.

Yamada fucked up, he knows that now. He knows that he should have just tolerated the silence, should have kept his mouth shut for once instead of forcing Shinsou to retreat even further. He has no idea how to fix it, what he could possibly do to convince Shinsou to come down, to be able to look at his ward and make sure that he's alright.

But Yamada knows someone that might know the answer, and he hopes that he can catch her before she goes to work.

And he hopes that when he comes back to Shinsou's room, the coffee mug that he leaves on his desk might be a little less full.

27 holds Mocha tighter against his face, and doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

He was so stupid. He wasn't good at this game, he wasn't good at any of his games, and he shouldn't have tried. He should have known better. He should have known.

A family dog. It was unnecessary. They didn't want one. They didn't want him. They wanted information. That's all anyone wants, information or a job. It's all he's good for.

He was so stupid. He thought he could be like Eri, that they could look at him like that. That he could make them see him that way, or something similar. He thought that he could stay here, he thought he could win this game.

He was a Dog. He was a Number. He wasn't Eri. He wasn't even human.

He used to be. He used to be a stupid little boy who cried into a cat plushie just like this, just like he is now. He doesn't remember how Mocha used to smell, but it wasn't lavender like this Mocha. Whenever he tries to remember the real Mocha all he thinks of is burning plastic and cotton, the ash turned acrid in a way that lingered in his room for days. They left the ashes and he kept them, more than once he wanted to eat them just to have a piece of Mocha that they couldn't take from him.

He'll lose Mocha again when they find The Miasma. Even if he doesn't tell them anything, it's only a matter of time. They know what Boss looks like, even if they don't know his name, and 27 doesn't know it either. They don't know where The Miasma is based, and neither does he. If that's all they wanted to know, then he knows that they're getting close. If those are the only pieces they're missing, they know too much already, and his time is short here.

50 didn't know that she was going to die. If she did, she might have told him. If she told him, he doesn't know if that would have made it easier. He probably would have broken down and cried. He would have made it harder for her to bear it, to waste what little time she had watching him cry when he couldn't even tell her how he felt about her.

He doesn't know if he should tell Eri.

He pushes his face against Mocha hard enough to remind him not to breathe, not to make a sound. He wants to scream, he wants to kick and thrash, but he keeps his muscles tightened against it. He knows better than to do that.

He doesn't want Eri to carry that weight. He doesn't want her to remember him, to think of him like he thinks of 50. He doesn't want to haunt her dreams like that, to be the ache in her chest every time she remembers.

He should have told her that he was a Dog. That he was trash, he was useless. Everyone else did, everyone told her. He should have been a Dog to her, but he wasn't, he couldn't have been even if he tried.

He was Twenny, and she needed Twenny. But he doesn't want her to miss Twenny.

He hopes that she forgets about him. She's still young enough to be able to. She'll grow up surrounded by heroes, by people who smile at her and dote on her far better than he can, and she'll grow up smiling. She'll forget about the time that she didn't, and she'll forget about him.

She'll forget about Chisaki too, and 27 wants that.

He wants to forget about him too.

If he sees him, he'll know that it's different. He's not his Dog, that tag was taken off of him. The pieces of the 8 Precepts still inside him can be ripped out, and that can be the last thing that Chisaki can take from him.

He'll scream into that impassive face that told him to bark. He'll grab Chisaki's mask and show him how he could have taken him down in every single match that he faked to lose. He'll tear him up the same way Chisaki tore into him, and the same way he tore into Eri with The Chair.

27 doesn't care what happens to him after that. The Miasma can have their blood, but 27 wants to have his first.

But he needs to make sure that Eri's taken care of. He knows that the heroes won't hurt her, but they don't know how to take care of her. She still needs him for that, and he needs to make sure that she doesn't.

He needs to do a lot of things, but first he needs a distraction. Something to clear his head, to stop his nerves from running wild under his skin, from the ache in his chest. A distraction will calm him down, settle him back into his own skin, and the heroes always give him one.

27 wipes his tears away, frowns when he realizes that he can't blow his nose, that he'll have to breathe with his mouth until his nostrils clear. He pulls out his phone and ignores all the messages until he reaches the bottom.

Ashi: @Shinny are you sick????

Genesis: Eri said that he's working on a project with Present Mic-sensei.

Sparky Boiii: Sounds fake, but ok.

Crimson Boiii: Yeah he was ok yesterday so he shouldn't be sick today

#1 Eri Enthusiast: We should send someone to check on him after school! Who makes the best soup?

Shitsou's Reaper: ME. I'LL CLEAR THE FUCK OUT OF YOUR SINUSES YOU WEAK TWIGGY BITCH.

Ya Good Boiii: My intestines still haven't recovered, and it's NOVEMBER.

InvisiCutie: The air in the dorm was literally too spicy to breathe

Slappy Tail Boiii: I have a family recipe that works for any illness, but I'm not sure if we have all the ingredients at the dorm.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: Ojiro can cook, Bakugo CANNOT be allowed in the kitchen. Izuku says he can go grocery shopping. Who wants to come with me to drop it off?

Ashi: MEEEEEEE!!!

Soba Boiii: My right hand is a good fever reducer.

Soba Boiii: And I have pictures of Soba that are full of #healing #energy.

Shitsou's Reaper: THAT FURBALL WILL MAKE SHITSOU PUKE EVEN MORE, ICYHOT BASTARD.

Soba Boiii: Take. That. Back.

Pastry Boiii: Pas encore....

Mysterieux Boiii: DO NOT. TELL ERI. I'M SICK. 1. I'm not. 2. I will kill each of you slowly and you will feel nothing but pain every second of it.

Sparky Boiii: bad vibes

Mysterieux Boiii: Eri is afraid of me getting sick. If you scare Eri like that, you deserve what's coming to you. And it will be coming to you. By me.

Sparky Boiii: bad vibes intensify

Sweet Boiii: Soooooo you're working on a project with Present Mic-sensei?

Mysterieux Boiii: Sure.

Shitsou's Reaper: LISTEN YOU VAGUE ASS PIECE OF SHIT I DON'T CARE HOW MANY TIMES I HAVE TO TELL YOU, BUT ANSWER. THE FUCKING. QUESTION.

Mysterieux Boiii: I did. :-)

Ya Good Boiii: shinsou please don't you're not at school but we're all going to suffer Palpitation Projector: Is it for his radio show? Tell him to stop playing Morrissey before I kick him in the face.

Mysterieux Boiii: It's not. Kick out his legs first, his face is a high target to reach.

Palpitation Projector: Noted.

Genesis: Eri is working on her math workbook right now. I'll be able to help her if she has any questions.

Mysterieux Boiii: If she starts looking around and playing with her pencil, she has a question. She doesn't always ask.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: awwwwwwww!!!! #bestbigbro

Shitsou's Reaper: IT'S CREEPY AS FUCK DON'T ENCOURAGE THAT SHIT BOB CUT

Quiet Boiii: She's kicking her feet and hasn't written anything for a while.

Mysterieux Boiii: She's bored. Or irritated by something. Smile at her if it's one kick.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: What does one kick mean?

Mysterieux Boiii: It's a test. Just do it.

Pure Boiii: What name sign did you make for Aizawa-sensei? Did he like it?

Mysterieux Boiii: Skip.

Ashi: Shinny ;:_;

Ashi: I'M GONNA HURT AIZAWA IF HE HURT YOU EVEN IF I DIE

Mysterieux Boiii: Don't.

Shitsou's Reaper: YOU CALLED HIM A FUCKING CAT, DIDN'T YOU? DON'T LISTEN TO HALF N HALF BASTARD, HE DOESN'T KNOW SHIT

Soba Boiii: No. He would have liked it.

InvisiCutie: Did you do something wrong? Are you grounded right now?

Mysterieux Boiii: I don't know.

Genesis: Eri asked how your project is going. Also @Ashido please stop. Shinsou asked you not to act out on his behalf.

Mysterieux Boiii: Tell her it's going well, but it's a lot of work.

Ashi: SENSEI DID SHINSOU WRONG I WANT VENGEANCE

Ya Good Boiii: Ashido you WILL DIE.

Mighty Boiii: Sensei doesn't have his coffee and I don't think he's sleeping, he's just ignoring us. Please stop threatening him.

Soba Boiii: Shinsou, were you acting aggressively? Even if you were, you should only be isolated for a maximum of 30 minutes.

Mysterieux Boiii: @Ashi stop. @Polar Temperatures I wasn't.

Ashi: shinnyyyyyyyyyyy I miss youuuuuuuu so baaaaaaaad

Mysterieux Boiii: Don't. Please just don

Sparky Boiii: Sniped?

Mighty Boiii: Shinsou, are you okay?

Genesis: Eri is very excited to tell you about her day when she returns home.

Genesis: She said she will also take notes for you for Aizawa-sensei's Hero Ethics class.

Genesis: Would you like me to take a picture of Eri and send it to you?

Shitsou's Reaper: INVISIBITCH SNEAK OUT OF CLASS AND MAKE SURE SHITSOU'S STILL BREATHING

Provost Piston: PLEASE DO NOT. Present Mic-sensei confirmed that Shinsou is fine!

Shitsou's Reaper: IT'S A FUCKING LIE THEY'RE DOING SOMETHING TO THE CORPSE FACED LITTLE SHIT. HE HASN'T SAID SHIT IN 15 MINUTES

Mysterieux Boiii: I was counting. Floaty, you owe me 2 questions. Tell me an Eri story. From when I wasn't there.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: Did she tell you about the cultural festival?

Mysterieux Boiii: Immediately. She really liked it. She was really happy.

#1 Eri Enthusiast: @Izuku! You have more Eri stories!

Pure Boiii: The first weekend she was with Aizawa-sensei at the dorm, she seemed really nervous, but she came out when I was cleaning my rabbits' hutch. Midoriya told her she could pet them, and she seemed to really like them! They really liked her too! Snoopy doesn't usually like to be held, but he let Eri hold him, because she called his ear markings cute.

Soba Boiii: I froze my hand while we were watching The Lion King 2. She tried to cover it with a blanket to help. I didn't want to use my quirk to melt it after that, so I let it melt on its own. She's very kind.

Genesis: On her first day of school, she seemed very nervous. Her desk was originally by Aizawa-sensei's, so my stomach must have been very loud for her to hear it growling. I hadn't eaten well the day before, and I had been training my quirk too much that night. She gave me a few of her snacks, even though she seemed too nervous to speak to me. It was very kind of her, if not a little embarrassing for me.

Crow Boiii: Eri and I have shared several apple bunny snacks, but my favorite time with her was during a weekend that Koda's rabbits were in the common room. We both enjoyed treating the rabbits to a delicious delicacy of delight.

Sweet Boiii: The first dorm breakfast that Eri went to, I made apple turnovers and cinnamon rolls. She ate so many that she kind of got a stomachache, but she said that she didn't know which one she liked more, so she kept eating to help her decide.

Pastry Boiii: Eri said that she enjoyed listening to ma ‘pretty words,’ and I tried to teach her a nursery rhyme from my youth in francais. Elle avait l'habitude de taper des applaudissements lorsqu'elle avait mal prononcé, je n'aurais peut-être pas dû la laisser.

Mysterieux Boiii: Mispronounce?

Pastry Boiii: Oui. She claps? Is this a new habit?

Mysterieux Boiii: Don't let her do that.

Mysterieux Boiii: No matter what, no matter what she says, do not let her do that. Stop her. Tell her it's right.

Genesis: We'll make sure to do that from now on, Shinsou. I'm sorry, I thought it was a learning technique.

Mysterieux Boiii: Chisaki made her do it. Don't let her.

Genesis: I'm sorry.

Mysterieux Boiii: It's fine. She looks up to you a lot. She looks up to all of you.

Mysterieux Boiii: Please take care of her.

Mighty Boiii: 1. When Eri was still in the hospital recovering, she checked out a lot of books to read instead of watching TV. There was one that she kind of tried to hide when it was time to return them to the hospital's library, because she said that it was your favorite book to read to her, and she wanted to make sure that she had it when you came back. Aizawa-sensei made sure to buy it for her, and I'm pretty sure she still has it in her room. I wasn't allowed to read it to her, and I don't think Aizawa-sensei was either. 2. Eri asked Togata-sempai if you could be his sidekick, and she drew a picture of you in a hero costume beside him in his. He still has it on his wall, but I'm sure he would give it to you if you asked for it, or if you wanted it. I could ask him for you! 3. Two days before you came to school, she gave everyone a picture of you with reasons why you're a good person and why we should be nice to you on the back. She worked really hard, and not all of them were the same. It must have taken her a long time to make 19 pictures, but she wanted to make sure that you would be okay here. I know it's not really my place to say anything, but Eri really cares about you, even if she was a little angry yesterday. I just think she gets a little overwhelmed sometimes, and it's kind of good that she acts like that now. She was really quiet before. She was really scared, but she isn't anymore, and that's because she has you. You're her hero, and you keep her safe. And I'm really glad you're here for her too.

Shitsou's Reaper: FUCK MIC, FUCK ALL OF THIS, I'M BEATING DOWN SHITSOU'S DOOR TO STOP HIM FROM DOING SOME STUPID SHIT

Provost Piston: Shinsou, please respond.

Mysterieux Boiii: Don't.

Mysterieux Boiii: I'm fine. I'm not doing anything.

Ashi: Shinny, just please tell us what's going on. We're really worried about you.

Crimson Boiii: Dude, just keep talking to us. Please.

Mysterieux Boiii: It's the investigation.

Mysterieux Boiii: I'm fine.

Mysterieux Boiii: They want information. I can't give it to them.

Mysterieux Boiii: I'm not going to tell you either.

Mysterieux Boiii: I don't know how much you'll know, but if I'm not around, take care of Eri.

Mysterieux Boiii: Don't talk about me after that.

Ya Good Boiii: You're talking like you're going to die. Shinsou, seriously, you need to tell us what's going on.

Provost Piston: There's a grace period. You wouldn't be moved immediately. I'm not sure if that's a comfort to you. I'm just. Very sorry.

Soba Boiii: @Iida you're wrong. Shinsou can stay in the vents in my room.

Genesis: We're not supposed to know anything about the investigation.

Sparky Boiii: TRANSFER TO UA THEY CAN'T MAKE YOU LEAVE

Mighty Boiii: We're not going to do that, Shinsou! Eri isn't just going to forget about you!

Ashi: We're kidnapping you.

Soba Boiii: I'm an accomplice.

Palpitation Projector: Consider Mic-sensei's custody fucking terminated.

Mysterieux Boiii: Don't try. It's fine. It will be fine.

Shitsou's Reaper: FUCK. ALL OF THAT. FUCKING FUCK THAT STOCKHOLM BULLSHIT AND TELL SHITSEI AND USE THAT SHIT. FUCKING DUMB FUCK THEY'RE NOT TAKING YOUR DUMB ASS

Mysterieux Boiii: I'm not going to respond, but I'm not doing anything. Don't worry about me.

27 rubbed off the dried mucus, finally able to breathe through his nose. Bakugo had a point.

A stupid one.

It wouldn't work. Even if his owner was pleased that he folded so easily, even if he could tell him anything without falling out of his head, he hadn't made another use for himself. He hadn't been able to make one.

He wanted to stay. With Mocha, with Eri. In this confusing place, a place that didn't have rules or expectations, hardly had any punishments. He wanted to stay here, even if he didn't deserve it.

But wanting never amounted to anything. His games never worked, never amounted to anything. He still kept trying, still too stupid to stop.

But if Chisaki would only talk if he was there, that was a foothold. He could play against it. He could try. Even if it didn't work, he would try.

27 was still too stupid to give up that easily.

Yamada was trying.

His mother hasn't steered him wrong before. Even if she's never had a kid that hid inside a ventilation shaft, Himiko and Jotaro did have a few little 'clubhouses' that he never knew about. She told him it was important to respect the very clear 'keep out' sign that Shinsou had put up, and he quickly realizes exactly why he picked the vents instead of his room.

They've never made a system for Shinsou to allow them into his room. They've just assumed that because he couldn't tell them to come in, that they should just stroll right in, and keep the kid from having any sense of privacy.

It's no wonder Shinsou went right for the vents after that, but he really hopes that this can be just a one-off thing, and that he'll just put a chair under his doorknob next time.

Yamada started off this 'ignore him to invite him in' plan by listening to the playlist that his radio station interns put together, to make sure it flowed and had the right kind of atmosphere he wanted. They added a few songs from the Open Mic Night as a nice tie-in for him to announce what song was Shinsou's favorite, though he hasn't gotten a straight answer yet. He wavers before he takes Denierre Danse off, because even if Shinsou did like it, French might be just a little touchy for a while.

After playing a few moodier songs, he decided to change it up to a playlist he hadn't listened to in years - 'Hizashi's Tear Tracks.' He really thought that was clever when he was a teenager.

The Cure, The Gazette, Depeche Mode, and a hundred other artists combined to make the perfect soundtrack for any broken hearted teenager. It's a little ironic that he would play this for Shinsou to help him through what Shouta did, when Yamada had made it to deal with his unrequited high school crush on Shouta.

He didn't know that it wasn't entirely unrequited until they were in their early twenties, and with hindsight being 20/20, he's a little glad for that. He had been embarrassingly lovestruck, and still a bit too self-absorbed to have really made any relationship between them work. He was too young to take Shouta's reserved nature as anything other than disinterest, or the verbal barbs they still traded as something other than irritation. He would have been a wreck in under a week, while in his twenties, he was able to put up with it for about a month before he broke down and asked Shouta if he even liked him. Shouta might have called him an idiot in response, but he started learning how many ways that Shouta could call him an idiot and still mean it as a term of endearment.

Shirakumo could tell back then. He could smile in the face of Shouta's pouting and egg him on until he smiled. And even if Yamada didn't know how he did it, he was insanely jealous of Shirakumo for doing that. For being the guy that Shouta clearly had a crush on, for being so damn cheerful and sincere all the time. For being the guy that Yamada pretended to be, until he was alone in his bedroom and stuck with himself for a few hours, sulking about all the ways he's not like Shirakumo at all.

He wonders how much of that sincerity was real for Shirakumo, especially when he spends more time with Togata. When Togata was just a student to him, he was almost painful to look at. The class clown, surrounded by people who loved him, hero hopefuls who looked up to him. That cheerful smile that he thought was sincere, he now knows is a mask. If it always was, Yamada never paid enough attention to know it, but he knows it now and often wonders if it was the same for Shirakumo. If Shirakumo just never had the opportunity to let it break, let himself be vulnerable for a while.

Yamada hasn't always been the best shoulder to cry on, and he wouldn't have been for Shirakumo. He just can't stand the silence, can't stand the tears because he starts to cry them too. In a way, it might be better that Shinsou drew away instead of letting him in, because he cares about the kid too much to be able to stand the sight of him crying.

He still wants to comfort him, in any way that Shinsou will let him. Even if it's just being his personal DJ for a while.

Yamada must think 27 is stupid. He knew why he was playing that music, humming along at times. Warming up his quirk.

27 was stupid, he acted before he thought it out. The vents were secure, and he was reasonably sure that Yamada couldn't fit his shoulders through the opening, but he quickly realized that they could be a death trap. If Yamada used his quirk, the sound would ricochet and intensify to cause a great deal of damage without much effort.

27 didn't have a lot to work with, but he fashioned some ear plugs out of the tissues he had in his pocket to protect some of his hearing, though he couldn't do anything to protect the rest of his body. There were rumors that Present Mic could break bones with a single shout, or make an opponent incontinent by hitting a certain note. He doesn't want to find out if they're right with his own body.

It's been nice to not have a quirk used on him for this long.

He found a dead end that might be facing the outside wall, and after staring at the seams of the paneling for too long, he found it a little too tempting to pull out his knife. He knew it was likely reinforced behind the paneling, that there would be brick and cement behind it besides, but there might be a crevice between that where he could hide the things he wanted to lose the least.

Mocha might be safer here than out in the open in his room.

He had managed to pull a corner of the paneling away, just enough to slip the tip of his knife under it, when he hears the scuttling. He turns and realizes that the ear plugs must have been a bit too effective, because the robot has already stopped, close enough to him to raise one of its legs and tap his hip.

Part of its cylindrical body opens up to raise a black rectangle over the dome of its camera, which blinks before words are displayed. 'There is an electrified probe behind that.' 'Powerful enough to kill about 20 men.' 'Please don't test it. :3'

Before the robot can scuttle away again, he grabs it by the thick plastic dome and sets it in front of him, cornering it. After putting the knife down, still easy to reach, he takes out the phone, and starts typing a message in the group chat for Izuku, Piston, and Floaty, before holding it up to the robot. 'How many of you are there?'

':3' The robot displays in return, before its screen blinks again. '346 vent units active.' '267 in reserve.' '124 full size combat units.' '2834 exam bots in reserve.' 'In case of emergency.'

27 nodded to himself, looking back at the phone. The vent units must be for surveillance, and the combat units must be larger and more deadly if only 124 of them were needed. It wouldn't really matter what the exam bots could do, since there were nearly 3000 of them. He finds himself smiling as the robot tilts its display to the side with that same ':3' face. Apparently, robots did answer questions.

And ask them as well. 'Why do you enjoy vents?'

27 frowns, typing out his response. 'Safe. Somewhat. It's not, and I know that. I should probably be afraid of them, but I'm not traumatized. People just think that I am.'

The robot whirs as it settles its body down, legs folding forward. 'Trauma is interesting.' 'Some horrors can be ignored.' 'Some comforts can be frightening.' The robot's screen goes black for a while, and 27 raises a hand to tap it, just in case it goes to sleep like the phone does, but then the screen blinks back to life. 'Would you like to know.' 'This robot's opinion?'

27 nods. He's already asked the Internet, so he might as well know what the robot thinks about what Eri is dealing with.

'Familiar horrors are comfortable.' 'New ones are not.' 'But they are in time.' 'Because it's the only.' 'Way we can go on.'

27 runs a hand through his hair, trying to brush away the trickle of sweat. This robot might be right. Eri had probably been terrified after she was rescued, especially without him there to protect her. Even if she hadn't needed it, she knew that he was safe for her to be around. Even if that wasn't true, even if he had abused her with his quirk, he was -

He was a familiar horror.

It was good that she had the heroes. Even if she was scared of them at first, they weren't horrors. They were the way for her to go on.

He still wanted to be there, even if he didn't deserve it. He probably shouldn't try, it would probably be better for Eri if he gave up. He should let his owner win. Let his owner and Chisaki win.

She'll forget about him sooner, easier, he'll be less to remember, the more pieces they cut him into to dispose of him. Just like all Numbers ended up. Cut into pieces, his fingers chopped at each knuckle, then the wrist, then the arm-

27 jerks his arm back when he feels cold metal on his hand, elbow hitting the paneling with a thud. He stares at it, horrified that he had given his location away so easily, so stupidly, rookie mistake and he was trained out of that, before he glares at the robot.

The robot rises up, withdrawing that thin metal arm that touched him into its body. ‘Your temperature is elevated.’ ‘Heat stroke is inevitable.’ ‘5 hours or so.’ ‘I would suggest trying.’ ‘A new horror beforehand.’ ‘:3’

He tries to catch it when it leaps onto his shoulder, but his hand is too slick and it scurries away faster than he could chase.

Apparently, robots are also assholes.

Yamada heard the thud, and had to stop himself from going to Shinsou’s room to squeeze himself into the vents to make sure that his ward hadn’t just passed out.

He asked Principal Nezu to turn down the heat for the staff dorm almost an hour ago, and all he’s gotten in response is that ever-terrifying ‘:3’ face. As much as he doesn’t want to get in hot water with his boss, he definitely needs to make sure Shinsou doesn’t get hurt while he’s sequestering himself in the ventilation system.

He knows he’s supposed to ignore it, that he’s supposed to be calm and inviting and trying to talk to Shinsou before he’s ready will make him less ready to talk. But his ward might be simmering like a little purple sausage in there.

“Shinsou?” Yamada calls, then pulls himself to stand on his computer chair to try to see into the vent, finding it still too high up and completely dark besides. “Hey, I know you don’t want to talk right now, but I just want to make sure you’re alright. Maybe you can clap for me, just so I know you’re okay?”

Yamada shouldn’t have taken his eyes off of him. His ward was in the vents, and it’s winter so the heat is turned up to full blast, and as warm as it is in the dorm, it had to be blistering in that vent. And Shinsou was wearing long sleeves, he might not take his shirt off, and he probably hasn’t drank any water today, or anything really.

His ward is probably passed out in the ventilation system.

He’s just such a good caretaker for that to happen. It’s just fantastic that Shinsou trusts him, that Shinsou has put his faith into him like that. Yamada is just so goddamn equipped to help Shinsou, the best hero for the job, really.

Yamada hears his phone chirp and hopes that Nezu isn’t asking why the Rat Robocops are throwing an error while they examine Shinsou’s unconscious body. But instead, he finds a chat notification.

From his chat with Shinsou.

Jean Valjean: I can’t talk anyway.

Yamada sits down in a huff, running a hand over his face as he tries not to feel so giddy that Shinsou finally used this chat. Because he definitely should have changed his username after the issue with French came up, and it was honestly a bit tasteless when he made it.

But, Shinsou was talking to him. Out of spite, maybe, but they were talking. And that was a good sign that the vent situation might clear up soon, as long as he didn't screw it up.

Current Radio: Sorry! That didn't come out the way I wanted it to. You doing okay though?

Jean Valjean: I'm fine.

Current Radio: I'd turn down the heat if I could, but Nezu controls the thermostat. Are you sure you're okay? Do you want me to bring you some water?

Jean Valjean: I'm not coming out.

Yamada throws his head against the back of the chair. He needs to respect the 'clubhouse,' he needs to be grateful that Shinsou is talking to him. But Shinsou needs to get out of there before he loses it.

Current Radio: That's okay! I just want to make sure you're alright.

Current Radio: Meet any cool robots up there?

Jean Valjean: Not a cool one.

Current Radio: You're okay, right? It didn't hurt you or anything? Those things are kind of dangerous, Nezu kinda went off the rails designing them. I think just one of them could take down 3 of me!

Jean Valjean: Just throw them. They're fast but easily confused.

Current Radio: That might just come in handy one of these days, little listener!

Yamada waited. He ground his teeth, typing out 'Still okay?' just to delete it right after. Shinsou thought the vents were safe, he needed space to decompress, but the vents weren't safe and he just really wanted to see his ward with his own eyes. He just needed to make sure that he was okay.

Current Radio: Whatcha thinking about for lunch? I should probably use the last of the bean sprouts before they start turning, but I don't know what to make

Jean Valjean: I'm not coming out.

Current Radio: I know. I can put it in there with ya! You won't have to come out until you want to. I just want to make sure you get to eat something.

Current Radio: Did any of my tunes catch your fancy?

Jean Valjean: I didn't dislike them.

Yamada frowned. Shinsou was only responding to questions, and with short messages in return. He was probably just pestering the poor kid, who was only putting up with it because he had to. Because he was afraid that Yamada might get angry if he didn't.

Current Radio: That's good! We can just listen to the music for a while, and if you like something, just let me know! I've got some nifty little programs that can pull a bunch of songs together based off of one, and maybe we can find a few more songs you like from that!

Yamada pulled up his own playlists and switched to one dedicated to songs with a heavy bass - 'Can't Hear You.' Whenever he needed a break from his hearing aids but didn't really want to deal with silence, he would drive out of the city and find an empty parking lot, crank up the volume and just let the music vibrate him.

He would have liked to take advantage of the day off to do just that, but he still needed to keep an ear out for his ward. Maybe if Shinsou would come out, he could go deaf for a while so that they could just talk through sign. It might help him remember how it feels to sign to someone's turned back.

After a few songs, he gets a surprising message.

Jean Valjean: Can you play that part again

Yamada does, finding himself a little intrigued to know what the acoustics of the ventilation system made it sound like. Shinsou might be getting quite a show in there.

Current Radio: What's it sound like in there?

Jean Valjean: Can you stop

Ouch. Okay, point taken. Hands off of the clubhouse, stop bothering the poor kid.

Jean Valjean: I didn't mean to send that I'm sorry I don't want to hear this Yamada hits 'skip' immediately, and turns back to his phone. That seemed a little worse than the usual mis-sent message nerves, and he hoped that song wasn't familiar for Shinsou. Dissociation was probably the only risk worse than heat stroke while he was in there.

Current Radio: It's okay!

Current Radio: I send texts too early all the time! One time I tried to tell Shou to pick up some take out because I was about to go into an emergency call and I didn't know how long I'd be incommunicado, but all I sent was 'Pick up.'

Current Radio: So Shou thought I was injured or close to death or something, and he was panicking the entire time! He was searching the city and calling every hospital, trying to find me while I was playing Whack-a-Mole with a gang of tunneling quirks.

Current Radio: Shou was so mad when I finally called him back lol

Jean Valjean: You didn't laugh.

Text rambling got Shinsou all the way back to sass. Yamada couldn't help but smile.

Current Radio: Ya caught me!

Current Radio: So, what's it sound like in there? It's probably got a lot of reverb, so this music must sound pretty neat.

Jean Valjean: It's weird.

Jean Valjean: It's stupid. It sounded

Current Radio: I bet it's not stupid! There was one time that I kind of got a little drunk, and for SOME reason, I wanted to know what chickens hear before they hatch. I'm pretty sure Nemuri was behind it, somehow. But I wound up with eggshells held over my ears while she played the sound of someone's heartbeat, and I don't even remember what it sounded like, but I was crying. And Nemuri was laughing. And Shou recorded the whole thing for blackmail.

He hears a snort from the vent above his head, barely loud enough to hear over the music. He wonders if Shouta still had that video, maybe Shinsou would laugh if he saw it.

Jean Valjean: It's weird. It sounded like my quirk felt.

Oh.

For all Yamada's rambling and wordsmith capabilities, he doesn't really know what to say to that. Shinsou hates his quirk, he hates it enough to reject it completely, probably to the point that it's physically affecting it. Monoma wouldn't have a reason to lie to him.

He knows that Shinsou needs to see a quirk specialist, but that's not going to happen until the investigation is closed. There's a lot of specialists that Shinsou needs to see, and he can't get the help that he needs right now.

He only has Yamada.

Current Radio: It's not weird to me, you know. I think it's kind of cool.

Current Radio: I was just thinking about how I play this kind of music when I take my hearing aids out. I can't hear it, but it feels like I can??? It's kind of hard to explain, but I think you can get it.

Shinsou doesn't say anything for a while, and Yamada wonders if he should ask if he's okay again, just to make sure he responds, but he does.

Jean Valjean: I didn't know you were deaf.

Current Radio: I've got some pretty nifty hearing aids so villains don't find out! lol

Current Radio: But it kind of comes with the quirk, and I was born with mine, so I've been deaf as long as I can remember!

Bringing his own quirk up might not have been the best idea.

Current Radio: What do you want for lunch, zaru soba or hiyashi chuka?

Jean Valjean: Hiyashi chuka

Perfect, out of two cold dishes, Shinsou picked the one with the most vegetables. Not that he ever complained about vegetables, or about anything really, but it was nice that he picked that one.

It was also pretty quick to make, especially after boiling the noodles first then chopping the vegetables and mixing a sauce while he waited for them to cool. Yamada took his time arranging everything in swirls of color, with the pale green beansprouts on top, though it would probably get a little messed up when he set it into the ventilation shaft.

He didn't even think about the door that he left open until he walks into Shinsou's room and sees his ward for the first time since this morning.

Shinsou is hanging upside down from the ceiling, sweating and flushed, and he looks like he was trying to reach for the coffee before he realized that Yamada was standing there. He watches his ward pull himself back up towards the open vent, and the rush of panic knocks him out of his initial confusion.

“Wait, wait! I should’ve knocked, you don’t have to-”

Yamada can’t help the sigh of relief when he sees Shinsou pull himself out of the shaft instead, standing on his chair before he quickly steps down. ‘ It’s fine. I’m sorry. ’

Yamada just smiles, relieved that this is finally over. His ward looks a little worse for the wear, but at least he can see that, at least they’re really talking. “It’s okay, kiddo! Everyone needs some space sometimes, I totally get that. If you want to eat in your room, that’s okay too, and I won’t bother you or anything.”

Shinsou runs a hand over the back of his head before he signs again, still looking a little more guilty than he should be. ‘ Not a bother. ’

And finally , the clubhouse opened up. Shinsou didn’t just want to get out of the vents, but it sounded like he was finally ready to talk. Maybe about what happened, maybe about anything else to distract from that. Whatever Shinsou wanted from him, Yamada would gladly give it. “Let’s see if you’re still singing that tune by the end of the day! Even Shou can’t handle me for too long before I bother him to death, but I was thinking that maybe we could just use sign today, since it’s just us. I’m probably a lot easier to deal with when I’m on mute.”

Goddammit .

If Yamada didn’t have his hands full, he would slap himself. Him and his big mouth got him into this mess to begin with, and even after nearly five hours of wondering if his ward was having heatstroke or not, that just falls right out of his mouth.

Shinsou raises his eyebrows, and Yamada absolutely deserves whatever non-verbal lashing he’s going to get, but instead he sees a flash of a smirk before it goes away. ‘ Rude. ’

“Yep, super rude, I’m going to shut up now,” Yamada swears, setting the cold ramen and water bottles on the desk for Shinsou to decide whether he wants to eat in his room or risk being around Yamada’s big mouth again. “And I’m going deaf in three, two, one.”

The steady ringing of his hearing aids echoed a bit before everything else fell silent, and he couldn’t help but rub the sore cartilage a bit. Powerloader worked wonders with making hero gear comfortable and efficient, but near constant wear still had its drawbacks.

He popped his hearing aids back into their little case and put it in his pocket, before he looked up to see Shinsou still staring at him, eyes widened with a bit of concern.

‘ You don’t have to, ’ Shinsou signed. ‘ I didn’t mean that. ’

‘ It’s fine! I haven’t taken my ears out for a while. It’s nice! ’ Yamada signs back. ‘ Nice to spend day talking with my favorite listener. ’

‘ But not talking, ’ Shinsou signs back, and Yamada is glad that he has his hands free, because even when his mouth is shut, he can still say the wrong thing. He still slaps a hand over it out of habit, but when he does, he realizes that he might have taken his hearing aids out a little too early.

He watches Shinsou laugh, just a smile and huff before he catches himself, and Yamada can’t help but smile behind his hand before he pulls it away. ‘ Stop bullying me! ’

Shinsou absolutely does not , even if he signs that he's sorry. Every little slip that Yamada makes gets called out immediately, and he has to take more than his fair share of ' Now Music ' s and ' Current Radio ' s on the chin.

He definitely regrets giving Shinsou coffee, especially after watching the kid drink it with his hiyashi chuka, which had to be disgusting. And the boost in energy wasn't hindering his ability to come up with bad hero names, at all.

But Yamada was sure this was just the start of a great day off.

Bakugo is just fucking tired. He's ready for this shit day to be over, because then he might be able to sleep for a few fucking hours. He needs a fucking nap, like a fucking toddler, and it's fucking bullshit. Fuck midterms, everyone's all over his ass and he has a lot of shit on his plate to begin with.

Fuck that stupid fucking project Shitsei gave him. It doesn't know shit , none of those books or websites know shit. He's not fucking-

He's not going to sound like fucking Shitsou's dumb ass . But he's not. Fucking. Traumatized.

He got kidnapped, it was fucked up. They didn't actually do shit to him. He might have gotten a little fucked up after All Might retired, but who fucking wasn't? It was All Might . Everyone was pissing their pants at that point, because All Might is fucking All Might , and he's not like that anymore, and it's all Bakugo's fucking fault.

Fuck whoever keeps blowing up his phone. It's probably Kaminari's dumb ass, going apeshit over a new meme or some shit.

But it's not. It's fucking Shitsou going apeshit.

If Eri ever swears I will kill you and no one will find the body: How do you not log off?

If Eri ever swears I will kill you and no one will find the body: You owe me an interview.

If Eri ever swears I will kill you and no one will find the body changed their name to Shit chan

Shit chan: You said something about grounding.

Shit chan: I can't look it up.

Shit chan: I'm in a vent.

Shit chan: Mental quirks don't work on me.

Shit chan: What do you want to know

Shit chan: I don't know what you want to know in exchange.

Ojiro should have broken your neck changed their name to Your fucking therapist, apparently

Your fucking therapist, apparently: CHILL YOUR FUCKING TITS. I've been in class, dipshit.

Your fucking therapist, apparently: Why the fuck don't they have a therapist for you or some shit? I'm not fucking paid to do this

Your fucking therapist, apparently: Fucking avoidance and detraggering exercise bullshit apparently fucking works

Your fucking therapist, apparently: AND WHY THE FUCK ARE YOU IN A VENT?

Shit chan: Explain detraggering exercises in exchange.

Shitty Hair tried to lean over his shoulder to look at his phone, still fucking chewing on a giant fucking meatball sub. "Mrf nrfn t-"

"CHEW," Bakugo growled, putting a hand over Shitty Hair's mouth like he's a fucking toddler who doesn't know how to fucking eat and talk, because he fucking is. He's fucking surrounded by idiots who don't know how to do fucking anything.

Shitty Hair swallows, and his lips do some weird fucking shit that feels way too much like a fucking gay fucking kiss bullshit fuckery, and Bakugo is not fucking dealing with that right now. "You're talking to Shinsou?"

"He's pulling this mafia-ass bullshit from a fucking vent," Bakugo says, typing out instructions on how to not be a weak little bitch for Shitsou. Even if this is not his fucking job, someone needs to do this shit, and just like every fucking thing else, that means it's Bakugo's job.

Sero can't wrap his stupid fucking brain around Pre-Calc? Why go to a real fucking tutor when Bakugo's there! Kaminari and Ashido didn't fucking study worth shit the whole term, but why fucking worry now? Bakugo's there to duct tape them to their fucking desks and pound that shit into their skulls. Headphone bitch keeps fucking "studying" art history with Yaoyorozu, and now she has no fucking idea what their essay is supposed to look like, but hey, Bakugo's there.

His fucking teachers can't be assed to handle Shitsou, and now it's Bakugo's problem. He doesn't know what the fuck they're doing to Shitsou when no one's looking, but if Shitsou keeps coming to him with this kind of shit, he can know they're not doing shit for his fucked up brain problems.

Your fucking therapist, apparently: You do the fucking shit that triggers you when you're all comfy and safe and shit, then stop when it starts to fuck you up. And you fucking do that WITH A REAL FUCKING THERAPIST.

Shit chan: I don't have time to get one.

Shit chan: I needed to get away from Yamada.

Your fucking therapist, apparently: Tell me what the fuck is going on and I'll give you some fucking PTSD hacks this weekend. Deal, fucking yakuza ass bitch?

Shit chan: 1. I need the hacks now. 2. I am a yakuza, you're not insulting me.

Your fucking therapist, apparently: Bullshit, and I'm done fucking around with you. Tell me what the fuck is going on or I'm eating lunch and ignoring your ass.

Shit chan: What is hiashi chuka

Your fucking therapist, apparently: Cold ramen with a fuckton of veggies, the next thing you send better be a fucking explanation or I'm fucking done.

"Dude," Shitty Hair says, way too fucking close to his ear with all the fucking lip sounds and chewing going on. "Does Shinsou not really know what-"

"Fucker lost his shit over a soda, so no, he probably doesn't fucking know what half the shit he eats is," Bakugo answers, tossing his phone onto the table. If Shitsou doesn't fucking respond, he doesn't give a shit. He's not going to give a shit about a guy who thinks he's anything like a fucking villain. Fucker probably talks to him because he's fucked in the head and thinks they're fucking friends or some shit, but Bakugo doesn't give a shit about him.

"Dude, we should order some pizza this weekend! Like, with every topping, so we can find out-"

His phone vibrates and Bakugo snatches it up, and if it's not a straightforward fucking answer, he's skipping next period just so he can throw his phone at Shitsou's face and be done with this shit.

Shit chan: They're taking me to see Chisaki for the investigation, and I can't log out when I see him.

Bakugo shuts off his phone before Shitty Hair can see it, kicks his chair out, and starts walking to the staff room. Shitty Hair still wants to know what Shitsou said, but fuck that.

Fuck that, fuck that, fuck all of this. This is fucked up and if Shitsei doesn't explain this shit or tell him that Shitsou is just being too fucking stupid to fucking compute his real fucking reality, Bakugo will fucking murder him.

Shitsou just better be fucking wrong about that shit, and if Shitsei has any fucking involvement in that shit, he's fucking dead. He fucking knows this shit, he fucking knows what that would do to Shitsou, it doesn't take a fucking genius to know that Shitsou is already crazier than a bag of cats, and no one could handle that kind of shit to begin with. Chisaki is fucking crazy and Deku should have knocked his head clean fucking off and done the whole fucking world a favor for it.

Bakugo kicks the door open, and has to stop himself from murdering the fuck out of Shitsei right then and there, because fucking Eri is crying and she runs up to him, and holds on to his leg. The brat doesn't fucking like him, he fucking gets it, so if she's that fucking upset, Shitsei fucking deserves what's coming to him.

"Ugo, I don't wanna do the horn trick!" Eri says in that whiney, pathetic little voice that's so fucking irritating to hear. It's like nails on a fucking chalkboard, and if murdering the fuck out of someone will get it to stop, Bakugo can and will do that shit.

But she did not just fucking call him ‘Ugo.’ “Did you just fu-frigging call me a ugly freaking boot?”

She just whines and sniffles, and it’s fucking disgusting . She shouldn’t be at school if she’s fucking sick, and fucking Shitsei should know that. She needs to sleep and eat soup and shit, and even if he doesn’t have the fucking time, he’s going to have to make some to cook some bland ass soup she could handle. “Kiri calls you Baku, so I can’t call you that.”

Bakugo rolls his eyes, because this stupid little naming system is fucking stupid, and he doesn’t give a shit about it, at all, because it’s fucking stupid. “Call me ‘Baku.’ If Crappy Hair throws a fit about it, I’ll beat his ass.”

Eri just sniffs again, probably getting snot all over his fucking uniform, but if he kicked her, she’d go flying, so he just has to let this shit happen. Shitsei looks like he was trying to get her to blow her nose or some shit, still holding that fucking tissue in his hand, but he’s so fucking incompetent that he doesn’t know how to get that shit on her fucking nose instead of letting this shit happen to his fucking pants.

Unless he does know, and he’s just being an asshole. “Oi, your fucking mole has some intel, and I’m not talking about it in front of her.”

Shitsei looks at Eri, then tosses the tissue on the desk. “Eri, stay here while I talk to Ugo.” Fucking asshole.

Bakugo can’t fucking move until he does that stupid little pat thing on Eri’s head, even though he’s the only fucking one who doesn’t treat her like she’s a fucking dog, but thanks to everyone else, she doesn’t fucking let go until he does. He follows Shitsei across the room, thinking there’s some secret trapdoor or some shit, but Shitsei just opens a fucking window and hops out, like that’s fucking normal.

Fuck it, they’re on the first floor at least, and Shitsei has some fucking explaining to do.

“What did Shinsou say on the chat?” Shitsei asks, and Bakugo slams the window shut because Eri does not need to hear this shit, if she doesn’t know it already. And if she does, Shitsei’s fucking dead.

“Why the fuck are you taking him to Chisaki?!” Bakugo hisses, trying not to yell because of fucking Eri, and trying not to fire off his fucking quirk because he fucking needs to right now. “He’s bugging the shit out of me from a fucking vent -”

“Who else knows about that?” Shitsei asks, trying to be all commanding and shit, but absolutely, unequivocally, fuck that noise.

“Why. The fuck. Is this happening?” Bakugo asks, and he feels like he’s going to explode. He pops off a few crackles just to stave it off, just so he can breathe , but he’s seeing fucking red. All those whiney ass elementary school counselors would probably shit their pants if they could see how pissed he is now, all that bullshit self-managed anger bullshit they tried to teach him never fucking worked , and it sure as shit wouldn’t do anything now.

Because Shitsei just blinks at him and doesn’t fucking care . He doesn’t give a shit about how fucked up this is, and that’s the most fucked up part about it. He’s a fucking hero , he spews this shit about what heroes are supposed to do every fucking day, how they’re supposed to act, he can’t just fucking let this happen.

“Give me one fucking good reason why I shouldn’t-”

“It’s out of my hands,” Shitsei says, all quiet and shit. “I need you to convince Shinsou to work with the investigation so it doesn’t come to that.”

Bakugo just shakes his head, can’t even fucking look at Shitsei right now. “Fuck you.”

“We both want to stop this-”

“Then stop it!” Bakugo yells, he doesn’t fucking care if Eri hears, if everyone hears, this is just. Too fucked up . He fucking laughs and doesn’t know why, he fucking feels like he’s in a goddamn tailspin, because this is fucking Aizawa-sensei. He could just fucking stop it. “Fuck, why the fuck can’t you just fucking- Why the fuck is it me?! Why the fuck do you think I can do anything?! You’re the goddamn hero! You- for fucking once , just handle this shit for yourself! Fuck!”

Shitsei steps forward and Bakugo steps back, fuck that stupid ass Good Boy Pat, he doesn’t fucking need it, he needs to fucking breathe.

He does, he fucking counts his fucking breaths, he fucking times his fucking quirk, counting and numbers and bullshit that he’s always fucking gotten easier than fucking breathing , and he gets over that shit.

Fuck it. Fuck all these heroes that don’t do shit in the end, and even if he sounds like a villain for thinking that shit, he’s not.

He’s going to be the greatest fucking hero of all time, because he’ll never sit back and watch that shit happen. Shitsou probably won’t listen to a fucking word he says, but even if he literally has to beat the shit out of him, he’ll be better off bleeding than dealing with seeing Chisaki again. Even if he has to pretend he’s friends with the fucking corpse faced dick, he’s not letting this shit happen.

Bakugo opens the window and jumps back through, hoping that Eri didn’t hear his fucking meltdown, but when he looks around to see if she’s hiding under a desk or some shit, he doesn’t see her.

Shitsei’s still trying to get his bony ass back through the window when Bakugo turns around to ask him.

“Where the fuck is Eri ? ”

The day is nice, cloudy and hazy in a way that reminds Aoyama of home. It’s far too nice to spend lunch inside, to miss the slight chill and gray skies, and Aoyama knows that he won’t be missed inside anyway.

Midoriya does invite him to sit with him occasionally, and often Sato will reserve him a seat, but Aoyama knows that neither will miss him too terribly if he instead takes his lunch outside. Even if it is a lonely place this time of year, perhaps it suits him.

Perhaps beautiful days are much like beautiful people, and they must feel lonely at times as well.

But before he selects a seat, he sees that there might be another reason for him to be drawn to the gray sky chill today. He sees that a lonely princess sits high upon her tower, waiting for a shining knight to bring her comfort with his cape.

He has forgotten his, but his blazer will have to do, as something must be done to protect little Eri from this cold and cloudy day. “Mon petit princesse, these tears do not suit you.”

They did not, neither did her trembling lips or worried expression. Whatever foul beast had driven their sweet princess to seek sanctuary alone in a tree outside must truly be a horrible one. “M’ sorry, Yama.”

“Non! I’ll not take an apology when I am owed none!” Aoyama protests, hand on his heart and the other thrust to the sky, challenging the powers above to bear witness to this tragedy. Their sweet princess driven to tears, driven to sniffles and apologies, and the cruelty of it is too much. “Mon petit, you must tell me who has driven you to such loneliness, such sorrow, and the shining hero will rain justice upon them!”

Eri tugs his cape tighter around herself, frowning with such sadness that broke his heart to see. “No one was mean to me. I’m just sad. I just,” Eri’s lips trembled again, tears flowing anew, and Aoyama wished to call Midoriya for aid, knowing that he could stop this sorrow far better than he could. Could bear the sight of it far better. “I really don’t like my-y quir-rk.”

A sob began, but it was a familiar one. A twinge in Aoyama’s chest now sings in bitterness and in hope. In this, he could understand, though he hated to see such sorrow besides. He pulls himself to sit beside his new companion in this familiar pain, tucking his arm around her shoulders to give her a bit more warmth. “That is a thing I’ve often struggled with myself, mon petit. My sparkles were not often kind to me in my youth.”

Eri looked at him, perhaps surprised to know that the bright and shining knight had wounds beneath his armor. It was not a thing that many knew. “But it’s cute. It’s nice. My quirk is bad.”

“Non,” Aoyama whispered gently. “Your quirk is not bad. It is kind, as Midoriya says, but we both know that kind and ‘cute’ quirks may often be hard to bear. Mine brings me pain at times, and embarrassment. I suppose we are not so different in this, though I hate to see you bear it.”

Eri shook her head, pressing her hand to the curve of her horn. Like he thought, these odd little sniffles were to do with it, and his heart ached at the thought. Their sweet princess, and her hidden pain, and what little that could be done about it. “I want to do nice things, and fix Mirio, but it hurts. It hurts and it makes me mean, and it makes me ugly. I don’t wa-ant my-y quirk, Yama-a.”

He brushed at her soft cheeks as the tears fell anew, wishing he had more than pretty words and an ill-fitting cape to offer her. “Mon petit, I will never shame you, but your words are quite wrong. You are our beautiful princess, and your quirk will never change this. If there were a spell that could be cast to save you from your troubles, I would say it, but I only have a song.”

It is a mournful song, a sad one, but the princess he knows likes songs. Especially ones with pretty words, and pretty words do suit her well. Especially these.

“Un cadeau que j’ai apporte des ennuis

Et ils peuvent me faire tomber

Mais je vais briller si brillant et fier

Et donner le meilleur

Le reste je garde et nourris

Parce que c'est la mienne

Et je m'aimerai pour moi

Aimerai mes larmes et fronce les sourcils.”

The tears have stopped, and Aoyama does not know if the sounds are enough to soothe her. If the words may do her well, as they did for him in his youth.

“Ma papa wrote this song for me, for even when I did not like my quirk, I loved songs. It reminded me to love myself, every part, because there is much good that we can do through that. But also because, we must love ourselves, mon petit,” Aoyama says, smiling gently to the little soul who still shines brightly in the darkness. “It is very sad and lonely if we don’t.”

“Yama,” Eri says, wrapping her arms around his stomach. Her little warmth quiets the chill on his arms, and the nervous hope that his words, though not fluent as they never were, were enough. “I don’t want you to be sad and lonely.”

“I am not, mon petit,” Aoyama says, because the truth is not for her ears. It is not for anyone’s ears, not but the ears of his friends that he left at home, the ones who knew his mother tongue, and heard the troubles that he whispered in his room at night.

He wanted to be a bright and shining hero, and UA was the place for that. But a knight’s armor does not always fill a heart that longs for home.

“I am the shining hero, whose sparkling cannot be stopped!” Aoyama declares, his signature pose moves his arms away, but he hopes it inspires the little princess to see that her troubles can be carried on to a bright and shining future. That he had carried his this far.

He earns a little smile, a rare and fleeting thing, and he treasures it all the more from his little princess. “Yama, I like your other smile.”

He gives it to her again, as even if few can see it, his princess deserves it all the more for knowing. “Mon petit, I shall give you this smile always. And whenever your brave heart fails you, I will give you the song to help.”

“Yeah, make him sing it again, Eri,” Jirou says, and Aoyama nearly falls from his perch when he realizes that she has been standing behind him for quite some time. Her soft smile betrays no mockery, her fingers toying with the ends of her ear quirk. “You can actually carry a pretty nice tune. It would have been nice to know that before the festival.”

His princess looks at him with hope in her eyes, but his courage fails him, a rosy blush that does not suit him heating his face. “Non! My songs are meant for only a few, and meant for my mother tongue.”

He hopes that he did not again slip into it as he spoke, as Jirou looks at him with a bit of shock, before it cools into her jovial half-smile. “Still, I think you would have worked into our set pretty well. It would kind of be badass to have a Japanese-French duet.”

Kind words, but there is nothing for it now. The festival has passed, and the stage would have been frightening besides. He still marvels at how Jirou could have bared her heart so bravely, though in singing for Eri, he realizes it was an easier matter. They were meant to be brave heroes, and to sing for a little girl who needed cheer was a heroic task indeed.

“Aizawa-sensei was looking for you, so I think we should probably meet up with him,” Jirou says, and their little princess frowns in worry over what she had done. Aoyama did not even think to ask if she had become lost, too intent to soothe her worries. “But maybe Aoyama can sing for us while we walk?”

Jirou is surprisingly intent upon this, but when their princess asks for it with her shy and trembling words, he cannot refuse. He lifts her easily to settle her on the ground, and his heart is made full and warm as she holds onto his hand, the words of his songs falling more easily, more brilliantly, more bright.

He finds himself wicked and amused by Jirou’s attempt to accompany him in song, her words stilted and clumsy in a way that he has struggled with often. But he finds himself less amused long before they return the princess to her rightful place at their teacher’s side. He finds that he missed hearing those words spoken so close, even if Jirou does not manage them.

That aching feeling reaches a pitch when Jirou mentions that they should practice before next year, as though he has already agreed to the stage, and in this, he finds little protest.

He finds that clumsy words can still be meaningful, and they can brighten a lonely day.

Mirio can be kind of a selfish guy sometimes.

He’s always known he wanted to be a hero, because he likes being the kind of guy that people depend on. As much as he hates seeing people down, he likes being the guy that turns that frown upside down. It’s a great feeling, and one that he can kind of get addicted to sometimes.

Especially with Eri.

Eri is a really sweet kid, and Mirio wants to give her the world, because she honestly deserves it. She’s been through a lot, and if every smile and plushie and game they play together can rewrite her past just a little bit more, he’s more than happy to do it. And Eri has always seemed just a little more comfortable doing those things with him than anyone else, just because he’s never been ashamed to act like a kid or do something embarrassing. It’s even easier with Eri, because she doesn’t have anyone her own age to play with.

But Eri looks so adorable when she tries to act like a high school student, just like she is right now. She’s copying his notes with a purple crayon, eyebrows pinching together with every tricky word she spells out. He’s not really paying that much attention to the lecture, which might come back to bite him on the midterm, but it’s kind of impossible to when Eri is just so cute.

And he’s kind of missed her since Shinsou came to UA.

He and Eri used to be practically attached at the hip, with Aizawa-sensei’s busy schedule and Mirio being more available than Nejire and Tamaki. They had internships, and he didn’t. They had to get ready to graduate, to really go plus ultra on their studies, and Mirio kind of didn't.

He hasn't given up on getting his quirk back, not after Shinsou told him that Eri could use her quirk without pain, even if it took longer. And he already knew that he would be waiting a long time for her to get control over it anyway.

He was happy to wait. To be Eri's own personal hero, while he couldn't really be a real one. While his friends started their hero careers, he could watch and cheer them on.

It was easy to ignore that kind of depressing stuff when he was with Eri, but since Aizawa-sensei seemed to be doing less hero work, he wasn't around her as much. And he really missed that, to the point that he was a little too happy that Shinsou wasn't at school today.

Even though he knew Eri was upset about that.

It was hard to tell with Eri. At first, she was just so shy all the time that it was hard to tell if she was having a good time or a bad one, unless it was really good or really bad. He's noticed that she's a lot braver with showing her emotions when Shinsou's around, and usually a lot happier, but he definitely remembers how to tell when Eri is not really having a good time but too shy to talk about it.

It's hard to even say what it is about her that tips him off, maybe just his hero instincts, but he might be the only one in the room who isn't surprised when that frown gets even more upside down.

"You okay?" Mirio whispers, hoping that maybe he's caught her just in time, but he sees the wobbly lip and knows that he isn't.

Eri shakes her head, curling her arms up on her desk before she lays her head down, and like a cloudburst, the crying really starts. Mirio tries to pat her back, noticing that every other hero in the room has noticed now. Even though Aizawa is trying to carry on with the lecture, he's still looking over just to make sure that Eri's not getting too upset.

"What's wrong?" Mirio asks, stretching over his desk to practically lay his head on hers with her, because if she does work up the courage to talk about what's upsetting her, it's usually pretty quiet at first.

This time, it's not really quiet at all. "Mo-o-om," Eri whimpers, before another sob picks up, and she kicks one of her feet against her desk. "I wa-ant my mo-om."

Mirio, and probably Aizawa-sensei, are the only people in this room who know who Eri's really talking about, but everyone knows exactly how Eri feels right now. Everyone was the preschool crier at least once, just a little kid who was excited about fun games and making friends at school until the reality of being away from mom or dad hit when they least expected it, and hit harder than a little kid could really handle.

Aizawa-sensei's lecture is pretty much over now, because even if the upperclassmen pride themselves on being better behaved than the first years, no one could hear that familiar cry and do nothing to stop it.

"Eri!" Neji calls before she jumps out of her desk, running over to hug her as best as she could while Eri still laid on the desk. Sohma started asking if anyone had a cup so he could summon water into it, President Touja offered to use his quirk to predict what Aizawa-sensei was going to lecture on so that Aizawa-sensei could step out, and half of the class was telling Eri that it was okay, trying to encourage her even if they didn't know her well enough to know what she really needed.

And Eri definitely didn't need Shizuo's offer. "I know an acupuncture tec--"

"Shizuo," Mirio interrupts, finding it hard to remind himself that a lot of hero students didn't know the full story on Eri's past. Even if he knows Shizuo probably would have thought better of saying that if they did, or at least feel horrible after the words came out, Mirio can't help but feel defensive. "If you hurt Eri right now, even for acupuncture, I really wouldn't be able to control myself."

Tamaki puts a hand on Mirio's shoulder, shaking his head a little to scold him, and it's a little deserved. But then, the biggest Preschool Crier of them all crouches down in front of Eri's desk, and pulls one of her hands away with the palm facing up, so he can show her a new magic trick. "Eri, can I show you something that'll help?"

Eri looks up, because she's always been just a little fascinated by Tamaki, even if they were both too shy to really connect before. The more time Mirio spends around Shinsou, he can definitely see why.

"If you write 'Mom' on your hand, like this," Tamaki says, writing on his own palm with a finger before he presses his hands together. "Then put your hands together, you can make a 'Mom Call.' Every mom can feel when their child makes a 'Mom Call,' and if you concentrate really hard, you can feel your mom answering it."

"Tamaki, that's really lame," Neji pouts, probably a little upset that Eri wasn't clinging to her like a surrogate mother. But Tamaki takes it to heart, like he does with almost every jab that Neji makes at him, and disconnects his Mom Call to lay his head on Eri's desk, hiding his face.

But Tamaki looks up when Mirio taps his shoulder, and looks a little surprised to see Eri pressing her hands together for her own Mom Call, still sniffing with her eyebrows pinched tight in concentration.

They definitely needed to help her out. "Signal boost!" Mirio calls, before he claps his hands together, and the rest of 3-A quickly follows suit. Tomoe starts humming like a monk, and the sound picks up and carries as more and more hero students start humming along with it, Shizuo's distinctive rasp being the loudest.

Even Neji starts humming, even though it comes out more like she's powering up for an ultimate combo move.

Eri's eyes open wide, staring at her hands as she pulls them away and ends the Mom Call. Tamaki smiles at her, definitely still a little embarrassed by how big his small gesture had gotten with everyone's help, before he asks, "Did your mom pick up?"

Eri nodded, wiping her tears away with the back of her hand. But then she noticed that she had quite a bit more attention than she usually did, with every single student staring at her, and she shrank in on herself. "I'm sorry."

"It's okay, Eri!" Mirio reassured. "It's a hero's duty to help boost Mom Calls to make sure they go through! Even during class! Right, Aizawa-sensei?"

He's pretty sure if this wasn't for Eri's benefit, Aizawa-sensei would have tripled everyone's page count for the midterm essay, and not tell them until the day before it was due. But this is Eri, who probably needs a little reassurance that she isn't in trouble for interrupting class. "It's a very sacred duty," Aizawa deadpans, nodding at Eri, and turning back to his lecture notes after she nods back.

Mirio expects Eri to get back to her notes, while he tries to get back to making his own, ignoring that little tug of disappointment when he realizes that the Pokemon plans he had been looking forward to today should probably be put off so Eri could make up for lost time with Shinsou. But before he can get too morose about it, he feels her tug on the sleeve of his uniform, looking up at him nervously. "Can I make Mirio calls too?"

Mirio might look like a tough guy, but no one could stand that kind of 'heart squeeze' moment, finding out that Eri might have been missing him as much as he had been missing her. "Only if I get to make Eri calls too!"

He holds out his hand to shake on the deal, both of them looking as serious as they possibly can before he crosses his eyes and makes her giggle.

It might be a little selfish of him, but he's definitely going to make an Eri call after school, and hope that Shinsou picks up too.

"You're doing very good, Eri," Momo says, smiling at her after she finishes up her science quiz about the different parts of leaves. Ocha smiles at her too and gives her a head pat before she lets Eri pick another sticker to put on her work, so Eri can look back and know she got all of the questions right.

Eri is trying to do a really good job at school, so she won't think about how much she misses Twenny. The heroes help her a lot, because they're really nice to her today. Momo talked to her a lot during homeroom, and Other Yama taught her a pretty song, and Mirio helped her take good notes for Twenny. She doesn't get to see a lot of heroes today, because she gets to stay with Zawa all day, but that kind of makes her miss Twenny even more.

Zawa did her horn trick, but he didn't really do it right. She still feels kind of stuffy, but she doesn't want to tell Zawa. She really hates that she had to let him do the horn trick at all, but he was really worried after she ran away from him, and she knew that it was really bad that she did that.

Eri looks at Momo, and kicks her legs out under the desk. She's not supposed to do that, but Momo doesn't get mad at her, because Momo is a really nice person. Momo just smiles at her, because she's a really good hero, so Eri knows it's okay to ask her a question that might be kind of weird. "Momo, are people veins supposed to look like leaf veins?"

Momo's lips look weird, like she's making them get smaller, before she smiles at Eri even more. "That's a very good question. We should go through our scientific method to figure it out."

Eri knows she smiles right when she hears that, because her cheeks feel a little sore and twitchy. She really likes when Momo plays the Science Method game, because it's what scientists do all the time, and Eri is getting really good at it. "My research book said plant veins carry water around, and Zawa said people need to drink water. But if people need to drink water, they gotta have some way to carry it around too, so maybe that's what people veins are supposed to do."

Ocha makes a weird noise, and tries to stop it by putting her hand around her mouth and stomping her feet. “Eri, you’re such a cute little scientist!” Ocha says when she calms down, hugging Eri really tight even though it’s kinda hard for her to reach around Eri’s desk.

Momo looks like she’s going to laugh at Ocha, but she just gives Eri a You Got It Right smile. “That’s a very good observation. We have our research, our real-world observation, and our hypothesis is that they are similar, so now we need to test our hypothesis.”

Eri nods, and flips through her science book. “I can test it by looking at plant veins and people veins, and see if they look different.” Eri misses the picture the first time, but Ocha helps her by pointing out the leaf picture after she flipped past it.

Eri frowns, because a lot of the pictures in her science book were black and white, and that didn’t really help her with her experiment.

“I don’t know what color they are, but leaf veins are really straight and neat. People veins are bunchy and crooked.” Twenny’s veins were really bunchy, and they moved a lot before He took them away, just like he took Twenny’s skin. He made sure Eri looked at it, even though Twenny was telling her not to.

Ocha and Momo don’t say anything for a little bit, and Eri knows she said something weird again. She doesn’t like doing that, it makes her sad when the heroes think she’s weird. Maybe she shouldn’t know what people veins look like. Maybe that’s why Twenny didn’t want her to see his.

“Let’s see if I can find some pictures in color,” Momo says, pulling out her phone to search for stuff. Momo usually likes to show her stuff in person instead, but maybe since Eri said something weird, she doesn’t want to have to see her after school to show her plant veins.

“I think my veins are kind of straight!” Ocha says, putting her hand on the desk in front of Eri, and poking at the blue lines on her hand where her veins are. “Maybe I’m secretly a flower person! What kind of flower do you think I’d be, Eri?”

Eri wonders if the Viney Lady in the other English class makes flowers in her hair in the spring, and that makes her giggle thinking of Ocha with viney hair. She would look really weird. “I think you’d have a really big, really pretty flower, Ocha! A really big pink one!”

Ocha makes that scream kinda noise again and hugs her really tight. “Eri, you’re so sweet! I love that about you!”

Momo shows Eri her phone, and it has a lot of pictures of leaves on it. Some of the veins are white, and sometimes they’re green or purple, but they’re always the same color. They’re not blue and red and tiny white ones, like people veins are. “People veins are different colors, so they’re not the same,” Eri says, forgetting that she shouldn’t say weird things like that because the heroes don’t like it. “But they do the same thing, so that’s my conclusion!”

Momo smiles at her, even though Eri knows she messed up and didn’t finish the game right. “That is correct. Veins exist in plants, people, and animals to carry around nutrients and water, but because people and plants are so different, their veins have different shapes and colors. I have an idea for a project to demonstrate how they work, using food dye and flowers.”

Eri loves doing projects with Momo. They’re always super fun, and she learns a lot from them. “Can we do it after school, at my dorm? Twenny won’t be as scared of you if we’re doing stuff together! Sometimes he even gets really talk-y, but that might be because he was sick.”

Twenny was sick now, but it was different. Yama and Zawa tried to hide it from her, but even the heroes knew about it, because they were talking about it this morning.

He wasn't acting sick like he did when he got really sick at the compound. He didn't really seem sick at all, even if he was acting more scared than he always is, and he had the Mondays on Monday. But Eri knew that something was wrong even before the heroes started talking about Twenny being sick, because Twenny was acting even weirder than when he was just scared.

Maybe if Momo came to the dorm with them, she could stop Zawa from taking Twenny away, just like Ocha stopped Twenny from doing the horn trick. Zawa might want to keep Eri from getting sick, just like He did, but Eri really doesn't want to make Twenny sad again. She doesn't want to see him cry now that they got rescued by the heroes.

She wants to make Twenny happy, like she gets to be now. She doesn't want him to be sad or scared or hurt anymore. She really wants to make him so happy that he gets full of overwhelming happiness, like Mirio said he wants for Eri.

Eri's head feels kind of tingly around her horn, and she tries to see if her hair is tickling her, but it's not. Her horn just grew again, and now it was even bigger than too big, and it was getting those ridgy things that were kind of sharp.

Twenny told her that if she gets hurt, her horn grows, but she still wasn't hurt at all. Maybe Twenny was wrong about that, but that wouldn't make sense, because Twenny was never wrong, except about other people.

Zawa puts his hand on Eri's head, and he must have been doing his really sneaky quiet walk because she didn't even know he was there. "Are you alright, Eri?"

Eri nods, putting her hands in her lap. She wants her horn to stop growing, because it's scaring Zawa, and it looks like it's scaring Momo too. Her horn scares a lot of heroes, because it's so bad.

"We were learning about veins," Momo says, and she has her serious Vice President face on when she looks up at Zawa, instead of her Eri Did A Great Job smile face. "Whether plant veins and human ones looked similar. And if Shinsou would like to do a project with us."

Zawa nods at her, like Momo was talking with her hands like Yama does sometimes, and pats Eri's head. He leaves his hand there for a while before he walks back to his desk, and he seems kinda sad, but Zawa kinda seemed sad all day today.

Maybe Zawa didn't like that Twenny and Yama stayed home today, because he missed them. Eri really hopes that Zawa missed Twenny, because maybe he wouldn't take Twenny away then. Eri doesn't know where Zawa would even take him to, because the dorms all have people already living there, and Zawa promised that he wouldn't take Twenny to the bad place, because he's a hero.

When school is finally over, Eri has a whole lot of stickers on her workbook, and she's really happy to go back to the dorm so Twenny can do her horn trick. She won't even be bad or whiney about it, because if she's really good, then maybe Zawa will let Twenny stay so he can do the horn trick all the time.

But Zawa is walking really slow, even when Eri tries to walk faster than him. Eri can't really walk a whole lot faster, because she has to hold Zawa's hand so it doesn't turn into icicles, and Zawa should probably wear some cute cat mittens like Eri has so they don't.

Eri has to try really hard to be good when Zawa stops outside their adult dorm, but she's really close to getting to see Twenny again, and she really doesn't want to stop, even if it's to talk to Zawa.

"Eri," Zawa says in a kind of weird voice, and he bends down really far so he's kinda short like she is. Twenny does that a lot when he talks about serious stuff, but Zawa almost never talks about serious stuff with her anymore. "When you were talking about people veins, were you talking about Shinsou?"

Eri was right about knowing what people veins look like. Zawa sounds kind of mad that she does. She nods, because she doesn't want to say something else that's weird and bad, and make Zawa more upset about it.

"It's okay," Zawa says, and he still doesn't sound like he's supposed to, but he hugs her and that makes her feel a little less scared that he's mad, because mad people don't hug. "I'm sorry that you had to see that."

Eri hugs Zawa back really tight, even though it's kind of hard to because he's a lot bigger than her. But he's really sad that she saw Twenny's hand get taken away, and that's all her quirk's fault.

Her quirk wasn't working, no matter what He did, and He was really getting mad about it. He told Hari to get Twenny, and Eri tried really hard to make her quirk work, because she was really scared that he was going to hurt Twenny, or even make her make him go away, just like He said she did to people before her mom got tired of it.

Twenny looked like he really wanted to help Eri stop crying when he got there, but he wasn't allowed to when people were watching, and He told him to hold out his hand. Then He took off his glove and held Twenny's arm, and started taking Twenny's hand away.

Twenny tried to stop him, and he was crying and screaming a lot. Twenny was telling Eri not to look, and He was telling her to look at what she was doing to Twenny. It made the bad feeling inside Eri get so big that her quirk hurt the most it ever had.

Eri doesn't remember what happened after that, but Twenny was a weird kind of away for a long time. Sometimes, when he's away, he still moves around and does stuff, but he doesn't do a lot, and he doesn't talk. It was really lonely, but then Twenny came back, and hugged her really tight.

Zawa hugs her really tight again, before he looks at her, and he looks really serious again. "Was it Shinsou's hand?"

Eri nods, and she's glad that Zawa already kind of knew that, so she doesn't have to tell him what happened. She doesn't want Zawa to know that Twenny got so hurt because of her, but she really wants to ask him a different question. "Zawa, after I fix Mirio, can you take my quirk away?"

Zawa looks at her really sad, and she already knows that he can't, even if she really wants him to. Other Yama looked at her really sad too, because no one can take bad quirks away. "I know that it's difficult right now, but your quirk will likely erupt soon. After that, we should have more time before it begins again."

Eri didn't want it to ever begin again, and she really hopes that Twenny will help her fix Mirio's quirk this time, so it'll be longer before it starts bothering her again. Even if Twenny doesn't want to, and even if it might make him a little sad, maybe if she knew how sad she was, he would do it for her.

But Eri doesn't want Twenny to know she's sad right now, because he might be sad that he didn't get to go to school, or scared about being sick, so she tries to smile really big when they walk in the door.

Twenny and Yama are folding laundry, even though that's kind of Eri's job, but Eri isn't mad. When she sees Twenny, she remembers how much she missed him all day, and she runs up to hug him really tight so he knows. "Twenny! Are you done with your project? Can you go to school tomorrow?"

Twenny smiles at her kind of sad, and she already knows that he can't, and she's a little mad about that, but he pulls her really close so he can look at her face. "I can't, but I'm working hard on it. Horn trick."

Eri sighs, even though she didn't want to be mad about that, because even if Twenny was sick, she had a lot of stories to tell him about school, and she wanted to tell him about them instead of getting all snotty. But she tells him it's okay, and she feels better after that, and she feels like a lot more snot came out because Zawa didn't make her horn do a thunky sound.

Even after Eri runs out of stories to tell him, and even when Yama asks if she wants to help him fold the socks, she doesn't let go of Twenny even a little bit.

Even if Twenny got her the most, worst, grossest sick in the whole wide world, she doesn't want to be away from him ever, ever, ever, ever, ever again.

Hizashi tried to pull him out of the office several times, but Aizawa had work to do.

And several good reasons to do it.

He had gotten halfway through the Slovenian database when one of his informants finally got back to him, and he couldn't help the rising apprehension when he saw which one it was. Shiori was a valuable asset to have, and she hadn't failed him yet, but she always exacted a heavier price than most for her services.

He found himself a bit relieved when all she had sent him was the word 'Analog,' meaning that she wasn't able to offer those services anyway without more information.

None of his informants could do anything with what little they had. They knew that the Nomu Organization used numbers as brands, that their members were scarred in unique ways, and they had a picture of the man who was in charge of it but didn't even know his name.

And Shinsou wouldn't give him that.

He can only hope that Naomasa will be able to force Chisaki to slip, for him to admit something meaningful even if he has to make a promise for Chisaki to see Shinsou again. A promise that Aizawa will ensure is empty.

There's a risk that this will happen again. That Chisaki will continue to play The Commission, and they will continue to fall for it. Aizawa knew that he had plenty of intel to drag it out, he may even know more than Shinsou did. He knew how to contact them for business transactions, how deeply tied they were to the League of Villains, and likely knew a few of their weaknesses that he would have used to keep an edge over them.

In a perfect world, they would be able to get that information from Chisaki, using means that the mobster deserved to suffer. Aizawa wouldn't mind at all if Mind Slice left Chisaki in a vegetative state or worse, but the use of intrusive mental quirks for interrogation was heavily restricted. Chisaki was an adult who was determined to have the full capacity to make his own decisions, and would be required to give consent, which rendered interrogation quirks almost useless.

Except for cases like Shinsou, a minor legally under the care of The Commission. A minor whose consent could be given by the very same government agency that would request it.

Aizawa needed to close this investigation before it came to that. He needed to make progress, and he needed Shinsou to work with him on that.

But now he couldn't even be in the same room with Shinsou. Even with Eri clinging onto the teenager, even if he never dropped into that same terror that he had this morning, Aizawa noticed it. Noticed that Shinsou was watching him with apprehension, that he held his breath when Aizawa looked in his direction. It wasn't clear, but it was there all the same.

Shinsou was terrified that Aizawa would continue to pressure him for information, which only made it easier for Aizawa to doubt that he even could. With how fruitless it was proving to be, with how moody and depressed Eri had been, with how it was affecting Shinsou, Aizawa regretted that he had attempted it at all.

Shinsou deserved some peace before it was ripped away again, and if sequestering himself in the office to work every other possible angle gave that to the kid, Aizawa would do it.

But he would probably make much greater progress if a certain loudmouth would stop pestering him. "So, now that the kids are gone for a couple hou-"

"What?" Aizawa demanded, swiveling around to face his husband, who had better just be trying to get a rise out of him. It's working incredibly well, and that's why he's not surprised to see Hizashi raise his hands to try to calm him down, wincing as he does.

"They're playing the Pokemon game with the Big Three, it's fine," Hizashi insisted, catching what Aizawa was about to say next. "Togata knows the drill, if Eri's quirk starts acting up, he'll call you. He said he'll keep them close to the dorm, just in case."

That still wasn't exactly what Aizawa wanted to hear, but neither was what Hizashi said next.

"So, we might be raising a little mafia princess?"

Chapter Summary

27 gains a prize and a realization while playing Pokemon Go with the Big Three, and afterwards Mirio comes to a startling realization himself. Unfortunately, the bough breaks at last.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: None!

“I really hope we can find a Kangkashan,” Mirio says, a joke that Tamaki understands, covering his mouth to hide a laugh when he hears it.

27 only has an idea what joke it is, and he can’t bring himself to feel insulted by it. Even if he’s earning quite a few odd looks, Eri doesn’t seem to notice, far too comfortable inside his hoodie. It’s easier for her to play the game with him like this anyway, his arms supporting her weight as he holds the phone, her head the only part of her that has to face the cold wind. He’s had to jerk his head out of the way a few times to avoid her horn smacking him in the face, but he can’t say that he would put her down even if she did hit him.

He just really hopes he hasn’t ruined her chances of being adopted by Yamada and his owner.

He didn’t mean to tell Yamada, but he had gotten too comfortable with the hero. He was caught off guard, and he shouldn’t have been, and he’s lucky that Yamada didn’t take advantage of that in a far worse way. He shouldn’t have answered, even if Yamada seemed nervous about asking. He shouldn’t have felt like telling him would reassure him, and he shouldn’t have felt like he needed to reassure him. He should have recognized this game.

Yamada kept glancing between him and the washing machine, a few times his hand would raise to sign, before he just scratched the back of his head. Finally, he sighed, a bit louder than usual, before he finally asked. ‘Are you really okay with seeing Chisaki?’

27 had wavered, knowing that Yamada wanted to know more than just a ‘Yes.’ He wanted 27’s reason, proof that he would be okay, and 27 had plenty of reasons. To kill the part of him that was Dog, to take vengeance for Eri, to stop Chisaki from giving them information about The Miasma. And only one of those reasons was safe to disclose. ‘Yes. I want to. For Eri.’

He used a name-sign for Eri that he was still unsure about, and Yamada looked like he was going to laugh when he recognized the sign for her name. ‘She is a little bossy.’

‘No. Boss,’ 27 corrected. He used the sign for female boss, not the descriptive sign for bossy. He wouldn't mis-sign on something that easy. 'Not bossy.'

Yamada just repeated 'Boss' with a raised eyebrow, still confused, and a sudden irritation made 27 slip.

'Boss of 8 by birth. Real heir. Trash bird pretender.'

And Yamada didn't know that. His eyes went wide, mouth dropping open, before his signs came quicker than usual. 'Eri is Boss. Boss of. Eri family name.'

'I don't know,' 27 lied, realizing too late what he had done.

They didn't know how or why Eri had come to be under Chisaki's control before 27 told them. They had no idea that Eri had yakuza ties in her blood, and 27 should have realized how lucky she was that they hadn't found out.

His owner and Yamada were heroes, and given how uncomfortable his owner was around 27, they might be uncomfortable adopting Eri if they saw that she was tied to the criminal underworld like that.

27 knew that she would never take advantage of her birthright. The yakuza way would be extinct before she could, and even if it wasn't, the 8 Precepts of Death wasn't the faction that would spark a revival. He just imagined it would be funny if she did. He could already see the legions of kobuns kneeling before her with apples and cat stickers and anything else she could desire, men and women of violence groveling towards her fascination with cute things.

And it was an easier way to try to explain what Eri was to him. She technically was his Boss, he hadn't officially severed his ties to the 8 Precepts, to un-take the Sakazuki oath that he swore. She was his Boss, and he was sworn to protect her for that.

That word fit as well as the name sign. It was right, but it didn't feel right. It felt like it encompassed too little of this overwhelming emotion, the steadiness that she gave him, the purpose. The warmth.

He didn't have a name for it, and wondered if one even existed.

"Aw, just a Pidgey," Mirio says, and the phone in 27's hand vibrates as the tiny bird appears on his screen. He taps on it and enters the screen to capture it, lifting the phone higher so Eri can take her turn to throw the magic ball at it. "Oh right, you guys are still kinda low level, so you still need to catch Pidgey's and Zubats."

"We gotta catch them all, Mirio!" Eri cheers, catching the bird with the second to last ball in their stock. They would have to find another point to restock soon, or return to the lucky one that Mirio showed them.

"Yeah Mirio! We have to catch them all! All of them! Don'tcha know how to play? You play this game all the time, and you don't even know how to play, do you?" Nejire rambled, seeming to be a bit bored aside from taunting Mirio and Tamaki, since she didn't seem to be using her phone to play the game.

"I know! But you can only have so many Pidgeots before you stop needing them," Mirio argued, staring at the phone while Eri named the new bird 'Pipi,' forgetting that they already had 25 birds named the same thing. "Did I show you guys how to evolve your pokemon? You just tap this button to turn them into candy-"

27 shook his head, horrified by the idea. He knew that this was a game, these little monsters weren't real, but every single one of them were given a name by Eri. To un-make them after that, for something as useless as candy, was unthinkable.

Mirio scratched the side of his head, pressing his lips together. "I guess that is kind of mean, isn't it?"

"It's okay, Mirio," Eri said, curling her arm back inside the hoodie. "Twenny wants to keep all the monsters, so we can just play like that instead!"

Another monster popped up on the screen as they took another step, and 27 found himself a bit too interested in it again. It was purple, with a wide toothy grin. It was just purple, that didn't mean anything, he shouldn't be reckless, especially when they only had two capturing balls. It was stupid.

But he wanted it.

"Ah! A Grengar!" Mirio said, once again pointing out the official name of a monster as soon as it popped up, possibly for their benefit. "They're pretty cool. They're a ghost type who can possess other pokemon. Kinda spooky, right?"

Possession. That wasn't terribly different from what his quirk could do.

It was stupid. It was stupid. He didn't want it, he shouldn't want it, this was just a game that he played for Eri's sake. He didn't really care about it. This was just a monster that would live in the phone afterwards, a thing that he would count and he had plenty of things to count. He had so many other things to worry about. He shouldn't care about this monster at all.

He tapped on it.

The first ball went just a little too far to the side, and the monster taunted him for it. But that only made him want it even more. He wouldn't lose like this, he wouldn't accept a loss from this creature.

The last ball. The last capturing ball that they had. He shouldn't waste it, he shouldn't use it at all. He should let Eri pick the monster that they used the last one on, let her use it.

It missed.

It bounced off the monster and again 27 was taunted.

27 narrowed his eyes, sure that if there was a way for him to really battle this monster, he would win. He would be the one to possess it.

"Yeah, he might be a little too high-level for you guys," Mirio commented, noticing the monster still taunting him. "We can go back to the Pokestop at the 3-D dorm-"

27 shook his head, refusing to give in so easily. Mirio had to know a way to beat this monster, there had to be a way for him to win. When Mirio looked at him, head tilting in confusion, 27 pointed from the monster to himself to explain his reasoning.

Mirio's lips again twisted in an odd way before he covered his mouth, then turned to look behind him. "Tamaki! We need to take down this Grengar!"

Tamaki approached, then shook his head when he saw the screen. "It's useless. Even with pokeballs, it's an 80 level, and you're probably 20 at most-"

"Tamaki," Mirio interrupted, staring at his fellow hero with fierce determination. "We have to. There has to be a way."

Tamaki turned his head to the side, before he pulled his own phone up, opening and closing the game in quick succession. "If this is a unique spawn, it should come up on my phone, then we can trade or battle for it after linking our accounts as friends."

Tamaki was right. He almost closed the game, but when Mirio gasped in alarm, he stopped and tapped on the monster. It was a quick battle, using only one capturing ball that looked different from the ones that he and Eri had, and didn't suffer a single taunt.

Tamaki looked up to 27, and 27 realized that he had nothing to trade for it. This was another taunt, another humiliating loss, and he shouldn't let it hurt. It was just a purple monster, it didn't really mean anything to him. "Oh, to send me a friend request, you just tap this."

27 watched as Eri followed the instructions, finding himself a little hopeful that she could influence Tamaki to just hand over the monster. He shouldn't care. He shouldn't care. It was stupid, and it was stupid how much he wanted it.

And Tamaki just gave it to him.

Eri cooed as the monster popped out of the inbox in a puff of purple smoke, pulling up the screen that asked for its name. "Twenny says 'Thank you, Tama! I like being friends with you!'"

27 tightened his arm around Eri's legs reflexively, wishing that she hadn't started this habit of speaking for him, especially when she was taking so many liberties. They weren't friends, Tamaki had probably only given the monster to him because Mirio asked him to. He was probably still holding a grudge against 27 for threatening Mirio when he was still under the impression that Mirio would use Eri's quirk selfishly.

But, he was beginning to trust that Mirio wouldn't. Whether it was the hope that Eri's quirk would be more effective if it was born out of happiness, or if he truly cared about Eri that much, he could accept that Mirio might not be a threat to Eri.

Tamaki was still staring at his phone, hunched and unresponsive to Eri's words. He probably wouldn't even care about 27's, but he made the effort to speak them anyway, closing his eyes and pretending that they were meant for Eri, to thank her for speaking for him. "T-thanks."

He saw Tamaki's head rise out of the corner of his eye, but refused to look up from watching Eri name the monster 'Grenny.'

Nejire wailed in frustration, shoving Tamaki aside to pout at 27. "Shinsou! Talk to me instead! Talk to Big Sis Neji-chan! I'm cooler, I'm way cooler, I'm SUPER WAY COOLER than Tamaki!"

"Neji," Mirio reprimanded, putting a hand on her head in an effort to push her backwards, but she just dug her heels in and whined, still pouting. "You don't even have any pokemon to give Shinsou, not even a Pidgey!"

"Pokemon are lame!" Nejire whined, turning away with a huff and crossed arms. "Shinsou likes me better, you know! I know he likes me."

He could blame it on that sniff that he heard, since she was standing behind him and out of sight. It was training, it was habit. It was nothing.

She moved her head back and forth under his hand where it was barely touching the top of her head. “See! See! Shinsou likes me !”

“Because you’re not really being the ‘sexy’ kind of cute,” Tamaki muttered, though his provocation was made hollow as he positioned himself behind Mirio, creating a barrier to hide behind. “You’re throwing a fit like a kid-”

“Ta. Ma. Ki,” Nejire growled, ignoring the light pats that 27 was trying to use to get her to calm down. “TAKE IT BACK!”

Nejire charged after Tamaki, who bolted as soon as Mirio stepped to the side. As they took off across the campus, quirks coming into play when Tamaki sprouted wings and Nejire tried to shoot him down from the sky, Mirio laughed. “Yep, that’s the Big Two for ya. Let’s get some pokeballs while they work things out.”

27 looked down at the phone, finding himself hating how he couldn’t have both the game and the voice app open rather than the relief he first had, before he handed it off to Eri so that he could sign. ‘Big 3.’

Mirio cocked his head to the side, just like 27 imagined that he would. “Three? The Class 3-D dorms?”

“Big Three!” Eri corrects, luckily having learned that sign from Yamada. “You said Big Two, but you’re all the Big Three!”

Mirio smiles, again hiding that wince. “I guess I did! Thanks for correcting me, Shinsou.”

He waits until Mirio’s back is turned to say what he feels more honestly, to see if it feels right. And it does, even if it terrifies him, even if a pit opens in his stomach when he realizes how well it fits Mirio.

‘Hero.’

Mirio might be a big guy, maybe even a tough one, but he’s not the kind of guy to be ashamed of finding something cute, or being open about it. He’s made quite a name for himself at the plushie shop, especially after he found a cat plushie that was so soft it melted in his hands, with giant eyes and a tiny little tongue sticking out of its mouth. He couldn’t hold himself back, nearly brought to tears with how cute it was.

That’s why he’s kind of having a problem with Shinsou right now.

Because Shinsou is kind of adorable.

Tamaki has teased him plenty of times for treating the underclassmen like little kids, but it’s hard not to when they’re just so tiny . And scrawny . And so enthusiastic, like little kids running around a playground with wide eyes full of hope, full of promise. Sometimes he looks at them and wants to ask what they want to be when they grow up, expecting at least one of them to say they want to be a fire truck.

They’re tiny and cute, and maybe he should be a little more used to that after spending so much time with Eri, who is the tiniest and cutest person in the entire world, but he’s not. At first, he thought it was just because Eri is hanging out in Shinsou's hoodie like the most adorable kangaroo baby ever, but it's not.

Shinsou is just kind of adorable all on his own.

He doesn't want to turn his pokemon into candies to evolve them, because it's mean. He keeps every single one he catches, just to keep them. His eyes got so big when he saw the Grengar, and it kind of made him look like a cat ready to pounce. And he wanted it because it looked like him .

It's adorable. It's super adorable.

And it's kind of sad.

Aizawa-sensei didn't tell him anything about the case that caused Shinsou to become a ward, but Mirio knows it's not related to the 8 Precepts of Death. So, like anyone would, Mirio tried to do his own research to find out, and it didn't take long for him to find some answers.

Just by googling Shinsou's name, he found the missing child fliers, and the newspaper articles. Shinsou went missing when he was 4 years old. A criminal likely kidnapped him, taking him away from a normal childhood at such a young age, and put things into motion for Shinsou to wind up at the 8 Precepts of Death.

It doesn't really matter if Mirio knows what happened between the kidnapping and the 8 Precepts, because he knows one thing for certain - Shinsou never got to have a normal childhood. He never got to play games like this, he never got to dream of becoming a hero, or a fire truck. He never got to be an adorable kid.

And Mirio is more than happy to help him make up for lost time.

"Choco milk!" Mirio cheers, quietly hoping that this vending machine was still a little buggy, and would drop two milk cartons if the button for it was pressed twice. The tell-tale thud tells him he's right, and he collects his prizes before turning to Eri. "Do you want to press the button, or am I Eri's super terrific official button pusher?"

Eri tucks her chin deeper into Shinsou's hoodie, thinking before she reaches out her hand to make her own selection. Shinsou walks her closer, and has to bend his knees for her to pick a lychee soda, which she takes from him with a little smile, careful not to spill any on Shinsou's shirt.

"Which one do you want, Shinsou?" Mirio asks, noticing that Shinsou seemed a little surprised at the offer. He also noticed the hesitation, the small frown when he looked at his choices, which might seem like too many to really consider. A little decision too important to make. "There's chocolate milk, melon milk, banana milk, normal milk, and sodas-"

Shinsou touched the button for chocolate milk, but didn't press hard enough to actually select it, still seeming a little hesitant when he glanced at Mirio. Mirio just smiled, perfectly comfortable with being a button pusher or decision maker, as long as he had a little input.

Eri looked up at the sky, which was beginning to glow with orange and red hues with the sunset, then turned to look at Shinsou. "Twenny, I like being outside. We get to be outside a lot here."

Shinsou's eyes widened again before he reached for his phone, only unlocking the screen before he put it back in his pocket. "We've been outside for a while," he muttered, seeming a little concerned about that.

Mirio had lost track of time on the Pokemon hunt, but they probably should get back to the dorm.

Even if Eri seemed to be doing alright, her horn probably wouldn't just get bigger the next time she felt an 'overwhelming emotion,' and Aizawa-sensei would need to be there as soon as it happened. "We can head back to the dorm if you guys want! It is getting a little late."

Shinsou signed something, and Mirio recognized the 'one,' before he started reaching for his phone again. Before Mirio could know what Shinsou wanted to say, Midoriya started calling for him, jogging past Nejire and Tamaki with just a wave.

"Sempai, Shinsou-"

"Izuku!" Eri called, kicking to be released from her little pouch, which Shinsou helped her with after taking the soda out of her hand. As soon as she was down, she ran up to Midoriya, who was already crouched down for her. "Izuku, we caught a LOT of monsters! I named some of them after you on Twenny's phone! Do you wanna see?"

"Yeah, I really would, Eri!" Midoriya said, pulling away from the hug to pat Eri's head. "But, I was hoping to talk to Shinsou first, if that's okay." Midoriya looked at Shinsou, signing something that caused Shinsou to frown.

"Eri," Shinsou called, holding Eri's drink out to her while she stared curiously, likely picking up on Shinsou's concern. "Midoriya wants to tell me a secret."

Eri glanced at Mirio, then back at Midoriya before she turned back to Shinsou. "A boy secret?" Shinsou nodded, and Eri sighed before she pouted at Shinsou. "Okay, but I really want you to be friends with Ashi or Momo so you don't have boy secrets!"

"I'm working on it," Shinsou promised with a small smile, before Eri turned away and it fell from his face.

Midoriya waited for Eri to run into Nejire's waiting arms, glancing between Shinsou and Mirio, which made him wonder if he should be included in the 'boy secret' after all, even if he was a little too interested to offer to leave. "Shinsou, are you really going to see Chisaki?"

Mirio couldn't believe what he was hearing, laughing under his breath. "Is this some crazy rumor that's going around? Jeez, you first years are..."

Shinsou nodded.

Mirio felt the ground tilt from under him.

No. The word was screaming inside of him. He wouldn't believe it, he wouldn't believe that. They all fought so hard to save Eri and Shinsou from Chisaki, they gave so much to rescue them from that monster's shadow. They were safe, there was no way. He lost his quirk to save them. He watched Chisaki absorb Shinsou into his body and did nothing, but he couldn't do nothing again.

"For the investi-igation. Eri do-oesn't know."

Mirio knotted his hands into fists, watching the horror spread on Midoriya's face, more horrified to see Shinsou's still blank as he typed.

"It's fi-ine."

"It's not," Mirio said, shaking his head. "Shinsou, that's not 'fine' at all!"

Shinsou had been suffering under that dark cloud all day, while Mirio never knew about it. Never suspected it. Shinsou had probably been putting on a brave face for Eri's sake, but even Mirio had been fooled by it. Shinsou was probably fooling everyone, even Mic-sensei and Aizawa-sensei.

"Isn't there something that Aizawa-sensei can do?" Midoriya asks, pleading for Shinsou to tell him that this didn't have to happen. "Kacchan was wrong, wasn't he? Aizawa-sensei wouldn't let that happen!"

"I won't," Mirio vows, even if he knows it's fruitless. There's nothing he can do, there's nothing that he can do now, but he can't let this happen. He can't let Shinsou suffer again for someone else's sake. "I won't let that happen!"

"I wa-ant to. It's fi-ine." Shinsou is holding his phone too tightly, still not meeting their eyes. Mirio knows he's lying, knows that the brave face is beginning to crack. "I wa-ant to see Chi-isaki."

"Mirio!" Tamaki yelled, and Mirio looked.

27 can hear Mirio talking on the phone, he watches the heroes crowd around Eri, keeping their distance. They don't realize how much that still hurts her, the green wisps of her quirk swirling higher, almost reaching out for them subconsciously.

He wants to reach out to her, to pick her up from her scrapped knee, to take away that small pain that's too familiar for her. It might be right on top of one of her scars, it might be a wound too familiar that called up her quirk. But he can't, he can only be relieved that she isn't restrained. She isn't in The Chair, she won't be harvested, she just needs her quirk to be quieted.

"Twenny," Eri calls, pleading with him with her wide, red eyes. He knows what she wants from him.

He doesn't want to. He won't. He won't.

Mirio keeps talking, his owner should have been here. He should get here faster than this, he shouldn't let Eri keep suffering.

The wisps get higher, and the heroes back away, only causing them to grow higher. She's reaching for something, for someone, something to take this pain away from her.

He could. He could, but he won't, he won't add another scar. He won't give her a deeper wound, burrow deeper into her mind. It's abuse. It's abuse, he's abused her, he won't do it again.

He won't.

"Twenny!" Eri screams, the wisps turning into a blaze, and he knows it's hurting her. She's in pain.

And he won't let her suffer.

He remembers how to make the push, how to reach out and pull the string without seeing it. He pulls it, and it's wrong.

She's pushing back, the string is frayed, he can barely hold it and he can't possibly command her with it. He holds onto the control as tightly as he can, and he feels like the string has been plucked, vibrating inside his mind, trying to break free.

It hurts. His head is throbbing, and he has to force his eyes open to make sure that she's under, that even if he can't quiet her quirk, he can stop her from forcing it higher. He sees her eyes turned white and looks away, feels sick enough to vomit.

He did it, even if he knew better. The control feels wrong because he knows it's wrong, because he doesn't want to do this. Because she might have begun to heal before he forced his way into her mind again. Before he tore open another scar.

He holds the control, ignoring the pain. Ignoring the trickle of blood running down his nose, only barely registers that it shouldn't be happening. He hasn't used his quirk intentionally in over a month, and that slip didn't feel this wrong, his quirk feels wrong. It feels weak, it feels shaky, it shouldn't feel like this.

He feels like something pops inside his head, like the string might have broken but it feels more like it disappeared completely. It falls into a void.

27 falls with it.

Hizashi shouldn't have let this happen.

"Eri, it's okay," Togata reassures again, gently trying to move Shinsou's unconscious body onto his bed from where he had been carrying the teenager on his back. "Shinsou is going to be okay, he just needs to rest for a while."

Aizawa feels her shaking in his arms, and knows it isn't solely from the backlash of erasing her quirk. Her forehead was warm against his palm when he checked it, but she wasn't in that same feverish coma that she had been after the raid on the 8 Precepts. She was awake, alert, and terrified as she watched Shinsou fall forward before he was caught by Togata.

Shinsou was having the reaction that Eri should have, after Aizawa had erased his quirk. It was a split-second decision, noticing the blood on Shinsou's lip, the strain apparent in the way that he was shaking, his skin too pale, eyes too tight. Shinsou was trying to contain Eri's quirk when Aizawa wasn't there, just like Aizawa said he was allowed to. He might have even acted recklessly because Aizawa allowed him to, and he took that as an order.

Recovery Girl wasn't a quirk specialist. There wasn't anything that any of them could do now but let Shinsou rest, and hope that he recovered quickly.

Eri tugs on his shirt to be let down, and though her legs are still shaky, she pulls herself onto Shinsou's bed, hands hovering over his arm but unwilling to touch. He recognizes it immediately, placing a hand on her head to reassure her. "It's fine. If you want to rest with Shinsou."

Eri nods her head, laying down and curling herself tightly into his open side, his arm a pillow that he didn't consciously make for her, but she takes all the same. Her hands fist in Shinsou's hoodie, and Aizawa knows that there's little he can do to quiet the sobs that will no doubt come.

He can tell by Togata's grim stare that he's needed elsewhere besides.

Togata closes the door after he follows Aizawa out of the room, and waits until they're in the living room before he speaks. "Shinsou is meeting Chisaki."

Aizawa sighs, doubting that Shinsou had been the one to tell Togata that. Bakugo had said that no one else knew, but he must have decided not to keep that information to himself. He could only hope that Bakugo had only told Togata for whatever reason, and that this information could stop leaking any further. "It's related to the investigation, and no one is supposed to know about that."

"Look," Hizashi cuts in, likely seeing something concerning on Togata's face, while Aizawa kept his back turned just so he wouldn't. "There's not a lot we can do when it's coming from The Commission of Wardship Affairs. I really wish there was, but there's not."

"Homicide," Togata says, biting out a bitter and airy laugh. "It's not really heroic, but Shinsou couldn't meet with Chisaki if Chisaki was dead."

Aizawa turns around to face his student, to take in the fact that Togata absolutely means it, and sighs. "Shinsou has the ability to stop this, and he hasn't. He's agreed to it."

"He's terrified," Togata says, his own arms shaking, though not out of terror, his eyes too wide, too strained. "He's supposed to be safe."

"I know," Hizashi says, putting a hand on Togata's shoulder, trying to reassure him even if this situation is beyond him. Beyond any of them. "Shinsou is the only one who can stop it, and he won't. He wants to do it for Eri." Togata's posture stiffens, likely feeling the same small insult that Aizawa had felt. They had already faced Chisaki for Eri's sake, Shinsou had no reason to do it again, but Aizawa knew that it was deeper than that. "It's just supposed to be a formal apology from Chisaki. 15 minutes, and then Shinsou gets to leave. And if we can't stop it from happening, we need to focus on being there for Shinsou after that."

Togata gritted his teeth, the tension slowly beginning to fall when he turned to the side.

"Comforting victims of trauma." It was becoming Lemillion's specialty, and though it began in such a bitter way, Aizawa had no doubt that it would serve him well after he regained his quirk. "I'll try to focus on that, then."

Hizashi guided Togata out, trying to get him to agree to using the chat to find out what food Shinsou liked to eat, as he hadn't gotten a straight answer and was insistent on making it Friday night.

Aizawa remained frozen.

There wasn't a single thing he could do to stop this, and too many of his students were feeling the same bitter hopelessness that he felt. He wished that Hizashi had taken away Shinsou's phone, but he knows that's entirely selfish of him.

Too many of his students were beginning to doubt him, because this was one horror that he couldn't stop. He couldn't erase it, couldn't fight it. Couldn't protect anyone from the slow machinations that The Commission had put into place.

Hizashi knew the look in his eye before he had to say anything, leaning his arm against his, carefully turning his expression away to hide the irritation. "I already cancelled my patrol, so if you want to look into Eri's parents, it's fine."

Aizawa nodded, winding an arm around his husband's back as a small concession, an apology that he didn't want to speak aloud. He wanted distance, he wanted progress, and he couldn't find progress with Shinsou's case. He wanted something to prove that he wasn't as useless as he felt, and his own patrols weren't an option for him.

"But! You need to use a sick day and stay home with Shinsou tomorrow," Hizashi stipulated with a raised finger, and Aizawa fought the urge to draw away from it.

"Hizashi-"

"Nope! You have all that time built up, and Principal Nezu doubled it to prove a point! You need to stay home with the kiddos that you keep bringing home!" Hizashi looked at him and sighed, wrapping an arm around his shoulders. "Look, I know the Guilty Gus look pretty well by now, but avoiding Shinsou isn't going to help anything. You need to patch things up before Friday, and before Eri notices, because you know she will. She's a smart little cookie, and she's got enough to deal with."

Aizawa nodded, and though he knew that isolating Shinsou to the dorm tomorrow might offer an opportunity to get information about the Nomu Organization, he knew he wouldn't take it. If Shinsou wanted to face Chisaki on behalf of his 'Boss,' then he already had two reasons too many not to talk.

In the meantime, Aizawa could at least make progress in the investigation into Eri's birth parents.

Anger Management

Chapter Summary

The after-effects of Eri's quirk eruption are difficult for Yamada and 27 to deal with, but when Yamada is able to calm Eri down, 27 doesn't find relief.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Depressive episode

Previously on Wards of UA: Eri's quirk erupted and was controlled by Shinsou until Aizawa erased both of their quirks, and both were affected physically by that erasure. Shinsou had described that Eri was emotionally volatile after her quirk erupted when he explained how it worked to Aizawa. Shinsou is supposed to meet with Chisaki, as Chisaki promised to give information about The Miasma if he is given the chance to 'formally apologize' to Shinsou, and Shinsou has agreed to it to make sure that Chisaki won't. Mirio suggested killing Chisaki to stop that meeting from taking place. Shinsou mentioned to Yamada that Eri was the heir to the 8 Precepts of Death by birth, which was new information to Yamada and Aizawa, and Aizawa left to investigate whether they could find Eri's birth parents and family name. Eri has a habit of calling Shinsou 'Mom,' because in her perception, he acts like a 'TV Mom' to her.

Yamada had been making his little patrol for a couple hours now. Between finishing up all the little chores that tended to fall to the wayside, he found himself checking in on the wards every 10 minutes or so to see if there were any changes.

Both were fitfully asleep, though Shinsou's fever seemed to be breaking little by little. The number that he read off of the thermometer the first time he checked nearly gave him a heart attack, but Shinsou had a history of surviving, and even functioning perfectly well with a temperature that was nearly lethal.

He was heading to check if the little kotatsu-head was finally going to have a normal temperature reading, when he found true relief to hear two voices behind the closed door. That was, until he got close enough to the door to understand what they were saying.

“-hate you! You were supposed to fix Mirio!”

“I know.”

Yamada heard Eri growling under her breath, before her words became sharper. “I hate that you can't talk right! You're stupid and I hate you!”

“You’re right.”

Yamada didn’t even think about knocking, ripping open the door in the vain hope that his hearing aids were picking up a television drama rather than a nasty argument between his two wards. But seeing Eri kick Shinsou’s chest, sprawled out over his bed still messy with the evidence of a quieter fit, was all the proof that he needed to know this was really happening.

‘ Emotionally volatile ’ didn’t really come close to describing Eri’s cold glare.

“It’s your fault Twenny doesn’t-” Shinsou cut Eri off with a hand over her mouth, which she screamed against, kicking her legs in a flurry. Shinsou looked like he was in rough shape, sweat still on his brow and wetting his hair from the fever, and he just looked exhausted besides. Not that Yamada could blame him, hearing those angry words from Eri were hard enough, but Shinsou absolutely couldn’t deal with it now.

“Okay, we’re a little mad right now,” Yamada said, trying not to take Eri’s pouty glare to heart when Shinsou pulled his hand away. It had to be hard for a little girl like Eri to process a powerful quirk like hers, and what Chisaki had done to her certainly didn’t make it any easier. “Why don’t we find a way to let that ‘mad’ out in a better way? Like, throwing some pillows around, or ripping up some paper-”

“No!” Eri screamed, turning her face into the bed, kicking her feet again but this time catching Shinsou’s chin on one kick before he caught her ankle and held it down.

‘ Doesn’t want to see. ’ Shinsou signed, looking all the more exhausted when he looked in Yamada’s direction, though his eyes never left the floor. ‘ It’s fine. ’

Eri balled her hands into fists before she rolled over on her back, reeling her legs back to kick Shinsou’s side. “Go back to him! I don’t care if you want to stay with him! You can just go away !”

Yamada could practically see Shinsou’s heart breaking at those words, his lips pressed together too firmly, his eyebrows pinched together in an effort to keep himself together. Yamada couldn’t just sit back and let this happen.

“Eri, don’t say things like that! I know you don’t mean it, kiddo,” Yamada said, crouching by the bed to notice that Eri was shaking a little, her arms wrapped too tightly around the pillow. He knew that she didn’t mean it, and it was probably pretty terrifying to be inside her head right now, with so much anger built up inside her and no good way to deal with it. Other than making Shinsou into a punching bag. “So, you don’t want to make a mess, even if you’re really upset, yeah?”

“I don’t want to, Yamada ,” Eri hissed, and boy, she could hit where it hurt.

But, Yamada could take a few blows from an angry 5 year old a bit better than Shinsou could. “So, we’re going to scream. Alright?”

Eri looked up at him, probably peeved that she was being told what to do when she was already in the foulest mood ever, but that only helped him out when he started to yell, and she quickly joined the duet.

He made sure to keep his quirk out of the mix, but still loud enough to cover up most of Eri’s anger, and when she stopped to catch her breath, it looked like he did a pretty good job. His little bean definitely wasn’t set back to rights, but she looked a little surprised to find that the anger meter had been drained a little bit. “Better?”

Eri nodded, tucking her chin deeper into the pillow, though she still kicked away Shinsou's hand when he tried to put it down too close to her leg. "S' stupid."

"But it works! So, let's keep-" A knock on the door quickly reminded Yamada that the staff dorm might not be the proper place for these vocal exercises. "Let's go somewhere that we can really let loose, alright? I know just the place for all the yelling I do when I'm mad!"

When he answered the door with a grumpy Eri in his arms, Midnight looked like she might want to do some yelling of her own. "There had better be a spider in there."

"Nope! Just some super serious Quirk Grumps going on! Can you do me the biggest favor in the entire world, oh x-rated hero that I love so much?" Yamada pleaded, noticing that Midnight's glare had barely cooled, and it would probably look a lot more intimidating if she wasn't wearing rubber duck patterned pajamas. "Can you watch Shinsou for a bit while we head to Gym Gamma?"

If it was for anyone else, Midnight probably wouldn't have budged, the evidence of a few rough patrols clear in the rings of exhaustion around her eyes. But she sighed, smiling softly at Eri even if Eri refused to look at her. "Don't take after this loudmouth too much, alright?"

"Don't tell me what to do," Eri muttered against Yamada's shoulder, and Midnight's eyebrows raised, probably shocked to hear a sass like that from someone who hadn't even entered puberty yet.

"Okay! Let's get some yelling done while we're on the way! Three, two one!"

This might not be his favorite duet to perform, but he could stay up all night belting it out anyway, for Eri's sake.

Useless.

27 struggled to keep his eyes open, the words from the television long since becoming noise to his ears. Sushi wasn't helping, something about the way the cat purred in his sleep, a steady and warm weight on his thighs felt like a drug. Like 27 was being drugged into sleep with him.

He couldn't fall asleep here. He had that much training, if nothing else. Even if he didn't have his quirk, didn't have Eri, didn't have much of a chance against Chisaki.

He couldn't let himself fall asleep here. Even if it was warm, even if Sushi was soft, even if the noise from the television was a steady hum, too much like a lullaby to him right now.

Witching Hour was asleep, her head resting on her arm where she was curled up on the recliner. He might be able to escape, if he could move his body. If Sushi wasn't resting on top of him, weighing him down.

Useless. Eri knew he was useless. She didn't care if he left, and he should be happy about that. He shouldn't feel so hollow and useless.

He shouldn't feel like crying.

He closes his eyes, and leans back against the couch, turning his head away from Witching Hour if she happened to look at him. If she saw him so weak and useless. He keeps his breaths steady, hopes that the tears dry on their own when he can't bring attention to himself by wiping them away. His arms feel too heavy to do that anyway.

Eri always said what she honestly felt during these fits, and this one was no different. She didn't care, she hated how useless he was, how broken. She said those things plainly, when something always held her back from saying them when she wasn't overwhelmed.

She hated him, and he was happy about that. She wouldn't miss him. She wouldn't hurt.

He shouldn't let it hurt either.

Useless. So useless that he might as well fall asleep.

Yamada stared down at the empty Gym Gamma, barely lit with only the security lights on, and let out another shout to cover up the noise from Eri's. He knew it wasn't really necessary at this point, the noise-canceling headphones from his hero costume did a perfectly fine job, as long as she held them over her ears.

But it felt so good to let it out.

He imagined that Overhaul was on the other end of it, that he could have somehow rattled Shinsou free when the fusion took place during the raid. That he had been requested to go to the raid at all, that he could have beaten down at least one of the criminals that had hurt his wards so terribly, had left the scars that they still had to carry.

' Homicide. ' If Yamada had been a part of the raid, if he knew what he did now, he probably would have stepped over that line without a second thought. He knows the limits of his quirk, he knows exactly how it could be used to kill. He would do it without a second-thought if it meant protecting his wards, if it meant that healing came a little quicker for them.

He feels Eri wrapping her arms around his waist, and he moved with one free hand to pop his hearing aids back in, her quiet little sniffles coming into focus as the whine of the devices faded out. "M' sorry, Yama, I didn't mean it! I didn't!"

"I know, little bean!" Yamada reassured, trying to wrap her up in a hug with his arm still trapped to his side. "You just had a pretty rough day, and that can make you say things you don't mean. That happens with me and Shou all the time, but it's harder when you're a little kid, and you don't have room for all that meanness or mad. We can always come out here and put on a show when that happens."

Eri kicked her foot, legs still swinging off the walkway through the bars of the railing, before she pulled them out and curled herself up in Yamada's lap, hiding her face against his chest. Yamada just smiled, wrapping his arms around her.

He's definitely been missing out on the Eri cuddles, even if he can still be a little jealous that Shouta and Shinsou get ones when Eri isn't so upset.

"Yama, I don't wanna have my quirk," Eri whined, hands making fists in his jacket. "I don't wanna be mean!"

"I know," Yamada said, tucking his chin before he stops himself, fighting the impulse to cross another line, to kiss the top of her head to express the way that he feels about her, but he shouldn't. To act like a father, when he wasn't. "Quirks can give you a lot of trouble, can't they? They can make you mean, or they can make you hurt. Or they can hurt people you care about."

Eri nodded, burrowing herself a little deeper into his jacket, and he hoped that he was reading her wrong.

Eri's quirk could kill too. And much like his, it developed long before it could be controlled or restrained. If Shouta was right, if their little Eri was Hanabusa Eri, then she already had.

The previous head of the 8 Precepts of Death had one daughter, Hanabusa Kaede. No one had looked too deeply into who the deceased man was before his passing, or who his family members were. But Hanabusa Kaede was in prison for child neglect, for failing to produce her child after social services investigated why she wasn't enrolled in school.

Shouta texted him after convincing Sansa to let him meet with her. They couldn't show Hanabusa Kaede a picture of Eri to verify it completely, and she refused to give them a sample of her DNA to prove the relation. All that she would say when asked why she didn't have her child or know where she was, was that she didn't have a child. That she gave birth to a monster who killed her boyfriend, and destroyed her life.

Hanabusa Eri's birth certificate matched the notes from Chisaki's 'research' notes, a 5 year old girl born on December 21st. Hanabusa Kaede's white hair, the features that were similar were clear from her mugshot. Even if Hanabusa Kaede didn't want to prove it, Yamada doubted that the relationship wouldn't be legally established at some point. He's sure nothing would come of it, that Eri would never be returned to her mother, but he still finds himself worrying.

He hopes that Eri doesn't remember that, remember Rewinding a person past the point of their existence. He hopes that she never finds out, and never blames herself for having a quirk manifest too early to control it. That she never finds herself torn apart the same way that he was, when he found out that the reason he didn't have his biological parents in his life was because he had deafened them after he was born.

"You know, I really hated my quirk too," Yamada says, running a hand through Eri's hair. "Because my quirk hurt people. I actually hated it so much that I stopped talking for a while, kind of like Shinsou. Because I wasn't sure if I could be a good person if I had a quirk that could hurt people."

Eri looks up at him, her big red eyes still wet with tears, and he runs his thumb over her little horn, trying to give her a reassuring smile.

"But quirks that can hurt can also help people. It's all about how you use them. I could have turned out to be a really nasty villain, but I didn't, because I wanted to use my quirk to help people. It wasn't easy to like my quirk, though," Yamada says, thinking back on all the times he wanted to crush his hearing aids, as though that would take back the damage that had already been done. How often he wondered how different the world would sound without them, if he didn't have his quirk. What his childhood would have been like if his parents didn't surrender him to social services. "Sometimes, I wished that I didn't have a quirk at all."

Eri's hand touches his neck, and he feels a proud little smile pulling him out of his morose mood. His inquisitive little scientist learned all about vocal cords from Yaoyorozu after watching The Little Mermaid, when she was curious whether someone's voice could actually be stolen. He tried to tell her about how vocal cords played into his own quirk after he overheard her telling Shouta about it, but she had just tucked her head against Shouta's chest, in a mood where she was a bit too shy to talk to the loudmouth she had to live with.

Even if Shinsou had his own Little Mermaid problems, Eri hadn't been nearly as shy since he came to live with them.

“Yama, your quirk doesn’t make you ugly,” Eri mumbled, and he almost wished that she had been a little more upset by her own words. That this wasn’t something that she honestly thought about herself, that it was still a part of the emotional tailspin that her quirk gave her.

“Eri, you’re not ugly!” Yamada argues, trying to get his little bean to look at him, but when she does, her expression is far too serious. “You’re the cutest little bean in the whole world! Everyone says that, and hundreds of heroes can’t be wrong!”

“I’m cute now,” Eri explains, and he’s only a little relieved to see a flicker of her usual self-confidence, watching her press a hand to her horn. “But when it’s big, it’s so ugly, Yama! And it’s full of snot, and gross! I really don’t like it!”

“I know you’re not a fan of the horn tricks, and I don’t blame you, kiddo. It’s not fun being sniffly and sick,” Yamada says, pitying the miserable little bean who’s had to put up with that for the past few days. “But even if you had a beard like Shou, and warts all over your face, and you had a big green mole right in the middle of your forehead with curly hairs sticking out all over the place, you know what? You’d still be the cutest little bean in the whole world.”

Eri doesn’t look like she believes him at all, putting her hand to her forehead in fear that a mole might already be sprouting there.

“Because you don’t just look like the cutest bean in the world, you are the cutest bean in the world. Because you’re smart, and you’re kind, and the best helper in the whole world. Do you know what me and Shou would do if we didn’t have you to help us pick our plates? We’d eat off the table like animals, Eri! Shou would want to use the kitty cat face plate, but then I’d want to use it too, so he’d just break it because he’s mean to me when you’re not around, and then we’d have no plates!”

Eri pouts, trying not to giggle, despite all his hard work to get her to. “Zawa’s not mean!”

“Oh yes he is! He’s just not mean when you’re around! He’s so mean to me, Eri. He tells me he’s not hungry, then as soon as I make something, he eats all of my food. He makes me do all the laundry, even if his hero costume gets the dirtiest after his patrols. And when it gets cold, I tell him to make sure to wear socks and mittens, because his hands and feet get cold, but do you know what he does? He doesn’t wear them, just so he can stick his cold toes and hands all over me and make me feel cold!” Yamada pouts, knowing that as soon as the first snowfall came, he’d have a snowball shoved down the back of his shirt. “He bullies me so much.”

“Yama, are you gonna leave him?” Eri asks, red eyes wide with concern. “Zawa acts so bad! He’s really mean to you!”

“No! No way, little bean!” Yamada insists, worried that he might have vented just a little too much, before he realizes that Eri wasn’t just worried about him and Shouta splitting ways over a few cold toes and chores. She might be worried about someone else who had been acting a little ‘mean’ and ‘bad.’ “I love Shouta a lot, a whole lot more than I hate cold toes or not eating my own food. Even if he’s mean, or if he acts bad, I still love him. Because he’s my mean little grump, and most of the time, he’s not mean or bad at all.”

Eri pulls herself closer to his chest, picking at his jacket before she works up the courage to ask, “Does Twenny still like me?”

“I know he does,” Yamada promises, running a hand over Eri’s hair before he holds her close. “Shinsou cares about you a lot, little bean. And I know that he knows you didn’t mean what you said. You two have been together for a long time, and gone through a lot together. I know Shinsou wouldn’t leave just because of a few grumpy words, even if they were pretty grumpy.”

“I didn’t mean it!” Eri insists. “I don’t want him to go back to him, Yama! Don’t let him!”

“Go back to....” Yamada’s heart drops when he realizes who Eri was talking about. The only person she would refuse to name.

She wasn’t supposed to know, because nothing could be more frightening for poor little Eri than knowing that Chisaki was still around, still able to torment them. But for her to not only find out, but to think Shinsou was going to live with Chisaki again. He couldn’t imagine how that felt for poor little Eri, but if his own sickening dread was any indication, it would have been a very ‘overwhelming emotion.’

“Eri,” Yamada says, still unsure how he could make the truth any more pleasant to bear, but he couldn’t lie to her now. If she found out after the fact that she was lied to, it would only be more devastating. “Shinsou will never live with Chisaki again. Chisaki is in prison, and he’ll be there for the rest of his life. He’s never getting out, ever. ”

He wishes he could end it there, with a promise that he knew he could keep. But Eri picked up on things with Shinsou, and if they had been together all day today, she probably would have realized that something was off. And she might pick up on it afterwards. Even if Shinsou wasn’t a wreck, even if they told her it was just a really important school test like they planned to.

“You know how wards get to live with heroes to keep them safe, right?” Yamada asks, and Eri nods. “Shou is your hero, because he can keep you safe if your quirk gives you trouble. And Shinsou is my ward, because I can keep him safe from bad people. And the police are trying to find those bad people, but they need to know more information about them. They want to get that information from Chisaki, and they need Shinsou to meet with Chisaki for a little bit for that to happen. And Shinsou said he wanted to do that.”

Eri shook her head. “He doesn’t want to, Yama! He’s scary and bad, and Twenny gets really scared of him!”

“I know,” Yamada says, holding Eri a little closer. “I think Shinsou might get a little scared when it gets closer, and he might be a little mixed up afterwards, but I think he wants to do this. So he knows that Chisaki can’t hurt him anymore. And to know he can’t hurt you anymore either.”

Eri frowns, and Yamada knows that as soon as she sees Shinsou, she’ll want to convince him not to meet with Chisaki, even if she doesn’t know it’s an option.

“I know you want to protect him from feeling scared or mixed up, Eri,” Yamada says, giving her a half smile. “But Shinsou wants to do this, and we can’t stop him. We just have to be there to support him along the way. And one of my favorite ways of doing that is making food, but Shinsou hasn’t told me what he likes to eat! I asked him a million gazillion times, and he still hasn’t told me!”

“He hasn’t told me either,” Eri says with a little frown. “But I can ask him! I wanna know too! And...” Eri trails off, then clasps her hands in front of her chest, staring at them. “I wanna ask him with my hands. And tell him sorry. ‘Cause it’s not stupid that he talks with his hands! His hands always look really pretty, and I know it’s not your fault that he does it!”

Eri starts copying the more formal sorry without hesitation, and he helps guide her hands through the correct motions.

And he hopes that the apology will be enough to heal those angry words that he knows hurt Shinsou so much.

“It’s okay,” 27 says, struggling to offer that much. He’s tired, and hollow, and every small motion draws too much out of him. Too bleach soaked. “I’m happy that you feel better now.”

Yamada helped her. He won’t let that hurt.

Eri catches it anyway, tucking her chin to her chest while she stares at her hands. He hates it, hates that he’s too tired, too useless to comfort her the right way. He busies himself with opening the door while Yamada and Midnight talk, so that he can get her settled inside. So he can wait for instructions, for anything else he needs to muddle through, ignoring how little strength he has left.

He feels a little relief to be back in their dorm, back to familiar surroundings. He knows it’s empty, that this is the place he can sleep. He’s allowed to be that vulnerable here.

“Twenny,” Eri calls, tugging on the sleeve of his shirt. He’s still sweaty, dirty, she shouldn’t dirty herself with him. “I don’t want you to be sad.”

“I’m not,” 27 says, still not able to look her in the eye. He can look at her hair, her shoulders, her horn. Not her eyes. She’ll see too much in his. She’ll be upset by what she sees.

“You are,” Eri whines, shaking his arm by his hand trapped between hers. “ Twenny. ”

She’s upset, and he needs to comfort her. He needs to find a mask to slip into, but he can’t. He’s numb, and too hollow, and too tired. He can’t even feel the urgency that he should to comfort her, and that scares him. “I’m sorry.”

“Hey,” Yamada says, closing the door behind him, and 27 can’t react fast enough, can’t pull himself straight or calm Eri down in the few seconds he has before Yamada notices. “Hey, is everything okay?”

“Twenny’s still sad!” Eri says, dropping his hand to walk in front of him, signing again. “I’m really sorry, Twenny!”

“I’m sorry, it’s fine,” 27 persists, hoping that Eri would just drop it. That he could just be ignored now, ignored by Eri too. He just wants to disappear for a while, just enough to gather himself. To be there, for what little she needs him for.

“It’s alright, little bean!” Yamada says, distracting Eri. Separating them. He should be angrier about that, but he isn’t. “How about we work on dinner while Shinsou takes a shower? It’ll help him wake up and feel a bit better.”

27 moved to comply sluggishly, despite the relief he felt to be alone for a while. To disappear from Eri for a little bit, knowing she wouldn’t miss him. Doesn’t need him anymore.

Eri doesn’t need him anymore.

He doesn’t know what to do. He’s been waiting for this moment to come, knew that it would eventually. It’s better that she had a transition, that he wasn’t just taken away or killed. She had him when she needed him, and now she doesn’t need him.

He knows he has games, but they're meaningless. He can't turn anything over in his head, can barely look at the black band on his arm while he showers. Can barely pull himself from the warm spray after he finishes.

Eri doesn't need him. It makes him meaningless.

He pulls whatever clothes are on top of the drawers, barely looks at them. Barely feels the short sleeves, or the hair that's still too wet. He stops in front of the door instead of moving immediately to comply with the implied order to meet them for dinner. Breathes in the numbness to stop his face from becoming wet. He's cried too much already, he wishes he could just stay numb to it.

He feels nothing and too much when he sees Yamada and Eri talking, Yamada translating what she says as she tries to copy him in stilted, fumbled movements. He's intruding here, he's not meant to be here. It's a beautiful moment between a family that he isn't part of. Never will be. Unwanted.

But they both look at him and he feels the numbness lift too quickly, too sharp. He wants to stay here. He wants to be wanted. He just knows it's hopeless.

"Hey there little listener," Yamada says, his smile strained. 27 should be more aware of that, more worried that he's made the cracks and broken pieces too easy to see, but he can't be. It's hard enough to just stand there, just occupying this space.

Eri stands in front of him, her hands clasped in front of her chest and worry plain on her face. She still needs comfort from him, maybe this is the last thing she needs from him. Just to wash her hands of him, apologize for her own sake for what she said, then she could move on. Forget about him.

"Twenny," Eri said, but her hands said something else. "I'm really sorry I said you're dumb for not talking. You're really really smart, and I like watching you talk with your hands. Your hands always look really pretty, and I want my hands to look pretty like yours!" Eri's signing trailed off as she went on, until her hands were fisted in front of her chest again. "I really don't want to make you sad, or make you leave. I never wanna be away from you, ever ever ever! Because you're my mom, Twenny, and we went through a lot together, and I want us to be together forever. Especially because we can be together for good stuff from now on!"

He forces a smile, and it feels like his face is cracking like plaster as it spreads. He closes his eyes and turns to the side, but he still has to raise a hand, has to betray the break that he feels in his chest.

He wanted. He wanted that so badly, bad enough for it to hurt. He wanted to be there, to never leave her, to be together for the good times she deserved now that the bad ones were done.

He wanted to be 'Mom Shi.' It was the only name he would ever treasure, far more than Dog or Shinsou Hitoshi. Even more than 27.

It was more than expectation and meaning, it was a promise. A promise he wanted desperately to keep for her, for himself. He wanted to be there.

He wanted to win.

"I'm sorry," 27 said, clearing his throat afterwards to hide how close he was to crying, kneeling in front of Eri to hug her close. "I'm sorry I made you worried. Y-your signing is getting really-y good."

Eri pulls back, her small hands brushing away his tears, and he feels the break too keenly. He felt it every time she's dried his tears, he's felt the humiliation. The disappointment in himself. And more than all of that, he feels overwhelmed to know that she cares.

She shouldn't, not now. Not after what he did, after he forced his way into her head again and held her under his control. But she did. She wanted him, even if she didn't need him.

And that was enough.

An Honest Conversation

Chapter Summary

27 is kept away from Eri and away from school yet again, but that only gives him an opportunity to find the answers he's been looking for. Aizawa expects that nothing will come from staying with Shinsou today, certainly nothing relevant to the investigation, and he doesn't doubt that Shinsou will find his company far less enjoyable than Yamada's. But he's proven wrong.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Brief mention of torture, Brief mention of 50, Dissociation,

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa kept Shinsou at home with Yamada yesterday after trying to question him about The Miasma, and soon after Aizawa and Eri left for school, Shinsou got into the ventilation system of the dorm and stayed there half the day. Shinsou believes that he abused Eri with his quirk after being forced to use it on her so often at the 8 Precepts. Aizawa showed Shinsou a sketch of the Boss of The Miasma, which was provided by Chisaki, in hopes that Shinsou would identify him or tell him where The Miasma was located. While Shinsou was messaging 1-A while he was in the vents, Iida assumed that Shinsou's investigation was reaching its end and told him that there would be a grace period before he would be moved from UA to a new home, assuming that was what was distressing Shinsou. Prior to that, several students noticed that Shinsou wasn't acting like himself and asked him to keep replying. Prior to that, Ashido was 'threatening' Aizawa after assuming that Aizawa didn't react well to Shinsou's name-sign for him and that Shinsou was upset because of that. In the chat, Shinsou compared Bakugo to Rikiya, which Bakugo reacted poorly to, and Shinsou tried to say it wasn't insulting because he considered Rikiya a friend. Shinsou used the 1-A chat to get information about Aizawa to make his name sign for his birthday. Most of Class 1-A is trying to hide the existence of the group chat from Aizawa, but Bakugo is the only one who has let him know about it. Aizawa asked Bakugo to convince Shinsou to cooperate with the investigation yesterday, after Bakugo found out that Shinsou would be meeting with Chisaki. While Aizawa and Bakugo were having that conversation, Eri ran outside because she didn't want to do a 'Horn Trick.' Shinsou's name-sign for Aizawa was 'Zawa Hero.' Before the raid on the 8 Precepts, Aizawa was supposed to investigate a thief who was using their quirk to steal from a bookstore, and that thief was Shinsou, but Aizawa moved the case to someone else to be at UA more often after Kamino Ward. Shinsou has avoided using his right hand, because it shakes and is less coordinated with certain actions after Chisaki used his quirk to destroy and remake it. Before Aizawa showed Shinsou the picture of Boss, he said that The Miasma was still active and still hurting innocent people. Eri told Aizawa that Shinsou's mother 'gave him away.' Shinsou thinks that Aizawa knows almost everything about The Miasma because he only asked for Boss' name and the location of the compound. After Shinsou was rescued, he was taken to a juvenile prison facility after nearly being killed by Bug, and was attacked by 127, which was recorded on security footage and shown to Aizawa before Shinsou became Yamada's ward.

The morning came, and Aizawa felt the dread nearly overwhelm him, enough to make an embarrassing nuisance of himself while he watched his husband get ready for the day.

“It’s too soon for them to be separated for that long,” Aizawa says, fully aware of how hypocritical he’s being. “Eri doesn’t have to go to school-“

“Shou,” Hizashi interrupts sharply, his head falling back and nearly ruining his hair before the gel dried. “You need to patch things up with Shinsou, and I know if Eri stayed home, you’d spend all your time with her to avoid talking to Shinsou. And if that means that I have to take on the absolutely grueling task of spending all day with my little bean, I guess I’ll just have to ‘fight on’, ”

Aizawa was allowed to be jealous, especially with that smug grin egging him on. “She won’t be happy to be away from him for that long.”

“I know,” Hizashi said, his grin softening a bit before he clapped a hand on Aizawa’s shoulder. “But she doesn’t know how to get into the ventilation system when she’s not happy.”

Aizawa quickly pulled out his phone to resolve that situation before it could come to fruition. Though he was a bit more equipped to pull Shinsou out of the vents with the capture scarf if necessary, he didn’t want to resort to something so forceful.

Especially when today would be miserable enough for them already.

27 glared at the robot on the other side of the vent cover, its mechanical arms stretched across it and locking the cover in place. He patted his empty pocket, where the phone had been before his owner took it, before he looked around his room, convincing himself that it couldn’t be more different from his room at The Miasma.

He wasn’t trapped here, not exactly. He was free to go to his room, free to leave it. But his owner was on the other side of that door, and he knew what he wanted, despite the lies he offered to lure him into complacency, to lower his guard.

“ You don’t have to talk about the investigation unless you want to. ”

His owner must be surprised he could breathe on his own, he must think he was that stupid . The investigation was the only reason he was here, the only reason his owner didn’t go to school today. His owner had plans to make him talk, and he should just be grateful that Eri wouldn’t know, that she would be kept away from it.

For now, he was left to wait, and his owner probably hoped that the wait would be unbearable without the phone. But he still had plenty of distractions.

27 pulled out the math test from the desk drawer while he waited for the laptop to turn on. He even considered pulling a book from the shelf to further prove how many distractions he had, how many things he could do. He wasn't trapped in the room, waiting for Bug to take him to train, or bring him a meal. He wasn't counting his paces, or the dripping of the faucet.

...34, 35 . 35 taps of his finger, and the laptop was ready to use. He opened the Internet, and typed quickly, nerves rising as he forced himself to look at those words. Even if he didn't speak them aloud, even if no one but himself knew that he typed them, they were an accusation all the same. A confession of his greatest crime.

'Cure for mental quirk abuse.'

There wasn't one. There was only treatment. Therapy, medication. Some mental quirks could rewrite the damage already done, making their users highly sought after specialists in their fields.

He spends an inordinate amount of time searching their names, trying to find one in Japan. He's kidnapped a few people on jobs, but never on his own. He's always been told exactly where the target would be, what they'd answer to. He was driven to the location, and only needed to be used for his quirk. A quirk that harmed them, would harm the person he needed to kidnap to help heal Eri.

But Eri didn't need to be healed.

One of those specialists wrote a book about Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome, and the website about it listed the symptoms. Disorganized thinking, paranoid delusions (often that other people could read their mind), suicidal ideation, self harm (often tied to delusions about bugs being underneath the skin), extreme social withdrawal, trembling in the extremities, whitening of the hair.

Eri didn't have any of those symptoms.

27 stared at each entry on the list, then searched for the symptoms over and over, to make sure the list wasn't incomplete. He turned each line over in his head, trying to find how badly Eri suffered from it.

Eri could get distracted, she could mumble over one thought and into a completely different subject. But that was normal for an under stimulated child.

Eri had little superstitions, and tended to place a great deal of power into little actions or totems, but that was also normal for her age. It could also be a coping mechanism.

Eri wasn't suicidal, she didn't self-harm, she wasn't socially withdrawn at all . Her hands and feet didn't shake, and her hair had always been white.

Eri...was fine.

27 holds his head in his hands, just trying to breathe. Trying not to laugh, or cry, he doesn't know what he should feel.

He was so fucking lucky. After the thousands of times that he quirked Eri, she was fine .

He couldn't explain why he was still able to control her without any verbal response, without asking a question, but whatever caused it wasn't a symptom of quirk abuse. He searched for that answer several different ways, before finding an article about mind reading quirks. Overuse of mental quirks doesn't make it easier with each repetition. Whether it was his quirk evolving, or something else, it didn't matter. He still wouldn't use it.

He still could have hurt his mother.

He nearly types it out several times, before he erases it. He doesn't remember her name, he doesn't know if he even knows enough to find her. If he could handle finding her, seeing a picture of her at an older age. After the years went by, as cruel as they were to him, they might have been crueler to her. She might be dead.

She might have killed herself because of him. Because of his quirk.

He feels the numbness in his skull, and tries to ignore it, but he knows that will only make it worse. He needs a distraction, and he taps his finger against the desk to count the taps before he reminds himself that he has other distractions.

He reaches for the phone before he forgets himself, then turns his eyes to the math test. He hasn't answered the questions that Bakugo taught him to answer, and he might be able to answer more of them just by figuring it out, working with the pieces he knew to work out a solution to one he couldn't fully answer.

He doesn't have the pen that Yamada gave him, or the highlighters, but he doesn't need them. It doesn't matter if his circles are shaky, messy attempts. He has a plan.

He can show a broken piece if they'll be able to pull it out of him, and take another piece of the 8 Precepts away.

Aizawa turns the phone over in his hand, watching the screen unlock before he turns it over again, staring at the closed door of the office afterwards.

He knows it's wrong, he doesn't need Hizashi's eventual scolding to remind him of that. He's the one who saw firsthand how little Eri and Shinsou had, that all their worldly possessions didn't fill a single box at the evidence locker. Beyond that, he knows that Shinsou treasures this phone, and it's clear in the way he treats it.

But he can't let his students know about the meeting with Chisaki. He can't face another student boiling with well-deserved rage and betrayal, facing the reality that heroes are useless as often as they're saviors. Facing the fact that despite everything that Aizawa has done, it's been for nothing. That even after the raid, Shinsou will still be under Chisaki's thumb tomorrow.

The phone vibrates with another chat notification, and Aizawa unlocks the screen again before he turns it back over.

He could look. He's highly tempted to. Bakugo doesn't know what the investigation is looking for, that any little piece of information about the Nomu Organization could prove to be instrumental. Something as small as Shinsou mentioning a restaurant or town that he's visited could be a lead that breaks the case.

But he wouldn't do this to a student. He's invaded Shinsou's privacy far beyond what he's comfortable with already, though that was hardly his choice. He needed to know what Naomasa found, without any doubt that Naomasa was withholding anything. And with how fruitless the keylogger has proven to be, he doesn't exactly have high hopes for these chats that Shinsou has been using.

But he needs to know. To use any tool that's available to him. He's done far worse already, and looking through a teenager's phone is hardly as traumatizing as showing him the sketch of someone he's sure has abused him.

And he's curious. He still knows nothing about the teenager that's been living with him, beyond the simplest things that he's offered in that 'Like' game. He likes coffee, cats, and learning. It's not enough to know anything about Shinsou, and he knows for a fact that his students know him better than that.

He can see immediately that Shinsou isn't as active as he seemed to be on these chats. Several have old unread messages, some haven't been fully set up. The most active one seems to be the Class 1-A chat, and that's the one he opens first.

It crashes immediately, stalling to load all of the unread messages before it shuts down, but Aizawa ignores the irrational thought that this might be a sign not to continue. He relaunches the app, and finds his students are interested to know why Shinsou is absent again today, and why he's absent as well.

Several are concerned, especially after he didn't take a single day off to recover from USJ, and they note that immediately. But others correctly assume that he's watching Shinsou today, and incorrectly assume that Shinsou must actually be sick. They had apparently been told about the 'Project' that Shinsou had with Hizashi, but now believe that was a cover story for Eri's sake.

Aizawa scrolls up, reading messages about their study plans, their anxieties building towards the midterms, before he finds the messages that Shinsou sent.

Iida. Aizawa closes his eyes and lets his head fall against the back of the chair. They hadn't told Shinsou that his placement here was temporary for a reason, and Iida had given Shinsou yet another reason not to cooperate with the investigation. At this point, the investigation was all but over, knowing that Shinsou would fight tooth and nail to keep from being removed from Eri.

But Aizawa continued reading, catching on the concern that his students clearly had at the time. Pleading for Shinsou to keep responding, as though they were worried that he was a suicide risk.

'They want information. I can't give it to them...if I'm not around, take care of Eri. Don't talk about me after that.'

That absolutely sounded like Shinsou was at risk, and he feels a swell of pride that his students reacted somewhat appropriately, even without training. But he knows that Shinsou wasn't at risk at the time, he was in a vent. And when he reads it again, his eyes catch on Shinsou's words. 'I can't give it to them.'

He knew that Shinsou was trained not to give that information away. Even if he didn't allow himself to dwell on it, he knew that training likely included torture. That his hands curled around the scars on his arms every time he was pressed too much because a scar was likely a reminder not to speak, one or many of them. Or all of them.

He scrolls up to distract himself from that thought, from the lingering desire to close this application and forget everything he's seen so far, before he sees Chisaki's name.

'Chisaki made her do it.'

He's noticed it. Eri has done that in front of him. She couldn't say 'Nemuri' once and she clapped her hands, too close to her face, and he noticed the flinch. He said nothing. He did nothing but watch while an echo of Chisaki took control of Eri again.

He has another reason to pour over these chats now.

‘ Floaty, you owe me 2 questions. ’

It seems that the ‘Like’ game wasn’t the only way Shinsou traded for information. He counted questions that he answered, to exchange for more information. He doesn’t know whether to be horrified that Shinsou seemed to play games when he wanted to interact with people, likely lacking enough socialization to know how to do so without some sort of structure, or horrified by his own thoughts. How quickly he started wondering how he could use this ‘Question Game’ into an interrogation tactic, before he realized how damaging that would be.

He’s learning more about Shinsou, but much like the keylogger, he doesn’t like what he finds.

He finds an explanation for Ashido rubbing her hands together and glaring at him during homeroom yesterday, but when he sees ‘Pure Boiii’s question, he can’t fault her for it.

‘ What name sign did you make for Aizawa-sensei? Did he like it?’ ‘Skip.’

He notes every little detail that Shinsou provides about Eri’s habits, and doesn’t miss that ‘Genesis,’ likely Yaoyorozu’s username, knows that Shinsou was unsettled to be away from Eri yesterday. He also doesn’t miss how casually his class brushes off Shinsou’s death threats should they tell Eri that he’s sick.

He still doesn’t know how many of them have accepted Shinsou as a ward, and whether they want to protect and comfort him as a part of a duty that a hero holds or whether they see him as an extension of Eri. But it’s clear that they care about Shinsou deeply, in a way that makes him proud to see.

‘ Rikiya was nice. He was my friend. ’

Rikiya was a monster . He had been one of the torturers, all of the 8 Expendables were. They took turns beating Shinsou with their quirks, with their fists, while Shinsou was still struggling to stand after the bleach torture. He knows that wasn’t the only time, he knows that Shinsou had endured more violence than he admitted to in that statement he gave about the 8 Precepts, because the bleach torture wasn’t in it. Neither was the beating. Shinsou only wrote about what happened to Eri, how Eri wasn’t fed enough, how Eri was tortured.

Aizawa had never considered the possibility that Shinsou could see one of the 8 Expendables as a friend. That he would be so used to violence to see any small absence of it as a gift, and he’s not even sure if Rikiya gave him that. He doesn’t know why Shinsou considered him a friend, but he knows that he wasn’t. The more he considers the possible explanations, the more it unsettles him.

‘ Even Rappa could be flipped when he overextended himself. ’

He finds himself mirroring the same reaction that his students had. He’s never considered that Shinsou had fought the 8 Expendables.

He knows with the casual way that Shinsou says that, that it wasn’t an escape attempt. And it wasn’t a single occurrence either. Shinsou, a half-starved teenager with years of training apparent in the way that he carried himself, had been pitted against those formidable criminals time and time again. They were older than him, they were well fed and healthy. He knows from experience that some of the worst fights are with strength-enhanced foes, as someone who also lacks a physically enhancing quirk. And his quirk cancels those quirks.

Shinsou faced them, and won. Not often, but the fact that he did at all is almost too surreal to believe.

Shinsou put a lot of effort into his name sign.

Aizawa knew it from the first time he saw it. He saw how fluid the sign was, knew immediately that Shinsou had practiced it several times. He didn't realize how much effort he put into it, that he enlisted the help of his students. Bargained for information. That Shinsou was trying to find information about him to fit his name sign.

That the 'Like' game was another attempt to do that.

Aizawa closes the app, and turns the phone over on his desk. They've been playing games instead of talking, they're both interested to know about each other, and he should have realized that from the start.

It was logical that Shinsou didn't know how to connect with people without a structure to guide the conversation, rules made clear and goals made more attainable. Whatever socialization he had at the Nomu Organization, it was lacking, and Shinsou relied on what little he remembered from his life before that.

Shinsou was a child, and he knew how to play games.

But Aizawa wasn't a child, and he should teach Shinsou how to interact with people honestly. Even if they started with the games and moved outwards, now that he knew that Shinsou wanted to know more about him, he owed it to Shinsou to have an honest conversation with him. To answer Shinsou's questions, even if his own weren't answered. He would make it clear to Shinsou that this wasn't an interrogation tactic. This was beyond the investigation entirely.

He and Shinsou lived together, and they shouldn't be strangers to each other. This awkward separation was both of their faults, but Aizawa could break it down, little by little. Now that he knew that there was more than fear on the other side, there was a flicker of interest. Whether Shinsou still wanted to know more about Aizawa now, after the line of questioning, after that betrayal, he doesn't know. But he could ask.

Before Aizawa stands to do so, he hears the chirp from his phone, and pulls up the keylogger.

And he realizes that they needed to have another conversation entirely.

Shouta wasn't kidding about Eri being unhappy to be away from Shinsou.

Yamada watched Eri pick at her lunch, her little frown deepening every time she looked up at the door, hoping that Shinsou would come through it. Hoping that she could point out all the little side dishes she organized, or the rice balls that she decorated. Hoping to watch him eat any part of it that he would, to scold him when he didn't eat enough of it.

It was a little easier to distract her during class, but he was running out of homework and quizzes that needed grading. He'd likely need to steal some from Nemuri or Ectoplasm at this rate, to keep her occupied until his free period where they could spend some quality time going over JSL or English, or both. Whichever his little bean felt like learning today.

He looks over at the little 'confidential meeting' going on between Jirou and Midnight in the corner, catching another cold look from Jirou when she notices. He's still not sure why that little listener has always seemed to hold a grudge against him, even before the exam where he faced off against her and Koda, but he can take a hint. Especially when it didn't seem to affect her studies, with her English scores being one of the highest ones in his class.

Eri taps her chopsticks against the side of the bento box, as though she's tempted to give up on finishing her lunch with the weight of missing Shinsou weighing so heavily on her, and he gives in. "Hey Eri, do you know what Shinsou likes to eat? I'm still trying to figure out what his favorite food is, but he still won't tell me! I think I need a little inside scoop from my favorite little listener."

Eri perks up at the mention of Shinsou's name, but the pout returns quick enough, her head tilting to the side. "He doesn't like oatmeal, but I don't know if he likes chicken. He didn't tell me what he likes either."

"Why don't you play that question game with him?" Jirou asks, and Yamada is surprised to see her looking in his direction, even if that little glare returns when she sees him looking back. "Don't you think it's a little irresponsible to live with someone when you don't even know that much about them?"

"Maybe! That's why I'm trying to figure it out, listener!" Yamada replies, just a little too jovially to cover up the sting from Jirou's words. He knows that he should know more about Shinsou. Shinsou trusts him more than anyone else other than Eri, and he has a responsibility to know more about Shinsou in turn. He's his caretaker, and it's pretty hard to call himself that when he can't even plan a well-deserved comfort meal for him. "What's the deal-io with the question game? I've never heard about it!"

Jirou starts tugging at the end of her aux-lobes, glancing away, and he knows that she's about to lie to him. But he hopes that enough of the truth still slips out. "When he chats with other people, he does this thing where he only answers questions if he has one he wants answered. So it's an even exchange." The cold look returns, and he imagines that she was trying to hide the existence of the group chat that he and Aizawa are already incredibly aware of. "Seriously, you're supposed to be his caretaker and everything, and you don't know about that?"

"I didn't know either," Eri mutters, bringing panic over Jirou's features.

"Eri, I didn't mean it like that--"

The door to the staff room flies open, Bakugo's usual entrance cutting off Jirou's attempts to console Eri. Kirishima is right behind him, smiling apologetically while he hovers behind Bakugo, and looks like he wants to pull him back out of the room when Bakugo sets his sights on Yamada. "Oi, I need to talk to Shitsou, so I'm going to your place after school."

Jirou sighs in frustration, running a hand over her face. "Can you seriously just drop it? You're not gonna--"

"I'm gonna fucking stop it, so don't tell me shit!" Bakugo snarls, tucking his hands into his pockets when he looks at Yamada again. "Aizawa-sensei told me to talk to Shitsou, and he's not answering the fucking chat, so I'm gonna do this shit face-to-face. Alright?"

Yamada takes a moment to take in how bloodshot Bakugo's eyes are, the rings of exhaustion around them, and another to take a very deep breath. This was not just midterm nerves, and he should have known better. Shouta should have known better. "So! Before we do that, let's have a chat, alright? Let's step out to...."

Bakugo jerks his chin towards the window, likely catching the hesitation while Yamada fumbles to find a private place to have this conversation, in a staff room that is becoming less and less private.

“Aizawa-sensei jumped out that fucking window last time.”

“He...does that,” Yamada said, still trying to find any other option, but coming up with none.

He shot a look at Midnight, who nodded, already read into the little flight risk that Eri could become if left to her own devices, and led Bakugo to the window in question.

He and Shouta needed to have a chat, about a lot of things, and though the window hopping was one of them, it certainly wouldn’t be the first order of business.

The first order of business would be why on Earth Shouta would put that pressure on Bakugo.

Aizawa watches Shinsou pick at his lunch, and tries to turn the situation over in his head.

An honest conversation. He owed that to Shinsou, he owed it to the child sitting in front of him that didn’t know to learn more about the person that he had to live with. He should have offered it sooner, but Hizashi was right. He avoided it, and it wasn’t all due to avoiding distressing Shinsou.

It was made so apparent with the shirt that Shinsou was wearing, the Lemillion shirt that Hizashi had made during his short-lived hobby of crafting hero merch. Aizawa found himself staring at the shirt to avoid the sight of those scars, but in doing so, he realized the reason he had retreated so readily from Shinsou.

Lemillion was a hero that Shinsou recognized, the one that he saw during the raid. Eraserhead wasn’t, ‘Zawa Hero’ was a new and short lived development, and deservedly so.

But Eraserhead could have been the first hero that Shinsou saw, if he had kept that case on his docket.

He knows better than to turn situations like these over and over, to play the ‘what if’ game. He’s lectured on the subject enough times to hear his own words echoing back at him, but he still wonders. If he had followed Shinsou from the bookstore, would Shinsou have spoken to him about his situation? Would he have done it for Eri’s sake? Would they have rescued Eri sooner, the raid taking fewer casualties?

What difference could a month have made for both of the wards, for Togata? For Sir Nighteye?

Would Shinsou have trusted him more after that raid, after that rescue? Would the investigation into the Nomu Organization been easier to close if he had that trust, if he had proven himself that much?

Would Shinsou have fought him as soon as he spotted him, to return to the 8 Precepts and return to Eri?

‘ The erasure of quirks is an attractive- ’

Aizawa stops that line of thought as soon as it comes, as soon as he does the math. If he had slipped up, if he had been caught off guard for even a second, things would have turned into a far different ruin. One that he doesn’t want to think about, doesn’t want to consider being under that blindfold and under that yakuza bastard’s scrutiny any longer than he was during the raid. If he took that case, he would have worked it alone, but he doubts that Shinsou was ever alone when he was allowed outside. And he doubts that Chisaki’s interest in his quirk would have been a secret.

He wants to know more about Shinsou as he is now, he wants to have an honest conversation with him. And Shinsou is making an effort to be honest in a way he didn't expect to see.

He's using his right hand.

He doesn't actually try to eat any of the food in front of him, and Aizawa doubts that he could if he tried. His hand shakes violently, and it seems to be an effort just to hold his chopsticks in place, though they slip too. Aizawa doesn't know if he should mention it, or if he should just heat up more steamed buns so that Shinsou can eat something that doesn't require as much hand coordination.

He doesn't know if this is a game, but he's willing to play a game with Shinsou at first, as long as it's an honest one. Disguising an honest conversation.

"I want to play the question game with you," Aizawa says, Shinsou's violet eyes locking on his for just a moment before he glances to the side. A promising tell. "You ask me a question, and after I answer it, I'll ask you one. It won't be about the investigation. Just to get to know each other."

He fights the urge to lean his head forward, to tuck his chin into his scarf or have his hair fall to cover his expression, because he's already taken precautions to stop either of those things from happening. His scarf is in the office, his hair is tied back. It never fails to make him feel vulnerable, but they can both be vulnerable now.

Shinsou stares at him, head tilting slightly though his expression remains blank. He places his chopsticks down, the act of pretending to eat now forgotten, though he doesn't seem to know how to start the game. He runs a hand over the back of his neck before he stiffens and pulls it back, his hands resting in front of him before he begins to sign.

' People you're looking for. Not innocent. '

Aizawa feels his mouth twitch into a frown, realizing who Shinsou is referring to. Realizing that he can still avoid naming the organization, before he remembers that this conversation isn't about the investigation at all. He should make an effort to get to know Shinsou.

But there's another conversation that they need to have, and this might be the way to do it.

"You were a part of that organization when you were four years old, correct?" Shinsou doesn't nod, doesn't answer at all, but Aizawa doesn't want to consider that there might have been another criminal that had taken Shinsou after his mother 'gave him away.' That there might be more owners than there were brands, and that Shinsou might have been traded more often than any given item at a second-hand shop. "I can't imagine what crimes a four year old could commit to make them any less innocent."

He wants to ask if Shinsou was an anomaly. If the Nomu Organization didn't have a habit of taking children, if they took adults instead. Vagrants, drug addicts, people that weren't missed and weren't looked for as hard as missing children. If Shinsou's quirk was just too tempting for them, too well suited to what they wanted to use him for. The weapon that they made from a small child.

He won't ask, because this isn't related to the investigation. He wants Shinsou to give him a hint of what he already knows from the keylogger, so that he can reassure him more directly. But Shinsou doesn't respond, his hands flat on the table. "Even if a child like Eri did something heinous with her quirk, she couldn't be blamed for it. Children that young don't have control over their quirks."

That strikes something in Shinsou, like he knew it would. He sees the sharp inhale, the flinch in his hands before he raises them to answer. ‘ E-R-I not. Quirk not like mine. My quirk villainous. ’

It’s not the clearest confession of his worries, but it’s still workable. The leap that he takes can still be believable, and the keylogger’s existence can still be hidden. “ ‘Villainous’ because of its capabilities, or ‘villainous’ because of the risk of Mental Quirk Abuse?”

Shinsou’s eyes widen before he looks down, curling into himself as though he’s waiting for a blow, and Aizawa looks away himself. He might have come across too bluntly.

“Eri was evaluated at the hospital, before she was released,” Aizawa says, wanting to address what he knows is Shinsou’s most pressing concern. “She doesn’t have any symptoms, or any evidence of damage associated with that syndrome. Not all mental quirks can cause it, and some believe that there has to be a harmful intent behind each use to cause damage.”

Shinsou still doesn’t look up, but his hands lift to sign. ‘ Question game. My mom has it. ’

Aizawa expected that the first few questions wouldn’t be questions at all, though he did have a small amount of hope that they would be. He brushes it off regardless, considering whether a reassuring lie would be convincing enough when he didn’t know the answer. “She doesn’t.”

He watches Shinsou sigh in relief, his hands raising to his face before he remembers himself, sitting up straight. Looking at Aizawa again before he glances to the side, but he looks back, gaze settling slightly to the left. ‘ Your turn. ’

He imagines that Shinsou doesn’t believe that this conversation won’t turn into an interrogation, and he imagines that Shinsou would answer even if it did. That he would consider a reassuring lie to be an even exchange for the information that he has guarded so resolutely. But Aizawa won’t take that opportunity. “Have you ever had a cat?”

He can see that Shinsou seems surprised, watching his eyes widen and head tilt just slightly in the pause he takes. ‘ No. ’ His hands curl inward, but he doesn’t ask a question. ‘ Cat toy. M-O-C-H-A. ’

Aizawa knows that Shinsou knows enough JSL to be clearer with his words, but he also knows that Shinsou might be signing in a purposefully vague way. He doesn’t know if Shinsou is referring to the stuffed animal in his room, or one that he had at some point in his childhood, but he takes note of the name anyway. “Your fondness for coffee must have started from a young age.”

He sees a twitch next to Shinsou’s mouth, but doesn’t know whether he’s fighting a smile or frown. He guards his expression too well, even now. ‘ Your favorite coffee. ’

“Black, dark roast,” Aizawa answers, holding back a deluge of brands and brewing methods that would put Midoriya’s ramblings to shame. “Sometimes Americano, if I don’t need as much caffeine. Have you ever had a Mocha?”

‘ No, ’ Shinsou answers, one hand curling in before he signs again. ‘ Y-A-M-A-D-A wants food. I want M-O-C-H-A tomorrow. If okay. ’

Aizawa nods, already seeing through Shinsou too clearly. Hizashi gave him an invitation to make his preferences known, and Shinsou accepted it. But he still sees it as an exchange of some sort, rather than a gesture of kindness. Kindness was just that foreign to Shinsou. “There’s a good coffee shop by the station. Hizashi isn’t exactly a trained barista, though he tried to pick it up as a hobby.”

Aizawa looks at Shinsou’s arms again, forcing himself not to look at the scars, and instead at the black band still left on his arm. Shinsou hides things well, but this might be too much for him to hide, and Aizawa can see it clearly now.

Shinsou is afraid of the meeting tomorrow, and the black band, the empty space where Chisaki's brand was could be a way of reassuring himself. But Aizawa could offer something better. "The meeting will take place at the police station, at 5. Eri will be with Togata, and both Hizashi and I will go with you. We will be outside the room, while you and Naomasa meet with Chisaki and his lawyer. Chisaki is supposed to apologize to you, but if he deviates from that, or if he tries to threaten you, the meeting will end. And it won't happen again."

Shinsou nods shakily, his hands lifting to sign a few times before he places them back down. Aizawa waits, hoping that the relief he wanted to provide was enough. The knowledge of what was to come could be some kind of relief, though he didn't know if it would be any more bearable. 'Time now.'

Aizawa pulls out his phone, before he realizes that he's pulled out Shinsou's. He lays it down on the table between them. "12:37. You can have your phone back as long as you don't tell my students about the meeting."

Aizawa still doesn't trust him not to, but he forces himself to pretend he does. He wouldn't blame Shinsou if he did, if he reached out to his students the same way he reached out to Bakugo. But he took from a child who had nothing, to protect his students. And in a selfish way, protect himself from knowing how disappointed and disillusioned in him they were.

Shinsou doesn't take the phone, but he looks at it long enough that Aizawa knows he wants to. Instead, he signs.

'I want to go outside. 4 hours and one minute. Will give useless information in exchange. Can.' Shinsou stops, glancing away before he looks back. 'Can give phone in exchange.'

Aizawa was willing to play these games of exchange to learn more about Shinsou, but he's learned little else than how deep these games run. That every little interaction has to be a trade, every request he makes needs to be paid for. Even for something as simple as going outside, something that he does for Eri regardless of how difficult that little request can be at times.

Shinsou shouldn't feel like a prisoner here, but he does. And when he was a prisoner under the 8 Precepts, he imagines that those trips outside also had to be bargained for. This is what Shinsou knows, this is the game that he knows how to play.

Aizawa won't take the phone, and he feels all the more disgusted with himself for taking it in the first place. But he will play the game if that makes Shinsou more comfortable.

"We can go outside after you eat, at least half of that," Aizawa stipulates, knowing that the full meal was likely too much for Shinsou, though he wanted to make sure it was an option. "I can make some steamed buns if that would be easier."

Shinsou shakes his head, taking up the chopsticks with his left hand, but Aizawa no longer sees it as a deception.

They could play an honest game with each other, and they owed it to each other to do so now.

27 picks at the scarf around his neck, trying to calm his nerves. He asked for this, and that much was a risk. He hadn't been sure if his owner would allow it, but he seemed to be in a generous mood today.

He has the phone back, but he won't use it. He won't flaunt it, won't inspire his owner to take it again. Instead, he works on the math test, but finds himself at a point that he can't guess the answers anymore.

His owner sits in front of him at the table outside, sometimes staring at his phone, sometimes reading a book about feral cats. Despite how insistent he was that 27 should wear a jacket and scarf, he isn't wearing one. If it's a ploy to make 27 somehow pity his owner, it shouldn't work, but it does.

27 checks the time on his phone, and an hour still hasn't passed, but he begins the exchange anyway. 'Pick a number.'

His owner looks back at him, from where he had been staring off across the campus. He knows that his owner saw him sign, that he doesn't have to repeat himself, but he feels like he should. That he should have found a way to phrase it in a way that didn't come across so demanding. "1."

27 feels his eyebrows come together, and tucks his chin into the scarf as though that would hide it. His owner must not know what he was offering, if they knew enough about The Miasma to only want Boss' name and the compound's location, they had to know about Numbers. 'Never existed. Could be too proud.'

The first Number was 2, and they died long before 27 was purchased. Even 10 never met them, but he heard how much they boasted that they were the first. That they were the real number 1 because of that. They were sloppy in their work, and Bug finished them off after too many complaints. It was a lesson to never think too much about your number, never place any stock in it. The number was a name, and that was all it was.

He wonders if he should offer his owner another chance to pick, but that would defeat the purpose of the game. Every hour, he could pick a Number, and 27 would tell them what he knew about that Number. They probably knew their quirks, but 27 could offer better information. How they fought, what their weaknesses were. His owner might still have that information already, but there was a chance that he didn't.

It was useful information, but 27 could surrender it. He had to, to have this chance to be outside longer than he ever had been before.

He had been so close yesterday. Just another hour, and he would have passed that threshold. His jobs always lasted 4 hours, on the dot, and Chisaki had given him an hour and a half at most to be outside. If he could stay outside longer than that, he could convince himself that this was better. That this place really was better than The Miasma and the 8 Precepts.

He could feel more normal if he did, more than having a phone made him feel. He could close his eyes and imagine he was a person, a person who was allowed to do things like this. To be outside whenever he wanted to.

His owner looks confused, before his lips thin out in irritation. Maybe he should offer him another chance, maybe he should just tell him every Number that he knows, and drag it out to the point that he gets to stay outside regardless. He just wants this, he wants to pretend he can do this even if he can't. "Shinsou, we don't have to talk about the investigation."

It's so odd. 27 can't wrap his mind around this play, how insistent his owner is that he doesn't have to talk about the investigation. He's here for the investigation, that's the only reason that they're living together, the only reason that 27 isn't in jail right now. But his owner is acting more odd than usual, and 27 just has to accept that this is another one of his oddities, his false tells. The same way that his owner tried to insist that he wasn't a criminal when he was 4 years old.

He was. He was a criminal from the day that his quirk manifested. His owner just hasn't seen his quirk in action, how disturbing it is. No one should have the power to take over another's mind, to make them look so blank, so soulless. There's a reason that 27 can. He was born to be a criminal.

He was never innocent. 'It's fine. Trade. Every hour.'

27 looks back at the test, but he still doesn't know what it's asking for. He was able to solve most of the questions that asked what 'x' was, going through the basic arithmetic that he knew to figure out the number hidden behind the 'x.' But now the 'x' was on top of a fraction, and equivalent to another fraction. He doesn't know how to solve that one.

He should be better with numbers, being a Number. Seeing people behind some of the answers that he works out. 'X' becomes 127, becomes 98, becomes 58. Some of the 'x's are just stories that he's heard from 10, some of them are dead. He doesn't know what he would do if one of the 'x's were 50, if he would even be able to answer it. If he could convince himself that circling the answer wasn't tarnishing her memory in some way, to use her number like that.

"Would you like me to look over your test?" His owner asks, and 27 remembers that he's also a teacher. Yamada was supposed to be the one to grade his test, but his owner could too. He slides the test across the table, but keeps the notes that Eri wrote for him for the Hero Ethics class he missed yesterday.

He reads the first few lines before he realizes that his owner is still staring at him, and he looks up to confirm it. His owner is so odd, he almost looks bewildered to see 27 reading those notes. Eri wrote them for a reason, though 27 still doesn't know how she had caught on to his interest so easily.

"You...pay attention to my class?" His owner asks, and again, he seems surprised. 27 didn't write notes like the students did, had little reason to when the concepts seemed simple enough to follow. But the material was interesting, far more interesting than Chisaki's long winded lectures about Hero Syndrome and Quirk Plagues, and he would have listened even if his owner wasn't the one teaching it.

27 nods, and wonders if he should start asking questions again. His owner has taken two turns in a row without a question in return, but he's not sure if they're still supposed to be playing the Question Game. Before he thinks of one, his owner cups a hand over the back of his neck, and looks back at the compound before he stands.

"I'm going inside for a minute, don't..." His owner pauses, hand tightening into a near fist before it relaxes. "I would prefer if you stayed there while I'm gone."

27 nods, unsure why his owner worded his order so awkwardly. If it's a test, it's one it's an easy one to pass. He doesn't have anywhere else to go.

He likes this place. He likes living at UA, because sometimes when he closes his eyes, he can pretend that he's living here as a person. That he can have things like food, trips outside, and instruction on subjects he's interested in for free.

He knows they're not free, but it's easy to pretend.

Aizawa wraps the red woolen scarf around his neck, watching the coffee drip into a thermos, and tries to wrap his head around what this situation has become.

Shinsou paid attention to his Hero Ethics class. Willingly .

He didn't even hesitate to pick up his lesson plans from the office, still wondering if he should start from the beginning of the year for class 3-A's lecture notes or whether he should start from the very beginning with class 1-A's. If Shinsou might notice the difference and be insulted that the first topic was a discussion of what the word 'Ethics' really meant.

If they could even have a discussion, if Shinsou's interest in the subject was enough to finally crack the wall built up between them. If his signing could finally be as fluent as it was with Hizashi, rather than those stilted, awkward sentences he shared with Aizawa.

He's never been more jealous of Hizashi in his life , to know that Shinsou has been such an eager student for Hizashi, while Aizawa never imagined that Shinsou might have wanted to learn something from him.

Especially ethics. His students had to be trained to pay attention, had to be threatened more often than not. In the end, it paid off with attentive and well-educated third years who could answer both philosophical and tactical questions with no hesitation. Heroes who knew themselves well enough to answer to any situation resolutely, and without question.

Out of all of his classes, his Hero Ethics courses were the ones that he enjoyed teaching the most. Principal Nezu had offered more than once to cut them to lighten his coursework, but he never allowed it, could never be forced to choose between the homeroom that established his class as his, and his ethics courses where he could polish every Class A student into the mindset of the hero they wanted to become.

He doesn't know why Shinsou is interested in his ethics classes, and doubts that he wants to become a hero. In the back of his mind, he knows that Shinsou has the capability to be a great one, but beyond that, he knows that Shinsou isn't in a place to fathom what he wants to be when he grows up. Before Shinsou could know what occupation he wants to have as an adult, he should at least be able to pick his own clothes to wear, or be able to pass elementary school mathematics.

He's honestly a little relieved that Shinsou started looking over the notes that Eri took for him. It might be more productive for Shinsou to work on his math, but Aizawa couldn't remember how to solve that particular algebra equation, and the rest of his test was even less promising.

Aizawa tries to froth the milk with a whisk, but he realizes quickly that it isn't a proper substitute for the correct method. When he reaches for the chocolate syrup, he can practically hear Recovery Girl chiding him, but he reasons that the decaffeinated coffee and nearly completed lunch makes up for it to some degree. It's cold outside anyway.

It's not a Mocha, but it's the best that Aizawa can make, and he owes it to his newest student to start off with a good first impression.

Mirio was acting weird today.

Eri was really glad that he came to get her after Yama's free class, because she really kind of hates sitting by his desk in front of his whole class. A lot of heroes she doesn't know keep telling her she's cute, but they say it in a weird way, like they're not even talking to her. Even if she wouldn't be mean and tell Yama she doesn't like it, she's really happy she gets to skip Yama's Class C class, because he really hates it, and they'd probably be really loud when they talk about how cute she is.

She likes that she gets to walk around the school building with Mirio instead, catching monsters on his phone, but he keeps trying to hide his face, or smush it against a wall when she's not looking. She hopes that Mirio isn't getting sick, because he said that his teacher let him out of class because they're doing quirk stuff, but he might have been lying. He might actually be really sick, and if he's sick, he should be in bed instead of playing monster games with her.

"Mirio, are you okay?" Eri asks, and Mirio looks up from where he had his face smushed against a wall. His face looks really red, like people on TV do when they have a fever, or when they're really embarrassed.

He gives her a really big smile, and scratches the back of his head a lot. "Yeah! I'm super-duper! I get to hang out with my best buddy today instead of having to go to class, and da-Mic-sensei said we can hang out after school too!"

Eri leans on one of her feet to think better, because Mirio started calling Yama 'da-Mic-sensei' today, but his voice gets really squeaky and high when he says the 'Mic' part. "Are you giving Yama a new name? Everyone calls Yama 'Mic-sensei' or 'Yamada-sensei,' but since you're really good friends, you should have your own name for Yama!"

Mirio closes his mouth really tight, and tries to cover his face with his hands. "Uh, no, that's not really..." Mirio sighs really loud, and puts a hand behind his head kind of like Zawa does sometimes. "It's kind of embarrassing, but I had this really silly dream last night that Mic-sensei was my dad. And I guess I can't stop thinking about how silly it was, because I keep accidentally calling him my dad. It's just really silly, isn't it, Eri?"

Eri shakes her head. "I don't think it's silly! You both have yellow hair, and you smile a lot, and Yama worries about you a lot like a dad does! And if Yama was your dad, then you could be my real big brother!"

Eri feels her face getting really hot when she remembers that Yama isn't really her dad, he's just kind of her TV dad. It must be really silly that she forgets that too.

But it's really easy to forget that when they do all the dad stuff together, and she gets to live with Yama and Zawa like TV families do. They get to eat together, and Yama and Zawa read her bedtime stories when she asks them to. Zawa always draws cute cats on her omurice, and Yama always takes her on fun shopping trips. She kind of wishes they could pick out a name for her and adopt her already, but they took a long time to pick out their married name and ended up not picking one at all. She might have to wait until she's really old to get adopted, so she just has to be patient right now.

Mirio looks at her kind of funny, because his eyes look kind of sad, but he still has a smile. It's just kind of like his smaller one, but different. "I guess it really isn't that silly, then. Mic-sensei is a really good dad, especially for you. Right, Eri?"

Eri nods, but she still feels really embarrassed. "I don't know if I can call him that though. Yama might get mad. Or maybe Zawa would get really mad, but.... Maybe I'm not supposed to call them my dad."

Mirio does his hero pose with his fist in the air, and smiles really big at her. "We can find out! Why don't we both go to Mic-sensei, and call him 'Dad'? If he gets really mad or upset, then we'll know if it's okay or not! I can go first if you want me to!"

Eri nods a lot, because she's still kind of scared that Yama might not want her to call him 'Dad,' but she knows that he wants Mirio to, because he talks about Mirio's dad in a kind of mean voice. And if Yama doesn't like Mirio's dad, it must mean that Yama wants to be a better dad for Mirio.

Mirio picked her up, and started carrying her to Yama's class, and it was a really good idea to do that. The doors of the other classes opened up, and a lot of heroes ran out the door really quick, and Eri might have gotten lost with all the heroes around.

Yama looks kind of mad at his phone, but he looks up and smiles when Mirio walks into the classroom. "Hey listeners! Did you have fun cutting class to chase around pocket monsters?"

"Sure did, D..." Mirio stops talking, and he has to smile really big before he starts again. "Dad! Eri, did you have fun?"

Yama doesn't look like he's mad at Mirio, because he kind of looks like he's trying not to move at all. Eri can't kick one of her feet, but she knows that Mirio really wants her to call Yama 'Dad,' because he said it already. "I had a lot of fun, Dad!"

Yama still doesn't look like he's mad, but his face gets really really red, like he's really sick, and he looks behind him for a while. But then he turns around, and he has a really big, really nice smile on his face. "I'm really glad you guys had fun! We should, uh, head home I guess! School's over and all, and I know you missed seeing Shinsou today, and um. Yeah! Let's head over there, then!"

Yama picks up his stuff really quick, and he almost forgets her backpack. But when he walks over, he doesn't give her backpack back for her to carry.

Yama gives her and Mirio a really big hug, and even if she gets a little smushed trying to hug Yama back while Mirio does too, Eri still kind of likes it. Especially when Yama messes up her hair and Mirio's too, when he rubs his hands all over their heads. "I'm really glad that I've got such great kids."

Eri's really glad that she has such great dads, and she even gets to call them that.

27 shouldn't have taken the notes outside.

His owner is flipping through his book again, his frown has gotten deeper every time that he does it. He's disappointed, incredibly disappointed in how stupid 27 is. He probably regrets buying him.

He just can't answer those questions the right way.

Some of them were fine, they were fun to talk about. Tactics, the mental coordination of a fight. Those were the things that he enjoyed learning from his owner. They were things that he was good at talking about, his owner nodding and even smiling when he noted something that he had learned from experience. How to pick a weakness beneath the obvious strength, how quirks and allegiances could change the way a person fought.

But most of those questions weren't about that. They were about right or wrong, and 27 didn't know what his owner wanted to hear from him. What was right now that 27 was owned by a hero.

Chisaki abided by a unique yakuza code, and 27 learned it soon enough. The Miasma's code was to do whatever the client wanted, whatever the client thought was right was right, unless it went against The Miasma. But even when he figured out what would be the opposite of all of those codes, what should be the correct answer for a hero, his owner still frowned. At the hesitation or the answer, he didn't know.

“ What would you do in that scenario? ”

It was a test, and it felt as miserable to be unable to answer it as the math test did. 27 didn't know what his owner wanted to hear, and he had been struggling with that ever since this ethics lecture began.

He feels all the more envious of the hero students in Class 3-A for answering so readily, so assuredly. He doesn't know if they just know what his owner wanted to hear more than he did, or if they didn't have to answer in a way that pleased him. Or if they just knew their own answers because they've never had to change themselves to fit a hundred different expectations and names, shifting with every owner and client that they never had.

He checks the time again and breathes a sigh of relief to know that it's almost over, this four hour long proof that UA is different is almost done. It doesn't feel as freeing as he hoped it would be, but he could always look back on that number, four hours and one minute, and know that he was just a little more free here than he had ever been.

And his owner still hasn't picked the last three numbers. When he offered the next one, his owner waved him off, intent to discuss the standard yakuza code instead. That topic was easy to get lost in, and his owner seemed to learn more from 27 than 27 did from his owner.

He hopes that his owner won't brush him off again. ‘ Pick three numbers. ’

His owner sees his signing, he knows that, but he stares back at the notes long enough that 27 nearly repeats himself. Before he does, his owner closes them, looking at his phone before he frowns, and looks back at 27 with that same unreadably blank look.

As much as 27 hated the scrutiny that came with these hero ethics lectures, he did enjoy seeing another face that his owner could wear. Smiles, interest, even frowns. Now they were back to the investigation, back to the reminder of who they were, and why they lived together. A hero and a criminal, forced to live together for the investigation.

“50,” his owner says, and 27 wishes that he didn't. That he had said any other number, that he wouldn't ask for hers.

He knows the sign for ‘dead,’ but he doesn't want to sign it. He doesn't want to make it more real in that way, and he doesn't want to give his owner anything about her. Even if he was his owner, he could own everything else that 27 had, but he couldn't have that.

“8,” his owner says, glancing off to the side. “58.”

27 could take all three numbers as his answers, but he wants to play dumb. He will, even if he's not allowed to, just to have this chance to keep her safe. ‘ Illusion quirk. 3 meter. Affects objects and people. Voice. Appearance. Distraction jobs. Very nervous, easy to confuse. Uses G-U-N. ’

His owner nods, a bit more than he usually does, and folds his hands in front of him on the table. He looks around them again, likely making sure that this information is secure, before he asks, “Do you remember who attacked you in the cell?”

27 swallows, nearly signs that this isn't how the game is supposed to go. His owner is cheating, and he's asking for very useful information, more than 27 honestly wanted to give him. But he was allowed to be outside, he created this game knowing that risk, and he had to answer to it. ‘ 127. Invisible. 15 meter. Affects objects and people. Theft jobs. Kill jobs. Very important. Never failed. ’

27 folds his hands in front of him, willing them not to shake. Trying to get Bug's words out of his head, You won't tell anyone anything about The Miasma.

"I have his number, then," his owner says in a low, angry voice. 27 looks up, knowing that he shouldn't, knowing that it's stupid to do so, but the sudden change in his owner's demeanor is startling, as is the way that his tone softens. "It's a way of saying that I know who I'm dealing with. I haven't captured many invisibility quirks in my career, but there's a certain satisfaction in erasing their quirk when I do. I wouldn't even say it's sadistic if I had the chance to face this '127'."

There is a tinge of sadism in his owner's words, and 27 doesn't even know what to feel about it. 127 was just doing his job, and he will probably be sent out to do it again. Even if 127 won't be as pleasant as he was the first time, likely irritated that 27 survived and marred his flawless record, he doesn't want 127 to be killed by his owner.

But it's just a little reassuring to know that his owner doesn't want 27 to be killed by 127 either. Even if he knows it's just for the investigation, even if he knows that he will probably be disposed of at the end of it, and maybe even killed by his owner's hand. He can ignore those things if he wants to, and pretend that his owner somehow cares.

It's a nice feeling, but 27 doesn't want to get lost in it. 'Last number.'

"27," his owner says, without any hesitation. 27 meets his eyes on accident, still trying to figure out what he means by that.

'Me.' 27 answers, though his owner should know that. His owner should know his number, and he shouldn't ask about it. Shouldn't want to know anything about it. His was the most useless number that he could have picked.

"I know," his owner says, as though that makes any sense. "Tell me about '27.'"

27 realizes what he means. He wants to know all of 27's crimes. He knows what he did to Eri, he knows what he did at the 8 Precepts, but he doesn't know about the jobs he did for The Miasma.

He doesn't want to know about his quirk, when his quirk was useless. And he wouldn't want to know 27's weaknesses, when he knew the broken pieces better than he should. He wanted to know about the jobs he performed, what few he did, and would probably keep a record of them so that 27 could face time in jail if he wasn't killed at the end of the investigation. If he wasn't kept, and 27 knows that admitting those crimes would make that goal completely unattainable.

But unlike his owner, 27 played the game fairly. 'Distraction. B-O-D-Y-G-U-A-R-D. Not often. Too small. Just number. Flashy quirk. Three K-I-D-N-A-P-P-I-N-G. Interrogation.'

His hands start shaking again, almost making the sign incomprehensible. He was used as an interrogation tactic once, on his first job, and Boss almost cut ties with Honzo over that. He doesn't remember a lot of what happened, during it or afterwards due to the concussion. But he remembers barely being able to breathe, the sound of his ribs cracking every time he tried, and 10's panicked muttering.

He wasn't supposed to come back from that. Honzo had broken him too much, but 10 said it was a good thing he was young. He was rubbery. He was small, which meant he was young, and Honzo later admitted that he wanted him because of that. On one of the nicer jobs he had with Honzo, just being a Number to fill his ranks, Honzo told him how easy it was to break that police officer by breaking 27. Heroes and police officers, people like that couldn't stand to watch a child being beaten to death when they could stop it, if they're good ones. And it was such a shame that police officer was one of the good ones.

27 curls his hands without thinking about it, testing how weightless they were, before he makes the effort to move them under the table, to keep curling them. Yamada's tactic seemed to work.

While he lets it work, 27 looks around, checking his surroundings. He's gotten too lazy with that, too complacent. His owner did it often enough outside, but he should check for himself, he shouldn't trust him like that.

When he feels only halfway in the fog, he picks up the thermos to take a sip. He doesn't know why this coffee is odd, it's unbearably sweet but it doesn't make him feel any more awake. He wishes that it did, that it could clear the fog faster that way.

He looks at his owner's shoulder, and has a sudden urge to breathe as deeply as he can, to prove that he can. That his ribs won't shift where they've broken if he does. And they don't. 'Sorry. Distracted.'

“No, I'm sorry,” his owner says, and he watches his arm rise, likely to curl around his neck or play with his hair. “I didn't want to talk about the investigation today. I would rather just get to know you.”

27 still doesn't know what he means by that. He knows more about 27 than anyone else does, more than an owner should. He knows about his unmade hand, his dangerous affection for Eri, the things that he likes. 'It's fine.'

His owner knows how easy it would be to poison 27 with coffee.

27 checks the time on his phone, breathing a stilted sigh of relief. Most poisons take a while to take effect, some linger at the bottom of a drink. He hasn't reached the bottom, only halfway, and if that much was enough to take effect, it would still give him enough time. Only 10 minutes left until he could prove that he was free.

Memory's poisons took 10 minutes. Enough time for her to leave, to cover her tracks. But that wouldn't be enough time for his owner, not when Yamada, Eri, and Mirio were approaching.

Mirio waves as he sprints past, calling that he would be right back, and Eri quickly scrambles into his lap to give him a hug. “Twenny, I missed you! I had a lot of fun today, but I only went to Yama's classes, so I couldn't take notes for Zawa's. But Mirio said he did!”

“Shinsou and I went over the course notes together today,” his owner says, smiling fondly at Eri. “Though I wouldn't mind looking over Togata's notes to make sure that Ectoplasm didn't take any liberties.”

“Oh, had a little study sesh outside, did we? That sounds like a lot of fun,” Yamada says with a tense smile, his hand squeezing his owner's shoulder just a bit too tightly. “Must have been so much fun that you didn't check your phone the whole time, am I right?”

“Yeah, Yama was trying to talk to you all day,” Eri says, playing with the zipper of 27's jacket. She tucks her head under his before she speaks again, almost too quietly for him to hear. “Dad.”

27 forces himself to look at his owner's face, to forget about the risk of being poisoned and the time that he's still waiting for. He holds Eri close, hopes that she earns the right reaction, hopes that her bold declaration is met with the bold acceptance that she deserves.

It isn't. His owner's eyes widen, his face reddens, and he turns away to look at Yamada. There's a conversation going on between them, without words and without sign, and 27 knows immediately that Eri has already made her intentions known to Yamada. He knows that Yamada accepted them. He has no proof but no doubts either.

His owner looks back at Eri, still shocked. "Sorry, I...was busy. I didn't check it."

27 will never forgive him.

Chapter Summary

Yamada and Aizawa have an important discussion, but return to the dorm to find that the number of their children has increased again.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: None! The fluffiest of chapters for you guys!

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa assigned Bakugo a 100 page essay on the topic of trauma related disorders after he had a fight with Shinsou, which is due at the end of the month and Bakugo will be expelled if he does not complete it in time. Shinsou had been wearing a 'Lemillion' shirt today. Shinsou threatened to fillet Bakugo's hands if he swore around Eri. Class 1-A assumed that Shinsou was sick since he hasn't been at school for the past two days. When Ms. Joke visited, she distributed 'Delete Face' shirts to the majority of Class 1-A, which caused Aizawa to nearly expel them. Bakugo tutored Shinsou in math but that study session ended poorly when Bakugo found Shinsou's stash of objects that are important to him.

As soon as the wards and Togata walk through the door, Hizashi throws Aizawa a bottle of his medicated eyedrops. “You’re going to need that.”

And Aizawa knows exactly what kind of argument this is.

He follows Hizashi silently across campus, to Gym Gamma, and watches as Hizashi dismisses the few students already there, lying that the gym was already rented out for the hour. Aizawa tries not to be concerned with that number, trying to convince himself that this should take 30 minutes at most.

But when his husband turns on his heel to look at him, Aizawa isn’t sure of that, and he uses the eyedropper to prepare himself.

“So! Where to start!” Hizashi says, clapping his hands together as he begins pacing. This will be a bad one. “Oh, how about WHY DID YOU tell Bakugo to convince Shinsou to talk about the investigation?! YOU KNOW what Bakugo is dealing with, and YOU SHOULDn’t have done this little trauma project in THE FIRST PLACE. HE hasn’t slept in three days, SHOU! HIS FRIENDS are worried, and I’m worried too! You should have seen Kirishima, HE’S WORRIED SICK and just- WHAT WERE YOU THINKING?”

Aizawa closes his eyes, placing his hands over them to help them recover a bit faster. His hair has almost worked itself out of its tie, but he won't ask for a break for Hizashi to give him enough time to re-tie it. "I was hoping that Bakugo could convince him. They seem to be close-"

"SO SHINSOU'S FIRST friend should just manipulate him like that?! And don't get me started on the little spy ring you've got going on! LET ME TELL YOU, that's over! Done! Your little mole is burned! The KEYLOGGER IS CREEPY ENOUGH, SHOU!"

He's getting out of practice, and has to sign for Hizashi to stop, working two more eyedrops in while he blinks against the light. When he feels like his eyelids won't stick with every blink, he sighs, knowing that this will only get Hizashi started on a much higher note. "I took Shinsou's phone and looked through some of the chat today. I won't do it again."

He knows that he's really done it, because Hizashi just gapes at him. He knows that Hizashi doesn't do it on purpose, but when he mouths silently like that, it's harder to detect when he begins to speak. "YOU TOOK HIS PHONE?! SHOU, you can't- YOU KNOW. YOU LOOKED THROUGH HIS..."

Hizashi spins on his heel, running his hands through his hair to start to free it from the gel. Aizawa knows that he's cutting himself off because Aizawa hasn't used his quirk to do it. He feels like he's more than earned the ringing in his ears at this point.

"Babe," Hizashi says, spinning around with his hands pressed together in front of him. He can tell by the wince that he's struggling to monitor his own quirk, something that becomes almost impossible when he gets that worked up. "I know you and Shinsou don't get along that great. I DON'T- I don't get it, because you're honestly just so alike, it's scary. Like, if I wasn't there, I'd swear you were having sex with a woman when you were 16. And I know you weren't."

Aizawa still doesn't see what Hizashi does. Cats, coffee, the odd observation about their teeth that Todoroki made. Their similarities are so superficial, and he knows that his husband knows them both well enough to see past that.

"But, seriously, can you try? Try to get along with the kid? Forget the investigation, and if you tried to get anything from him today, I SWEAR, I will very seriously consider divorcing you! But just- Shou, really. The kid has been through enough, both of these kids have, and they don't need any more from you."

"I'm trying," Aizawa says, rubbing at his ear while he considers keeping this from Hizashi for the sake of his ear drums, before he decides against it. "He gave me information that could be critical-"

"SHOU I SWEAR-"

"He offered it," Aizawa says, keeping his quirk active until Hizashi crosses his arms, closing his mouth. Hopefully willing to listen. "There's a question game that he plays. I tried to use it just to have a conversation with the kid, but he told me to pick a number. Those numbers are members of the Nomu Organization."

Hizashi glares, but he nods.

"There's a chance that Naomasa can work with that information, and give The Commission a reason not to go through with the meeting tomorrow," Aizawa says, grimacing. "I doubt that it will be enough, but there's a chance. If we offer proof that Shinsou is willing to talk, as long as we don't stress him with something like this."

Hizashi sighs, his head tipping back while he rubs at his forehead. “But Chisaki has better intel, so they won’t, the insufferable pricks. God, I always thought that Nemuri was exaggerating.”

Aizawa knows, but he can’t sit on the information that Shinsou gave him when there was a chance that it could be useful. “We had a nice day. Talked. He...actually pays attention to my class.”

Hizashi smiles at him, lifting an eyebrow. “He’s a smart kid, Shou. He wants to learn anything, even if it’s your stuffy little philosophy mumbo-jumbo. And maybe, he just likes learning stuff from you.”

Aizawa unties his hair, ignoring that implication. He doubts it too much to consider it a possibility. “He wants a mocha, instead of food. As much as you hate my ‘spy ring,’ making your own is rather hypocritical.”

Hizashi rolls his eyes.

“How was Eri today?” Aizawa asks, knowing that if that little jab didn’t set off another argument, then the argument was well and over with.

Hizashi looks nervous, trying to smooth over his hair while he tries to look anywhere but at Aizawa. “Uh, you know. Good! A little down about Shinsou staying home, but you know. She called me ‘Dad’?”

Aizawa bites down on an incredibly irrational thought, an illogical bitterness that Yamada was called that first, and sighs. “It might be the separation. I knew it was too soon for them to be apart for that long-”

“Babe, uh,” Hizashi interrupts, fidgeting with his headphones. “Maybe it’s not? I mean, we’re... You know, taking care of her, living with her. She’s a little kid, and she needs a dad, or two dads, and I wouldn’t... be opposed?”

Aizawa doesn’t know what to say to that.

Hizashi is being so completely irrational that it stirs up something illogical in him. Something that feels like it’s clicking into place, that conversation about legal names, the red eyes that Eri drew on his birthday present. How easy it is to relax with her warm little weight on his chest, to smile at every little accomplishment she makes. How often he’s caught himself wondering about school districts, when he knows that Eri won’t be able to attend a proper school until she’s gained control over her quirk.

“It’s been a month,” Aizawa says, unable to say it to Hizashi’s face, instead looking at the nearest sparring court painted on the ground. “We shouldn’t be thinking like that.”

“But,” Hizashi says, walking towards him to drape an arm over his shoulders, pulling him in close so he can’t escape. “You wouldn’t be opposed either?”

“We need to give it time,” Aizawa answers, which is a non-answer that he knows his husband can see through immediately. He just hopes that he can still hear the part that means caution, awareness. Eri has been through enough, and she deserves to have a place and a family that will give her the best in life.

That might not mean two heroes with five jobs between them, whose life expectancies are shorter than other industries. She’s terrified of the sight of blood, and Aizawa can’t promise that he can always hide that from her when his patrols line up with Hizashi’s, and they both come home wounded.

But that wouldn't be for lack of trying. They would both try to give her the best in life, but they need to consider whether they can.

"We'll give it time," Hizashi says, wrapping his other arm around Aizawa. "And Mirio called me 'Dad' too, so--"

"Hizashi." Hizashi almost won that argument with Todoroki, but he won't let him win with Togata. "Togata has a father."

"Who hasn't called him since the raid," Hizashi argues. "Who didn't even visit him in the hospital--"

"Togata," Aizawa starts, considers leaving out the truth before he remembers who he's talking to. The man who would see through it before the words even left his mouth. "Didn't want him to. He asked me to make sure he wouldn't."

He feels Hizashi recoil a bit, not pulling away from the one-sided embrace completely, but enough to know that information is shocking. "Why would he do that, Shou? He needed someone there, especially after...."

Aizawa shakes his head. "In one of his assignments, he mentioned that his father had reservations about his becoming a hero. I imagine he didn't want to hear any reassurances that he could still take over the family business."

Togata wasn't meant to be a grocer, despite the warm smile and cheerful demeanor that Aizawa had no doubt would fall off his face within a week. Permeation was a quirk that most wrote off as pedestrian, but Togata worked hard to mold it into something heroic. It was that kind of willpower hiding beneath the surface that left Aizawa with no doubts that he would regain his quirk and be a better hero for it. If Togata had already changed his quirk's utility to suit his needs, he had no doubt that he could do the impossible, and mold his current circumstances to fit his vision of the future.

"If he wants that support from you, that's good. But that doesn't mean you should start filing for adoption for every student who calls you 'Dad,'" Aizawa says, tipping his head back to his husband's shoulder as he tries to imagine how many children they would have adopted by this point. The dorm situation had not helped, but it was a common enough slip of the tongue beforehand, to the point that a new instructor couldn't truly call themselves a teacher until it happened.

"If you say so," Hizashi sighs, his hands wandering a bit lower than they should, considering that they were in a building that Aizawa knew Principal Nezu had surveillance cameras.

"I need to call Naomasa," Aizawa says, trying to pull himself away from his husband, only to be pulled back even tighter.

"Mm, text him. We've got 45 minutes and you've got two hands," Hizashi whispers into his ear, before his voice drops lower. "And I bet I can make you call me--"

He can't silence Hizashi with his quirk anymore, but the hair that catches in his mouth is enough to do the trick. "Never. Say that. Again."

It takes much longer to text Naomasa than it should have.

27 places the shirt back in his closet, relieved that Mirio hadn't seen him wearing it, and looks back at Eri.

She's kicking both of her feet pretty hard against the edge of the bed, holding Mocha close to her chest. She isn't even distracted with the chance to touch his scars, so he knows she's upset. And rightfully so. "Eri, I can't pick another shirt."

She frowns up at him, kicking one of her legs higher than the other. "I want you to wear that shirt. Big brother Mirio would be really happy if you wore it."

"Maybe, but it's embarrassing," 27 says, wavering before he returns to the T-shirts in the back of his closet. He needs to be able to remind himself, to be able to look at the empty space where his skin became his again. That victory over Chisaki for when he wavers, when he thinks about it.

"Is Mirio gonna be your son or your brother if Yama and Zawa get to be my dads?" Eri asks, and 27 has to cover his mouth to stop from laughing. To imagine calling Mirio his son. As nice as it was to have kept Eri sheltered from the likes of Rikiya, she probably needed to know how babies were made. Eventually.

"Definitely not my son," 27 answers, though he doesn't let himself wonder what he would be if the game worked perfectly. The thought of being his owner and Yamada's son was equally ridiculous.

"Is it okay if I call them my dad?" Eri asks, and he doesn't need to look to know that it's one kick. "It's okay if it's not, you're my mom and you can tell me no. And I don't think they like it anyway."

27 tugs the Delete Face shirt off its hanger without a second thought. "Yamada does. And it doesn't matter what Aizawa thinks. Even if he's too stupid to realize it now, he likes it too."

27 pulls the shirt on, and turns to face Eri, to find that angry pout that he probably deserved after that slip. "Zawa's not stupid! You're being mean, Twenny!"

"I didn't..." 27 stops, because he absolutely meant it, before he decides to lie for Eri's sake. "I didn't mean that. I just really want this to work out for you, and I wish that he would be honest for once."

Eri cuts her eyes in another glare, before she starts staring at the floor. 27 runs a hand through his hair, trying to settle himself before he sits down and wraps an arm around her. She doesn't lean against him like she usually does, and he tries not to get lost in wondering if it's another sign that she doesn't need him. That she has her fathers now, and doesn't need a mother. That she's slipping away that quickly.

"I've only ever wanted you to be happy, Eri. To be safe, and taken care of. And even if I was a little stupid at first, I know they would do that for you," 27 says, and finally gets that lean, that warm little weight against his side. "We just need to be patient for a while."

Eri's fingers start tracing the back of his hand, wandering over the scars there. The claw marks, the knife wound. At least she seems content enough to ignore the Bug scars. "If you called them 'Dad' too, then maybe it would be okay."

"It wouldn't," 27 says, recoiling at the thought. He can't even imagine how poorly that would go over for him. "It's different for me. But it's not for you, and that's good. That's all I need."

Eri looks up at him, her lips still in a tiny pout, but he knows that she's putting it on at this point. He might have fallen for it a thousand times before, in a different room and for different reasons, but this time he just pats her arm and sighs.

“Trust me, I can’t. It’s just really good that you can,” 27 says, before he hears a familiar voice that couldn’t be more out of place.

“ Ho fucking ho, what the fuck even is this? If that shitty extra handed me a bag of trash to bring up here- ”

27 rolls his eyes, he doesn’t want to deal with Blasty today. The Hero Ethics lecture was enough, and he doesn’t think he can stand to stare at any more numbers today. He doesn’t trust himself not to see the Numbers behind them, to get lost and fall away if he does. Especially if he sees 50.

But another voice cuts through, and all he can tell is that it’s from one of the female students, before Eri throws herself off the bed, jumping up and down in front of him. “Ocha’s here! C’mom Twenny, Ocha’s here!”

He especially doesn’t want to deal with Floaty, but Eri takes his hand, and he can’t refuse being dragged along behind her. She lets go once they get to the end of the hallway, and 27 fights the urge to bolt back into his room when he sees how many people are standing in the living room, staring at him.

Floaty is holding a large pot for some reason, requiring both of her hands which prevents her from returning Eri’s affection when she holds onto her leg. Red Shark, Izuku, and Mirio are standing awkwardly together, shoulder to shoulder as if they’re trying to hide something, and doing so poorly.

But Blasty just hisses between his teeth before he stomps over to 27, trying to grab his shirt before 27 deflects on instinct. “Oi, you want to have this out here or take it some place private? Bitch, you never check the fucking chat, so I had to drag my ass out here with all of these goddamn extras-”

27 twirls the knife just for show, and levels a glare at Blasty before he glances at Eri.

“Cool it with your fuck-friggin’ creepy ass obsessed bullshit ,” Blasty hisses, but he throws his hands in the air, and Mirio’s panicked waving makes 27 sheath the knife.

“Um, we brought soup!” Floaty oddly interjects, holding the pot upwards as though that would explain anything about this situation. “We thought you... but it doesn’t look like you are, but it’s still pretty tasty!”

27 wonders if Mirio has ever used his quirk to sink through the floor, just to avoid awkward situations like these. ‘ Thanks. ’

If they were still staring at him, expecting him to fill the silence, then they were stupider than he thought.

“Dude, I like your shirt!” Kirishima says, placing his elbow on Izuku’s shoulder to try to appear more relaxed than he really was. “Sensei really lets you wear that, though? He got so mad when-”

“Can you extras just fu-” Just a glare is enough now, though Blasty returns it. “LEAVE, already?! I told you, he’s not freaking sick!”

“Yeah, maybe we are intruding a little,” Izuku says, before staring at Blasty intently, his eyes a little too wide. “So maybe we should all leave, instead of bothering Shinsou when he’s not supposed to be at school. Right, Kacchan?”

Eri shakes her head, and he doesn’t need to look at her expression to know that she’s already sealed his fate. “But I missed you guys! I didn’t get to see you at all today!”

These heroes were weak, falling over themselves to comfort Eri and reassure her that they missed her too. Blasty tries to take the distraction as an opportunity to make another grab, but 27 swats him away, and tilts his head towards his room.

It wasn't a concession, it was an escape. And a way to keep Blasty's foul mouth away from Eri.

Blasty kicks the door closed, and he should be trained better than that. Eri could have kept the others occupied for a while if he didn't make their exit so noticeable. "Don't fucking tell me you want to do this shit. It's fucked up, it's not happening, and you're just going to have to sort through all that Stockholm bullshit in the next 10 minutes because that's all I'm fucking giving you before I just beat the shit out of you, alright?"

'Time limits good. Increases anticipation. Proud of you, Blast-chan,' 27 signs, knowing from the blank look on Blasty's face that he has no idea what he's signed, other than the sign name that earns another hiss.

"Get your fucking phone out, I'm not dealing with this shit," Blasty growls, before he throws himself on the bed, groaning afterwards. He seems tired.

27 doesn't care. Blasty's made a nuisance of himself, he swears in front of Eri. He rooted through his collection and revealed its existence to Yamada, and 27 was lucky that didn't turn into another horrible review of his trash. Blasty could wear those under-eye circles and look like the corpse he constantly compared 27 to. He didn't care.

"Look, this shit is fucked up, and you can't handle it. Half of those idiots standing out there don't know about it, but if they did? They'd beat the shit out of Shitsei for pulling this," Blasty says, and he still sounds too tired. 27 still doesn't care, at all. "After all the shit they went through to rescue your dumb ass, you think you're just going to walk into a room with that trash bird ass bitch and get away with it? Fuck no. Just fucking tell Sensei what he wants to hear."

Since Blasty still won't get off his bed, he has to accommodate him. "Ca-an't tell him anythi-ing. I'm mu-ute."

Blasty throws a pillow at him, but his aim is horribly off, and 27 can't even catch it. "Pay attention, smart ass. You're fucked in the head, and Chisaki is going to skull fuck you even more. But that shit ain't happening, alright?"

27 looks at Blasty again, making sure that he would struggle to get to his feet more than 27 would, before he sits in his chair. "You were a-at the raid?"

Blasty scoffs. "Bitch, we wouldn't be having this conversation if I was. Bitch ass bird would be in fucking pieces."

27 stores that mental image away for later, before he types again. "I lo-ost every fight o-on purpose. I do-on't have to lose no-ow."

Blasty sits up, eyebrow raised, but 27 ignores that insult. He beat Rappa a few times, and even if these hero students didn't believe it, 27 could always know it for himself. He could know that he won something, even while he was losing.

"I wa-ant to fight hi-im and win."

Blasty just shakes his head before he collapses back on the bed, throwing an arm over his face. Then he laughs, sounding all the more exhausted for it. "You're fucking crazy. Crazier than shit, shitface."

He's heard that before. From Bug when he pulled a particularly stupid stunt, and amused her a bit more than angered her. From other Numbers when he picked a tougher opponent that day, or when some of the jumpier ones were disturbed by his silent gaze. Even clients tried to take advantage of it, telling him to widen his eyes, not blink, and smile as much as he could beneath the mask. Look crazy, look dangerous. It's more disturbing because you're young.

Being broken and being crazy might not be different in some ways, but there was one important distinction. 27 never wanted to be broken, but he was proud to pull off something crazy, something that no one believed he could do.

But there was something different in Blasty's red eyes when he rolled over on his elbow, that snarl replaced with amusement. Something that might mean that he believed that he could.

"Fine, you want to do this stupid shit? I'll give you the fucking hacks. But if you log out, I swear to fuck I'm gonna tear Shitsei a new asshole."

27 stores that mental image away as well.

Yamada watches Shouta open the door before he closes it, and braces his arms against it. "Zashi. How many students called you 'Dad' today?"

Yamada can't help but grin, just to egg him on, before he fluffs Shouta's hair to cover up what the missing capture scarf couldn't. "How many little herolets are behind door number one?"

"Too many," Shouta says, offering a half-hearted glare before he glances over his shoulder. "It's Togata's responsibility, he can tell us when they leave-"

"Hey!" Mirio says, opening the door with a smile and a wave, though both falter. "So, a few of Shinsou's friends wanted to stop by and bring some soup, I hope that's okay. It's really tasty! You should try some!"

Shouta didn't give him a headcount, which was worrying enough, but with the strain behind Mirio's eyes, Yamada is worried that most of Class 1-A has crammed themselves into their dorm. Between himself and Shouta, he's definitely the more sociable one, but even that would be pushing his limit. "Yeah, yeah, sounds good! We should try some, that was very thoughtful of them!"

When Mirio backs away from the door, Yamada breathes a sigh of relief to see only five herolet invaders, though he doesn't miss which ones they were. Other than Bakugo, almost every Class 1-A student who participated in the raid had decided to show up, and he can tell by how Shouta stiffens that he doesn't miss that worrying implication either.

Then he notices what shirt Shinsou is wearing, and wonders if his husband noticed the students at all.

Shinsou is sitting at the table, eating a bowl of soup, but from the way that Bakugo is crouched so close to him and watching every spoonful he takes, it seems less and less willing. It looks like a slightly different method of force-feeding.

Uraraka seems a bit concerned about that too, standing in the kitchen as if on guard to keep the force feeding from becoming something more forceful. Though she seems a little distracted by the Sailor Moon episode that Kirishima, Midoriya, and Eri are watching. Eri seems a little distracted herself, making a mess of Kirishima's gelled hair to work in as many decorative hair ties as possible, and Midoriya sits behind her to give her two lopsided pigtails.

There's also a giant black bag sitting at the corner of the couch with a blanket thrown over it, that Mirio immediately stands in front of.

Maybe things had gotten a little out of control for their babysitter/possible son while they were fooling around in Gym Gamma. And maybe Yamada had no idea how to manage it. But if he doesn't say something soon, Shouta will just start glaring and threatening to expel all the thoughtful little herolets who made the effort to check on Shinsou, and Yamada wouldn't stand for that.

Especially when Bakugo was proving to be very effective, dumping another ladle of soup into Shinsou's bowl, which Shinsou met with a rather catty sign. But no hesitation in continuing to eat it.

"Well, it looks like we're a little late to the party!" Yamada says, trying to ignore the messy and deflated state of his hair, and the urge to pull his collar up a bit higher just in case a telling flash of red showed.

"The one being thrown in our own home," Shouta deadpans, which always made for great commentary at the Sports Festivals, but was not helping the awkward vibe.

"Sorry for intruding! We just noticed that Shinsou wasn't at school today, which might have been related to the- uh, thing! But it might also have been because he was sick, and we would have asked permission or about the situation if we thought of it during English, but Ectoplasm-sensei didn't know the situation either, and-" Midoriya's ramblings cut off when Mirio placed his hand none-too-gently on his head, almost slapping it like it was a 'Stop' button.

"And, you know, can't let good soup go to waste! It was my fault, really," Mirio says, wincing after he does. "But maybe it's time to leave?"

Eri pulls a pout when she looks at Mirio, and Yamada begins to suspect that this is truly the most adorable hostage situation that they've ever walked into. "But we're having fun! It's a party!"

Shinsou in particular looks like he's having a blast. So much so that Yamada can practically see the life draining from his eyes as he drops his spoon into the bowl, prompting Bakugo to offer encouragement. "Oi, weak ass twiggy bitch, you gonna let the soup win? Can't even finish a full fucking meal, and you want to talk all that shit?"

Shinsou look at Yamada, the plea plain in his eyes before he sign whispers it. ' Help. '

"I'm sure the herolets will be happy to throw an even bigger party this weekend at the dorm! That way, everyone's invited to boogie down and clown around!" Yamada offers, trying to negotiate with the little terrorist who has too many heroes and hero students wrapped around her little finger.

Including him. When that pout turns to him, he has to look away, to stay strong for Shinsou's sake, but luckily the heroes win this time. "Okay," Eri concedes, her chin tucked to her chest while she looks as pitiful as she possibly can, but Red Riot is there to cinch the victory.

"Yeah, we were already thinking of ordering pizza! We can watch a few movies, have a fun time, and you can definitely make my hair this super manly again!" Kirishima says with a grin that betrays nothing, but his hands are already working fast to pull out every plastic butterfly or cat that's currently adorning his hair.

" Please study ," Shouta grates out, his concern about missing a day the week before midterms flaring back to life. "There's already one interruption to your study schedules that you need to compensate for.”

“Ah, sorry about that,” Midoriya mutters, scratching the side of his head before Shouta waves him off.

“All of you have been given the appropriate amount of time to do well, and if you fail to take advantage of it, it’s on you,” Shouta adds, earning the title for Biggest Party Pooper Ever in record time. “Now leave.”

And there was that signature Shouta Charm that Yamada grew to love. It was easy to love as it was to hug a cactus, but it definitely did come in handy.

Each little herolet bid their goodbyes to Shinsou and Eri in turn, though Bakugo whispered something after slapping Shinsou’s shoulder, and Yamada tried not to wonder why Shinsou didn’t lash out in return. If this weird little friendship forming between Shinsou and Bakugo was actually a bit of bullying, Yamada wouldn’t hesitate to switch Bakugo’s midterm exam with Ashido’s. It would be a very easy mistake to make.

Before he could stop Mirio from making his exit, Mirio picks up the black bag, having to wrap his arms around it to hold it. “I hope you don’t mind, but I got this for Shinsou. Surprise!”

Shinsou does look surprised, if not a little wary as he gets up to take the gift from Mirio. And once it was in his arms, he looked like he was a little at a loss for what to do with it. Until Eri jumped in to help. “Open it! I wanna see what big brother Mirio got you!”

Shinsou set it on the floor to start untying the knot at the top, but once he started pulling it out, he quickly pulled the giant plushie into the air with a rare, unguarded smile.

And Yamada wished he had thought to record it, not just to capture that smile from Shinsou, but because the oversized Pokemon plushie was wearing the same one. But then he looked at Mirio and saw that he was a bit more prepared, snapping another picture from his phone.

And Yamada decided he didn’t care what Shouta thought, if Mirio wanted him to adopt him, he was ready to sign the papers now . His son was an amazing hero, so smart and compassionate and thoughtful.

“Oh, can you hold it like this?” Mirio asks, demonstrating a bear hug. And there’s something in his eyes that betrays exactly how thoughtful his possible son is. Thoughtful in a way that’s borderline a little creepy.

In a way that explains why Mirio so insistently wanted to know the exact length of Shinsou’s arms and waist.

But when Shinsou does, he can’t really complain, because it’s adorable. The plushie is so big that he can’t quite wrap his arms around it, and so long that it swallows up his torso to his knees. The smile might have faded away, but it’s replaced by a blush that makes Yamada want to bury his face in his hands to make sure his own face isn’t heating up.

He needs Mirio to send those pictures to him immediately.

Shinsou signs ‘ Thank you ,’ struggling with the plushie still held in his arms, and Yamada wishes Mirio had taken a video instead. Especially when Eri reaches up to pet the plushie, and he realizes that it’s bigger than she is. She could use it as a bed , and that’s entirely too adorable to even think about.

“It’s no big deal! I’m glad you like it!” Mirio says, putting his phone away, though Yamada won’t let him leave until he sends those pictures. “Gregar is your favorite, right?”

That half-smile works up over Shinsou’s face as he nods, but when he notices Eri’s attention, he lowers the plushie to the floor, to confirm that Eri could absolutely sleep on it , and if she did, Yamada might die. He nearly does when she wraps her arms around it, and can’t even begin to reach around. Shinsou repeats himself more clearly, ‘ Thank you. ’

“ ‘Thank you’ for the ‘Thank you,’ ” Mirio says with a laugh, signing a little awkwardly. “I haven’t learned ‘You’re welcome’ yet, but I’m working on it!”

Shinsou signs it first, but that’s not stopping Yamada. “Well, we can work on some JSL while we’re catching up on dinner! Whatdya say, sport?”

Yamada regrets it when he sees that falter in Mirio’s smile, one that disappears as quickly as Shinsou’s rare expressions. In the back of his mind, he knew that Mirio might have called him ‘Dad’ for Eri’s sake, to take it upon himself as her own personal hero to help her work up the courage. That he might be acting a bit too fast and too bold here, but he’s always had that bad habit. Shouta tries to be the brakes to his speeding car, but sometimes he’s a bit too fast for him.

But Mirio is a good kid, and he smiles like he means it this time. “That sounds great! As long as you’ll have me!”

Shouta could say whatever he wants, but between Mirio’s eager signing, Shinsou’s persistent help, and Eri’s quick progress on her own JSL knowledge, the soup they shared wasn’t just tasty.

It felt like a family dinner.

Taking Off His Gloves

Chapter Summary

27 has to meet with Chisaki for the investigation, and he knows that he needs to do it. He needs to keep Chisaki from telling anyone anything about The Miasma, to keep his place at UA with Eri. He wants to win against Chisaki.

But can he?

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Child bedwetting, Dissociation, Mention of Bug and The Red Room, Mention of 50, Smoking, Anxiety attack, Mirio thinking about Sir Nighteye's death,

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou had a tattoo of the word 'Dog,' his name at the 8 Precepts, but it was removed shortly after arriving at UA, and now only the black band covering up his Number tattoo remains. Shinsou was forcibly submerged in bath water treated with bleach several times while living at the 8 Precepts. Shinsou gave Aizawa two descriptions of other Numbers from The Miasma thinking that it was useless information, and Aizawa passed that information along to Naomasa in hopes of stopping the meeting between Shinsou and Chisaki. Shinsou is scheduled to meet with Chisaki for Chisaki to formally apologize to Shinsou, and Chisaki has promised to hand over information about The Miasma in exchange for that meeting. Shinsou's right hand shakes and is uncoordinated after Chisaki Unmade it, and Aizawa learned from Eri that she had witnessed that incident. Shinsou had been using a unique JSL sign 'Away' to communicate to Eri if he had dissociated before they were rescued, and Yamada and Aizawa have both been aware of what it means. Shinsou had searched online for ways to help traumatized children, intending it completely for Eri because he doesn't believe he's traumatized but instead broken, and he searched on a laptop that has a keylogger installed. Shinsou was scratched badly by Todoroki's cat named Soba, and Aizawa helped clean the scratches but at first wanted to let Shinsou do it himself. Shinsou refers to a type of dissociation he as where it happens with no build up and enters a full dissociative spell as 'Thunder claps.' Yamada has guided both Shinsou and Eri through hand-curling exercises to help ground them after a dissociative spell or a panic attack. Yamada promised to take Shinsou, Eri, and Class 1-A to Disneyworld during an English class after Eri demonstrated that she could say "Are you from America? Can you take me with you?" Mirio stated that if Chisaki were dead, Shinsou wouldn't have to meet with him. Hari told Eraserhead that Erasure inspired them to make the quirk erasing bullets. Yamada developed temporary mutism during middle school. Eri recently called Aizawa and Yamada each her 'Dad.' Recovery Girl stated she wanted to give Shinsou a check up in a week, last Friday. Shinsou was fused with Chisaki at the end of the raid, and while Chisaki was trying to use his quirk, Shinsou was conscious of that. Ashido has been trying to give Shinsou a high five for 13 chapters. Shinsou has threatened to kill or maim Bakugo several times if Eri ever swore.

27 looks at the black band on his arm, turning it to the side to see the empty space. Victory.

He looks at the giant Gengar at the end of his bed. Another victory, but a different one.

He looks at the Lemillion shirt, trying to remember exactly the way that Mirio had moved in that fight. Sinking into the floor just to spring up, throwing blow after blow at Chisaki. Forcing him to dodge, forcing him to retreat. That billowing red cape flowing with every movement.

He looked at the cape before he saw Chisaki's face, before he saw the widening of his eyes, before he saw the change in his stance, before the hand-

He forces himself to remember the cape when it billowed. Forces himself to remember how Mirio stood in that hallway. He presses his feet against the bed and tries to focus on how it feels, how the sheets are soft, and even if his eyes are closed, he knows they're gray.

He opens his eyes and looks at Eri, sleeping on his arm with Mocha abandoned at her back. Her hand still on his stomach, still grasping at his shirt. He takes in every detail, from her hair, to her closed eyes, to how small she still is, to the cats smiling in repeated patterns all over her pajamas. She hasn't had nightmares for a while, or night terrors. She feels safe, and cared for.

Victory.

That's the one that 27 wants to keep. He beat Chisaki. He stole Eri from Chisaki, and undid all of his work, all of his plots to return the 8 Precepts and the yakuza way of life to its former glory. Chisaki didn't care for Eri, but he wanted her more than anything else, and 27 took her from him. He already hurt Chisaki in the way it counted the most.

He can win. He knows he can.

He falls asleep thinking of his plan, calling up all of Chisaki's weaknesses, but he wakes up in terror.

Eri is sobbing, tears already streaming down her face, and she shakes her head at him in a way that he doesn't understand. He doesn't understand why she's standing next to the bed, why she isn't next to him, clinging to him after another nightmare, but then he feels it.

She hasn't had an accident in years.

"M' sorry-y," Eri gasps out, and 27 pulls himself to his knees to avoid the stain, but nearly stumbles in his urgency to pick her up and comfort her.

"It's okay, Eri, it's an accident," 27 says, holding her close to his chest while he helps soothe her, tracing circles on her back to help guide her deepening breaths. "It happens, it's fine."

She should be past this stage in her development, but it's a symptom of trauma in children. He's not sure why it's flaring up now, why she was able to avoid it while they were at the 8 Precepts. He doesn't know if this happened while he was away from her.

But he knows exactly what to do to fix it.

Once Eri quiets down, still not completely calmed but he doesn't expect her to be, he carries her to her bedroom, careful not to make a sound. He knows how to work against the squeaky hinge on her door, how to lift the handle to avoid that noise. He picks the first outfit he finds from her pajama drawer, and then makes his way to their bathroom.

She clings to her new set of clothes, watching him set out a towel and start the bath, and the look in her eyes is too familiar. She's older now, but she was always this quiet when it happened. He pulls out the basket of soaps that are meant for bubble baths and bath bombs, and encourages her to pick one. He doesn't need to tell her to smell each one, because she already knows this trick well enough. He smiles while he watches her, happy that she has more than one option now.

She picks a bath bomb, and he sets it in the tub before he realizes that the plastic around it wouldn't let it dissolve, like he imagines it's supposed to. He corrects that before he tests the temperature again, testing how deep the water has gotten. It's almost full enough.

Eri curls her toes against each other, her frown deepening again with the threat of another crying fit. "M' sorry."

"It's okay," 27 says, trying to get her to look at the smile he wears for her sake. "Chibi-Usa has accidents too. Sailor Moon is just mean for making her feel bad about it, and she shouldn't. That's why I don't like Sailor Moon, she's my least favorite."

"I like her," Eri mumbles, at least distracted from her embarrassment. "She eats a lot like Momo."

"Momo looks more like Sailor Pluto though," 27 says, tugging the clothes out of Eri's arms so she could get undressed. "But she acts like Sailor Mercury with how smart she is."

"Who's your favorite, Twenny?" Eri asks, and he takes her hand to make sure she can step into the bath safely, settling a hand on her head after she settles in the tub.

"Chibi-Usa," 27 answers, smiling again to make sure that Eri will fine on her own while he cleans up. "I'm gonna be back, so just wait if you need help getting out." Eri nods, and busies herself with splashing in the water a few times, chasing the still dissolving bath bomb as it spins with white foam and tiny pink blossoms.

27 is glad that Yamada showed him how to use the washing machine, which would definitely be easier to use than the bathtub. He makes quick work of stripping the bedsheets, but frowns when he realizes that the mattress would be much harder to clean than the futon was.

He hesitates before he reasons with himself. He can't just leave it, the smell would be obvious, and he doesn't want his owner or Yamada to find it. He's been very careful with his possessions, and he doesn't want to make them angry. He doesn't want them to blame Eri either.

He starts the washing machine before he grabs the bleach.

He makes sure to pick a white towel, knowing that he can wash it in bleach in case it gets stained. He only pours a little on the mattress, not wanting to soak it, before he starts rubbing the evidence away. It's not working as well as it should, not without the benefit of running water, of being able to squeeze the futon and wring it out with his hands.

He's been trying to hold his breath because he hates the smell, but when he breathes in, it catches him off guard, and he coughs, even though he tries to muffle it with his hand, and

Yamada wakes up with a hand on his shoulder, and forces his eyes open to see Shouta pointing to his ears, to tell him to put his hearing aids in. When he sits up, he sees Eri wrapped in a towel, clinging to Shouta with her arms wrapped tight around his neck, and as he puts his hearing aids in, he hears her panicked words over the whine of the devices' adjustment. "-enny's 'way 's my fault 'm sorry!"

"Eri, it's alright," Yamada reassures, finding the towel around her wet when he puts a hand on her back. Shouta looks at him, and Yamada reasons with himself that they only reason that Shouta isn't going to Shinsou is because Eri needs his focus instead.

He tries not to run, because he doesn't need to worry Eri, but he sets a quick pace to Shinsou's room, and doesn't like what he finds.

Bleach , goddammit, why hadn't he thrown that out?

The bottle was still held in Shinsou's hand, the other cupped around his mouth, and Yamada pieces together what happened in the back of his mind. Eri with a towel wrapped around her shoulders, her hair wet, the bed stripped. He doesn't even question why Shinsou didn't wake them up, he knows the kid wouldn't have thought to do that. Not with how long he's been taking care of Eri.

He needs to get Shinsou out of the room, opening a window might not be enough and Shinsou's room doesn't have a window anyway. But he's more than a little worried about how to do that.

"Hey, Shinsou," Yamada calls, hoping there's an answer. A startle. Anything other than the frozen teenager in front of him breathing too slowly, too still other than the rise and fall of his shoulders as he breathes. "Shinsou, Shinsou, Shinsou?"

He reaches out and manages to take the bottle out of his hand without touching him, but Shinsou still isn't responding. He still needs to get out of the room.

He hopes he can do that without Shinsou lashing out. "Hey, Shinsou, it's Yamada. Current Loudspeaker guy. I'm gonna take you out of the room, alright, just get some clean air. Fresh air, it'll... It'll help, okay?" Yamada keeps rambling, touching Shinsou's shoulder gently at first. He waits for a reaction, and finds himself hoping that Shinsou might stay lost in the spell long enough for him to guide him outside. "You know, it's just me. We're here in your room right now, but I'm gonna need to walk you outside, so just come with me, alright?"

Shinsou turns when he pushes against his shoulder, stumbles along as he guides him out of the room. Yamada doesn't know what else to say but to name every action, every room they cross, everything in that room. He knows that Shinsou can't hear him right now, but he hopes that if the spell breaks, he'll recognize his voice first, before he recognizes that someone is touching him.

He tries not to think of broken fingers, broken noses, broken wrists. He knows Shinsou well enough to know he never meant to do that, probably doesn't even remember it. He's not afraid of the kid hurting him, but he's terrified of having to restrain Shinsou, or failing to. Of Shinsou coming out of the spell with Yamada's blood on his fist.

It's cold outside, and he rambles about that for a bit without really hearing what he's even saying, and walks Shinsou a few more paces before the teenager jerks away from him. He's breathing faster now, like he just ran a marathon, and now Yamada is worried that this will spiral into a panic attack.

Shinsou looks around, his head moving too fast to really take anything in, and the hand around his mouth moves halfway to his hair before he stops and freezes.

And throws his hand down hard against the back of the bench, hard enough to know that Yamada still needs to worry about broken fingers.

“Hey, buddy, it’s alright! We’re okay, we’re at UA-” Yamada stops his attempts to remind Shinsou where he is, wincing as Shinsou starts signing.

‘ No broken not no E-R not E-R ,’ Shinsou’s hands move quick, as rapid as his breathing still is, his eyes are still too wide. He’s probably too panicked to even register the pain in his hand, and Yamada has to stop himself from reaching out and grabbing his hands to stop him from doing any more damage.

“Eri is inside, she’s okay, just- you know, let’s take some deep breaths,” Yamada has done this a million times, he knows how to act when civilians are in a panic, but Shinsou isn’t a civilian, he’s Shinsou , and Yamada can’t keep his tone as even as it should be.

‘ Not Eri. Broken. Lost. Dog. ’

It’s that last sign that breaks him. Yamada goes numb, just staring at Shinsou as his breath catches for a moment, but his eyes remain too wide, unblinking.

‘ Dog. I’m Do- ’

Yamada catches Shinsou’s hands in his own. Even when he can’t stop himself from reaching out, he keeps his grip on Shinsou’s palms, careful not to touch his fingers. “No. No, no, no, you’re not. Shins...”

Fuck , how long had he been ignoring this? How could he not have seen it? Shinsou was good at hiding things, but Shinsou was his ward . He read his case file, every gruesome detail in it. He looked at the photograph of that tattoo, even if he couldn’t bring himself to look at it when Shinsou was wearing a shirt that displayed it. He read Tabé’s statement, the only one that they got from any member of the 8 Precepts regarding Shinsou, that one line. It was Chisaki’s idea to name him Dog.

He’s never heard him do it, but Shouta did. He ignored it, he stupidly thought it was over. That they could replace it with better memories, happier times. That it was better not to confront it, to stress Shinsou out like that. That Shinsou never really believed his name was Dog, that he was able to hold out that long because of it.

But 3 years and 8 months wasn’t going to go away that easily. Not after what Shinsou had been through. Not with the threat of tomorrow still hanging over him, hanging over both of his wards, and Naomasa still hadn’t reached out with an answer.

That left Yamada in the lurch, and he wanted desperately to tell Shinsou that it was over. That it was enough, that what he told Shouta was enough. Enough to stop this . Even if he couldn’t tell Shinsou that there was hope, he could tell him this, “You are Shinsou Hitoshi. You are not , and you never were Dog.”

He forces himself to look up, to take in Shinsou’s still panicked stare. He only feels one of his hands shaking, but he doesn’t feel them try to pull away.

“A lot of people tried to take that from you, a lot of people have hurt you. You’ve been through a lot, too much, but you’re still here. You’re here, and you’re safe, and Eri is safe because of you. Because you never gave up, Shinsou. You never let them win, so don’t you dare let them win now,” Yamada says, biting his lip when he feels Shinsou pull his hands out of his grasp.

‘ Lost. Away, ’ Shinsou signs, that right hand still shaking. It doesn’t always shake that badly, but Yamada imagines it's too hard for Shinsou to hide it right now. After what Shouta told him, he knows the reason why.

“That’s not losing, Shinsou,” Yamada says, shaking his head but unwilling to look away from Shinsou’s eyes, still locked on his. “You’ve been through a lot, and sometimes-”

‘ Broken. Not E-R-I. Broken. ’ Shinsou’s eyebrows furrow together, insistent and confused all at once, and Yamada regrets ever letting himself believe that part of that little research that the keylogger picked up on was for Shinsou’s own sake.

All of the searches that he made were targeted towards children who had dealt with trauma, but he knew by copying those searches that most of the websites also mentioned adolescents. At the time, he had been a little proud of Shinsou for trying to get help for himself, but he never imagined that it could run this deep.

‘ Not E-R-I. Not pers- ’

Yamada feels him try to tug away immediately, and in the back of his mind he knows that it couldn’t be more wrong to take away the only way Shinsou could communicate right now. But he’s not going to let him finish that sign. He can’t . “Shinsou. You’re...”

Yamada clenches his teeth, trying to take a deep breath. He can’t cry, he can’t cry, this isn’t about him and Shinsou needs him right now. He doesn’t have anyone else. He needs to hear this.

“You are the strongest person I know. You went through a lot, and that can leave-” fuck his stupid fucking mouth why can’t he just “You’re not broken. You’re not. You’re not broken, Eri isn’t broken, Shou isn’t broken either. All of you had to go through things that no one was meant to, and no one could come out of without injuries. It’s not breaking, it’s...”

It’s a conversation that they should have had a long time ago, and it needs to be a conversation.

“Let’s go inside and talk about this, alright? With your phone , after I check your fingers because I know what a broken finger sounds like, and I know how bad it hurts to sign with one. Or four. Pro tip! Don’t try to punch a lead pipe that’s being swung at your face! It doesn’t work like you think it will,” Yamada says, finding himself rambling from his frayed nerves and the knowledge that sometimes his long windedness is the only thing that can calm Shinsou down.

But he finds himself entirely too relieved by that little eye roll, before he sees Shinsou raise his hands to sign as soon as he lets him go, and he nearly makes another grab before Shinsou huffs and lowers them back down to his sides.

But Yamada still finds himself smiling, to see that rare flash of ‘teenager’ in Shinsou’s attitude. It’s something that he wants to see more often as time goes by.

There were times that Quirk Training wasn’t as serious. Chisaki called for one, but he ended up just standing against the wall on his phone rather than making sure that the 8 were punishing him. If that was ever the point of Quirk Training. 27 has never been able to figure that out.

Deidoro and Tengai had a game that was all Deidoro’s idea. Deidoro would use his quirk on 27, then they would all take turns throwing him into Tengai’s barrier. 27 would be so disoriented, so close to puking far before the end of it, and even when he closed his eyes or tried to dodge the hands that grabbed at him, it didn’t help.

Even when it wasn't brutal, when that was the tamest that Quirk Training ever was, it was humiliating. To hear them laughing. For him to fall on the floor without anyone's hands on him, to fall without being shoved. As often as 27 lost, losing that game felt the worst.

'Pinball.' That's what they called it.

27 feels like he's in that game right now.

Yamada took him to check on Eri first, to see her fast asleep on top of his owner's chest. Her hair was still wet, but she was changed into another set of clothes, not the ones that he picked. Both of them were asleep under his owner's yellow sleeping bag.

"It's a sleeping bag night. It's... It helps her to have a heavier blanket. There are some that are made especially for that, but she likes Shou's sleeping bag, so..."

He stumbled into the barrier without anyone's help a few times. He tried to pull himself back up to standing by leaning against it, but then someone would tell Tengai to drop it and he'd fall. He eventually learned not to do that.

Yamada went to his room to get the phone, but wouldn't let him follow. He gave him the phone then went to his and his owner's bathroom to get the medicine kit, and set it on the kitchen counter just like his owner did after Soba scratched him. But he told him to wait instead of treating himself, and started boiling some water.

He's never been burned with water, never come across a quirk that does that. He's heard it's painful to have hot coffee or tea spilled on you, but no one has ever done that either. He wonders when someone will, if his owner will get angry and spill coffee on him. If it would even hurt him right now.

Yamada tells him to flex his fingers, and winces at what he sees. The middle and ring finger are broken, but 27 only knows that because he can see the red line right below the knuckle, can see that they can't curl as far as the others.

He doesn't feel them.

His unmade hand goes numb sometimes, as though it wasn't really remade at all. Like Chisaki didn't have enough materials to remake it, but somehow made an illusion of it. Chisaki always said it was important that Eri finish her meals, that she had the materials, but he didn't care if 27 did. He called for Quirk Training on days that 27 traded a meal for a trip. He wouldn't have had as many materials as he would have on other days.

Yamada asks if it's okay for him to wrap them. That he has to touch his hand. He talks about every move he makes, where he's going to touch him before he does it. It's odd, he's grabbed his hands often enough before this. He's taken his hands.

Took his voice.

Pinball.

27 feels like this is a Pinball match, and it's the part where he's just trying not to throw up. He's thrown up in a locked mask before, nearly died that time. Sometimes, he thinks that's the way he doesn't want to die the most, but usually he just doesn't want to end up dying in the Red Room. Whichever way he would die there, by Bug or Memory's poison or just something simple. If he filled up a locked mask with puke in the Red Room, that'd probably be the worst way to go.

There's a startling sharpness that he feels when Deidoro drops his quirk. Everything that spins stops, everything blurry becomes clear. It's annoying when he starts and drops it rapidly, it's more disorienting, and Deidoro knows that. He only does it when he doesn't get to drink enough.

Yamada puts a mug in front of him, filled with hot tea. The mug has a cat on it, with the word 'Caturday' in a swirling English script. Yamada sits down in front of him and sighs, his own mug close to his mouth but he doesn't drink from it. Yamada looks at him, and 27 realizes how green Yamada's eyes are.

Deidoro's quirk drops.

"So, um. 'Away,'" Yamada says, repeating that unique sign. 27 knew that he knew it. "That's called 'dissociation.' It's a way for your brain to kind of 'check out,' to protect you from bad stuff that's happening. It happens to a lot of people, and it can happen in a lot of different ways. For a lot of reasons. It's... you probably noticed it happening a while ago. A long time ago."

27 tests the splint, it won't let him bend his fingers. He can barely sign anything now. He was wondering when they would get a mask, and now he wonders if they'll use this as one while he picks up the phone. "I read about it." He doesn't know how the drop gets sharper, but it does. "Noticed before."

Before he was sold to Chisaki. It didn't happen as much, though. Not enough for anyone to notice.

"How." It doesn't matter. He's broken, Yamada knows, and he's always known. How he knows, he doesn't know. How he notices.

"How does it work or..." Yamada trails off, looking back at his mug before he tucks his hair behind his ear. "How do we know? Well, it's tough to spot, but Naomasa... told us enough. And there's training that me and Shou went through to get certified for wardships. How to spot it. What, um. What does it feel like for you? Is it totally blank, or like you're looking down on yourself, or..."

"Thunder claps." 27 knows he's not making sense, but Deidoro started using his quirk again. "Blank."

Yamada nods, a half smile that barely reaches his eyes. His eyes look back at the mug. "Yeah, a lot of people have that happen. They're not broken, they have PTSD. You probably read about it," Yamada nods again, to himself, and spreads his hands so that they're open, heel resting on the counter. "So, even when bad things aren't happening, dissociation can still happen. Your brain sees something that it recognizes as a part of that bad thing, or a warning sign. That's a trigger, and most people avoid them. Bleach is, you know, probably a trigger for you, and I kind of knew that, or figured- I'm sorry, I should have gotten rid of it."

"Avoidance." Blasty told him about that. "Showers." He didn't know the word for it, he just knew that he didn't want to take baths anymore. That sometimes, he couldn't even look down and see a tub around his feet, to see that he was in a tub even if he was standing in it.

Yamada keeps nodding, but he cups his hand around his mouth and looks away, looks at the cabinets for a minute before he looks back. "Yeah, baths and bleach are probably triggers for you. There's probably others, and we can avoid those too. Just like we do for Eri. And when we can't, there's ways we can help you come back after that. Grounding exercises we can do."

“Bla-asty told me. Ha-acks.” Feet on the ground, looking at things. Remembering good things. Trying to stay. Trying to remind himself that he won.

“That’s good! I’m glad that Bakugo... you know, Bakugo did that,” Yamada says, that same half smile that he doesn’t like seeing. “And, you know, working your hands like this. I should have told you at the time, but-”

27 raises the unmade hand, showing the splint. He just wants Yamada to stop smiling like that, and he does, but not the way he wants him to. He’s not play-mad, he’s not laughing. He doesn’t get the joke.

He looks like he’s going to cry. “Well, yeah. Hold off on that one, I guess.”

Deidoro’s quirk dropping has never been so sharp. “I do-on’t want to lo-ose tomo-orrow.” It’s probably today, it’s probably that late. He doesn’t know what time it is, even when he stares at the numbers on his phone. It’s late, or early.

Yamada presses his fingers together, his hands in front of his face. A deep inhale, a deep exhale. A breathing exercise. He might have PTSD too. “I don’t want there to be a tomorrow. I don’t...”

27 doesn’t know if he wants a tomorrow either. Or today. However much time he has, how little he has to prepare. He usually has a day or two at least to prepare for jobs, but he didn’t for the first one. For Honzo. Bug was angry that it happened, he hadn’t even been numbered yet, but Honzo offered so much money. A lot of money.

Numbers were supposed to be able to leave after they paid back their debt. A lot of them kept track of it, a lot of them guessed how much time they had left. 27 probably made Boss a lot of money, just from Honzo. Enough to leave then, when he was still small.

Leaving was a joke, though. 27 never kept track of how much money he made Boss. Never tried, not after 50.

There’s no leaving. No escape. Not from The Miasma, and not from tomorrow.

He just wants more time. He doesn’t care if he loses it, if he’s away for almost all of it. He wants to be here, even if he’s not. It’s not entirely for Eri’s sake either, it’s something that he wants selfishly. It’s something that he doesn’t deserve.

He just wants to win. Once. Once against Chisaki.

Yamada laughs, barely a laugh with how short and airy it is, shaking his head before he pulls his hands away. His eyes are closed and when they open, they look down. “Who knows, maybe one of Shou’s informants can make a passport really quick. Yours is on lockdown, but there’s ways to still get out of the country. Smuggle you out of the country.”

“Di-isney World.” 27 doesn’t actually want to go there, he just wants Yamada to stop crying. Even if he’s trying to hide it from 27, maybe he’ll smile and laugh. Forget whatever reason is making him cry.

Yamada does, he smiles and laughs, and it sounds a bit better this time. “Exactly. We’ll go to Disney World. Start a new life in America. Shou’s accent is horrible, it’ll be hilarious. And you...”

Deidoro’s quirk makes him feel too much at times. That’s why 27 laughs. “My a-accent is horrible too.”

Yamada doesn't laugh, but he smiles. His eyes are still green, but they're red too. "You're an amazing kid, Shinsou. I... I want to help. Honestly, I want to stop this whole fucking fiasco, and I'm not the only one who's considered a little bit of vigilantism to do it. But, um. Tell me how I can help."

27 is still a little surprised that Yamada swore. That he's that angry about it. It's an interrogation, it's 27's job. There's nothing that will stop it.

27 can't tell him how to help either. It's his fight, his job. He's only had a few jobs with other Numbers, usually just filling in ranks and they were told not to act like they knew each other too well. And they didn't anyway.

There was one kidnapping job that he did with 58. 58 had to do double duty, to change 27's appearance and voice to look like the target's ex-wife, and to cause a distraction so that the target's gang wouldn't notice that their leader was walking away.

Distraction. "Distra-action."

Yamada finally smiles in a way that 27 likes. It's close to that wincing smile, that smile that doesn't meet his eyes, but it does meet his eyes. Just not fully. "Well, you're talking to the right guy! I'm plenty distracting. Shou kicked me out of so many study sesh's when we were in high school, because I'd just start rambling or get distracted and he couldn't concentrate. Just me and my big mouth, running a mile a minute."

27 likes it. 50 would talk like that sometimes. Just to fill the space he couldn't. Sometimes she'd talk for him, have a conversation that was really with herself, but she knew him. She always knew what he wanted to say.

"So, we've got some tea! It's my drink of choice, Shou is the real coffee fiend. He can drink it all day, but if I have two cups, I start buzzing. Tea is, you know, more calming. Turns the volume down, and you know how much I need that sometimes," Yamada says with a short laugh, the one he uses in class while he mimes adjusting the dial on his speakers. "Have you ever had tea?"

27 shakes his head, but shrugs. He's not sure. He can't remember drinking it, but he knows what it is. He thinks it tastes bland.

It doesn't. It's not sweet, but it's not bitter. Maybe it's what flowers taste like. Floral. That's the word.

He likes it.

"Well, I guess we've got several options," Yamada says, curling a hand around the back of his neck. "I just kind of guessed that sleep would be a no go for a while, maybe not tonight, but if you feel tired, just let me know. I can fix up the bed really quick, we have plenty of spare sheets. We could watch a movie, listen to some tunes, work on your tests, do some- well, not JSL, not until we see Recovery Girl, and she doesn't want to see us right now. Talk, or... you know."

Yamada shrugs, just a quick lift and lower of his shoulders. It's almost relaxed, so relaxed that it's hard to see the tension, but Yamada has been tense this entire conversation.

"Whatever you want me to do, listener. Just tell me, and we'll do it."

That's almost like his quirk.

When he first started quirk training at The Miasma, he used to be a little amazed that he could do that. As soon as he pulled that string, sealed that disturbing look over someone's face, he could make them do almost anything. Just by telling them to do it.

Even if they were angry, and trying to hurt him. If he riled up a Number enough, even if they knew better and they knew how his quirk worked, they'd answer and he'd pull them under. That disturbing look on their face replacing rage.

Rikiya let him have fun with it a few times. He would stop the match and tell him to make the quirked underling do something embarrassing. Make them dance, or pick their nose. He would take a picture of them doing it if that underling made Rikiya mad earlier, for something that happened outside the room. Some offense he didn't need to know about.

Yamada is almost telling him to use his quirk, but it's different. When 27 gives a command, there's no 'we' following it. 27 isn't doing anything with the person he has under his control.

It's almost like his quirk, but it's different. It's so different that it's almost scarier than his quirk.

But he likes it.

“Ta-alk. But no-ot really. I'm mu-ute.”

When Aizawa wakes up, he makes sure that Eri is still fast asleep, that her deep and shallow breaths don't hitch when he slowly moves her onto her bed and off of his chest. He feels guilty for leaving her, but tucks the sleeping bag around her, folds it over itself so that it's heavier. He still feels that rising anxiety, that desperate desire to check his phone and see if Naomasa has responded yet.

His phone isn't on the nightstand, but the drawer beneath is slightly opened. He pulls it open a bit more and sees that the Stress Stash has been taken out.

Shinsou is asleep on the couch, his feet angled towards the ground as if he didn't mean to fall asleep. His head is propped up on the armrest, his phone held loosely in his hand. Aizawa considers putting a blanket over him before he decides that the risk of waking him up with the action would be too great.

He imagines that he and Hizashi need to have this conversation privately.

Hizashi only spares a glance in his direction when he walks outside, his hand tucks into the pocket of his lounge pants where he knows the cigarette carton is. But he doesn't light another one until Aizawa lifts his hand, and he hands it to him while still refusing to look at him.

Aizawa breaths in the smoke and holds it, and waits.

“He said no, it's still happening,” Hizashi says, tone too even, as he flicks the end of his cigarette. “They said they have concerns that Chisaki might be attacked, and I fucking hope so, Shou. I don't know...”

Hizashi purses his lips when he shakes his head, and he doesn't need to say it. Aizawa has taught restraint to the students under his charge, tried to be an example of it, but knowing what he knows now, he's unsure whether he could have any himself.

It was different during the raid, when he knew Eri as a little girl and Chisaki as a villain who was hurting her, and only had a brief suspicion that he wrote off as paranoia. Now that Eri isn't just a little girl to him, now that he knows that Chisaki was hurting Shinsou too, and that his paranoia wasn't just unfounded, but confirmed by that bastard Hari, he doesn't know.

He doesn't know if he can lay eyes on Chisaki and not try to snap his neck.

"I fucked up," Hizashi says, rubbing at his eyes. "Big time. Shinsou was saying things, and I.... I couldn't handle it, Shou. I've done it a million times, being calm, being Present Mic, being a hero. I couldn't do that, Shou. I couldn't pretend that I could handle it, I couldn't wave it off and smile. He was...."

Aizawa forgets about the cigarettes, he's far more concerned with the way that Hizashi is talking. Too many pauses, too close to silence.

"He called himself Dog . And broken ," Hizashi shakes his head, more firmly this time, then finally looks at Aizawa. His eyes are more bloodshot than his own, more irritated and not from the smoke. "I didn't fucking see it. He seemed fine, fine as he could be, and I didn't even see it. I'm his hero, I'm his caretaker, and I couldn't be any of that, Shou! And I can't...."

"Hizashi," Aizawa says, resting a hand on his husband's shoulder before he squeezes. He's seen doubt in heroes much younger and inexperienced than Hizashi, and there's a threshold at which he stops telling them to reconsider whether this is the right path for them. There's a point where it really isn't doubt, it's a mess of 'what should have been done's' that tangle up into guilt and disillusionment. Hizashi has long since passed that. "He's asleep."

"I wouldn't be out here if he wasn't, Shou. I wouldn't leave him alone after-"

"He's asleep, on the couch," Aizawa interrupts, with another squeeze, harder this time. "Without Eri next to him. When he knows what's going to happen today, and after realizing it in the worst way."

Hizashi looks away, probably still blaming himself for not throwing out the bleach, but it was Aizawa's fault as well. They talked about it briefly the night before bringing Shinsou to UA, going through all the things that they needed to change for his sake, ways to mitigate risks or make things easier for him. At the time, they thought that he wouldn't have a reason to be in the laundry room. That he would be as unlikely to do his own laundry as any other teenager they knew.

"He's asleep after that, because you calmed him down. You reassured him enough. You took care of him," Aizawa says, bringing his hand up to the back of Hizashi's neck, stepping closer to press against his husband's arm, still limp at his side. "If there's nothing else we can do-"

"I can't, Shou," Hizashi says, his voice breaking before he covers his mouth and swallows, tension in his shoulders rising all at once as he tries to hold it in. "I've fucked up enough, I didn't see it, I didn't say anything! He thought that he was broken because he dissociates, because he doesn't think he's a person! "

Aizawa hadn't allowed himself to dwell on it. 27 and Dog. Tattoos that were brands, the same way animals were identified. The implications of that. The reasons behind those methods, and how effective they could be in shattering a person in a wholly unique way.

Hizashi huffs, quick and harsh, almost a laugh but far too rattled for that. "Bakugo taught him how to do grounding exercises. Bakugo saw it--"

"I told him eno--"

"We were told more," Hizashi growls, cutting his watery eyes at him. "We can't help him, we can't get him the help that he needs, and I can't hurt him more. I can't just drive him to the station and pretend that this is fine, Shou! Because it's not!"

"15 minutes won't kill him," Aizawa says, and activates his quirk almost out of habit, just from recognizing that subtle difference in the way that Hizashi inhales. "But Mind Slice will."

Hizashi breathes out through his clenched teeth, pressing the heels of his palms against his forehead. "Fuck, Shou."

Aizawa agrees, for more reasons than Hizashi has probably realized. Chisaki was barely a lesser evil, but certainly a torment in and of itself.

But The Commission of Wardship Affairs could cause far more suffering. Mind Slice could take the information they needed in a matter of hours, leaving Shinsou in a catatonic state afterwards. Possibly for the rest of his life. They could remove either ward at any time, and separating Shinsou from Eri would undoubtedly leave him in a state similar to that. And Eri could be ripped away from the heroes that taught her the meaning of safety, how to smile. From him and Hizashi, heroes that she regarded as her fathers.

Chisaki called her his daughter.

Aizawa hadn't realized it before, had only considered the bedwetting to be a sign. But Eri had been so oddly insistent that the hero students stay with her, had clung to Togata until he promised to buy her a giant plushie of her own to keep. He heard Shinsou reading to her an hour after they went to bed, but imagined that was only due to how infrequently he did so.

Eri was suffering too. And he hadn't seen it.

"Shou," Hizashi says, wiping his tears from his eyes before he looks at the cigarette, almost brings it to his lips before he tosses it to the ground. "I need you. I need you to be there, doing your 'Steady Shou' thing. To keep me from bringing the whole building down, because I swear. When I see him, I'll want to kill him."

Aizawa nods, wraps his arms around his husband's shoulders when he's pulled into an embrace.

But he doesn't know if he can.

Sato doesn't like getting up early, but he usually does. It's kind of a force of habit, since he's been waking up at unreasonable hours since he was a little kid to help out at the family bakery, or at least say good morning to his parents before they leave.

Even if he's woken up at 4 AM more often than not, and falls back to sleep more often now that he's pushing his mind and body to the limit at UA, that early morning hour still has a sense of oddness. There's a word for it that he can't remember, but it has something to do with doorways. The part of the day that isn't really day or night, and it just feels weird to be awake because of that.

But it's not just the time that's weird this morning.

Iida is a familiar face in the dorm kitchen at 5 AM, but it's usually just to say 'Good morning' and refill his water bottle before he goes on his run. But today, he's just running in place while he types on his phone, barely looking up to greet him.

Bakugo is up occasionally, but always groggy enough not to bother with words. If he says anything to Sato, it's usually a grunt or growl that might be aimed at the coffee machine. But today, he's snarling at his phone and shooting glares at Midoriya across the table with his coffee cup already almost empty.

Sato almost never sees Midoriya, and if he does, Midoriya always tells him 'Good morning' with bright eyes and a chipper tone, and asks if he wants any help if he's making breakfast. But Midoriya is so focused on his phone that he doesn't look like he's blinking, thumbs working faster than should be humanly possible, and the bags under his eyes suggest that the phone charger connecting Kaminari's mouth to his phone should be one meant to recharge humans, because he looks like he's on 1% and very aware that he's dying.

Kaminari looks dead, poking at his phone rather than typing with his head slumped on his arms, but Todoroki looks the same as always. Just sipping on a glass of orange juice while he looks at Sato, and doesn't really say anything.

Sato kind of feels like someone should say something, but he's a bit too tired to do something as complicated as asking. Especially when he knows he can just pull out his phone and find out.

And he's not surprised at all that it's the group chat with Shinsou that's so active.

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: There isn't a reason for this. But I want you to roast Chisaki.

Sato looks up after confirming his suspicions, having scrolled up until he found the evidence he was looking for, and sighs. Then he starts making himself a glass of orange juice.

It's not like he dislikes Shinsou or anything. He's a ward, and that means he kind of needs all the support he can get. He's been through a lot, even if he barely talks about it, and Sato's kind of glad he doesn't. Sato imagines that 'bleach baths' weren't the worst thing that happened to him.

But Shinsou has a habit of dropping into the chat and saying stuff that gets everyone worked up, then dropping off for a few days. He's not sure if it's even helpful for him, if he's just got so much stuff going on that he's too busy to say anything unless he needs something, or if it's just to start drama. Because it is kind of starting drama.

And it couldn't have happened at a worst time, because midterms are next week. Everyone is already feeling the pressure, especially Sato. He's had half of his peers already put in their requests for study snacks, and he kind of hopes the other half forgets that he offered, because he's not doing too well in Art History and needs to focus.

But he's almost certain that Shinsou will drop another bomb or three next week, and no amount of rabbit petting or sugary snacks will help them deal with the fallout.

But, they're heroes. Sato is a hero, and that means going beyond his limit. He can't really complain with reading about whatever crazy stuff Shinsou is dealing with when they're training to go into disaster zones and villain fights. They're training to risk their lives, and possibly lose them to protect others. To help people like Shinsou.

Even if he'd rather just bake him some deserts and call it good sometimes.

Mighty Boiii: Are you sure? I don't have a problem with that at all but Aizawa-Sensei said not to talk about the raid and maybe there's a reason for that and

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: What do you want for it

Mighty Boiii: Nothing! I just want to make sure you're okay? You're up really early or really late and maybe you should sleep because you seemed kind of tired earlier today but I don't mind even if I'm not that great at it

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: CHISAKIS REAL NAME IS CHISUCKI BECAUSE HE SUCKS

Provost Piston: Chisaki is a horrible villain who deserves to be imprisoned for his heinous actions far beyond the end of his life. This is also due to the fact that no one in society should have to share the same space that he occupies.

FUCK CHISAKI: CLOCK BITCH FUCKED UP HIS FACE BUT HIS HAND FUCKED UP HIS OWN DICK

Provost Piston: @Bakugo Though I am aware that the nature of roasts often devolves into insults of a sexually degrading nature, I believe your comments are unnecessarily so. Midoriya never utilizes that tactic, and he is regarded as the best roaster among us.

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: oh fuck I can't believe you've done this

FUCK CHISAKI: DEKU IS FUCKING DEKU HE CAN'T DO SHIT BETTER THAN ME. HE HASN'T SAID SHIT FOR 30 MINUTES. AND YOU DON'T KNOW SHIT ABOUT ROASTING EITHER SHITTY FOUR EYES

Soba Boiii: It was a joke.

Provost Piston: When Chisaki was born, the doctor who was attending the birth attempted to throw him out the window for reasons obvious to us all, but the window rejected that action and threw him back.

FUCK CHISAKI: FUCKING IMPROVEMENT, BUT I KNOW YOU STOLE THAT SHIT FOUR EYES. AND FUCKED IT UP.

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: It's fine. You should sleep. I didn't know about midterms.

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: Nah dude its cool! My brain thingy was doing the wakey wake, and we're all like insomnia squad anyway.

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: Yamada is doing a review, but Aizawa won't. They're arguing about it. Yamada might win.

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: shisnou pls steal the answers for the tests im begging u

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: Aizawa is suspicious that I'm talking to you. I won't have time, and I don't know where they would put that.

FUCK CHISAKI: FUCK SHITSEI. BONEY FUCKING ASSLESS BITCH CAN CHOKE ON A FUCKING CHEERIO

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: Is Yamada more highly ranke

Provost Piston: When Chisaki happens to be walking down a street, he causes many people in the vicinity to turn their heads. This is not towards him, but in fact away from him, to keep themselves from having to look at him.

Soba Boiii: @Shinsou It's better to ignore it when your parents are arguing. I have a picture of Soba wearing an All Might hat.

Soba Boiii: Tap to open 24 KB file

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: ilu sobaaaaaa i wanna cry does he know i love him too????

Soba Boiii: Yes. Koda made sure to tell him.

FUCK CHISAKI: YOU TWO FUCKHEADS ARE SITTING NEXT TO EACH OTHER WHY THE FUCK ARE YOU DOING THIS SHIT. AND FUCK THAT FUCKING CAT.

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: He looks uncomfortable. Thank you.

Provost Piston: Present Mic is technically more highly ranked than Eraserhead, because as an underground hero, Eraserhead is not ranked in the same manner as most Pro Heroes are. The Hero ranking system has many proponents and opponents, regarded as either a distraction from the duties that Pro Heroes are entrusted with or a symbol of reassurance for civilians or a source of information to guide marketing strategies utilized by hero management agencies which dominates 13% of Japan's economy. It is hard to say how well Eraserhead would do if he was a ranked hero, but as merchandising and media presence tends to affect those ranks, I believe that Present Mic would still be more highly ranked than Eraserhead.

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: It's fine. You should sleep. Eri had a bad night, and she'll want to spend time with you. Don't say anything about Chisaki. And I just wanted to read it before 5 today.

Sato looked up from his phone to see if anyone else was thinking the same thing he was. Iida had stopped in his tracks, one foot still raised, and Kaminari rolled his head to the side, frowning in confusion. Todoroki's eyes widened a bit before they narrowed, and he turned his phone towards Midoriya, who hadn't noticed.

Bakugo growled and slapped Midoriya's shoulder. "I fucking told you, Deku! Just send that shit already!"

Midoriya did look up, his eyes widening when he read the message from Todoroki's phone, before he turned back to his with a deep set frown, thumbs typing faster.

Sato just stared.

When he was in middle school, he wasn't sure if he wanted to become a hero. He knew that he wanted to help people, to use the strength he was given to protect people that were weaker. He spent a lot of time wavering between UA and the high schools in his hometown, between a lofty dream that he wasn't sure he would see come true and something more sensible. Between a costume he couldn't stop drawing as a kid, that he wasn't sure he could fit into, and a TV character he's seen on a million sitcoms.

He could have just stayed home, and become a police officer after graduating. He could have used his quirk only to help at the bakery, he could have spent more time helping at the bakery. He could have gone to a police academy, and listened to the same three jokes about how good he was at making donuts while he patrolled his hometown, working with the heroes but keeping his quirk out of any fight that came.

He knew how investigations worked. He read a lot of detective novels and watched a lot of crime shows while he was trying to decide, to figure out whether he could really be smart enough to catch that little piece of evidence that breaks the case.

He knew that sometimes, victims had to still see their perpetrators. People who were hurt had to point the finger at the person who hurt them, to provide the accusation and statement and evidence that the police needed to do their jobs. It always felt wrong to him.

But he never considered what it felt like for the victim. And he can't imagine what Shinsou feels like now.

But if Shinsou felt like a roast would help, then Sato knew his way around the oven.

Stress Bake BB: Chisaki named his gang the 8 Precepts of Death, because he couldn't count any higher. He didn't know that thumbs counted as fingers too.

Bakugo snorts through his nose, but Sato isn't done. His new classmates probably don't know this, but he kind of got a reputation back in middle school among his friends. He just hasn't really had the opportunity to show it off at UA.

Stress Bake BB: Chisaki wore a mask all the time so that his gang could be unique, but that wasn't the only reason. Villains don't have dental.

Stress Bake BB: Chisaki's teeth are so crooked that if he flossed with piano wire, it could play Beethoven's 8th symphony all by itself.

Bakugo slaps the table and whispers "Fuck," before he starts laughing.

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: dark!Sato unlocked omg sugar daddy how are you doing this Soba Boiii: Keep going.

Stress Bake BB: Some villains try to say that they had a rough home life to explain why they turned to crime, but that isn't the case for Chisaki. His parents kicked him out of the nest just like any other pair of seagulls would.

Yeet Me to the Moon: I woke up to our sweet sugar man going OFF who tf hurt you?

I Shall Be #5 Nevermore: Hidden depths beneath the sugar glaze.

Stress Bake BB: Chisaki's villain name is 'Overhaul,' but he should have went with 'U-Haul.' Maybe 'Dump Truck' would have worked better, but U-Hauls can still work for hauling around giant piles of garbage.

Mighty Boiii: Message failed to send due to exceeding the character limit.

Sato looked up slowly, in the corner of his eye he saw the rest of the 'early morning' gang doing the same. Midoriya didn't look like he was breathing, the bags beneath his eyes starting to look even darker as the color drained from his face.

While Bakugo began screaming at him for not sending the roast in smaller sections, Sato looked back at the phone, ignoring the possibility that one of those explosions could send his glass of orange juice flying off the table. Again.

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: Midoriya.exe stopped working.

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: Oh my god he's not breathing who knows cpr????

Yeet Me to the Moon: THERE'S A CHARACTER LIMIT???? I legit sent a 5 page essay on LNE before!

Lofi hip hop beats to chill and study to: KAMINARI WE ALL KNOW CPR

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: bold of u to assume I can remember that

Not haxing the midterm server stuff 4 me :'(: The limit is set to 99999 characters per message....

Mighty Boiii: @Hagakure do you still have that webcam and your printer?????

Not haxing the midterm server stuff 4 me :'(changed their name to C me fail

C me fail: Yep! Just let me get ready real quick, it won't take long lol

God is a woman and her name is Yaoyorozu Momo: Who needs help and what with?

RIP to our ADHD phone charger: hooooomg we need marshmallows this is gonna be a live roast my body is READY

Yeet Me to the Moon: Printer??? Are we getting a powerpoint presentation of Chisaki's failures and sins because I am READY.

C me fail: L...can't with that. IT'S NOT POWERPOINT IF IT'S P R I N T E D

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: It's really not that important, it's fine. You really need to study.

Yeet Me to the Moon: Shinsou dude, this is still definitely about you, but this is also for us. I want this. So bad. To happen.

Melting into a puddle of tears and failure: ROAST ROAST ROAST ROAST

Melting into a puddle of tears and failure: SHINNYYYYYYYY COME TO SCHOOOL
PLEAAAAAAAAAAAAAASE I MIIIIIIIIIISS YOUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUU

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: They don't want me to. Eri is though. Make sure she's busy.

Shinny bb i miss uuuuu: Thanks Stress Bake.

Sato smiled to himself before he got up from the table, watching Midoriya race to the stairs before Todoroki called for him to take a glass of lemon water to prepare.

He's not really a flashy guy like a lot of other students. His quirk isn't the most powerful, or the most unique. When he applied for UA, he wasn't surprised when the interviewer representing the management department told him that if he did find some success as a hero, he would never be able to break the top 200 hero ranking.

He just wants to help people, and the little things count too. Making a baker's dozen for a customer who seems a little down, or offering a sample to a little kid who was staring at a pastry that his parents weren't going to buy. Making food was a simple way to comfort people, even if it wasn't a grand gesture, and it was usually taken for granted.

But it helped. He helped. He could help a little more.

Stress Bake BB: No problem! Just tell me what you want to eat for the dorm breakfast this weekend. I'm making everyone's favorites.

Aizawa was surprised to see Recovery Girl smiling when they entered, until she spoke. "I'm glad you remembered your appointment without having to be reminded."

Aizawa completely forgot. And Recovery Girl realized that as soon as she saw Shinsou's hand, a cheery smile becoming too sharp and not at all cheery when she turned to him.

"Of course," was all that she said, but there were far too many comparisons to Midoriya in those two words. Far too many accusations. But she didn't need to speak them, especially in front of Shinsou, when he imagined that at the end of this appointment she would still make plenty of time for that. "Let's take a look at that hand, then."

Shinsou sat on the cot while Recovery Girl unwrapped his fingers, patting the back of his hand before she kissed it, deciding that even if Shinsou was tired throughout the rest of the exam, it wouldn't matter.

Though Shinsou never seemed to be affected by the exhaustion that should come from Recovery Girl's quirk, his eyelids did fall a bit more closed while she clipped a monitoring device on his thumb, and remained that way while she took his height and weight.

It might be better if Shinsou did fall asleep at the end of the exam, so that Recovery Girl would be more willing to watch over him. Aizawa had few other ideas for what to do with Shinsou.

Neither he nor Hizashi could take today off and stay at the dorm with Shinsou. They had students that needed their attention, especially in Hizashi's case. While Aizawa was sure that no amount of review or preparation could make a difference at this point for his homeroom, and he was already ahead of his lesson plan in Hero Ethics, Hizashi had missed a lot of class. His rubric was a mess, and he needed to sort it out today for his students.

Shinsou couldn't be left alone at the dorm, but he imagined that the usual schedule of taking him to class would also be overwhelming, even with Eri by his side. He seemed to be unaffected so far after waking up, but if he broke down so readily with Hizashi, then Aizawa knew better. Even if Shinsou could hide it, it was still there.

“I-It shakes. Nu-umb sometimes,” Shinsou's text-to-speech app broke through Aizawa's distracted thoughts, causing him to look up to see Recovery Girl looking at Shinsou while he held up his hand, still slightly trembling. “Wa-as unmade. No-ot remade right.”

It's the 'right' that Aizawa can't stop thinking about. The suggestion that Chisaki's quirk was so familiar to Shinsou that he could tell when it was poorly done.

Sir Nighteye told him that at the end of the torture that he saw, Chisaki would use his quirk on Shinsou to undo some of the damage. He knew that this torture must have occurred more than once, that it wasn't unfamiliar to Shinsou, but he hoped that it hadn't always been so brutal.

That it never was worse than that. That Shinsou hadn't also been reset.

Eri hasn't talked about that part of the raid, but Aizawa hopes that if she did, she wouldn't ask what Chisaki meant by that. That somehow, it had been forgotten about, or she was unable to remember. There were things that they had to be willing to discuss with her, to explain, but he knows that he can't do that for that moment. That vague admission and the horrors behind it.

There was a possibility that both of his wards had died and been brought back to life, repeatedly. And more than the weight of the horrors that they lived through, that possibility was heavier in a different way. Something unfathomable, something without research or accounts of others who had gone through the same thing. Aizawa had no idea what it could feel like to die and come back, and he hopes that neither of his wards do either.

He hopes that if there was a memory of it, it stays buried.

Recovery Girl smiles at Shinsou after pulling away the portable X-ray, and Aizawa doesn't miss the fact that Shinsou had quickly looked away from the screen when it turned on. That he hadn't looked at it for the entire exam. That he wasn't curious at all to know what the inside of his hand looked like.

Aizawa wanted to kill Chisaki.

“I'll be sending those images to some friends of mine who specializes in orthopedics and neurology, and I'm sure we can have that taken care of,” Recovery Girl says with a smile and another pat, before she walks to the table beside the cot to pull out a UA branded messenger bag.

One that has a purple cat paw embroidered above UA's logo.

“I have a few snacks packed away in here, along with the usual gifts that come with the bag,” Recovery Girl says, smiling at the flicker of a grin on Shinsou's face when his eyes lock on the embroidered patch. “It's important that you eat whenever you feel like you have an appetite.”

Recovery Girl won't mention the patch, or the fact that it's clearly hand-sewn. That she not only took the time to personalize Shinsou's bag with something that she knew he would like, something that she learned in the short amount of time that they had spent together, but that it had probably been difficult for her. Her own hands weren't as healthy as they used to be, Arthritis still at an early stage, but there nonetheless.

It's a touching gesture, one that makes Aizawa feel all the more guilty when she levels another accusation with her stare. He had just assumed that Shinsou would find himself welcome to Eri's snacks as well, though Hizashi did mention wanting Shinsou to order a backpack for himself online. At some point. "I need to speak to Aizawa in my office, but do let me know if there's anything you like in that bag. I have plenty more stocked away in here."

Shinsou nodded, lifting the flap, and Aizawa followed Recovery Girl to her more secluded office prepared for a rather deserved scolding.

Instead, she sighed as soon as she sat down, full of disappointment, and that was honestly enough for him. Enough for her as well, as she lifts her notes on her clipboard. "He's gained just a little weight, but I do hope that this is the lowest I ever see him at. His metabolic rate is improving as well, he's more hydrated. His temperature was steady throughout the exam, and oddly low."

Aizawa glances towards the door, cupping a hand behind his neck. "He's been apart from Eri the past few days. Since she is the only person he can speak to, it might have an effect." Shinsou's quirk might be weakening rather than flaring up and going wild due to the lack of using it, but Aizawa knows that might not be the case. "He used it on Eri when her quirk erupted. He was only controlling her, but he still had a nose bleed. I erased his quirk, and he was unconscious and feverish."

"I remember," Recovery Girl chides, flipping to an earlier page in her notes where she must have recorded the incident after Hizashi reported it to her, asking for her advice. Though there was little that any of them could do. "He recovered in a few hours, but seemed lethargic afterwards."

"Did my quirk have an effect on his?" Aizawa asks, forcing himself to. It wasn't the same as his quirk inspiring the bullet that took away Togata's, but the possibility was nonetheless horrifying. That he could have somehow harmed Shinsou's quirk when it seemed to be in a fragile state, doing so thoughtlessly.

"I doubt it, but it must have been a shock to the system," Recovery Girl says, reminding him that she was not a quirk specialist. But it seems that she had been educating herself. "Rejected quirks can often cause unpleasant side effects, and it's more clear when evaluating the quirk factor itself. I haven't been able to get the police to authorize a specialist to look at Shinsou's quirk factor, since it would be more identifying than anything else."

Aizawa nods, heartened that at least Recovery Girl was able to reach out to some specialists, and Shinsou could receive better care through her. And more than a little relieved to know that his quirk might not have affected him the way that he thought.

Shinsou's quirk factor might have been growing steadily more volatile, more at risk for quirk slips and those unpleasant side effects, which in Shinsou's case might be as benign as a migraine or severe as a seizure. But if Erasure nullified that quirk factor, rendering it dormant for the few seconds it took to snap his control, it would take time to work up to that pitched frenzy. Time enough that it might not have the opportunity to cause issues, if Shinsou was able to speak to someone other than Eri.

If he had been fully convinced that he wouldn't inflict Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome onto that person.

"His hand," Recovery Girl says with a shaking sigh. Aizawa is immediately concerned. "I don't see anything wrong with it.”

Aizawa doesn't understand. “The damage must be severe. It's noticeable.”

“Very much so,” Recovery Girl says, closing her notes to fold her hands over them on her lap, looking up at Aizawa. “There may be something that I'm missing, which is why I'll be getting a second opinion on the matter, but there's a possibility that this is a psychogenic condition. A healthy hand, but a clear reason why it doesn't behave like one.”

Aizawa is unfamiliar with the term, but Recovery Girl offers enough explanation for him to have an idea what it means. Shinsou's hand wasn't damaged by Chisaki, but Chisaki had done enough damage on his own. And more than any other injury that Chisaki ‘repaired,’ Shinsou's hand held onto the memory of it.

And after what Eri told him, he doesn't question why it would be his hand.

Chisaki had destroyed Shinsou's hand in front of Eri. Had shown it to her, and Aizawa knows that as painful as that experience was for Shinsou, it must have been more painful because Eri was involved. And he imagines that Chisaki took great pleasure in knowing that.

“I'll email you as soon as I know one way or another, but I'm glad to see that he's doing better. Broken fingers notwithstanding,” Recovery Girl says with narrowed eyes, ones that Aizawa instinctively looks away from.

He imagines that she wouldn't take too kindly to his request, and nods, knowing that words are useless at this point. As much as he could argue that Shinsou seemed to have a knack for getting injured all on his own, it would be pointless. He and Hizashi were Shinsou's caretakers, and they should be doing a far better job.

Shinsou looks completely unphased by the treatment, much like Aizawa imagined that he would be, though he hoped that it would be different. He slung the bag over his shoulder before he signed to Recovery Girl. ‘Thank you.’

“Please, do be careful with that,” Recovery Girl scolds with a gentle tone. “It would be better to avoid using your fingers for a few hours at least.”

Shinsou pulls his phone from his hoodie pocket, the barest hint of a frown lingering on his face while he types. “So-orry. And tha-ank you-u.” He must have remembered that Recovery Girl didn't know enough sign language to know what he signed.

But he would be surprised. “Just be careful,” Recovery Girl said with a chuckle, before she signed. “And ‘You're welcome.’”

And Aizawa had to say that he was surprised himself, but only for a moment. He had known and worked with Recovery Girl far too long to be surprised that she wouldn't make that effort. It brings a smile to his face nonetheless.

But a glance at the time quickly wipes it away. “Thank you, Recovery Girl. If there's anything else, please send me an email.”

They needed to collect Eri from Hizashi quickly to get to homeroom in time, and though that wouldn't offer Shinsou much time to decide whether he would like to stay with Hizashi or himself, he hoped that Shinsou would still make the right decision.

Class 1-A's homeroom would not be the right decision.

27 made a mistake. Several mistakes. Consecutively.

Eri had placed another note on his desk, while he stared at the test that he wanted to be a distraction, and tried to ignore it. He didn't want them to notice that he was there, he didn't think about it, he wasn't thinking at all he was stupid.

He refused to look away, because he knows what he'll see. His owner's irritation already carried far too well in his words, and he could feel the weight of their stare anyway.

He hates this game. He never should have started it, never should have encouraged the heroes or asked anything of them. What little they gave in return was nothing compared to the price of it. Their stares, their attention. He was entirely too bleach soaked to deal with it.

He had opened the first note, curious. Curious if it could be interesting, distracting, could be useful. It wasn't.

' The roast was AMAZING, have you seen it? Also Kiribro said you have tats, but I didn't want to bring it up in the chat since it might be embarrassing, but you can tell me. ;) What do they look like? And are you a student now? You have a bag, did you transfer from villain school? Can you still steal Present Mic's midterm answers even if you did? If that's okay? I need it? Anyway, how was your morning? I was super tired after... '

He didn't know which one of the heroes wanted him to read a full page front to back filled with questions and statements and words that required too much from him, but they would be disappointed. They all would be. He could only hope that would make them leave him alone.

The buzzing had only gotten stronger, until he had to focus on breathing, realizing that he was forgetting to. He tried to breathe, tried to breathe, but it was getting harder. He knew what that meant, and he didn't want it to happen.

Yamada told him to use the phone if he needed to, and he did. He messaged Yamada that he wanted to leave, in a space between the rising panic where he didn't care whether he was allowed to tell him that or not, didn't care if it was troublesome for Yamada.

But he didn't pick the right chat to send that to.

"I wonder if we can sneak into the staff room," Mirio mused, matching his quick pace before 27 realizes he was walking too fast again. He didn't even know where he was going, why he needed to get there so quickly.

He had no idea why Mirio was here either. " Sorry. Mi-idterms. You do-on't have to. " He didn't know about midterms, he shouldn't be bothering the heroes, his owner didn't want him to do that. He would distract them, they would do poorly. Mirio shouldn't be here, Mirio shouldn't be doing whatever they're supposed to be doing, he has no idea what they're supposed to be doing, he doesn't know why he wanted to get away from Eri, why he would be so stupid, why he would cause so much trouble he's causing a lot of trouble he should be better than that he's troublesome troublesome troublesome

"Breathe," Mirio says, gently. Hands rising and falling again. Kind smile. They're stopped. He's trying to breathe, trying not to be troublesome. Trying not to make trouble. "In." He can, he can breathe in, if Mirio tells him to. "Out." He's getting better. He's not completely lost, he's not a lost cause, he won't be thrown away, he can breathe.

He doesn't know why he keeps crying when this happens, but he wonders if Mirio notices that it doesn't stop as quickly as it should. Even when he's breathing better, when he's breathing right, he can't really stop, it's troublesome. There's a troublesome ache in his chest, a stinging in his hands that goes numb, but not like it's supposed to. He's troublesome.

He doesn't want to think of being troublesome, doesn't want the words to stay in his mind, but they are. They're in his mind, because Chisaki left them there. When he stole his voice he put the words in there.

He hates it.

"Really, don't worry about it," Mirio says, waving his hand. "I don't really have to worry about midterms that much, and Neji and Tamaki take better notes than me anyway! And Ecto-sensei-"

"Has found you," the villainous looking hero approaching from down the hall says. Mirio stiffens and presses his palms together in front of his chest, to ask forgiveness when it's 27's fault. 27 is troublesome, so incredibly troublesome that he's troubled Mirio that much, troubled that Ecto-sensei person, troubled everyone around him and even people he's never met before. "It's fine."

Mirio sighs relief before he cups a hand behind his head, wincing. "I'm sorry, Sensei, I really should have said something before bolting out the door like that."

"You should have, but you didn't. And now that I can see why, it's a forgivable offence," Ecto-sensei glances at 27, giving him a nod, but not a wound. Not a punishment for causing trouble. It's weird. "It's not entirely your fault either, and Eraserhead and Present Mic will be hearing about it from me. But as long as you feel it's necessary, you can be excused from class."

27 doesn't know how to make his fingers move. He should tell Ecto-sensei that it's not Mirio's fault, it's not Yamada's and it's not his owner's. It's his. He's troublesome.

But he leaves after Mirio thanks him, and Mirio turns back to him to try to convince him that it's fine. That he likes being with 27 anyway, and he really doesn't have to worry about midterms. That they should try to sneak into the staff room, or maybe the cafeteria. Maybe go outside and enjoy the day, or go to Yamada and his owner's dorm. Or to Mirio's dorm.

27 still doesn't know how to make his fingers move, but his feet do. They're just very slow. He just wants to stand still, but he can't. Not when Mirio is walking, but slowly. Looking at him.

There's a chime that he barely hears before there's too many people and it's loud and he's standing in the way and he knows that he can feel them staring he can feel them moving around him he knows that he needs to move but he can't. He's troublesome.

There's a brush against his elbow, it knocks his arm forward a bit and the word out of his mouth. "Troublesome."

He hoped that Mirio didn't hear it, because he's supposed to say something else when he speaks to him. Anything else, anything that makes sense. Mirio is a hero and he wanted to hear something else from him when he speaks, because he places too much importance on that. For some reason, he doesn't care that 27 is broken and instead finds it funny. Or not funny. He doesn't know what Mirio thinks of it.

But Mirio smiles too much to cover up the falter, and puts a hand on 27's back. It's warm, it's large, it's solid. Maybe it's pushing him, but he moves before it can and it still follows, still rests there.

“I don’t think it’s troublesome at all, Shinsou,” Mirio says as they walk. It’s quieter than he usually talks, softer. It’s gentle, it’s warm, it’s kind. It’s confusing, but it’s almost believable. “Let’s just hang out here until the crowd dies down a bit.”

It’s an alcove in the hallway, a space that people are ignoring, have no reason to linger in. 27 stops when Mirio does, and it takes him too long to realize why it’s wrong. Mirio is standing between 27 and the crowd, he’s taking the guard position. It’s not entirely effective, there are still many angles from which one of the students could still attack him, but Mirio is turned so that there are fewer. So 27 can’t see as many of them.

But 27 can’t move to correct that, can’t do anything but stand and feel the weight of Mirio’s hand on his back until the crowd thins, until the chime rings again. Until Mirio smiles at him again, even wider. “Now we’ve got the whole place to ourselves again! Do you feel up for a little adventure?”

27 nods, he just doesn’t want to be troublesome. Anymore than he already is.

But something about that unwavering smile and that warm weight on his back is making that word disappear while they walk.

Bakugo is fucking pissed.

Shitsou clearly has some fucking anxiety issues and shit, and he shouldn’t be dragged around UA when he’s having a fucking breakdown already. Fucking Shitsei and Micsei should know that shit, but they did it anyway. And all the asshole extras in homeroom couldn’t fucking contain themselves. Fucking Ashido is so hellbent on this high five shit that even Shitsei knows it, and he was too busy glaring her ass down to even notice Shitsou.

Bakugo tried to keep an eye on him, because fucking someone should. The corpse is quiet as shit, but he didn’t say shit to Eri, even when she was talking to him, and that’s a red fucking flag right there. Fucker goes deaf sometimes because the anxiety shit gets to him. Shitty Hair said he didn’t seem to hear a fucking word he said after he tried to go to the lunch room and had that fucking episode.

But apparently some fucker installed an anxiety chip in Shitsou’s brain, because that creepy Tin Tin looking bastard strolled in and Shitsei didn’t bat an eye. Just fucking nodded at the bullshit line about needing Shitsou to help him with some shit, and let them leave like it’s some kind of shit he expected to happen.

Shitsou’s been gone all English, and he should probably stay missing until he gets his shit sorted. Or gets fucking medicated , but that would require some kind of fucking effort on Shitsei’s part, so it’s not happening.

Eri is doing that kick thing a lot. That creepy fucking shit Shitsou might be on to something, because everytime Shitty Hair turns around to smile at her, she stops for a while. But she’s doing that fucking test kick too much and someone needs to take her home or some shit, because she’s clearly not fucking alright and fucking dandy being here either.

The bell rings and Micsei starts going off like a fucking sprinkler trying to wrap up the fucking review, but Bakugo doesn’t need to hear that shit. He’s been fucking paying attention all fucking term, this shit’s not easy but it’s not hard, and he knows he’s got this shit in the fucking bag. He’s almost out the fucking door when he feels some shit pulling on his jacket, and he looks down to see Eri looking back at him.

The brat wants something pretty fucking bad to look that worried, and she needs to spit that shit out because it's a done fucking deal. Whoever's shit he needs to fuck up, whatever shit needs to go down, he's gonna fucking do it.

"Ugo," actually, fuck that, he's not doing shit for her until she stops that shit. "I want you to teach me how to be mad."

Fuck.

Fuck, is this really happening? Now?

Bakugo grabs the front of his shirt, his fucking heart is racing and shit, he's not fucking ready. He's not ready for this shit, he needs some fucking supplies or some shit, he doesn't even have any fucking candy. Eri is asking him to teach her how to be mad, and he can do that shit, but he needs to make sure he can do it right.

"Bro," Shitty Hair says like he's about to fucking cry, putting a hand on his shoulder. "I'm so happy for you-"

"Fuck off," Bakugo hisses through his teeth. He doesn't fucking give a shit, fucker is just insinuating some shit because he has fucking hair for brains, because Bakugo doesn't fucking care about this shit at all.

But he's still going to help the brat out, because he's a hero and shit. And because Shitsou is going to lose his fucking marbles when he finds out, but there's a fucking method to this shit. It's fucking necessary, and his impending shitfest is just a bonus.

Bakugo kneels down so he's fucking eye-level with the brat, because that shit helps communicate with tiny people and shit, and she just looks at him with her giant fucking red eyes. "Say 'Fuck.'"

"Fuck," Eri says, right before Micsei starts screeching like a dropped microphone. But he can cut that shit off right fucking now, because there's a fucking method to this shit, and Bakugo knows his shit. This is his fucking shit, and the brat knows it.

And she's a quick fucking study.

Aizawa looks up from the completed expulsion form, and looks to his husband. Hizashi's frayed nerves are a bit too apparent now, and the swears being muttered between bites of curry are not helping matters.

"Mirio checked in an hour ago, but they're not answering their phones," Hizashi says, with a long sigh and long stretch that doesn't relieve any of the tension in his eyes. "But I'm sure things are fine! I'm sure they're just getting something to eat, or maybe just hanging out. Having a lot of fun. Just like we are, right, little bean?"

"Fuck yeah," Eri answered, in a chipper voice that didn't suit those words at all. "Fuck...him. Fuck...."

Aizawa looked back at the expulsion form and tried to convince himself to hand it over to Principal Nezu. He knew that Bakugo meant well, he knew what he was trying to accomplish. But if he knew that Aizawa would be listening to Eri swearing like a broken record for the better part of two hours, he might have rethought his plan of action.

Or he might not have.

“Fuck Ch...”

Aizawa crumpled the expulsion form in his fist.

Shinsou tipped his head back against the wall, mouth still hanging open as he breathed hard, but he still had a little bit of a smile on his face. And he definitely earned it.

“And hydrate,” Mirio said, handing Shinsou a water bottle that he opened and drank from a bit more readily than he followed the cool-down stretches. He didn’t need to be told to do warm-ups, but cool-downs were a little confusing, and Mirio didn’t need another reason to hate Chisaki, but he had several. Shinsou not knowing how to do cool-downs was the least of them.

“I-I fought Rappa-a. You-u won’t hu-urt me.”

Mirio definitely didn’t believe that at first. Didn’t want to believe it. And definitely didn’t want to see Shinsou prove it to him, but there was a look in Shinsou’s eyes after he said that. Even if Shinsou didn’t outright ask, his eyes seemed too desperate for it, and Mirio convinced himself that as long as he went easy on the kid, then maybe this would help.

Tamaki says that it feels like feeling too much, like a surge of electricity that knocks out the power. Mirio imagines that Shinsou feels way too much, and it’s probably worse because he doesn’t have an outlet. He can’t tell anyone about it to let out the pressure when it starts to get that bad.

Tamaki says that exercise can help sometimes, and that’s why Mirio took Shinsou to the 3-A dorm workout room. They stretched, they ran laps, and Mirio was starting to see the difference. Shinsou was starting to loosen up, like all that electricity was slowly seeping out before it could fry him again, but then Shinsou started looking at the sparring mat, and eventually stopped running.

“I wa-ant to fight you-u.”

Mirio didn’t want to fight Shinsou, even if he was going to fake it. He really hoped that Shinsou would make the first move, that maybe he could just fall to the ground and let Shinsou have that little victory. But Shinsou beckoned for him to go first, and he moved his arm slowly, knowing his fist would go right over Shinsou’s shoulder.

And then the rest of him did.

His legs were still dangling over his head, chest tight as he was bent in half with his shoulders on the floor and arms braced outwards to balance himself. Shinsou just raised an eyebrow when Mirio asked if he was okay, before Mirio realized it and laughed.

He made sure that Shinsou taught him the sign for ‘Stop,’ that he’d use it as soon as he needed to. Shinsou never did, and Mirio never went all-out on the kid, but he was starting to see that Shinsou wasn’t quite as much of a kid as Mirio thought he was.

But Shinsou smiles a lot easier when he’s winning. And he knows when he’s going to win before he does it, when he sees that one opportunity before he takes it. Mirio wouldn’t say it’s a nice smile, it looks a lot like Aizawa-sensei’s smile before he doubles their essay’s page count or assigns a new project with an incredibly short time frame to do it. But it’s a smile, and Shinsou doesn’t smile nearly as much as he should.

“You did great,” Mirio tells him again, watching Shinsou catch his breath and take another long drink from the water bottle. He definitely should have been firmer with Shinsou about taking off the hoodie, but Shinsou almost never refuses to do something, from anyone. It’s something that Aizawa-sensei is working on, that he told Mirio to look out for, so Mirio just kept an eye out for signs of heat exhaustion instead.

Shinsou isn’t smiling anymore while he pants, but he pulls out his phone and says something that Mirio kind of wishes that he didn’t. “ Te-ell me about the-e raid. ”

Mirio sits down slowly, lifts his own water bottle before he realizes that he’s very clearly stalling, and Shinsou knows it. Shinsou stares at him, and he sees that same look in his eye, the one that he already couldn’t refuse, even if he should. Even if he definitely should, especially today. “Maybe that’s not the best idea. It’s kind of heavy stuff, and Aizawa-sensei knows more about it than me.”

“ Su-upposed to be-e willing to ta-alk about trauma-atizing events wi-ith trauma-atized childre-en, ” Shinsou says, and Mirio feels a cold trickle down his spine that he knows isn’t from sweat. Yamada had also told him that Shinsou can be a little manipulative sometimes, but the more than Mirio thinks about it, he doesn’t think that’s the case.

It might just be an honest request from a traumatized child. “Well, maybe we can start from the beginning. And if you want me to stop, just say ‘Stop,’” Mirio signs, then runs a hand through his sweaty hair. “Well, Sir Nighteye, my mentor, got a tip that The 8 Precepts of Death were doing something fishy. He and Bubble Girl were doing recon work, while me and Midoriya were on patrol. And that’s when we ran into Eri.” Mirio pauses, a small smile working over his face as he remembers what Midoriya had mentioned to him. “She talked to us because you told her to, right?”

“ Plan H, fi-ittingly eno-ough, ” Shinsou says, his eyes narrowing at his phone for a moment while he types. “ Di-idn’t think it wou-uld work. ”

Mirio smiles, despite that. Even if Shinsou didn’t believe in heroes before, maybe he did now. “It’s a good thing she did. We couldn’t help her then, even though Midoriya really wanted to. We didn’t know enough, just that she was really scared, but other hero agencies were noticing things. The, uh. Bullets.”

Shinsou nods, his eyes falling a little more closed before he looks at Mirio again. That same look in his eye.

“So, Sir Nighteye contacted those heroes and a few others, and started doing recon work for a raid. We had proof that the 8 Precepts were up to no good, but we needed to be sure that we knew where they were. And Sir Nighteye met you at the bookstore, right?” Mirio asks, even if he’s not sure if he should. If he really wants to hear Shinsou’s side of the story, and hear another piece of the life that he didn’t realize he’d miss so much before it was taken. To have another piece of Sir Nighteye when he wishes he had known sooner, had spent more time with him to have more pieces to remember him by.

“ Yes. So-orry. Shou-uld’n’t have stolen. Knew i-it was wrong. ” Shinsou looks away from him, low and to the side. He’s a good kid, and Mirio never doubted that. Never doubted that Shinsou would have turned out far different if his circumstances had allowed it.

“It’s okay! It actually kind of helped,” Mirio reassured, waving his hand. “The bookstore was close to the compound, and the owner of the bookstore noticed that you, you know. You seemed like you needed help. Sir Nighteye staked it out because he thought you were maybe just a kid who was working for the 8 Precepts, but he used his quirk and it... It helped a lot. We knew where Eri was.”

Sir Nighteye had been quiet when he got back to his office. He didn't speak for hours, just writing down what he observed from his quirk. When he finished, he sighed heavily, and folded his hands together in front of his mouth before he said anything. "The raid has two objectives now. But the second is unlikely to come to fruition. Prepare yourselves for that."

Mirio knows that he's very lucky to have never seen a civilian die. He knows that he probably will at some point. But he doesn't know if it will feel any different from watching Sir Nighteye pass away. "After that, we moved quickly. Uh, remember to stop me if you need me to."

Shinsou nods, looking at him again. Mirio kind of wishes that he knew more about the other parts of the raid, that he wouldn't have to talk so much about his own.

"So, that big Rikiya guy ran out as soon as we got there. Team Ryukku, with Ryukku, Neji, Uravity, and Froppy dealt with him and tried to maintain the backline while the rest of us ran in. It was kind of a mess at first, with the hallways moving around due to that one guy's quirk. We got split up and had to fight villains that way, instead of working as a unit. Fat Gum and Red Riot faced off against that Tengai and Rappa guy. Tamaki had to go against Tabe, Setsuno, and Hojo."

Mirio takes a drink of water, hoping that Shinsou might not want to hear the rest of it. He can't talk about The League, he imagines that Aizawa-sensei doesn't want Shinsou to know anything about the villain group that had already attacked UA. Shinsou was familiar with too many villains already, and he didn't need another group to worry about.

"And, you know, I got to you and Eri," Mirio says, and waits. He waits for Shinsou to say something, to sign 'Stop,' but he doesn't. He nods. "You...know how that went."

"More," Shinsou says, looking at his phone. "I-I don't remember a-all of it. Or a-after."

He doesn't need to say it, and Mirio wasn't going to go into detail about it either.

How Eri had trembled and whimpered while Chisaki taunted her with Shinsou's voice. How Mirio had to clench his jaw so tight to keep from answering, from telling Chisaki that he wasn't going to leave Shinsou. He had no idea how to unfuse him, but he wasn't going to leave him either. He just needed to get Eri to safety first.

"Well, when I showed up, I tried to fight Chisaki. I was really hoping to knock that stupid mask off of his face, because maybe he'd get into such a hissy fit about it that I could get you and Eri out while he was distracted."

Shinsou's mouth twitches into a smile for a moment, and for more than one reason, Mirio wishes that he did knock that mask off.

"But jeez, I was taking a long time to do that, and you... you were trying to get him to answer a question, weren't you?" Mirio asks, and Shinsou nods. "That's why your quirk is so amazing! I mean, you could have ended the fight right there! I was trying to hard to knock Chisaki down and out, but you could have ended it without lifting a finger!"

Shinsou looks back at his phone, but doesn't type anything. Long enough for Mirio to know that if Shinsou has something to say to that, he doesn't want to say it. Not right now.

"And I caught Eri. She was pretty scared to be away from you, but I was running to try to get her to safety. We couldn't really do that, and a big fight happened at the end. Midoriya punched Chisaki right in the face, knocked his mask clean off. It would have been nice to take a picture of that," Mirio says, skipping over all the other parts that he doesn't want to mention.

That he left the group, and Eraserhead was taken by Chronostasis and nearly killed. That sting from the bullet in his back and that electric feeling of his quirk factor cells dying all at once, like a hand was being cut off. That Sir Nighteye sacrificed himself there, let himself be impaled by the cement and rubble that Chisaki was manipulating.

That when Chisaki asked Nemoto if he was willing to die for his sake, and used his quirk to take him into his body, Mirio couldn't stop thinking of Sir Nighteye's words. 'The second is unlikely to come to fruition.'

But it did. Eri's quirk was strong enough to pull Shinsou out of that fusion, unharmed. She was brave, braver than any little girl should ever have to be to put her hand on Chisaki and pull Shinsou free, that she tried to reach for him immediately. And it looked like Shinsou was trying to reach for her.

"Since Eri was using her quirk, but couldn't control it, Eraserhead had to stop it. Both of you were unconscious. You were taken to the same hospital, and you would have been in the same room if there wasn't a risk of Eri's quirk still being active," Mirio says, remembering the tours that he went on, that he knew Aizawa-sensei went on as well.

Whenever he felt too heavy to move, he would force himself to, to check on Eri and Shinsou. Remind himself that it was worth it. Even if Eri twisted and thrashed in her sleep, feverish and unresponsive, she was free. Even if Shinsou was so small in that hospital robe, so thin, with scabs and scars across his nose, cheeks, chin. The mask was gone, that brutal black thing was off of him.

"And, you probably know the rest of it better than I do. We visited you before you woke up, but then you weren't there. And now you're here!" Mirio says, forcing a smile on his face. "Now you and Eri are both safe, and it all started with your plan. With Eri talking to us."

Shinsou stares at him for a moment, eyes wide. He's seen that look on Midoriya's face a hundred times, before he starts sputtering that it really wasn't anything, before Mirio cuts him off with a hand on his head to ruffle his hair. But Shinsou doesn't need a hair ruffle.

He smiles, even if it's small. Just a half smile that he keeps to himself, eyes almost closed. It's not anything like the smiles that he wore while they sparred, but it's no less proud. No less victorious. "I wo-on."

Mirio can't help but smile at that. "Yep, you won! Deku might have knocked Chisaki into next week, but he couldn't have done it without your help! Or Eri's!"

Shinsou's smile starts falling, more slowly. He almost offers to check in to see where Eri is so that Shinsou can see her before he starts missing her too much, but then he realizes it. It's not missing Eri that's setting in. It's remembering what time it is.

It's remembering that in a couple hours, Shinsou will have to face Chisaki again.

Mirio doesn't have a quirk, and never really wanted another one when he had one, but right now he wishes that he had one that could stop time. He'd use it as long as he could, to stop it as long as he could. To keep Shinsou in this place, this sweaty gym where he felt like he could smile. That he could win.

But Shinsou taps on something that makes a loud noise that he startles to, and taps again to mute it before he looks up at Mirio and shows him the phone.

Mirio can't help but laugh when he reads it, and pulls himself to sit against the wall, next to

Shinsou instead of across from him. “We should watch it!”

And that’s all the encouragement that Shinsou needs before he presses play.

Midoriya is standing in a living room that looks exactly like the one in the 3-A dorm, with Chisaki’s mugshot tapped to a wall behind him. But there are pieces of paper below that with shaky, jagged lines that come together to look like the rest of him, like someone tried to make a life-size cardboard cut-out of Chisaki but didn’t have the supplies.

A lot of other people are gathered around by the sound of their chanting of ‘ Roast roast roast roast, ’ and they all fall silent when Midoriya lifts a long, thin pointer and slaps it against Chisaki’s hair.

“ Hair: it looks like Chisaki goes to Supercuts 5 minutes before they close, but that’s not the case. He does his own hair with a noodle strainer and sheep shears, ” Midoriya says, ignoring someone yelling out ‘ Fucking weak ’ before he moves the pointer to Chisaki’s eyebrows. “ S curves like these are banned from road planning for a reason. ” Chisaki’s earlobes. “ He didn’t get those piercings from Claire’s, but he wishes that he did. He thought that the studs would make him look like a ‘Stud,’ but they just set off metal detectors the same way that braincell detectors go off, but for a completely different reason. ” Chisaki’s eyes. “ Mascara. Expired, clumpy mascara. ” Midoriya circles the bruise that’s still prominent on Chisaki’s jaw. “ This is my proudest moment in my hero career. You can’t see it from the picture, but this man? You can’t see it, but I know it in my heart, that this man’s teeth are absolutely, situation fucked. ”

“ Izuku! ” One of the girls scolds, which causes Midoriya to startle, that determined look in his eye wavering for a bit.

“ Ochan, let him have this, kero. ”

Before Midoriya starts again, Shinsou pauses the video. Mirio watches as Shinsou’s bottom lip is pulled in, as his eyes narrow, but before he reaches out, Shinsou puts the phone in his lap and pulls at his sleeve. Pulls it up to his elbow to reveal those painful scars, that black band.

When Mirio saw that tattoo in the hospital, it looked different. It was too painful for him to look at after the first time he saw it. But he’s glad that it looks different now.

Shinsou breathes out, his hands raise to sign before he stops himself. Then he signs anyway. Mirio doesn’t recognize the sign, but he knows what Shinsou says anyway.

‘ I won. ’

Eri really, really, really hates today.

It’s really bad, it’s the worst day in the whole world. Zawa and Yama are worried and Twenny is gone the whole day, and Eri is trying really hard, but she can’t get it right.

“Fuck Chisa...”

Eri holds her favorite unicorn stuffie close to her chest and lays on her bed. Yama said he was making apple bunnies as a snack, and she’s kind of hungry, but she really wants to get this right first.

‘Fuck’ is a bad word. Eri already knew that because Bakugo uses it a lot. ‘Fuck’ is supposed to make people feel mad a lot better, because it's a mad word. But so far, Yama and Zawa just don't like hearing it.

Eri wants to be mad. If she's mad, she won't be scared, and she's really scared. She gets so scared that He's going to hurt Twenny when he sees him that she forgets that Yama and Zawa won't let that happen. She can't really think about it without thinking that maybe they won't. Maybe they'll reach out like Mirio did but be too slow to stop Him.

"Fuck Chisa...."

Eri should be mad at Him, because she hates him. She knows she does. She's just really scared, so scared that she doesn't feel mad or hate like she should. It's not okay to get mad at Twenny, when Twenny is really good and he's the best person that Eri knows, and He's the worst.

"Fuck Chisak...."

Sometimes, Eri hated going to The Chair. Even if she liked The Safe Place, sometimes she didn't want to go there. Sometimes she would get mad at Twenny for trying to put her there, but then she'd look and see that he was really sad. He was really sad and scared all the time, because he didn't want to take her to The Chair. But He made him do it.

"Fuck Chisaki."

Eri holds her unicorn really tight. She feels like He might be standing there, He might be looking at her with that scary look.

But she looks and he isn't.

And she remembers that she gets to live with heroes now.

Yama and Zawa won't let him come back. They won't let him hurt her, or hurt Twenny. And there are a lot of heroes that they get to live with that would stop him from even coming close to them.

It's really easy to feel mad. She doesn't feel scared at all, but she feels really mad. It makes her feel kind of bad, and a little like she has a tummy ache after eating a lot of cinnamon rolls, but she can say it. She can yell and no one will get mad, like Twenny told her they would. She can kick, and no one can tie up her legs. She kicks her legs a lot, and breathes in really deep so she can make a big yell like Yama, and get all of the mad out of her. "FUCK CHISAKI."

Yama runs to her door, and he stops and has a big smile on his face. She was worried that he would be mad that she was yelling, because she wasn't supposed to do that, but Yama gets to yell all the time too. And Yama yells with her sometimes. "Fuck Chisaki!"

Eri nods, because she really wants to do a concert with Yama again. "Fuck Chisaki!"

"Fuck Chisaki!"

"Fuck Chisaki!"

They get to do that a lot, until Eri hears the door open, and she knows that it's Twenny finally coming home. She runs over to him, and hugs him a whole lot because she missed him, even if he was having fun with Mirio. And she wants him to know that he doesn't have to go see Chisaki anymore.

"Fuck Chisaki!" Eri says, and Twenny doesn't look like he likes that. Mirio doesn't either, because his face gets really twisty and weird before he covers his mouth, but Twenny really doesn't like that. And he looks really mad when he looks down the hall outside.

"Where are the fucking shits- fuck yes ," Ugo says, and he walks up to the door with a bunch of candy apples in his hand and a really nice smile on his face. Ugo doesn't use that smile a whole lot, but he probably should. "Here. Fucking congrats on tha- FUCK ."

Twenny really doesn't like Ugo sometimes, but Eri thinks that Twenny actually kind of hates Ugo right now. Twenny has a really mad and scary look on his face, and his hand is pinching Ugo's shoulder really hard, and it looks like it's really hurting Ugo.

But Ugo hits Twenny's arm away and looks really mad at him before he grabs his shirt and starts shaking Twenny. "Oi, I've put in all this fucking work and done all this fucking shit for you, so keep your little sister complex to your goddamn self, alright? Fucker?"

Twenny hits Ugo's arm away, and still looks like he wants to hurt Ugo, before he looks at Eri, and stops looking so mad. He just looks really tired. "Saying that word helps."

Eri nods, and holds her unicorn tighter. "It's a mad word, and it helps me not be scared. So I'm not scared of him anymore."

Twenny smiles, even if it still looks a little sad. "Okay. If it helps."

"Yeah, it helps , so cool your fucking shit, Mom ," Ugo says like he's trying to make Twenny mad, even if he shouldn't now that Twenny is his mom too. "It's not like you talk like a fucking nun either, Shit-Chan."

Ugo and Twenny both start talking with their hands a lot, after Ugo gives Eri her apples. Yama doesn't look like he really likes what they're saying, because he claps his hands together and talks kind of loud. "So! Nice of you all to drop by, I'd love to host a little get-together sometime, but we're kind of on a time crunch so maybe--"

"Here," Ugo says really mean, before he grabs the plastic bag around his arm and holds it out for Twenny. "Not that you'll fucking appreciate it, but we got you some shit. And since I had to play fucking delivery boy, I'm not leaving 'til you learn to say 'thank you.'"

Twenny knows how to say 'thank you,' but he doesn't. Even if he kind of looks like he likes the white thing that he pulls out of the bag.

"Since you have issues with talking and shit," Ugo says, but he says it kind of quiet, and he doesn't really want to look at Twenny. "And Trash Bird doesn't know sign language, but that's no fucking reason you can't tell him to eat shit and die."

Twenny kind of smiles, but he still doesn't say 'thank you,' but he still has more presents from Ugo. He pulls out a shirt, and he holds it out to show a picture of Izuku with his arms straight out and a serious hero look on his face. The words on top of it say 'I Punched You In The Face And It Was Awesome.'

"It's the stupidest shit I've seen in my goddamn life," Ugo says, and his hand goes over his face like he's trying to 'wipe that look off,' like Yama tells Zawa to do sometimes when they're play fighting. "Yaoyorozu's IQ got fucking nerfed by Kaminari's bad ideas, and this fucking abomination was born."

Twenny really likes it though, so maybe he likes 'abominations.' He likes it so much that he says 'Thank you' with his hands, and still kind of smiles at Ugo. Then the smile looks more like Zawa's mean-happy smile, and he says something else with his hands that Ugo doesn't like.

"Fuck off, Shit-Chan. Just, fucking," Ugo stops and looks really serious, before he looks back at Twenny. "Remember your shit. And fuck that Trash Bird up."

Twenny nods, and Ugo slaps his shoulder really hard.

"And show me how to do that bitch ass pinch shit, I'm gonna use it to fuck up Kaminari when he starts fucking around instead of studying." Ugo doesn't want Twenny to show him now, but that's okay because the heroes are going to have a pizza party tomorrow, and Twenny can show him then.

Yama and Mirio go outside to talk for a while, and Eri gets to cuddle on the couch with Twenny while they do that. Eri hopes that Twenny falls asleep, and he can't see Him because he sleeps through it and Yama and Zawa don't wake him up.

Eri gets up to get a blanket, because even if Twenny looks tired, he's still not falling asleep like Eri wants him to. Even if he looks really tired when Eri tucks him in, he just smiles at her. "That's the first thing you did."

Eri doesn't know what Twenny's talking about, so she tilts her head to try to think about it better, and that just makes Twenny pull his hand up and behind his head, maybe because it helps him think better.

"After... The first night that we were together, you put a blanket on me. You were still too little to talk, so you don't remember," Twenny says, and he looks a little sad about that. Eri wishes that she did remember, because she wants to remember the first time she met Twenny. First meetings are important, because Zawa and Yama talk about the first time they met a lot. "But it was the nicest thing someone had done for me in a long time."

Twenny had to live at The Bad Place for a long time, and it was a really bad place. Twenny is still really scared of it, because people at The Bad Place do bad things to people who know about them. That's why Twenny doesn't talk about it, because he doesn't want bad things to happen to Eri.

"I'm glad I met you, Eri. I'm really, really glad," Twenny says, and Eri feels really funny when she thinks about that, even though she feels the same way. She doesn't even want to know what it would be like if she didn't have Twenny as her mom.

Eri falls asleep on Twenny's chest, but she wakes up alone on the couch, with Mirio sitting beside her on his phone.

And Eri is still scared, so scared that she can't help but cry.

27 sits in the chair, and tries to call up all of his victories.

The mocha coffee on the table in front of him, the shirt that makes the empty space so visible. The taunts from the shirt and the face mask, the ones that made that stern woman frown and complain, but she couldn't force him to take them off. His owner wouldn't let her.

The officer with the too honest eyes wasn't allowed in the room. His owner didn't lie, but he didn't have the right information. His owner was angry about that, but it didn't matter. The man that sits beside him ignores him anyway.

The door opens, but not for his owner. Not for Yamada either. 27's hand falls to the pocket of his jeans, but not to the knife that they've already taken. To the box that Yamada gave him.

"So, you can put these guys in your ear whenever you want. They work kind of like my hearing aids, but they play white noise that cancels out any other sound, instead of helping you hear it. Even if you have to be in the same room with him, you don't have to look at him. And now, you can put him on mute!"

It would have been nice to do that. 27 hasn't looked up, and Chisaki hasn't said anything, but just the sound of him clearing his throat makes 27 feel paralyzed. He can't be, not now. Not here. Not with what Chisaki knows, and what he's promised to tell them.

He can't let Chisaki tell them anything about The Miasma. He has to fight him. He has to win this fight.

27 looks further up the table. Chisaki's hands aren't resting there. He sees the flash of the orange jumpsuit and follows it up to the shoulder, then to the ear. His piercings have been taken out.

It takes too long, he's aware that people are talking around him, but it's not Chisaki's voice. Not his either. 27 stares at his ear for too long, before he can look at Chisaki's mouth.

Naked. Unnatural. There's no mask, no mask on 27's mouth either, and that makes them too similar. They're still joined, he's still inside him, still fused. The bruise isn't there because there never was a bruise, Chisaki was never defeated, and they never got out.

They did. 27 feels the cloth mask around his face. He has a mask, and Chisaki doesn't. 27 looks at his arm, open on the table for Chisaki and himself to see it. There's an empty space where Dog was, before he killed him. He needs to kill him again.

He looks at Chisaki again, fully this time. Convinces himself that he can, that he can meet those eerie golden eyes when he looked away too often, looking anywhere else. He's not Dog. he's not Dog. He's 27, and he has a job to do.

"You're looking well, Dog," Chisaki says, and despite himself, despite who he is, 27 flinches at his words. "Far better groomed, but ill-mannered as ever."

Chisaki's teeth are fine.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: A meeting between an abuser and a victim, Dissociation, Dehumanization, two mentions of 50.

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou had been living in an interrogation room for a month before he was taken in as Yamada's ward. Before Shinsou was rescued, he had developed chemical pneumonia and had coughing fits and fatigue that he tried to hide from both Chisaki and Eri. Two of the scars Shinsou received from Bug were still healing when he was sold to Chisaki, and the bleach bath caused more pain because of that. Chisaki had a reward game for every match that Shinsou won while fighting members of the 8 Precepts. Ms. Joke gave Aizawa a book about bonding with feral cats to help him improve his relationship with Shinsou, and Mirio had sparred with Shinsou when he was having severe anxiety issues, which seemed to relieve some of that. Aizawa isn't aware that Shinsou refers to him as 'his owner,' but he is aware that Shinsou seems to treat him more fearfully than anyone else and has taken that to mean that he's a stand-in for Chisaki in Shinsou's mind. Shinsou thought that Aizawa and the investigative team were close to finding The Miasma because he was only questioned about Boss' name and the location of the compound.

Aizawa feels the scarf adjusting itself around his neck, and can't be bothered to care. It's taking far too much effort to keep himself from ripping the door open and storming into the room, and even more to keep from throwing the scarf towards the representative from the The Commission and throwing her into the nearest wall. "This was supposed to take place in a conference room."

The representative doesn't bat an eye, just a robotic mannequin wearing a well-tailored suit. She sold her soul for that suit long ago. "A ridiculous request that was denied. This is the purpose of an interrogation room."

Hizashi spares a moment from glaring down Chisaki through the observation window to cast a murderous look in her direction. If looks could kill, they could be on their way to a cat cafe by now.

Aizawa forces himself to look at the meeting, feeling his scarf lift higher when he lays eyes on Chisaki. He looks smaller in the jumpsuit, stripped of his mask, but that's not enough for him. He doesn't look nearly as defeated as he should be, and he can hate The Commission all the more for that.

"You're looking well, Dog. Far better groomed, but ill-mannered as ever," Chisaki says, and Aizawa steps towards the door to end this charade before the representative's crisp voice cuts through the haze of anger.

"I wouldn't." Two words carrying through enough threats to make her a villain. Threatening a hero is still a misdemeanor, still enforceable. Excessive force might be more heinous, but no one could convince him of that right now.

"The purpose of this meeting is for a formal apology," the other representative mediating this farce reminds, with a tone far too calm for the words that have already been spoken. "That doesn't sound like you're apologetic at all."

Chisaki huffs a short laugh, a smile so fake that Aizawa aches to tear it open. He wishes the bastard would forget himself, raise his hands to reveal that they aren't there anymore, but they've allowed him to keep his arms in his lap, the stubs hidden under the table. "My apologies, but that's the only name I know him by."

"You won't be receiving his legal name," the representative reminds Chisaki, which only draws a sigh.

"Ah, well. There was another name that you went by. 27," Chisaki says, and his eyes are turned back to Shinsou, just to watch him flinch again. "Of course, it's odd to refer to someone as a num-"

Shinsou coughs. Aizawa has been avoiding looking at Shinsou, avoiding the sight of the coiled tension in his shoulders, knowing that he couldn't bear to watch him tremble and shake. But the tension is barely there now.

Shinsou pulls his hand from under the face mask and lays in on the table, palm down, and Aizawa can't help the grin when he sees a flush of hives rising on Chisaki's face.

He's never been more proud in his life.

According to Hizashi and Mirio, this meeting is a fight to Shinsou. One that he wants to win. The shirt displaying Deku T-posing with those taunting words are likely irritating enough for the mobster, and the face mask telling him to 'EAT SHIT AND DIE, TRASH BIRD' is a bit more aggressive. But taunting Chisaki by aggravating his germophobia is a far bolder move.

One that Chisaki can't help but respond to. "Still not over that, are we? That little cough that you tried to hide. Despite all my best efforts to take care of you, you refused to let me, at times. Perhaps, it's understandable." Chisaki leans back and sighs, pulling on a mask of regret far more fake and ill-fitting than any that he's seen from his students. "I sincerely apologize for my actions, 27. My time served has given me distance enough from the criminal underworld to realize what I had done. At the time, I only wanted to make my surrogate father proud, but I fell too deeply into the responsibilities that came with that. I allowed others to influence my actions, and they harmed you."

Aizawa grinds his teeth, watching Chisaki's lawyer take dictation on a legal pad. If that bastard thought that this would help his appeal, if he thought that he could get away with his crimes after killing a hero, killing Sir Nighteye, he had far more delusions than his thoughts on quirks and Hero Syndrome.

“ It particularly saddens me to know that we’re alike, ” Chisaki says, slipping off that mask to something trying to goad Shinsou with false sympathy. “ I could have been a guiding force for you after taking you under my wing. The two of us were abandoned to the criminal underworld at a young age, and I imagine it was for the same reason. Our quirks. ” The tension in Shinsou’s shoulders flares again before he settles, and Chisaki doesn’t miss that, smirking. “ I did try, though. I’m sure you know that. When we first met, you were so frightened. I had to convince Mimic to rescue you, rather than another one of those num- ”

Shinsou coughs again, and this time Aizawa isn’t proud. He feels a cold sensation of dread down his spine as the scarf settles around his shoulders.

Shinsou wasn’t just fighting Chisaki. He was fighting the investigation.

And the flare of Chisaki’s eyes and the pull of his smirk told Aizawa that Chisaki knew that as well.

“Take him out of there,” Aizawa growls, unsure whether it’s relief to have a reason to end this charade or irritation that Shinsou would do this. That Shinsou would suffer one meeting with Chisaki just to render it fruitless, and drag out the investigation further. “He’s given his apology, now take Shinsou out of there.”

The representative doesn’t move, and doesn’t have to say anything when she looks at him when he puts his hand on the handle. Hizashi turns and gives him an utterly hollow grimace, the despair in his eyes all the more clear for it. “Have you ever wondered if Naomasa’s quirk works on sociopaths?”

The representative adjusts her arms where they’re crossed over her chest, the only confirmation that he needs for something that he hadn’t even fathomed. Something that Hizashi had been piecing out this entire time.

That’s why Naomasa wasn’t in the room. His quirk wouldn’t be able to read Chisaki, but Shinsou would. They were going to use his reactions to know if Chisaki was telling the truth or not, whether his information was credible in every flinch and note of terror in Shinsou.

Aizawa turns the handle only to find it locked.

“Did we make a mistake in assigning you to his case?” the representative asks, and again, he wants to throw her into a wall, but harder.

He wants to stop this, but he can’t. Not when Shinsou’s life is still at risk, when Eri’s happiness can still be taken away. He doesn’t need her to remind him of that, but instead she lays the sickening truth bare to him, the real reason why they overlooked two wards living together.

“You better than most should know how important it is to stop the production of Nomus.”

Hizashi puts a hand on his shoulder, curls it tightly enough that he knows that his husband wants to lash out against this too. But they can’t. They’re as trapped in this room as Shinsou is in the interrogation room.

They’ve only been pretending that they were able to take him out of there in the first place.

27 can’t move anymore. Not when those eyes have narrowed, when they’ve seen it.

It was a struggle each time he lifted his hand, each time he forced a cough. He felt heavy, straining against himself, and straining not to tremble and shake. To show it. He needed to fight and win.

He can't. He can't win.

But then he sees it. Amusement. The way Chisaki's eyes narrow again when his cheek lifts, when he smiles more. The smile was hidden behind the mask, but that tell has always meant safety. Always meant hope. A beating, not a bleach bath.

27 knows how to win at a beating.

"How did you come into contact with this organization?" the man beside 27 asks, in that same flat tone that betrays nothing. It doesn't have to, he's meaningless, and the game that's just twisted makes him even more so.

Chisaki hums, considering. Rikiya or Rappa. "That was quite a long time ago, but I believe it was Mimic who arranged for it. It's hard to remember the name of that group either, they went by several, depending on their services."

Not even a beating. Just a bark.

"The man I met with, what was his name?" Chisaki muses, entirely for show. He knows how to draw out his lectures, his rants, knows that flat statements can only inspire so much. He tries to use anticipation, but the only thing that 27 has anticipated from listening to them was the end of it. "He had an odd, bark ing—"

"Arf," 27 answers, without even meaning to.

The twitch of a smile on Chisaki's face only confirms that he knows that too. That 27 didn't even think to answer, didn't think to bark. It's still there, that piece is still there, that piece is still inside him and he can't pull it out.

He can't be free. Not even from Chisaki. Not when Chisaki is inside him, inside him again, inside his head putting words there putting noises, manipulating his body, stealing his Ground. Shoes. The inside of his shoes. Flat on the floor. He's here. He can feel his shoes around his feet, and that means he's not fused. He couldn't feel anything, but now he does.

He's been losing while he was drowning in the fog, and he presses his feet more firmly to the soles of his shoes to force the sounds back into words. Chisaki's voice doesn't help him.

"...you were quite injured at the time. I told Chronostasis to take care that you were treated for your wounds, but he misinterpreted what I meant. I couldn't stop him after that point," Chisaki continues to ramble, his eyes flicker down at an arm that 27 doesn't feel. He wants to float away into the fog again, but knows he can't. "Those awful scars. Two of them were still fresh at the time, and the bleach must have caused a considerable amount of pain. That mask was also causing you pain, wasn't it? You were bleeding when I took it off for you."

Chisaki's eyes narrow at the mask that he wears now. It covers the scars, hides them, and Chisaki knows it. He knows that more than removing those taunting words, he wants to see those scars again. 27's hand is heavy when he pulls it off, and feels all the more cold for it.

"It was unfortunate that we had to use another mask, but you were dangerous at the time. You nearly killed one of our members by controlling another with your quirk, and we had to take precautions to make sure that you could be stopped. But as long as you behaved, you were allowed to speak. You often thanked me for that, since you weren't allowed to before," Chisaki tilts his head forward, and it's as good as a command to bark. He doesn't know if he can, if the words will shake out, what will happen if they don't, what Chisaki will say.

"Th-th-th..." The words don't fall out, they're trapped, they're taken, he can't

"Don't thank me now, after everything," Chisaki says, but behind his voice is a laugh. He finds his stutter amusing, always has. "I tried my best, but there were things you were taught to expect. You had quite a career before you met me, and that kind of violent life isn't easily forgotten, is it? What is your number now?"

There's a threat behind his widened eyes, and it knocks the words out easier. "Two thousand...four hundred-red ni...inty five."

Chisaki sits back with an open smile. "Not very busy, then. You haven't been getting enough exercise, and I know how that can make you. Anxious. Violent."

Was he? Was that why he had to fight the underlings? Was that why Chisaki picked that game?

27 doesn't know. He thought he did, he thought he knew himself. He thought he remembered those years, but he doesn't. He doesn't remember anything except what Chisaki tells him.

Chisaki probably wants that anyway.

"I tried my best to care for you, even during those spells. I tried to give you an outlet. I couldn't allow you to hurt Er-"

The tension snaps.

27 moves faster than he can see, between one breath and the next he moves from sitting to standing, his hand relaxed to fisted in Chisaki's hair. He looks down and sees that Chisaki's face is against the table, that the hives are spreading across his neck.

He can feel them against his knuckles, and he grins.

He can win. He can be violent, if that's what he is. If that's what Trash Bird says he is.

"Pretender," 27 spits the word out, it comes easier than it should. He knows by the way Chisaki tries to rear back that it strikes true, it hurts him. Hurts his pride, the fake young head of The 8 Precepts. He wants to hurt him more, tear into him, tear himself free by ripping Chisaki apart. How dare he?

How dare he say Eri's name?

A stronger hand wraps around 27's arm and shoves him away, Chisaki rises immediately and makes to grab for him, stretching out his hand with eyes blazing.

But he doesn't.

He doesn't have hands anymore.

27 laughs.

The first gasp of it feels like bile across his tongue, it shakes him so much that he can't tell if he's shaking from fear or laughter. That stub, the blood smeared across Chisaki's lips and chin like a new mask, his eyes blazing impotently. He was afraid of Chisaki? Afraid of those hands?

Chisaki's eyes go cold. "Bark."

"Arf."

27 covers his mouth, tries to stop it. Tries to form a new mask, just to hold it. He wants to keep it, he wants to keep this. "Bark."

"Arf."

"Bark, bark, bark, BARK!" Chisaki roars, manic and frightening and full of rage, and 27 has never seen him that angry. Never made him that angry. There's a terror that makes him grow cold, numb, and paralyzed. Nothing inside him moves, not even his blood, but the sound still does.

"Arf."

It's not his words. Not his words, not his words, not his words, his words are stolen he's using them he's inside him the void the nothingness nothing is here not even his words not even him he's dead he's dead he's dead

Yamada's face, the sound of his voice.

He looks around the room and Chisaki is gone.

He lost.

Hizashi changes the radio station again, a gesture that has proven so fruitless by this point that Aizawa can't help but seethe with resentment at it.

All of that, for nothing .

Not a name. Not a place. Nothing but the ravings of a lunatic that would drive anyone insane, the pressure building against Shinsou until he snapped. He lashed out against Chisaki, causing the representative to call for the end of it, but that moment of clear triumph was paid back with every wound that Chisaki dug into, until Shinsou went still. Remaining that way after Chisaki was taken away.

Aizawa could only watch until the representative unlocked the door, and that was only after Shinsou attacked the other representative.

That was the only flicker of retribution in that ordeal, and the more he thinks on it, the more disgusted he is to have enjoyed it. To see Shinsou lash out and break Chisaki's nose against the table. To see him snap from that eerie stillness to quick, trained motions that swept away the hand that was trying to shake him out of it, bent the representative against the table faster than he could react with an elbow against the back of his neck.

Aizawa strolled purposefully slow into the room in time to hear the pop of a broken finger before the representative started screaming at him to restrain his ward. And Aizawa ever-so-helpfully reminded them that Shinsou wasn't supposed to be touched during a dissociative spell.

The spell broke slowly. After the pop, his hold loosened enough for the representative to pull away, backing away quickly. Shinsou was still again, his breathing slow and shallow, but it fell away in shades as Hizashi kept talking to him. Telling him about coffee flavors, even if Shinsou couldn't hear him. Hizashi likely couldn't think of anything else to say to keep from reminding Shinsou of Chisaki, of what had just happened.

Shinsou didn't seem to fully come out of it. Even as they walked to the car, his movements were too slow, jerking his head up too frantically, as though he hadn't realized that they had been walking. It wasn't until they got into the car that the stillness set in, even more so.

"He didn't even move, Eraser." Sansa said that about Shinsou's time at the station, and it was hard to believe it.

Aizawa believes that now.

Shinsou isn't moving. There's something in the coiled tension, the terrified wideness of his eyes, that's painful to look at. Neither he nor Hizashi know what will help.

Hizashi tried to hand him the face mask that had dropped on the floor, and Shinsou didn't react to it. He didn't take the coffee either. He was breathing normally, too tense to be dissociating, but lost in his own world nonetheless. Hizashi's attempts at grounding exercises, this radio station switching the latest attempt at it, were having no effect.

It's the tension that Aizawa can't stop thinking about. He knows not to believe a word that Chisaki said, but two of them stay stuck in his mind. 'Anxious. Violent.'

More like 'Trapped.' And 'Desperate.' He's seen the same coiled tension in a fight between street cats, before it turns violent. It's not a violence that's inherent to the cat, but a tension that builds in response to a threat. The threat of violence from an opponent's claws that makes them freeze, yowl in warning, before they coil up and lash out with their own in a frenzy.

He doesn't believe a word that Chisaki said, but he has other reasons to keep Eri from seeing Shinsou like this. She shouldn't see him in this state, and Shinsou likely wouldn't want her to either. He wouldn't be able to hide it from her at this point.

Hizashi doesn't know what to do, but Aizawa does. The book from Ms. Joke suggests something similar, something that Togata has already found to work. He might have tried it anyway, regardless.

Shinsou deserved to win a fight against Chisaki, and Aizawa could give him that fight.

Hizashi didn't approve, but he didn't have any other ideas. Shinsou wasn't responding, hands folded together in his lap. Silent, but he still followed orders.

"Run one lap."

Aizawa took off the scarf and tied back his hair before he put on the weights. Shinsou has the knife again, and he might use it. Aizawa has accepted that possibility, accepted that this is reckless and barely rational, but he does it. He puts on one less weight that he does for the first years' final exams, not because he needs to be quicker, but because the lack of patrols have taken an effect that he can feel. He's weaker for it.

Shinsou likely isn't in the best shape either. He and Togata sparred several rounds, had run several laps beforehand. Shinsou hasn't had a proper diet in either months or years, but Aizawa can see that he's learned to ignore that. He's trained his body to perform on willpower alone, on necessity alone, instead of nourishment. It only gives him another reason to hope that Shinsou makes this easy for him.

He doesn't. Shinsou never makes anything easy for him.

When they meet on the sparring mat, Shinsou hesitates before throwing his leg forward, and Aizawa can see from a mile away that it won't make contact. He steps forward with his own arm thrown, meant to soar right past Shinsou's shoulder, and it does.

They're not fighting, they're dancing.

Aizawa knows exactly how difficult that is to do, because he had to learn how when he became an instructor at UA. The weights can only do so much to bring his body's abilities down to a level that a student can compete with, and he has to be careful with each blow that it doesn't fully connect. That it's never at his full power, that he never forgets that he's fighting a student, not a villain. A child, not an opponent.

Shinsou has learned how to fight like this for a different reason, one that becomes more clear in the narrowing of his eyes as this dance goes on. He's been told to fight in circumstances where winning would be more painful than losing.

'Even Rappa could be flipped when he overextended himself.' If he could fight Rappa with his full power, then there was only one person that Shinsou would learn to fight like this.

That makes it all the more important that he wins.

Aizawa claps a hand over Shinsou's shoulder and shoves. Shinsou steps back to catch himself immediately, eyes flaring, and darts an arm out to grab the underside of Aizawa's. There's a hesitation there that tells Aizawa that Shinsou knows several ways to move the fight forward or end it there, it's easy to read in the places that his violet eyes quickly dart over. Where his feet are, how his torso is angled. Shinsou plays out the fight in a dozen different ways in his mind, in that hesitation.

Before he tugs forward and lets go.

It's close, and Aizawa won't give up on him yet. He follows the tug and brings a knee up, knowing that Shinsou can easily twist away from it. Shinsou does, a hand brushing against the heel of his foot but it doesn't push forward to tip him off balance. Aizawa spins on that foot to charge again, an arm braced firmly against Shinsou's chest bringing a glare in Shinsou's eyes.

He kicks one of Shinsou's feet off the ground, knowing that he recovers immediately and uses that foot to step back with a hand curled around Aizawa's shoulder. Aizawa sees Shinsou's knee bend and rise, and he can see himself being pulled into it, the knee knocking the wind out of him. It's a move that's so similar to his own that he instinctively recoils from it, Hizashi's words ringing in the back of his head when he shoves Shinsou away with an arm braced against his stomach.

Shinsou doesn't break his hold on Aizawa's shoulder even when he moves back, and when Aizawa lifts that arm he finally takes it.

Shinsou's hands tighten on the top of his shoulder and the underside of his elbow, taking advantage of Aizawa's loose crouch to shove him backwards, foot behind Aizawa's to knock him over. As much as Aizawa trusts Shinsou, he doesn't let his eyes close when he allows himself to fall back on the mat. He doesn't know if Shinsou will follow through, doesn't know if he will choose fists or the knife, but Shinsou doesn't.

Shinsou pulls back and away to standing, too rigid, and too still. Aizawa pulls himself up to sitting while he considers it, when he finds that lingering doubt that this was a bad idea flaring up when he recognizes the trembling in both of Shinsou's hands, before he raises them to sign. To finally speak.

'Better. I'm better. Not this.' Shinsou's hands rise further to his hair, running through the purple mess, tugging in frustration. Aizawa has seen that look on hundreds of student's faces, when they feel disappointment in themselves far sharper than he could ever inspire, right before they scream or swear.

He imagines that it's more frustrating to be unable to do that. "I know."

Shinsou looks at him, arms dropping to his sides, and for a brief moment, he actually meets his eyes. Aizawa ignores the wideness, the clear fear, to be surprised that his gaze holds. That even if he's afraid, he's listening.

"I know you can fight better than this. I know why you didn't," Aizawa says, and even if he went forward with this plan with the full acceptance that he was still Chisaki in Shinsou's eyes, the evidence causes him to recoil from it. "You still fought, and won."

Shinsou goes still again, breath that was coming faster from exertion catches. But he breathes out, steady but not slow.

"You rattled him. You kept Eri's name out of his mouth. You forced him to reveal himself for what he is," Aizawa says, and he feels all the more proud for it. But that swell of pride dies in the face of their shared reality. "You fought, but you weren't just fighting him. That made it into a fight that you aren't going to win."

Shinsou looks away after he catches what Aizawa means by that, his arms pulling inwards. Preparing for a blow. Aizawa doesn't know how to convince him that one won't be coming, and fights to strip the irritation from his tone when he speaks.

"You did. You fought the investigation, and you won. This time," Aizawa leans back, bracing his arms by the heels of his hands on the mat, as he stares at the ceiling long enough to convince himself. "But there will be another, as long as you don't cooperate. And I can't stop them from doing something worse."

He forces himself to look back at Shinsou when he sees his arm move out of the corner of his eye. Shinsou looks surprisingly relaxed, his arms loose before he raises his hands to sign. His eyes still focused on the mat, lowered and submissive. But there's a hidden plea there. 'I don't want to fight you.'

A full sentence. A rare thing from Shinsou. Aizawa knows it's an honest statement, and that makes it all the more painful to know it.

It's an honest plea from a child who never asks for anything, not without a trade behind it. A child who has learned not to be honest with what they want, because they've learned it won't be given.

Aizawa wants to give it. "I don't want to fight you, either." An honest statement in trade, before he steadies himself in their reality again. "Tell me why you're fighting the investigation."

He wants to know there's a reason he can overcome. If Shinsou didn't recognize what Iida said in the chat, that by some stroke of luck he doesn't know that he would be separated from Eri at the conclusion of it. Even if he did, that he might believe Aizawa when he tells him that the investigation won't end until the Nomu Organization has been fully taken down, and they have no time frame for that to happen.

But Shinsou's answer is an honest one, and a simple one.

' I will die. '

It's hard to argue when the evidence has been laid out twice before Shinsou's eyes, when the police failed to protect him twice. When Shinsou has likely been told to expect that beforehand, and been proven correct. When Shinsou's hands don't shake, and his eyes don't waver at all when he signs that. He truly believes it.

Aizawa can try to convince him not to.

"It's my job to protect you," Aizawa says, his voice firm. "UA is one of the most secure facilities in Japan, other than Tartarus. That's the reason you're here, and you're never more than 30 meters from a pro hero at all times. Believe me when I say that it would make our jobs a lot easier to know who we're defending you from, but it doesn't change the fact that we will. You are safe here from that organization."

Shinsou's eyes dart to his for a moment, his mouth opening for a moment before he closes it. Whether he was moved enough to try to speak, Aizawa doesn't know, and doubts it when Shinsou signs. ' Name of people. Looking for me. '

Aizawa feels the corner of his lip twitch in irritation, before he reminds himself that he doesn't want to fight Shinsou. Subterfuge is meaningless if they can be honest. "We don't know it. It would be far easier if you told me. I have informants who might be able to find them just from that. You wouldn't have to worry about interviews or the investigation anymore."

Shinsou's hands start to tremble before he makes them into fists. He's clearly fighting against that suggestion, and Aizawa convinces himself to be proud of that. Even if it wasn't an order, it was close enough to a request for Shinsou to see it as one. It's progress that he won't try to answer.

Aizawa doesn't know whether he wants progress in the investigation or for Shinsou more, whether he wants Shinsou to be safe more than he wants him well. He wishes that the two could coincide to make that easier.

' Can't tell you. Not fight. Can't. Can't. ' He sees Shinsou's hand curl around his wrist, his fingertips resting in the grooves of one of those scars, but before he can move to stop Shinsou, to reassure him or ground him, Shinsou pulls his hand away and faces him, eyes blazing. ' Tell me to bark. '

Aizawa clenches his teeth against the black, bile-like feeling rising in his chest. He knew, but for Shinsou to say it so plainly makes it all the harder. He has to force his jaw to open, force the breath into his lungs. He does so with the hope that he won't hear it. "Bark."

He doesn't.

Shinsou looks as surprised as Aizawa is. He doesn't know who feels more relieved, but between the looseness he can't fight settling into his bones, and the rise of Shinsou's eyebrows, he feels like he wins. That this was a test, this was a fight that he won. That he had to prove he won, and Shinsou forced him to.

But Shinsou is the one that signs it. After he breathes out a heavy sigh, his mouth open for a flash of teeth that almost looks like a smile for a moment. ' I won. '

Aizawa can't help his own smile when he feels the same way.

27 walks through the door and feels the same as he did the first time.

He's tired, so bleach soaked and heavy that he can barely keep one foot moving in front of the other. He takes in the warmth that washes over him forcefully, the chill from the night air swept away in it. He still hates that when he dares to think of how things would have turned out if 50 had lived, that he can't help but picture living in a place like this.

But this time, Eri isn't tugging him forward to see everything, to explain everything. Instead of holding his hand, she throws her arms around his legs and hugs him, so tightly that he nearly has to pry her away to pull him into his arms, though they're shaking with exhaustion.

She's heavier for a different reason, clear in ways he hasn't noticed before. Her cheeks are fuller, her stomach just slightly rounded rather than flat. She's healthy, healthy enough that she might have even grown taller while he hadn't noticed.

He forces himself to smile at that, to bite down on the selfish, embarrassing thought that he doesn't want her to. That he wants to keep her small, and tucked against his chest, but it's hard not to be selfish when she's so warm, with her arms wrapped around his neck so tightly.

"You're okay, Twenny?" Eri asks, barely a question with the way that she says it, so quietly that he wouldn't hear it if she wasn't pressed right next to his ear.

He nods. "You're okay, Eri."

She nods and squirms closer, and he doesn't need another reason to not let her go. He can forget how tired he is as long as he holds her close.

Yamada smiles, though it still doesn't reach his eyes. It's still that worried smile that 27 hates, but he doesn't know how to stop it when his hands have to hold Eri. It isn't until Yamada brings a large, steaming pot to the kotatsu, already set with bowls and plates, that 27 can sign. Eri still refuses to leave him, sitting on his thigh and pressing her back against his chest, but his hands are mostly free.

'I'm fine.' 27 means it, but he doesn't know how to convince Yamada. Not when that clearly isn't enough.

"Well, I sure hope so! That little bean probably isn't going to leave your side for a month after being away from you so much the past couple days," Yamada says with a fake smile, but when he pulls off the lid for the pot, it reaches his eyes for a moment. "Hot pot on a kotatsu! Nothing beats that on a cold winter night like this!"

The soup is so hot that it bubbles, still boiling, and 27 would wonder if it was still cooking if he didn't remember reading about it. It's supposed to be hot enough to do that, and the meat is supposed to be the best part. It's good enough to fight over, to the point that someone might throw the rest of it on someone who had stolen all of the meat, knowing full well that it would scald them.

Eri tries to give him a lot of meat, but he takes the ladle from her for a different reason. Because she might get burned if she spills it.

Because he wants to do it himself.

He wants to serve Eri, and she lets him. She tells him what parts she wants, and he gets them for her, but can't help the smile that keeps pulling at his face. It's ridiculous, he hasn't actually made this soup, and it was probably difficult for Yamada to do it on his own. But he feels like he's feeding her, and it's so similar and so different to the way he fed her when she was younger that it nearly overwhelms him.

But when he takes that first sip, it does.

It's warm. It's so warm that his tongue thaws at it, the warmth rises to his eyes and threatens to spill over. The warmth of his legs under the kotatsu, the warmth of Eri seated happily on his lap. This place is warm, too warm, and he wants to stay here.

He wants to stay here, in this moment, forever.

Yamada notices, but not for the right reasons. He isn't even smiling, but his eyes are asking questions that he doesn't have to say. 27 doesn't want him to say them, he just wants to answer them, and he does it in a rush with his lungs still full of steam from the broth.

"Thank you."

He means it. In this moment, for this moment, he's never been more grateful. That he has this, even if it won't last. Whether he dies or loses, he'll have this moment, and it will be real. He will always be able to feel it, in a way that he can't when he tries to imagine escaping with 50.

He never gets to feel how warm their escape would be, even when he tries.

But he wants it to be as warm as this one. He wants Eri to be there too. He wants Yamada, he wants his owner, he wants 50 to be here so bad that it hurts.

But he forgets that ache for a moment when Yamada smiles at him. The real one, the one that he didn't figure out the first time. It's smaller, it's so kind that it's too warm to look at sometimes, but he likes it. He wants to keep it. "Thank you, Shinsou. I'm glad you like it."

27 wants to stay here so bad that for a moment, he forgets that's not his name.

Tooth Fairy

Chapter Summary

27 is still reeling from meeting with Chisaki, and that leaves him vulnerable to the devices of Class 1-A. He has no idea what they intend to do to him, but 'Bakusquad' certainly has plans for him. Eri loses something, and gains a new plan of action to help protect Twenny.

Chapter Notes

Early update this week because I will be moving to a new apartment this weekend! I hope you guys enjoy!

Trigger Warnings: Dissociation, Mild flashback, Food issues

Previously on Wards of UA: Eri's nickname for Bakugo is 'Ugo.' Eri can say 'Chisaki' if she says 'Fuck Chisaki,' to help her feel angry instead of scared. Eri has started calling Yamada and Aizawa 'Dad' sometimes. Ashido knows that Shinsou went missing as a child and still believes he was kidnapped. Todoroki's cat Soba attacked Shinsou, and Shinsou has hated the cat ever since. Class 1-A thinks that Shinsou went to 'Villain School' before he came to the 8 Precepts, based on a lie that Shinsou told Kirishima and Ashido. Shinsou believes he 'lost' when he met with Chisaki because he dissociated. Bakugo threatened to 'tear Shitsei (Aizawa) a new asshole' if Shinsou dissociated during that meeting. Shinsou compared Bakugo to Rikiya because he considered both of them friendly to him. Bakugo was assigned a 100 page essay on trauma related disorders by Aizawa after fighting Shinsou in a bathroom. Ashido has been trying to give Shinsou a high five for 15 chapters. Aizawa was given a 'coupon book' for his birthday from Class 1-A, and some of the coupons simply say 'Stop,' to stop a student from doing whatever they're doing. Ashido and Shinsou were friends in elementary school before he was sold. Shinsou is concerned that his quirk can cause Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome, and knows that he used it on Ashido. Aizawa and Yamada know that Eri is the granddaughter of the 8 Precepts head before Chisaki took over. Yamada proposed the idea of adopting Eri, and Aizawa didn't entirely disagree but argued that they've only known Eri for a little over a month.

Eri likes Ugo, because he gave her candy apples. So even if he's really mean sometimes, he must be trying to be nice other times, because he's a hero. He's just not very good at it.

Eri kicks her feet and looks at the paper strips that Mirio made for her to work on. She already made one for Mirio, because he was working on his midterm stuff before she woke up really scared, and after he made her not scared, they worked on drawing together. Mirio showed her how to make midterm headbands for heroes, and how to write magic spells on them to help the heroes study better. She wants to make headbands for all the heroes she knows, so they can all do really good on their tests.

But she doesn't know what to put on Ugo's headband, so she eats a candy apple to help her think.

She wants to ask Twenny what he thinks Ugo wants on his headband, but Twenny is asleep. Twenny was really tired last night after he had to see Fuck Chisaki, and he even fell asleep before she did. Twenny almost never does that, ever, so he had to be really tired.

And Twenny never ever takes a nap, unless he's super tired, or sick. And if he's sick, then Eri needs to make sure he gets a lot of rest, even if she kind of wants him to wake up and help her.

Zawa is really busy with some teacher work. He doesn't even look at the TVs on his desk as much, because he's writing a lot of stuff and frowning. He was frowning at a bunch of pictures of the heroes while he was doing his Serious Thinking Face, but when he looked at her, he asked her to tell him who she thought should go together on teams for one of their tests. Eri tried to put the heroes with their friends, but some of the heroes didn't have a lot of really good friends, even if they were all friends.

Zawa said that was right, some of the heroes didn't coordinate with others really easy. And he made a really big frowny face when he looked at Ashido and Kaminari when he said some of them didn't strategize good.

Zawa kind of got really quiet and frowny, so Eri went back to her work to help him work on his teacher stuff better. Teacher stuff must be really hard, and it's probably a lot like making headbands, because you have to think about stuff really hard to make sure it's right.

Eri takes another bite of her apple, but her mouth feels really weird after that. It feels like something's missing, and after she swallows, her lip goes in where it shouldn't. Eri puts a finger where her lip felt weird, and then touches her teeth.

But one of her teeth are gone.

"Dad!" Eri yells, and she's trying not to cry but it's scary. Her tooth is gone and she got broken, but she doesn't want to get repaired. "Dad, my tooth is gone! Can you fix it?!"

Zawa looks at her with really big eyes, and he touches her lip even though she shows her teeth really big for him to see it, so he can fix it. But then he gives her a really nice smile, and pats her head, and even if she's still kind of scared, she knows it's okay. "It doesn't need to be fixed. Children lose their teeth when they get older. It's a normal part of growing up."

Zawa reaches for her candy apple, and she gives it to him even if she still wants to eat it, but she really likes Zawa, so she can share. Eri looks over at Twenny, and he's awake now. Probably because she was yelling really scared, because he looks really awake. "Twenny, I lost my tooth!"

She runs over and shows him, and it feels really weird when she puts her tongue where her tooth was. It doesn't really hurt, but it feels really weird, and it's kind of fun to do.

Twenny smiles at her, even if he still looks kind of worried. "It's the first one," Twenny says, but his voice gets kind of shaky and quiet. It's kind of like when he tries to talk to people by talking to her, but not really. It's kind of different, and she doesn't really know why. "I'm happy for you."

Zawa makes a hummy kind of sound and he pinches something in her apple, before he holds her apple out for her. "Your first tooth is worth more than any other tooth you lose. Hopefully the Tooth Fairy has enough money tonight."

Eri takes her apple back, but then Zawa holds out his pinchy fingers, and puts a tiny white tooth in her other hand. "Tooth Fairy?"

Zawa smiles again, but this time it's kind of like his play-mean smile, but not really, because it's still really nice. "When you lose a tooth, you put it under your pillow, and while you're asleep, the Tooth Fairy comes and takes the tooth but leaves money in its place. Sometimes it's a lot of money, so you need to make sure not to lose that tooth."

"But I lost it," Eri says, and Zawa kind of laughs.

"Don't lose track of it, I mean," Zawa says, before he opens up his desk. "It might be better to put it in here until you go to sleep tonight."

Eri nods, and puts the tooth in the drawer, even if she kind of wants to play with it. It's weird to see something that was in her mouth for her whole life not be there anymore. And it's really weird that teeth just fall out anyway.

Maybe Momo can tell her about it.

"Zawa, can I go talk to Momo?" Eri asks, but Zawa looks at his TVs and kind of frowns before he gets an itch on the back of his head.

"I'll let you know if I see her in the common area, but if she's in her room, she's probably studying, and it's better not to disturb her," Zawa says, and he looks at Eri to make sure that's okay, so Eri nods, and he nods back.

Eri goes back to her headband for Ugo, but she kind of doesn't want to eat her candy apple anymore. Her teeth get kind of sticky when she eats them, and she doesn't want to lose all her teeth, even if she gets money. People talk about money a lot, and it sounds like a lot of trouble, but Eri hopes that it doesn't give her trouble.

But there's stuff that people can do with money, and she wants to do one of them.

27 knows that he shouldn't do this.

He looks at the phone, and bites the inside of his lip, looking again to see his owner's turned back. To see Eri still happily scribbling on her project, writing in crayon on strips of paper already prepared for her. She's laying on her stomach, legs kicking above her that pause when she presses the crayon to her mouth, trying to decide how to personalize each gift that she's making.

She's fine. She will be fine. He knows that. He knows that his owner can take care of it.

He knows that he shouldn't bother the hero students because they have midterms. It's a very important series of tests, and his owner is worried about them. He wants them to be prepared, to study. He doesn't want 27 or Eri to distract them, and being at school was distracting for them. Messaging them will be more distracting.

But he needs this information. For Eri. For her sake. He needs to make sure that this goes right.

Last seen being kidnapped by serial stomach puncher: Message back if you're not studying.

SHINNYYY: How

STFU ABOUT PIZZA: You doing okay bro?

SHINNYYY: How do you summon the tooth fairy?

27 waited. He tried closing and opening the chat again, but the minutes passed and there still wasn't a response. He should have been prepared, he should have looked it up when he had access to the Internet. He should have known this was going to happen one day.

His owner said it was okay. It was normal. Children lost their teeth, and 27 knew that, he wasn't an idiot. He lost his teeth too, and he remembers that.

Eri didn't even tell him that one was loose.

He tried to be calm, but he didn't feel calm at all. Eri lost a tooth, she was growing older, she was growing and something about that made him feel unsettled. His owner was better at being calm. He reassured her that it was fine, it was normal. She was growing up, and losing her teeth was part of that. And the tooth fairy was going to visit her, and give her money for the tooth.

27 needed to make sure that happened.

Eri needed to have a normal childhood. So far, she hadn't had one, she had lived very differently from the way she should have. She probably should have lost her first tooth earlier, but Chisaki's quirk likely stopped her from doing that. She could have a normal childhood now, and an important part of that was being visited by the tooth fairy.

He knew for a fact that losing a tooth wasn't enough to summon the tooth fairy, and he needed to know the process to do it. The hero students needed to tell him.

Cementoss x Gucci Collab: oH fuck Sero isn't breathing plz HELP

He stared for a moment before he closed the chat and turned the phone face down on the bed. It vibrated, but he couldn't bring himself to care, laying back down even though he couldn't bring himself to fall asleep again.

He was tired. He was tired of this place.

He liked it, he liked being here. He liked that he was able to eat more food than he ever thought existed, that he wasn't punished or beaten. The lack of rules was frightening, but after being able to fall back to sleep without his owner saying anything about it, he could appreciate it.

Eri was allowed to grow up here. She was allowed to be healthy, to lose her teeth. To be a normal child. He wanted that for her, more than anything. He wanted her to have this place, to be happy and normal and grow up to forget about everything else that would have kept her from being happy and normal.

But he wasn't normal.

He knew that, it was clear in the way that his owner and Yamada treated him. In the way that the heroes reacted to what he said. He says weird things, because he's weird, and he can't change that. He grew up wrong.

He remembers being able to suck a few of his teeth into his mouth when they came loose, and he could work them with his tongue past the back of his molars, to the inside of his cheek. It probably took hours to do it, but by sticking a finger into that tight space between his clenched teeth and cheek, he could fish out the tooth.

He never thought to put it under his pillow. He would just roll it between his fingers and stare at it, then try to hide it so that Bug wouldn't find out that he had something to occupy himself with in those long, empty spaces of boredom. When he was left in his room to count the bricks and drips from the faucet, having something to hold like one of his own teeth was a treasure. He had something to do when he wasn't eating, wasn't training with Bug, wasn't being taught to read by 10 or visited by 50.

He always lost the tooth eventually. Just like he lost Mocha.

Maybe he would have been more normal if he didn't. If he put his teeth under a pillow, or knew to do that. If he kept Mocha, instead of having to watch him burn to ash. Children were supposed to have toys, and teeth weren't toys.

Maybe he was never normal, because he treated his own teeth like toys. Maybe his mother knew that already. Maybe that's why she sold him.

"Yaoyorozu is in the kitchen downstairs," his owner says, and he hears Eri's knees and hands knocking on the ground in a flurry to bring herself to stand. He waits for her to open the door, to run to one of her favorite heroes to tell her the exciting news, and feels guilty when he realizes he spoiled that for her.

But instead, he feels her small hands on his arm, shaking him. "Twenny, I'm gonna talk to Momo. You wanna come? We can get some apples to share."

He doesn't. He recoils at the idea, almost enough to pretend to continue to sleep. Talking to that hero on the chat was bad enough, but to see her after that, to see her face. The idea was horrifying. She already knew how stupid he was, now she knew how odd he was.

But he knew that voice that Eri was using. She wanted him to come, to be friends with this hero.

His place in her life was too fragile for him to refuse it.

He sees his owner's head turn when he walks with Eri to the door, and imagines that he wants to remind him not to distract the heroes. But he doesn't say anything, and Eri holds onto his hand after closing the door behind them.

The halls and stairs are empty, but he still feels like he needs the mask. The heroes aren't even there to look at him, but he can still feel their stares. They'll probably stare more, now that they know about the mask. They know that it was kept shut, and they'll probably figure out the reason why. They'll probably want to put another one on him, because he's violent.

He wants to wear one, even if he's not violent. And he has one in his pocket. He just can't wear it.

He looks down at Eri, to see her excited to see Momo. She starts jumping from every step, and he can't bring himself to scold her. Not when he wants to have a reason to hold her hand.

She's growing up happy, growing up to be normal. He can't bring a piece of something that isn't normal back into her life. He can't wear a mask and hide his smile from her, even if he wants to. Even if he wants it so bad that he almost misses The Miasma.

He looks normal with a mask. When he was in the bathroom that morning, he took the face mask out of his pocket and flipped it around so that the words were hidden. He put it on and looked in the mirror.

And he looked normal again .

His mouth is weird. His scars are weird. He doesn't want to look at them, so he doesn't know why other people do. He knows why Chisaki did, he wanted to remember when they were bleeding, but the heroes just want to see where he looks weird.

Maybe that's why Blasty is staring at him, now that he knows he's especially weird.

Blasty doesn't say anything, but he crouches down a bit and hooks an elbow under 27's knee, a hand finds his arm, and then the world spins and he's draped over Blasty's shoulders. It's such an odd pin that he didn't recognize it, too tired to react when Blasty was grabbing him, but now he's here and he has several options.

He could take out his knife and stab Blasty in the chest, if he reaches far enough he could stab him in the kidney. He could slit his throat, but he can't brace his arm for a sleeper hold.

He sees Eri staring at him, too confused to really know what to do, and he knows that he can't be violent. Not in front of her. Even if the hands on his arm and leg, and that feeling of Blasty's shoulders pressing against his side makes him want to do something violent to break away from it. He can't exactly tell Blasty to let him go either, when one arm is trapped and the phone is in the pocket trapped against Blasty's shoulders.

"Oi, I'm taking this," Blasty says, shrugging his shoulders into 27's side. "Congrats on the tooth shit, pipsqueak."

"Okay, I'm gonna save you some apples, Twenny! Have fun with Ugo!" Eri says with a wave, before she sprints down the stairs. He wants to tell her to be careful, but he can't tell if the words are trapped again, if now they're trapped with her now, or if Blasty's shoulder is just digging into his chest at the right angle to make it hard to breathe.

Blasty growls about how little he weighs as he stomps up the steps to his floor, and kicks the door open instead of releasing one of his hands to open it. But that seems to be Blasty's go-to method of opening doors anyway.

The door to his room was open, but he kicks it shut before he angles himself to toss 27 onto the ground. 27 remembers the knife, considers punching Blasty in the throat for a moment, before he decides he's too tired to do either. If Blasty wants to beat him, it's fine. He might fall asleep while he's doing it.

But 27 falls onto Blasty's bed, and after the bouncing settles, he refuses to move. If Blasty wanted a reaction, he wouldn't get one, he wouldn't give one. He was too tired to give one anyway.

Blasty sits on the chair by his desk, and 27 remembers when Blasty collapsed on his bed and 27 sat in his chair. When Blasty tried to convince him to tell his owner what he knew about The Miasma, so that he wouldn't see Chisaki. Because Blasty knew he would lose, even if he told him how not to.

Blasty wants to know how badly he lost. "So, you saw that Trash Bird ass bitch?" Blasty is talking oddly, but 27 won't look up to see why. He's oddly quiet, oddly calm. "How'd that shit make you feel?"

27 lifts his head enough to see Blasty slumped lazily in his chair, a foot braced on the corner of his bed, and a clipboard resting in his lap. He has a pen in his hand that he keeps clicking.

Blasty stares at him before he rolls his eyes. "Look shitface, I spent five fucking hours googling this shit, so don't give me that 'I'm mute' crap. Dig out. Your fucking phone. You ass. And talk about this shit."

Blasty taps the pen on his clipboard and glares at him. 27 just lays back and sighs.

He could get the phone. He could try to even sign to Blasty, but that requires a lot of moving. He doesn't feel like moving. Blasty kicks the bed and groans, and he sounds angry. He also sounds tired. "Yeah, it's stupid as shit. Who the fuck wants to talk about that kind of shit? But apparently, this shit works, so you're gonna fucking do it."

He doesn't want to. If Blasty wants to make him do it, he'll have to do it like Chisaki did. Throw him into a nothingness and take away his words, steal his voice to make him speak.

"Did the grounding shit work or what?"

27 knows he won't leave him alone until he knows something, until he gets his information. Even if the phone feels too heavy, he pulls it out. "I lo-ost."

Blasty goes quiet, quiet enough for 27 to consider falling asleep, before there's a sharp clatter as the clipboard falls on the desk. "Cool. I'm murdering the fuck out of Shitsei, wait here."

His voice is still too calm, too serious. His face is too, when 27 looks at it after he grabs his shirt, stopping him.

Blasty is a goddamn idiot. "Oi, I fucking told you this shit was fucked, and it's his goddamn fault it happened. I'm doing the whole fucking world a favor."

When 27 realizes it, he almost laughs. He feels the grin pull, he feels goddamn insane to feel his mood changing so rapidly. It's almost like Deidoro's quirk, one minute he's too heavy and the next he's too light. It's just so stupid.

"Wanna share that shit with the fucking class, chucklefuck?" Blasty asks, slapping his hand away. He looks confused, he looks so oddly devoid of anger, just like his voice is. It's just so weird, and he would have figured it out sooner if he noticed it.

'Friend,' 27 signs, slowly for Blasty because he knows he's not fluent in JSL. He usually doesn't care, but he wonders if Blasty will get angry again. If he'll be insulted, or only pretend to be.

Blasty recognizes it, his eyes tend to widen a bit when he does, and the anger comes back in his knotted fists and scowl, but it's darker. It's deeper than anger. "Look, if you say some shit about me being any fucking thing like that goddamn bastard, I will blow your ass away and then fuck up Shitsei on principle."

But Blasty is nothing like Rikiya.

That's the line that he knew Rikiya would never cross. He'd never cross Chisaki, never utter a word against him. Chisaki got him out of debt when the loan sharks were circling, trying to figure out which organization similar to The Miasma they would sell him to. Even if 27 could manipulate him, force him to be kind with every joke and favor and wince when he favored an injury that Rikiya gave him, Rikiya would never cross Chisaki.

Bakugo was his friend, but better. He gave him things, he gave him skills to use in the fight against Chisaki. He probably crossed his owner then, giving him those hacks helped him fight the investigation, and he knew his owner wasn't happy about that.

Bakugo gave him many more things than that fight in the bathroom should have earned him. Even if things seemed to come easier here, even if it was all on loan and they hadn't forced him to pay any of it back, Bakugo had given him a lot of things. For free. ' Not R-I-K-I-Y-A. Best friend. '

27 doesn't think he's had a friend like that. 50 wasn't a friend, she was so much more, and 10 only did things for him because he felt guilty, he drowned in guilt over every death he couldn't stop or couldn't help but to cause. 27 probably manipulated 10 somehow with that, without meaning to.

But 27 has barely manipulated Bakugo, and he knows that he doesn't feel guilty about revealing his collection. Out of all the heroes that Eri wanted to be his friend, Bakugo wanted to be his, for some odd reason. And 27 couldn't complain about it.

Bakugo looks like he wants to complain. He opens his mouth just to shut it, just to bare his teeth before he growls. "Damn straight, I'm going to be the number one fucking hero, so don't you forget that shit, shit face. If that means I'm going to be the best fucking friend you have, then fucking deal with it!"

27 has no idea what to do with that. He doesn't know how to have friends who admit that they're friends, and manipulation only works when there's something to hide. It's frightening, it's vulnerable, it makes him more naked than not wearing a mask.

But it feels so normal that it almost feels wrong. It makes him feel like he's stealing something, to pretend that he's allowed to have friends. Numbers shouldn't have friends, shouldn't have distractions, but this place makes him forget that he's a Number sometimes. It's probably because he has such an odd name here, a normal one. A human one.

Shinsou Hitoshi gets to have friends.

Then the door opens and his owner glares at Bakugo, and 27 remembers that he doesn't get to decide that. His owner named him, his owner decides what Shinsou Hitoshi gets to have. Even if he gets to have more than a Number should. "Shinsou, are you here willingly?"

His owner asks too many questions, it's too many tests. He's probably been tested more times here than he was at the 8 Precepts and The Miasma combined. And he hates that his owner always makes it difficult, that he never gives away the answer.

But 27 wants to test something. And Bakugo hates his owner enough to make it safe to do so.

' Yes. With friend. ' Shinsou answers. Shinsou gets to have friends, gets to answer without considering whether it's safe. Shinsou calls the man standing in that doorway 'Aizawa.'

Aizawa looks too calm. He always does, he never gives any tells, never tells him the answer. There's a movement in his jaw that 27 barely catches, irritation or something to say. To tell him not to distract the heroes.

But he doesn't.

"Good. Remember that you're free to leave at any time," Aizawa says, something odd in his voice making it lighter, softer. Then he turns to glare at Bakugo. "The same rules are in place. Don't make me enforce them."

Bakugo scoffs, crossing his arms, but his owner allows it and turns to leave. But before he crosses the threshold, he stops, hand on the doorframe. "Oh. And your project isn't required anymore."

Bakugo flares up into rage, a scream behind his bared teeth. "TOUGH SHIT! I've got 113 fucking pages for you to read, and that shit will be fucking enlightening!"

Aizawa looks over his shoulder, eyes widened in barely-there surprise. "Exceeding your page count before the deadline. Very Plus Ultra."

Bakugo throws a pen at the door after it closes, tipping his head back in a sigh caught in a snarl. "If he starts saying that 'How Plus Ultra of you' shit I will fucking lose it ."

Bakugo didn't have much to lose to begin with. That's probably why they're friends.

Bakugo looks at him and cocks his head, and he looks so odd when he's not angry. "Oi. You ready to talk or what?"

Shinsou still feels too much, still feels too drunk, can't hope to hide his smirk. " Ca-an't. I'm mute. "

Bakugo clenches an empty hand, and probably wants to throw something at him. He likes throwing things at Shinsou, it's almost a game that they have. A game between friends. " Fuck you. Buckle the fuck in, this shit's supposed to take 45 minutes but your ass is stuck here 'til we fucking get somewhere on your brain issues and shit. "

Bakugo sits down in a huff, looks for the pen before he remembers throwing it, and growls at himself before he grabs another one. Shinsou sits up, even if he's allowed to lay down, he doesn't feel as tired as he did before.

"Welcome to fucking therapy. First, we'll go over all the shit that fucked you up so I know what I'm working with," Bakugo says, again too quiet. "Tell me about your childhood."

Of course. He's just so stupid that he forgot.

The heroes want to be friends with him to get information about The Miasma. Blasty seems to want that even more than the others. Blasty plays a better game, he knows that he has to trade things to get information, and the other heroes are just too clumsy to know that.

They're not friends, not in any new way. But it might be better that way. " Ba-ad. Weird. "

Blasty writes that down, rolling his eyes. "I fucking figured. Elaborate on that shit."

“I-I’ll answer questions. A-ask them.” He can’t think for himself as a Number, and he doesn’t want to give anything away for free. If Blasty asks questions, he can deflect them. He can make him think that he’s winning when he only gets empty answers.

Blasty looks up, clicks his pen a few times before he tosses it onto the clipboard. “Ashido said you got kiddy-snatched, but your mom might have done shit before that. Do you remember that shit?”

“No. She-e didn’t.” He barely remembers. Flashes and pictures that seem too vague. When he tries to remember, he’s not sure if he remembers dreams or memories, but some are different from others. Some are clearer.

“You remember getting kidnapped?” Blasty writes something, but he hasn’t gotten any important information yet. He won’t, even if he thinks he will.

“No,” 27 answers. He wasn’t kidnapped, but he remembers being sold. Flashes of it, but they’re clear. Being in a car, holding Mocha, his mother’s eyes in the rearview mirror. He remembers being scared before he had a reason to be, remembers that he had nightmares about Boss before he met him before his first job.

“How does that shit make you feel?” Blasty asks, like he doesn’t really care to know the answer. Too calm, too quiet. That question is just routine, ritual. It’s meaningless, as meaningless as whatever 27 feels.

“No-othing,” 27 doesn’t care about his answer either. He doesn’t care to pick through what he should feel about being sold, because it happened. It happened so long ago that he doesn’t remember it. His feelings on it wouldn’t change that.

“Then, you went to that villain school bullshit, right?” 27 nods, wondering how Blasty is going to try to get The Miasma’s name from him. His owner would probably reward him for being the one to do it, which will only make Blasty more determined. “And they made you wear a mask. It probably kept your mouth shut, right?”

27 has to fight not to roll his eyes. Blasty was bad at this. “E-everyone did. They did. Chi-isaki did.” He smiles before he catches himself, he hadn’t realized it before, but it’s funny. “Ne-ever had it o-off this long. They do-on’t need it.”

He was too broken for them to use a mask. He already wore one. His words caught behind his teeth even if his teeth weren’t held shut. He wouldn’t try to use his quirk, wouldn’t try to escape. He doesn’t have his quirk, and even if he did, he probably wouldn’t use it. And he doesn’t want to escape, he wants to stay, and that’s probably another mask that they put on him. Another kind, invisible mask. One that still makes him feel too vulnerable.

They probably want him to feel vulnerable like that, to get the information. End the investigation. Whatever comes after that, they want to get to it quickly.

“Right,” Bakugo mutters, too quiet. Still writing too much. “So, voice quirks get fucky when they can’t talk. There’s regulations and shit when they get arrested, and muzzling a voice quirk brat for too long is fucking child abuse. So, that’s fucked up already.”

Muzzling, masks. Dogs were muzzled. That’s probably why Chisaki picked that name. “Chi-isaki only clo-osed it at ni-ight.”

“Still fucked up, don’t fight me on this shit because I know this shit front and back,” Blasty growls, tapping his pen against the paper. “How does it feel when you try to talk and shit? Normal talk.”

“Li-ike I ca-an’t.” Like he’s shoving his weight against 98, but worse. When he can’t find the right angle, can’t make one in a fight, can’t bring his opponent down. He feels the words in his throat, in his mouth, and they’re stuck.

“Like bad shit will happen if you talk or you just can’t?”

The phone looks too bright, and 27 closes his eyes to stop it from hurting him. It feels heavy again, he feels tired. “Can’t. Li-ike the mask.”

Blasty circles something, a long scrape of the pen on paper, but then it’s quiet. Too quiet, for too long. “Check in, bitch. How the fuck are you feeling now?”

Heavy. Tired. Useless. “Fine.”

Blasty draws another long line, and kicks another foot on the bed. “So, fuck that. Let’s talk about Trash Bird. You see his stumpy little fuck stumps?”

27 feels the smile again, and wishes he could have said something like that. He can’t even imagine what Chisaki would have looked like when he heard it. “Yes. Tried to quirk me-e after I bro-oke his nose. It was fu-unny.” Blasty makes an odd, choked off noise, and that reminds him why it wasn’t funny. “Then I ba-arked. Lost.”

Too quiet again. For too long. “The fuck does that mean?”

“Tell me to ba-ark.” 27 might. He feels it in his throat when the phone says it. He might do it this time.

“How about fucking nope ?!” Bakugo yells, and it’s relaxing. He’s normal again. “Did that fucker fucking furry-fy you?! Did he fucking—” Three pops, louder each time. Then a hand slapped on a desk. “Look shit face, there’s fucked and there’s fucked, and that is fucked. That’s some fucked up brainwashing shit, and we’re not bringing that shit into the therapy shit. Fucking. Nope.”

Brainwashing. He was brainwashed. And his quirk was brainwashing.

It’s funny, and he wishes he wasn’t too tired to laugh.

He wishes that he could, that he wasn’t so heavy. That he didn’t feel this electricity inside his body, like he was shocked by a quirk but only on the inside. He didn’t have the burn, the pain that he should.

Blasty kicks the bed. “Fuck it, we’re doing homework now. We’re gonna find a fucking hack that works, so tell me what worked better.”

An order. He can answer it. “Feet.”

“Fucking nasty,” Bakugo mutters under his breath, but he writes it down. “So, fucking sensations and shit. I found some fucking weird ones I haven’t tried. I don’t know what the fucking deal is with ice cubes and shit, but it’s fucking everywhere online, like everyone with fucked heads has their own personal icyhot bastard to make that shit.”

“You-u have PTSD.” 27 doesn’t think to make it a question, even if it is one. Even if it shouldn’t be, anger is a symptom and Bakugo has it in spades. But Bakugo knew the hacks, said that he tried them. That was an admission in itself, but 27 was stupid. 27 didn’t notice it.

Bakugo’s face tightens, his fist does too. 27 knows the clench of his jaw, the way he stares harder into nothing and doesn’t blink. He knows why he holds his breath.

Bakugo lets it out, his mouth hanging open in something that’s barely a smile. “No, that’s the fucked up part. I fucking ended All Might’s career. Because I got fucking kidnapped, like some fucking extra. Some fucking nobody. They wanted me to be a fucking villain, and I did that shit. I did what villains have been trying to do for fucking years, to take down All Might. And I fucking did that.”

27 snaps his fingers, because he doesn’t want to use the phone, even if it’s slower. He means this. ‘I-N-S-U-L-T-E-D. B-Y. A-S-S-O-C-I-A-T-I-O-N.’

Bakugo rolls his eyes. “Shit’s not funny, asshole. You can talk all this shit about how you’re a criminal or a yakuza, but you’re fucking soft as shit. You’re a fucking mom, snack bags and fucking hankie stashes and all. So don’t act like you fucking know shit.”

‘I know. V-I-L-L-A-I-N. S-C-H-O-O-L.’ 27 knows the rest of the signs are easy enough to piece together, even if Blasty doesn’t know them. ‘Not villain. You. Hero. Just loud.’

Bakugo narrows his eyes before he throws the pen at 27. It’s small and thin, and nearly falls out of his hand when he catches it. “Fucking. Fuck this, we’re doing hacks. Get all comfy and shit, because I’m gonna fucking test them, and that means triggering your ass. Tell me yours and I’ll tell you mine.”

Even if it sounds more effective, 27 doesn’t want to. He gets the phone, because Bakugo needs to know this. He needs to know that there’s something under his skin that comes out, something that made the underlings avoid him afterwards. Something that Chisaki was probably right about. “I-I have a lo-ot. But I’m viole-ent.”

Bakugo just grins, all teeth and menace. “Fucking same. I’ll get Shitty Hair to deal with it.”

It still sounds like a bad plan, but he wants it to work. Especially if it works for this one. “Ha-air.”

Eri feels like her tummy is going to explode. She also feels kind of bad for eating a lot of Tokoyami’s apples, but maybe if she draws one on his headband for every apple she ate, she can make it up to him.

“And then the new tooth pushes through the gum, like this,” Momo says, squeezing a yogurt tube with an apple slice inside it so that the apple slice starts coming out. “The only teeth that don’t go through that process are the four hind-molars that are called ‘Wisdom teeth.’ They erupt through the gum in the very back of our mouths, where a tooth wasn’t before. This happens during young adulthood, usually in your early 20’s, which is why they were named ‘Wisdom teeth,’ with the assumption that you’re ‘wiser’ when it happens.”

“You were probably born with your wisdom teeth, Momo!” Eri says, trying to see if she could see Momo’s wisdom teeth. Momo had to have them now, there’s no way she could get any smarter.

Momo gives her the Good Job smile, but it's a little weird and pinchy looking. "Well, most people are, but I actually wasn't born with them. It's probably a good thing, because it can sometimes require surgery to remove them if they're angled incorrectly inside the gum."

Eri didn't think about that, but that's a really good idea. "Momo, can you do surgery on my teeth to get them out?"

Momo's eyes get really big and her lips get thin and twisty, and Jirou drinks her water wrong and starts spitting it out. "N-no, I don't think that's a good idea, Eri. It would be a bad idea to lose all of your teeth at once. It would make it very hard to eat. Especially apples."

Eri frowns, because the apples haven't been working either. She ate a lot of them, but her teeth don't feel loose at all. "I wanna lose more teeth though. Especially these ones," Eri stops and points to the really pointy ones in the back. Momo said they're 'molars' and they're good for chewing stuff. They experimented on that by eating a bunch of snacks and seeing what tooth did what. "I can't really see what they look like in my mouth, but if I looked at them in my hand, I could see them better."

Momo raises her finger like she has an idea, and then she cups her other hand around it. She makes a little frown, but then her quirk makes her skin move up and a tiny white thing comes out of her finger. "This is probably a better demonstration of how teeth grow," Momo says really quiet, before she pinches the tiny white thing and puts it in Eri's hand.

It's a tooth, but it's bigger than the one she lost. And it has four points instead of just being flat on the top. "Momo, you can make teeth?!"

"It's a simple compound, it's just harder to get the details right on something that small," Momo says with her Kinda Embarrassed smile. "But it's probably a good idea for me to focus on creating smaller objects rather than larger ones. It can help me create more complex electronic devices."

"Momo," Eri says, and she needs Momo to know that she's serious. She really needs her to help her with this. "Can you make me a lot of teeth? Like, a lot of teeth. So I can know all about what they look like and stuff."

Momo looks over at Shoji, and he looks at Eri before he remembers he doesn't like her, and he gets up off the couch to leave.

Shoji seems nice, but he's really quiet. And he doesn't really like Eri. He always leaves when she looks at him, unless they're in school and he can't. But he probably would if he wouldn't get in trouble with Zawa.

Eri doesn't know why Shoji doesn't like her, like all the other heroes do, but she likes Shoji. And Momo likes Shoji too, but she doesn't look like she's happy with him right now. She's kind of frowny, but she smiles when she looks at Eri. "Let's do that, Eri. What are the front teeth called?"

"Incisors!" Eri says, but her mouth makes a weird whistle noise when she says that, and Jirou looks like she might choke on her water again, because she covers her mouth to catch it.

Momo's lips go super thin, and her cheeks kind of get bigger, but she nods and holds out her hand. "That's right. Now, if you watch my quirk, you can see how the tooth erupts from the gum slowly."

Eri tries to count all the teeth she has with her tongue while she watches Momo. She doesn't know how much money she can get for all of her teeth, but maybe Momo can make her even more teeth than that.

Maybe if she has a whole bag full of teeth, she'll have enough money from the Tooth Fairy to put a hit on Chisaki.

27 can't tell if it's getting less effective, or if the training is more efficient than he thought it would be. Judging by how long it's taking Bakugo's hand to start sparking, it must be the same for him.

Kirimon Shark seems to be getting more worried about that, standing between them to use his body as a shield if either of them slip too far. He keeps turning his head, glancing at them, and it's distracting. It's probably his fault that he's barely stuck in the fog now.

Then the fist in his hair tugs harder and he slides deeper in, loses track of his body for a moment, smells bleach sharp in the air. He doesn't feel his body, but he feels Hari close by, and he barely remembers to call it.

He slaps his free hand on Shark Bro's shoulder, only sees his hand tightening on Bakugo's wrist, doesn't feel himself doing it. He sees sparks pop bigger, knows they should be louder, sees Bakugo's eyes go distant before he's shoved back, still weightless.

It's the slow fog, not thunder claps. It's still frightening, he still feels himself trying to fight it before there's something smooth and green in his hand. He squeezes before he remembers they tried that one already, this is the eating one.

He tries to eat it, tries to remember that he looked at it beforehand. Bakugo seems to think it's odd that he wants to make sure his food hasn't been tampered with in a noticeable way. His mouth is open, the green thing is inside, but he can't bite down, he doesn't know if it's safe. If it's not poison.

Hari closes the mask to make him bite down on the dog treat, but the mask is warm. It's odd. The dog treat is soft, there's an odd juice.

It's warm. Too warm, too hot, it hurts, the bleach doesn't burn right. His mouth is on fire in a different way, it's wrong, he opens his mouth.

He can open his mouth. There's voices. There's something in his mouth, and he keeps chewing, even if it hurts. He can't spit it out, he can only swallow.

"-it's a fucking jalapeño, he's fucking fine."

"No, what ." Clap. "The fuck. " Clap clap. "Were you doing?" Clap. "To Shinny?!"

27 turns his head, sees that the door is open. Ashi is dangling from Tape Boy's shoulder, she looks angry. Sparky is holding her feet with his arms, his hands occupied with a glass of milk and plate of cookies. He looks back to Bakugo, and he looks fine. Settled back into his own skin, almost relaxed in it. "Training. Now fuck off, he's fine."

Bakugo looks at him, and probably wants to ask if he's fine. He is, even if his mouth hurts. It's been burned worse. And he's on the edge of the fog, enough to feel himself, just not as much as he should. He just has to curl his hands a few times to bring himself out of it.

"I'm not fucking playing, get the fuck out of my room," Bakugo says, but he's still talking in that strange quiet way, just a little louder, a little irritated. The hot peppers must have worked, they seemed to be more effective than the other hacks they tried. Either that or this training was just that effective.

“But I wanna hang out with Shinny,” Ashido whines, her face hidden as she slumps over Tape Boy’s back, and he adjusts his stance to the change in where her weight is. But she takes advantage of that and springs up, kicking her feet from Pikachu’s hold before she twists from Adhesive Dispenser, ducking under his arm with her eyes locked on him. “High-“

She says something else, but he sees the hand and forgets himself. He forgets that it hurts more if he flinches, if he stiffens. Chisaki finds it amusing, holds his hand in a hover to make him bark for it, forces him to remember the pain from his wounds and choose them over fear.

No wounds. He does the body check out of habit, to find which parts of him aren’t there, are lost in the fog. His eyes, he closed them, and when he opens them he remembers to breathe, to relax. It’s Ashido, not Chisaki. He curls his hands to help remember that.

Ashido looks as frozen as he felt, her smile falling with her hand. “I, uh. Haven’t had a quirk slip in forever, you know. I know it’s kind of scary...acid and...everything.”

27 shakes his head, looks to Bakugo because he can’t remember where the phone is. ‘ Training. Bird. ’

Bakugo nods, he taught him ‘Training,’ and ‘Bird’ is easy enough to guess, and looks at Ashido. “Oi, it’s not you. His brain’s fucked because of Trash Bird. That’s the fucking hand quirk he’s worried about, not your weak sauce.”

27 nods, but Ashido doesn’t look relieved like she should. She bites her lip, eyes widening, before she narrows her eyes and becomes serious, determined. “Down low!”

Her hand is stretched out again, but it’s low, palm up. Not a handshake. He’s not sure if she wants him to give her something, but maybe it’s similar to a high five. But if it’s the opposite, ‘down’ instead of ‘high,’ then maybe he’s not supposed to slap her hand. He’s supposed to do the opposite.

He puts his hand on her palm, biting down on the urge to pull it away. He remembers this kind of training, doing it with Eri. He used to jump every time she touched or grabbed him, but he taught himself not to. Made himself used to it. Became just a little less odd for it.

He feels like he’s being odd, feeling the weight of their stares, but Ashido is staring at him oddly too, like she’s confused. But then, she grins and holds his hand, her thumb too hot on the back of his knuckles before she starts swinging their joined hands back and forth.

“Shit face, do you seriously-“

“Shut up!” Ashido hisses, her face twisted in anger at Bakugo, but softening oddly at him. “Shinny knows, he just wants to hold my hand. And I want to hold hands with Shinny.” Her swinging stops and her voice grows oddly cold and low when she speaks again. “And if you take this from me, I will put horse tranquilizers in your coffee before your Lit Midterm.”

Ashido hums when she starts swinging their hands again, and 27 once again wonders if he’s underestimated Ashi. Beneath the excited grins and spastic movements that make her seem like a fool, there’s a colder side. A fearsome one.

He can’t say he doesn’t like it.

He hears a cut off squeal, and looks to see his owner standing in the hallway with his arms crossed,

Sparky crouched low with his arms at a poor guard. Sticky Joints stiffens into a half-salute for some reason. “You’re here of your own free will?” His owner asks, but the low half-growl of it makes it barely a question.

This is another test, and it’s clear he failed the first one. He should say no, he should shake his head, but that would mean returning to the Safe Room. And he knows it’s not safe at all with his owner in such a mood.

“What’s with the fucking ‘Free will’ checks? Shitsou’s fine,” Bakugo growls in answer. “He’s not fucking kidnapped or some-“

That’s even less of a question. Ashi is practically begging him to say yes.

He doesn’t know why, what she plans to do to him. What she wants from him, but it’s clear she wants something. It’s even clearer that his owner doesn’t want her to get it, his eyes narrowing in a rare tell when they settle on their joined hands.

He hears Eri’s quick footsteps before she runs to his owner’s side, her hands tucked in the front pocket of her dress. She looks up at his owner before she looks at him, and her eyes dance with a smile. “Twenny! You’re making friends!”

“Yeah,” he says, because she’s too excited about it. She’s wanted him to do this for so long, he just hopes that the heroes won’t correct him. That if they want something, they’ll wait until the door is closed to tell him.

Ashido seems to want his hand, because her other starts holding his trapped one. “Shinny,” she whines, and for some reason it sounds like she’s close to tears. She’s slumped over in some defeated gesture, which makes it hard to see if she really is.

But Eri is so happy that she smiles, that happy and normal smile that should come more naturally to her over time. The one she deserved to wear more often. “You’re doing a really good job! Let me know if you need help, okay?”

“Okay,” 27 answers, and wonders if he should be embarrassed to accept help from a 5 year old. Even if he knows it isn’t necessary.

His owner steps forward, reaching for something in his pocket. 27 only has a second to wonder if it’s dangerous, if he’s choosing something more painful than the scarf to force him to come back to the Safe Room, before his owner pulls out some folded pieces of paper to him. “Here.” 27 takes them with his free hand, fighting to keep his confusion hidden. “These are as good as if they came from me. And Shinsou is free to leave at any time, without question.”

27 manages to unfold the first one, and it just has one word on it, ‘Stop.’ But it’s not his owner’s handwriting.

“Yep, got it, no problem!” Zappy says with a grin that looks a little too manic, his thumbs up and eyes locked on 27. He wants something desperately.

Red Shark crouches to offer Eri a high five, which she takes with no hesitation. They both wiggle their fingers as they pull away, imitating an odd whooshing sound like the after-effects of an explosion, which sounds more like a whistle from Eri. “Aw, you’ve got a train whistle tooth! That’s so cool!”

“Yup! ‘Cause I lost my incisor!” Eri explains, whistling again.

27 immediately decides that he doesn’t want to be here, he would rather be in the Safe Room with Eri to see if she does that again. How many words can make her whistle without meaning to, if it will be easier to teach her how to whistle like that. He tried to teach her once, to use whistling as a code that Chisaki might not figure out, but she got too upset when she couldn’t.

But his owner won’t give him that option, won’t make it easy for him to leave by ordering him to. He just leaves, and Eri looks back to trail after him with another wave. “Have fun with your friends, Twenny!”

Sticky Joints closes the door and presses his head against it, before he turns around with his hands folded in front of his face. “Oh my god, that is the cutest thing I’ve ever seen in my entire life. I need to do something manly, I need to punch a bear or something.”

“Go find one and fuck off,” Bakugo scowls, before he looks at 27. He jerks his chin up, probably wanting to avoid asking the usual questions to evaluate how well the hack went. He seemed to want to keep it a secret from the others, probably because he was involved in it. Hiding his weaknesses was a smart move.

27 shrugs, tilting his free hand left and right. ‘So-so.’ It wasn’t the most effective hack they’ve found, especially when he found it difficult to eat the pepper while he was in the fog, even though he tried to remember that he had to. The pain wasn’t very enjoyable either.

“Uh, maybe we should take a break, though?” Red Shark says, practically pleading with Bakugo in his nervous smile. “The squad’s all here and all, with snacks and everything!”

Bakugo’s eyes narrow at the snacks before he grabs the milk from Sparky, then holds it out for 27. “Drink this, it’ll help with your weak fucking tastebuds. Fucking sweating over a jalapeno, that’s some fucking training we need to do.”

27 takes it, and forces himself to lift the glass to his lips. Training. Be less odd. Just drink it, it’s not poisoned, he hasn’t been poisoned yet and he won’t be until he’s given them the information they want. He’s safe as long as he doesn’t give them The Miasma’s name.

The milk soothes away the lingering burn, and he forces himself to swallow it. Bakugo nods, and 27 notices that Red Shark has a hand held over Sparky’s mouth, and Tape Dispenser looks a bit unsettled by something.

“So,” Red Shark says, releasing his hold on Sparky. “Pizza? ‘Cause that sou-”

“Fucking,” Bakugo swears, pressing a hand to his forehead before he glares at 27. “Bitch, do you know what pizza is? Because this fucker has been going apeshit all fucking week and it’s driving me fucking crazy.”

27 takes out the phone. Even if Bakugo did know enough sign, Ashido’s hold on his hand seems to be unbreakable. “Ha-ad once. Didn’t like. Sta-ale and hard.”

Bakugo and Red Shark exchange a look, before Red Shark raises his fists above his head. “YES! Dude, we’re doing this.”

“Say ‘dab,’” Sparky says, his eyes wide and locked on 27. “Please-”

“Fuck no,” Bakugo mutters under his breath, shaking his head. “Fuck no, don’t you fucking-”

“Da-ab.” 27 doesn’t know who’s reaction is more amusing, Bakugo’s apparent despair or Sparky’s wide eyed shock.

“Fuck,” Sparky whispers, crouching down as the plate of cookies fall out of his hand. His hands fold in front of his face, and he breathes in shakily. “Fuck, that’s too powerful. You can’t just do that anytime you want, that’s so much more power than anyone should have. Oh my god.”

27 holds the phone’s screen out for him, he’s pretty sure anyone can have this app on their phone, but Sparky holds his hand out and turns his head away from the sight, as if the screen was blinding him.

“No, no way! It’s too much power, I know I’m not worthy!”

“Thank fuck for that,” Bakugo mutters, swatting at Ashido’s hands still locked over his. “How long are you going to do that shit?”

“Forever!” Ashido argues, sticking her tongue out at Bakugo. “Shinny and I are best friends for life, Bakugo. Don’t be jealous.”

“Traini-ing. Fine.” 27 wants to train himself out of all of his weaknesses, and that includes this one. He doesn’t want to flinch, he doesn’t want to pull away or feel the panic that rises when someone unfamiliar touches him. He wants to be more normal, or at least be able to look like it.

He doesn’t feel that rising urge to pull his hand away anymore. It’s working.

Even if he’s starting to feel more tired.

Yamada takes a few minutes for himself as he holds his phone in his hands. He hopes the news didn’t travel that quick, but he knows that Shouta never calls before he texts when Yamada is on patrol. If his hero manager wouldn’t skin him alive, he’d just go back to UA instead of calling, but he reasons with himself. Shouta can handle it, no matter what Shinsou is going through. He’ll definitely be handling the situation more calmly than he would. “Hey babe! What’s up?”

“Yama, I lost my incisor!”

Yamada didn’t expect to hear Eri’s voice, and definitely didn’t expect to hear that adorable little whistle. And it takes him a bit to get his brain to process that before he realizes what that means. “You lost your first tooth?!”

“On a candy apple,” Shouta says, and he can practically hear that grin. That’s another bet that Yamada isn’t sad to lose, even if he’s absolutely miserable knowing that he missed it. “The tooth fairy will have to stop by the Class 1-A dorm tonight.”

“You don’t carry enough cash, I’m gonna hit up the ATM- what’s our balance again?” Yamada asks, trying to remember if his check from the station cleared before he sets out to cash it.

“Don’t worry, Eri is going to be one of the richest five year olds in Mustafu,” Shouta says, laughing under his breath at him before he says something angled away from the phone. “2000 yen is plenty.”

“It’s not, Shou! This is Eri’s first tooth, and you better not lose it!” Yamada will lose something else if his husband does. “We don’t even have a box for it! Can you- wait no. I’m going to order the tooth box, we’re not going through another first outfit again.”

Shouta scoffs, but he has to know that much pastel and tulle was an abomination. “ I owe you 2000 yen. Shinsou is hanging out with his friend now. ”

Yamada might have wanted to be a hero from the bottom of his very heart before this moment, but right now, he hated it. Two firsts from his wards happened while he was on patrol, and he’ll never be able to get that back.

But at least he can be right for once.

“I told you! I told you! They’re getting along though, right? Bakugo’s a little rough around the edges, and Shinsou can get a little mean sometimes. They are friends, right? Shinsou’s not being forced or anything, right?”

“ I’ve made it as clear as I can that Shinsou can leave, but he seemed to be enjoying himself, ” Shouta says. “ But that was before Ashido and the others dropped by. I should probably check again, but Nezu has a robot on surveillance. ”

Yamada can’t help but drop his head and sigh. “Shou, don’t make it weird. This is probably hard enough for Shinsou without you dropping by to remind everyone that he’s a little different from his friends. But seriously, keep me posted on the Rat Robocop feed.”

“ I’m just making sure he’s not... ” Shouta trails off before he sighs. “ He didn’t seem to be in a friendly mood before this. It would be understandable if he didn’t want to deal with anything unnecessary for a few days. ”

Yamada frowns at the reminder. “Did you hear about it?”

“ Naomasa emailed me, ” Shouta answers, huffing under his breath. “ Despite the Nomu Organization saving us some trouble, it wouldn’t be good for the investigation if Shinsou finds out about it. He’s already concerned. ”

Yamada tips his head back, grinding his teeth. It would probably help their wards a great deal to know that Chisaki was stabbed to death in a stairwell that he shouldn’t have been in, but for Shinsou, it might just be another reason to sleep with one eye open. “Still, I definitely feel like a little celebration is in order. Think they’ll be up for some take-out?”

“ Not for a few days, if I’m seeing this right, ” Shouta mutters under his breath.

27 has been wondering what he’s supposed to do in this situation for what feels like hours now. So far, the only answer is to answer Sparky’s questions and let Ashido do whatever she wants with him.

Sparky’s questions are not the ones that he expected to answer. “Do you think hot dogs are like a species of sandwich? Like, they have bread and meat, but they’re not sandwich sandwiches, you know? You- wait, you know what hot dogs are, right?”

27 nods, the phone has been too heavy to use for a while now. He ignores the impulse to sit up when it flares again, when he feels the warmth from Ashido’s lap on the back of his head again. He has no idea why she wants to do this, but it’s good training.

He feels her fingers running through his hair again, and closes his eyes for a moment to pretend that they’re Eri’s. It makes it harder to open them again, but he forces himself to. He’s been too tired all day, but this feels different. It feels odd.

Bakugo snorts again, shaking his head before he reaches for that tall soda. Bakugo seems tired too, maybe he's just as drained as 27 is. Maybe these other heroes are causing that somehow.

"Have you been to America? Wait, no, Eri said you wanted to go to America, my bad," Sparky continues to ramble, mostly to himself. "Hey, is Mic-sensei going to do another essay on the—"

"Ha-and thing," 27 types, feeling more alert as he remembers. "In cla-ass. What." He feels more alert, but his thumb still feels too heavy.

Zappy blinks at him before he runs a hand over his hair. "Oh yeah, the alphabet thing." Despite all the questions he's been asking 27, he seems like he doesn't want to answer this one. "So, I've got the ADHD thing, and it helps to do something with my hands sometimes, and I can't remember the letters? Like, I know sentences and stuff, but the letters are like. Small. You know?"

27 raises an eyebrow. "Say i-it. Alphabet." He lets the phone drop on his chest afterwards, he won't need it.

"Uh, A," Sparky says, confused until 27 signs for him. Just a fist with his thumb on the side, not the most recognizable sign but Zappy surprises him with wide eyes when he gets it. "Dude, how did I not—" Sparky cuts himself off to lean back, like he wants to throw himself on the bed before he leans even closer, both hands making the 'A.' "A! Dude, you are super trilingual, that is so cool. How do you say my name with that? Like, with your hands and—"

'B,' 27 signs, and waits for Sparky to copy him. Almost every sign is interrupted by some odd remark or praise that Zappy can't help but say, and it's made worse when Ashido starts copying him too. She's awful at putting her fingers in the right places, even when he shows her where she's messing up.

He doesn't know why they're doing this.

They wanted him to be here, for some reason. They had to want something from him, but they haven't told him what it is. Sparky has just been asking him questions, making the oddest observations out of thin air while Ashido pets him or holds his hands. Bakugo looks over occasionally to grouse at something, usually one of Sparky's more invasive questions. Tapey and Red Hair have been on their phones or watching that cooking show with a very angry man who swears a lot, pestering Bakugo into watching it when he seems to get too distracted in berating Zappy or Ashido.

"A, B, C, D," Sparky starts signing, grinning at his own hand. He's happy with that at least. Maybe now that he has something from 27, even if he didn't ask for it, 27 can leave.

"Whoa, wha- did Todoroki just—" Tapey looks around with wide eyes, hands still curled around his phone.

"Rich fucking bastard," Bakugo growls, before he stiffens in his chair, glaring at his phone. "Fucking Deku, I'll fucking...."

27 forces himself to pick up the phone, now that everyone else is staring at it. Ashido starts bouncing, a strained scream held behind her teeth. "I'm getting all the Gucci swag before Endeavor kills me," Sparky says in a rush.

Sparky dropped his phone then his head into his hands as he breathed shakily. “Oh man. Oh man. Todoroki is my sugar daddy, and I can’t say anything about it because he just got me Gucci swag.”

“Hi, yes, I’d like to order one of every pizza to be delivered to UA’s campus,” Tapey said into his phone, using an unnaturally low-pitched voice. “No, this isn’t a prank, and you’ll know it when you hear my credit card information. The name is Todoroki Enji- Yes, that’s correct. And you can have this done in- Well, Tokyo said one hour- Oh, perfect. Yes, the number is...”

When 27 opened his eyes, the panic pulled him into sitting. Deidoro’s quirk was making his head swim, but it was wrong. It was too thick, the air around him was too heavy, his head felt too full. This was wrong.

He needed to leave.

“Shinny, wait!” The floor shifts under him, that part’s right, but he’s used to it. He knows how to keep his legs bent, how to fall from a shorter height if he does, and how to shuffle to keep from falling. “Shinny, just-”

He feels a hand on his shoulder and jerks away, stumbles around and notices that Bakugo is slumped too heavily in his chair, that his eyes are closed and loud snorting snores are coming from his open mouth. The others are staring at him, eyes too wide, hands too open and reaching for him.

He forces himself to the door, to open and close it behind him, even if it catches on someone. “Shinny, you weren’t supposed to drink it but if you just sleep it off, and it’ll be okay! Alright? Just-”

Another hand on his shoulder and he jerks away, almost falls even if he knows better. “Don...”

They pried the mask open, and he doesn’t want them to. He doesn’t know how they did it, but it’s not there. He wants it to be there.

Even if he’s odd. Even if he’s ignored. Even if the boredom was unbearable in that dark room, when he counted how many times he counted and still couldn’t get the itching in his head to stop, he wants to go back there. The itching is everywhere, it’s crawling under his skin and he just wants to leave .

“Okay, um,” Ashido mutters to herself, he doesn’t like it. He wants her to go, he doesn’t want to feel that nervousness in her tone, it makes the itching worse. “You want to go back to Aizawa-sensei?”

That white electric feeling is too intense, he feels too seen. He doesn’t know what Ashido wants, if she wants him to say yes or no. He just wants to close his eyes and let someone else deal with this. But he swallows and tilts his head down, it’s not a nod so she doesn’t have to take it as one if she doesn’t want him to nod.

“Yeah, I get it,” Ashido says, and she’s disappointed. “I’m sorry, it was really stupid-I just,” Ashido sighs, and he hears her hands slapping against her sides in frustration. “I know you don’t like it, but is it okay if I walk with you there? We don’t have to talk and you can ignore me, but if you fall and get hurt I'm really going to cry. We just wanted Bakugo to go to sleep, because he's too stupid to do that when he drinks so many energy drinks, and we wanted to have fun with you but now you think we're assholes, and we are, and-"

27 holds his hand out, even if he doesn't want to. He just knows that she wants him to, that she feels bad about something. He doesn't know why, but he doesn't want her to.

Her hand is warm, and he doesn't flinch. "I know it's weird," Ashido says, her hand squeezing for a moment. "I just want to be your friend again."

He still doesn't know what that means. He tries to figure it out as they walk, as he ignores her free arm reaching around him at times while they climb the stairs. He doesn't know what she wants from this, what she wants from him.

Everyone wants something. It's easier when they do. Even easier when he knows what they want.

"What," 27 makes a mask with his clenched teeth, glaring at the stairs he climbs. His head is too full for him to catch himself, and he hates it.

"I'm not scared of your quirk, you know," Ashido says quietly, swinging their hands forward. "It kind of...felt nice? Like, it was really fuzzy all around me. I can't remember a lot, since it was so long ago, but... That's a lot nicer than mine, right?"

27 shakes his head, doesn't have the strength to explain it to her. "You're fine."

She doesn't know it's a question. "Good! 'Cause I like holding hands with you!"

He doesn't know how she pried the mask off, but he can almost feel it close when he opens the door and sees his owner, and sees his eyes narrowing. 27 should pull himself up straighter, should hide the fact that he can't feel himself as much in an odd way, but it's too much effort to keep his eyes open or himself upright.

"Bakugo drugged him," Ashido says before she drops his hand and runs, but she doesn't get far. 27 recognizes that the white scarf has soared past his arm long after it does so, and turns to look to see Ashido bound at the other end, straining futilely to run.

His owner glares, his red eyes and flowing hair more intimidating. "With. What. "

"Benadryl, just a little! Shinsou wasn't supposed to drink it and he only had a little, I swear! Bakugo hasn't slept for a few days, so we made some cookies and milk and put the Benadryl in the milk and watched Kitchen Nightmares, and it was all Sero's idea, so he's the one you need to expel, and-"

"Drugging someone, even with over the counter medication, is a criminal offense," his owner says, closing his eyes before his hair falls, and the scarf pulls back around his neck. "Leave."

Ashido doesn't need to be told twice, sprinting down the hallway. 27 wonders how he's supposed to get to the cot when just standing takes so much effort.

His owner sighs. "You should sleep it off. I'll deal with them later."

27 manages to drag himself to the cot, unable to hide the huff of breath when he falls on it. But as soon as he does, the heaviness grows irritating. He feels sleepless, even if he doesn't want to move. 'Can't,' Shinsou signs, before 27 remembers he's not Shinsou.

His owner's mouth twitches into a half-smile before he tucks his chin into his scarf, sitting down. "That can happen. Other than being drugged, did you have a good time?"

27 half-rolls his eyes when he catches the double meaning. ' Training useful. T-H-E-R-A-P-Y bad. Spark Rat talks a lot. '

He sees his owner nodding, just the top of his head visible. 27 can't keep his eyes open much more than that, whatever is in his head that makes it feel so full is swelling. "Kaminari does.... What do you mean by 'therapy'?"

' Blasty. Bad at it. Not investigation. I don't know what they want. Weird. ' 27's eyes have fallen closed, and he can't open them. His signs are getting sloppier. ' I'm weird. Are they weird? '

It's quiet for a moment before his owner huffs a laugh. "That's not even a question. They're very weird."

' Good. ' 27 signs, before his hands fall to his sides.

Friends.

As a man who has a deep and abiding devotion to the art of sleep, he has to say he's impressed.

Shinsou has barely moved since the Benadryl took its hold over him again, and didn't so much as twitch when Eri returned. And with the excitement of all the heroes gathered around such a disgusting feast as the one he saw being delivered, it was no surprise that Eri almost forgot about the Tooth Fairy's visit.

It took a little convincing to make sure she would put it under a pillow rather than underneath Shinsou, but her excitement was apparent with every time her head popped up from her attempts to sleep, to stretch a hand under the pillow to make sure the tooth was there.

But finally, both wards were deeply asleep, and completely undisturbed by the Tooth Fairy's visit.

But that's not to say the Tooth Fairy isn't a little disturbed when he reaches under the pillow to feel something he did not expect.

Aizawa pulls out a handful of teeth, and has to stop himself from opening Eri's mouth by rationalizing that he would have noticed if she lost all of them. He still finds himself staring at his hand for too long, before once again, he finds himself impressed. He gathers up all of the teeth before he walks over to his desk and takes a picture of the disturbing collection on his phone.

Shou: I need to report a counterfeit operation

Shou: Image attached

Zashi: BABE WTF

Shou: She still has teeth. These are fake.

Zashi: Omgggggg baaaaaabe

Zashi: Our little mafia princess is trying to scam the tooth fairy!!! I don't know if I should b proud but I am??

Shou: You can't withdraw more money.

Zashi: Y NOT??? They're very good fakes! This tooth fairy is very fooled!

Shou: You're welcome to do it when it's your turn to be the tooth fairy.

Aizawa busies himself with trying to pick out the real tooth from the fakes, and after he plucks it out he nearly drops it at the sound of his phone vibrating loudly against the desk. He makes sure neither ward wakes to it before he checks his phone.

Zashi: U sound v sure that we'll be there for the next tooth. Wat about it only being a month??? ;)

Aizawa turns his phone off, even if it's irrational. Even if he knows that the silence is only more telling.

He doesn't want to consider the logical differences between 'tooth fairy' and 'Dad' when he knows there are few of them.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Body dysmorphia

Previously on Wards of UA: Bakugo and, by accident, Shinsou were dosed with Benadryl-laced milk by Bakusquad which resulted in both falling asleep before the 'one of everything' pizza order was delivered. Bakugo has been mocking Aizawa for being one of the lowest paid heroes in the industry for a while. Eri was trying to lose more teeth so that she could get enough money from the Tooth Fairy to put a hit on Chisaki. Aizawa and Yamada know that Chisaki is dead, but won't tell Eri or Shinsou because The Miasma was probably behind it. Sato offered to bake Shinsou a 'study snack' like he did for Class A on the chat. Shinsou and Aizawa sparred after the meeting with Chisaki, to give Shinsou a sense of victory over Chisaki. Ashido held hands with Shinsou, and afterwards Shinsou described it as 'Training.' Bakugo tried to give Shinsou a therapy session. Eri has had meltdowns after seeing the scars on her arms and legs, thus why she wears long sleeves and leggings. Shinsou is triggered by having his hair pulled after being tortured by bleach-laced baths at the 8 Precepts. Chisaki forced Shinsou to dissociate by ordering him to bark repeatedly. During Shinsou's therapy session with Bakugo, Bakugo asked Shinsou about his childhood. Bakugo hates the ':--)' emoji, or any emoji that has a hyphenated nose. Shinsou's right hand has been uncoordinated and shaky since it was unmade by Chisaki. Ashido snitched on the rest of Bakusquad when Aizawa noticed that Shinsou had been drugged.

There's a knock on the door to the Safe Room. Aizawa knows that's never a good sign.

When he opens the door, it's only confirmed to him in the worst way. "Oi, fucking delivery for the other guy who got roofied."

Bakugo at least looks more well-rested, though Kirishima's wide-eyed terror is easy to see. Aizawa narrows his eyes at him, just to see the fear deepen, before he sighs. "This is not an emergency."

You have no reason to-”

“Ugo! Ugo!” Eri calls, bounding to the door with her hair only half brushed and a hair tie loosely held on that half. “I got money from the tooth fairy!”

She proudly holds up the 2000 yen note for Bakugo’s inspection, which he meets with a smirk aimed at Aizawa. “Tooth Fairy must be pretty fuckin’ broke now. It’s too bad this shit is for Shitsou.”

“It’s okay, Twenny can share!” Eri decides for Shinsou, who stumbles out of the bathroom with his purple hair tangled and messy. His eyes still seem unfocused until they narrow on Bakugo and Kirishima.

“Man, that’s a lot of money though,” Kirishima says, crouching down to Eri’s eye level, which conveniently allows him to move away from Aizawa’s line of sight, obscured by Bakugo.

“Whatcha gonna spend it on?”

“I don’t know, it’s not enough to put a hit on someone,” Eri answers, staring at the note as she tilts onto one foot. Aizawa feels unbalanced in a different way. “But maybe I can buy a lot of- Zawa, can I see Tokoyami? I won’t bother him if he’s studying, but I think he’s not.”

“That’s fine,” Aizawa answers, without considering the question at all. While Eri bounds away, he looks to Shinsou to see if this was a conversation that he missed out on, and Shinsou’s averted gaze and hand running through his hair is enough confirmation that it was.

But Shinsou catches his raised eyebrow, and lowers his hand. ‘ C-H-I-S-A-K-I. Heard H-I-T. Didn’t know meaning. Didn’t explain. ’

Aizawa nods, knowing that is going to be a difficult conversation to have, especially knowing that it could be far easier if he could trust that Eri wouldn’t tell Shinsou. “I don’t think I need to make myself clearer,” he says, turning to Kirishima’s shell-shocked expression and Bakugo’s darkened scowl.

“If someone could answer their fucking phone, this shit wouldn’t be necessary,” Bakugo says with a low voice, before he shoves three pizza boxes into Shinsou’s chest to take. “There’s one of everything, all labeled and shit. Happy fucking birthday.”

“Yeah dude, and Sato has like another box of stuff since you didn’t tell him what you wanted,” Kirishima adds, though he keeps himself far from the doorway and begins to wither under Aizawa’s focused stare. “And uh, sorry about the milk thing.”

Shinsou gives a pointed stare to the pizza boxes in his arms before looking at Kirishima, and though Aizawa knows that his hands could easily become unoccupied, he takes it as an excuse to force their exit. “If that is all, leave. Now.”

Bakugo hisses as he turns, but Kirishima takes the invitation enthusiastically. “Yeah, nice seeing you bro!”

“If you let that shit go stale, I’m beating the shit out of you,” Bakugo adds as his own farewell. Though Aizawa doesn’t miss how toothless that threat sounds.

Shinsou places the pizza on the cot without further interest, before glancing at Aizawa, his gaze quickly lowering. ‘ I am sorry. ’

“It’s fine,” Aizawa replies, lowering himself back into the chair with a quick glance to see that Eri had made it to Tokoyami's door. "My students took it upon themselves to invite themselves here. I imagine it will happen again, though I would prefer that they didn't."

Aizawa would prefer if his students made the discomfort that came with being an uninvited presence in what was basically their home a bit easier to ignore. But if Eri's frequent visitors during the first two weeks was any indication, this would happen again.

And if his students were under the assumption that visiting Shinsou was a loophole around the rules that had finally been taken seriously, they were very wrong.

' Tried to keep her from it. C-H-I-S-A-K-I or H-A-R-I. ' Aizawa looks up, taking in Shinsou's face twisted in clear worry, his eyes glaring at the floor with his lips pulled into a grimace. ' During Chair. '

Aizawa finds himself glancing away before he steadies himself. "It's not your fault. Those were circumstances out of your control. And I wouldn't want to imagine what it would have been like for Eri if you weren't there for her."

He doesn't want to, but he has. He's taken the photographs of the room that they occupied and imagined it even more barren. A bed that an unattended toddler would make into a nest. A child with too wide eyes, staring at the blankness of her surroundings for hours before the necessity of food brought company. Before another visit brought unimaginable pain.

He always stops his wondering when he remembers the bottle of bleach, how easily an unsupervised toddler could reach it. Or whether the toddler would already know its purpose.

Or if a child whose longest interactions with others was during torture would cleave onto those torturers out of necessity. A human's innate need to be with others, to be cared for, twisting a nightmare into a dream.

"Don't leave, 50."

He wonders how long Shinsou had known 50. He was nine years old when she died, but there were five years between that and Shinsou's disappearance, presumably spent at the Nomu Organization. Formative years that are left in darkness, where he imagines that whatever care that four year old was given, was lacking.

He's never considered it before, but Shinsou might be a form of what Eri would have grown into if she hadn't been rescued. Avoidant of touch that he doesn't understand, and the one that he does can be painful.

The reason he was able to touch Shinsou in a fight was because it was the only interaction he could understand. He didn't flinch because he expected it.

But Shinsou is trying to change himself. He could have easily broken away from Ashido's hand on his, but he didn't, despite the apparent discomfort. He knows enough about himself to know that he's different. ' Training. '

Shinsou is sitting on the cot, glancing at the pizza boxes. His worries seem oddly soothed, and Aizawa ignores that he might have apologized for failing him in some way. That Eri overhearing a conversation about contracted murder was Shinsou's fault, and that Aizawa hadn't expected for Eri to have very different assumptions and knowledge about the world than any other five year old.

"You mentioned 'therapy' before you went to sleep last night," Aizawa says, more than a little curious what that could entail. Especially when it was followed up with a mention of the investigation.

Shinsou explains, but Aizawa can't say that he's happy about that.

Shoji recognizes the footsteps before the knock on the door comes, and tucks himself a bit closer to the corner of the wall before the door opens, staring at the math textbook as though he's completely engrossed in it when he's completely distracted now.

"Toko, I'm sorry I ate a lot of apples. But you can have this to buy more of them!"

Tokoyami pulls himself a little straighter, likely finding that little tooth whistle from the 'sorry' and 'this' to be unexpectedly adorable. "You're more than welcome to my apples, Eri. I appreciate your thoughtfulness, but I believe that money was left for you to use. I wouldn't wish to incite the wrath of the tooth fairy by accepting it."

Though Shoji had purposefully kept himself out of Eri's line of sight with his position, he couldn't help but turn his face to the wall. Eri was trying to give away the money she received from the Tooth Fairy. "I don't know what to buy though...Toko, can I tell you a secret?"

Tokoyami nods, glancing at Shoji before he kneels down and cups a hand to his ear canal hidden beneath his feathers.

Shoji still hears the entire conversation, even if he doesn't want to. Not for the first time, he wishes that his hearing wasn't quite so sensitive, even when he wasn't using his quirk.

And he wishes that Tokoyami didn't shoot him a look like that. "I won't tell a soul. Shoji does have a fondness for aquatic creatures with multiple limbs, such as squids and octopi. Perhaps that could be an image you can use." Tokoyami chuckles under his breath before he cups a hand around his beak. "Could you tell me what my headband will look like?"

Eri's hair slaps against her shoulders when she shakes her head. "It's a surprise! And don't tell him!"

"I swear to keep your confidence, Eri," Tokoyami promises, punctuated with a nod. "And I'm looking forward to receiving your blessing before we all endeavor towards a trying week."

"Okay! Thanks, Toko!"

Tokoyami closes the door, and sighs. "Do I have to ask if you overheard, my sharp-eared friend?" He doesn't, and Shoji doesn't have to answer. "She's noticed your avoidance, and taken it exactly the way I told you she would. Perhaps this would be an opportunity to overcome your ill-suited complex."

Tokoyami says nothing else, returning to his textbook. He won't insist further, but Shoji knows that he wants to. He wants to convince Shoji, when he simply doesn't understand.

It wasn't a surprise when the interviewer for the management department told him that as a hero, he would do well with boys in the 9-13 age range. That his quirk had a 'gross-out' appeal that would make him very marketable in that demographic, especially if he took off his mask.

But Shoji has learned not to take off his mask. It's a bit deeper than the 'gross-out' appeal.

He doesn't have lips. His teeth and gums are visible at all times because of that, and his mouth stretches too wide across his face. He doesn't even like looking at it, feels disconnected from the sight when he catches a glance in the mirror while brushing his teeth. Every other part of him is his, but not that one.

When he was a child, sometimes he would form an ear on his arms and try to twist it off. He wasn't really trying to succeed, he was testing how sensitive it was to pain, how deep the cartilage ran into his arms.

But sometimes, when he looks in the mirror, he wants to twist off his mouth.

Tokoyami doesn't understand that. Sometimes he complains that the tip of his beak gets too cold in the winter, or that the specialized soap that he buys for his feathers is out of stock, but Tokoyami has never seen his less-human features as something to hate.

Shoji hates his mouth. His arms are strong, his quirk doesn't gross him out. But his mouth is the worst part about him. It's barely a part of him in his mind when he's calm, when he can ignore it.

He's scared little girls that look a lot like Eri, before his parents started buying masks for him to wear at school. He remembers the horror, the disgust. His elementary school class made a game of daring each other to poke his teeth, since they were so open and vulnerable. His female classmates always squealed the loudest before they turned and ran.

He asked Kirishima once, and he brushed it off, saying that his teeth were manly. It was annoying to accidentally bite through his chopsticks when he was younger, but he got used to it.

Shoji tried to get used to his mouth once. He stared in the mirror intentionally, before he gave up and looked away. It still didn't feel like it was a part of him.

Shoji prefers wearing the mask. He's learned how to eat with it still on, to buy one that's loose enough to work his food under. There are nights that he doesn't take it off when he goes to sleep, because he forgets that he wears it. His mask is a part of him, more than his mouth is.

But Eri has reasons to hate masks.

Shoji wondered why she didn't smile, but a quick Google search gave him a better answer than Midoriya's nervous "She doesn't remember how, since...you know. It wasn't a good place."

They wore masks at that place. The raid brought media interest to how the 8 Precepts of Death operated before the fall, and swaths of gangsters who weren't as attuned to Overhaul's operation, who didn't know Eri existed much like the media, gave interviews. 'Everyone had to wear masks to stop polluting the air he breathed. It was kind of our thing, everyone got one when we joined.'

Masks that hid smiles. Masks that were a symbol.

He doesn't want his mask to look like that. He doesn't want to be a piece of Eri's dark history that still lingers behind her. Even if he does.

He finds himself watching her, even when Tokoyami or Yaoyorozu don't invite him to movie nights or dorm activities, knowing that sometimes they have to. Eri is so different from his little sister on the surface, but her mumbled words and excited cheers are enough for him. Enough to remind him of home.

He keeps himself away from her, even when he steals those moments. He doesn't want to be the shadow of the Class 1-A dorm, but he is.

Eri thinks he doesn't like her, but she couldn't be more wrong.

Yamada feels blessed.

He probably shouldn't considering he hasn't slept in well over 24 hours, and had a rather exciting patrol that luckily had him walking away with only a few bruises. His radio show last night was a nightmare, and he should have thought better than to open up the phone lines for an advice panel when he didn't have nearly enough answers as to whether the mystery listener from last week liked Open Mic Night. He couldn't even blame Byte for that, knowing that she honestly should have gone home to nurse her concussion.

But Yamada was blessed, because he had two of the most amazing kids in the world to come home to.

Eri will definitely kill him with that cute little whistle. Even when he tries to expect it, it still catches him off guard enough to cover his face with his hands, knowing that he's blushing a storm under them. That much is too cute, but when Shouta reveals that the big box from Ms. Joke wasn't just for his birthday gift, he feels his heart stop.

Shouta walked out of the office with an angel costume in his hands, made exactly Eri's size. And she knew it for her immediately, and wanted to try it on.

Yamada gets the long sleeves and leggings out beforehand, knowing that even if there would be a time for that to be challenged, it wouldn't be anytime soon. But even that dark thought isn't enough to put a damper on the sight that he immediately immortalizes in a little modeling session.

Eri is the cutest little angel in the entire world, and he can remember that everytime he unlocks his phone now.

Then, when Eri asks for a braid to better suit her new outfit, Shinsou asks a question that he's absolutely fallen in love with seeing.

'Can you teach me?'

Yamada had been finishing up lunch when his husband and the wards got back on their little reprieve from the dorm shift, unaware that Shinsou had a project to find out what kind of pizza he liked. Shinsou hovered for a while, and Yamada wasn't sure whether he wanted to talk about the new friend situation or whether he wanted to have pizza more than crepes, but then he asked it.

'Can you teach me?'

Yamada would teach him anything, anything at all that Shinsou wanted to learn. Even if flipping crepes had a steep learning curve, Shinsou caught on to it quick, with only one mishap landing a half-made crepe on top of his purple hair.

He caught on to cooking a bit quicker than braiding, but to be fair, their cosmetology client wasn't in the best mood to be patient.

When Eri whined one too many times, and he saw the frustration in Shinsou's face, Yamada took over to finish up the plait with instructions for Shouta to take all the pictures his phone could store. And took a bit of a risk to offer his own hair for Shinsou's braiding lessons.

But even if Shinsou looked a bit uneasy at first, and it was even easier to feel it with the shaking of his hands, Shinsou did it. And Yamada wanted to think it wasn't just a better braid that made those fingers a bit less shaky and more confident.

But as surprising as that was, he really didn't expect to see those signs from Shinsou. 'Can you?'

Yamada didn't expect that when Shinsou held up one of the hair masks. Yamada was in the middle of explaining how long to wait for it to set in, how the properties of the mask would affect his hair, when he saw that sign.

He already knew he couldn't say no to Shinsou when he asked for something. He knew that he was the only one Shinsou asked questions to, and he knew that there was a reason for that. He knew he had to be the one to help Shinsou overcome it, and if little lessons and the occasional coffee was the price he had to pay, it was effortless to do it.

But he knew that Shinsou had reasons not to let his hair be touched. And if Yamada made him remember that, if his hands reminded Shinsou of what he had gone through, he wouldn't be able to stand it.

"Are you sure?" Yamada asks, still struggling to find the words to ask what he really means. He wants to, he desperately wants to, but knowing that even Eri had made Shinsou uncomfortable when she tried to give him a ponytail should be enough for him to say 'No.' Especially so soon after seeing Chisaki.

Shinsou nodded. 'Training.' Then lost a little bit of that confidence, that determined stare falling to the ground. 'If okay.'

Nothing in this world could make Yamada refuse him. "Yeah, no, it's okay! Just wanted to check before we have a little spa moment! Let's just..."

Yamada tests it with a towel grabbed from the nearest bathroom, draping it around Shinsou's shoulders before he puts a hand on top of it. And he breathes a sigh of relief when he doesn't even see a flinch.

"There we go! Now, just pick a seat and we can get to work!" Yamada bites his lip as he watches Shinsou sit down on the floor, just like Eri does when she wants to have her hair done. It's the best way to do it, but if he's going to touch Shinsou's hair, he doesn't want to be behind him. "How about we turn around, so we can still talk, yeah? It's not a spa day if we can't gossip."

And so he can see the exact moment when Shinsou dissociates, because Yamada knows he will. He knows that Shinsou sees this as 'Training,' so he knows that he wants to make sure he doesn't 'Lose' again. So that no one can ever do what Chisaki did to him in that interrogation room again.

Yamada takes his seat on the couch, and tries to cling onto a little bit of hope that this can actually be relaxing for one of them. Even if it isn't him. "So, stop me if it starts getting a little less relaxing," Yamada says, opening the top of the packet so he doesn't see what Shinsou thinks of that. "So, a little birdie told me your first friend sesh was a little exciting."

'Poison milk. It's fine. Sorry. Didn't hear show.' Yamada catches the first lock of hair, close to Shinsou's forehead, and slowly slides the gel over it between his fingers. Trying not to tug, trying to move as slowly as possible.

"Eh, it wasn't my best anyway. You don't have to tune in if you don't want to, I just, uh," He tries another lock, a little further back. "I'm a music nut, but I get it if it's not your thing."

'I like music. Like show.' Yamada can't help but smile when his chest warms with those words. '

Current Noise different. ’

“Ah, yeah,” Yamada says, betraying a bit more nervousness as he nods. “Yeah, Present Mic is kind of loud and obnoxious. I hype it up a little more for the listeners, since it’s kind of a brand. My hero managers have always loved it, and you can’t have a radio show without a radio personality.”

‘ What do people like? ’ Shinsou signs with a small frown. ‘ Friends. I don’t know. ’ Then he sees a little smirk with a huff. ‘ Can’t be loud. ’

Yamada still finds himself smiling at that joke, even if the reasons behind that topic are a little heavy. “I’m pretty sure your friends like you for you, little listener. But I definitely get it on wondering why.”

He sees Shinsou’s eyes widen before he realizes what he said, nearly smearing the gel on his own face when his hands jerk away in a panic.

“Not that- I mean- Ugh, my mouth, I swear!”

Yamada sighs before he takes a moment to think before he speaks.

“I worried about that too when I was your age. I didn’t really know what people liked about me, and I kind of...” He nearly smears the gel on the back of his neck before he catches himself. “I kind of made ‘Present Mic’ into a thing back then, because I didn’t think people liked me for ‘me.’ It was a little easier to play it up and play a part, instead of, you know. Being myself.”

He knew people liked the radio lingo, so he worked it into almost every conversation. He was a natural blonde, so he had to be a bit of an idiot. He knew people wanted him to be loud, so he got even louder.

And Shouta hated it, because he was the loudest with him. “And that wasn’t a great idea, because a lot of people just assumed that was how I was. They never really got to know me.”

Shirakumo did, just a few times. He was always along for the ride, for whatever the two biggest stooges in Class 2-A thought up that day. But Shirakumo also caught him in some quieter moods, and if that closed-mouth grin was any indication, Shirakumo had a quieter side to him too.

“And I think that there’s a lot to like about the real you, Shinsou,” Yamada says, threading a bigger section of hair between his fingers. “You’re a pretty amazing kid, and they see that. You’re sharp as a tack, and I can only hope that Bakugo learns enough sign to know half of what you tell him.”

He gets another huff that he’s decided is a laugh, while Shinsou rolls his eyes. ‘ Learning. Slowly. Might be better if he doesn’t. It’s fun. ’

Yamada finds himself checking whether Shinsou still seems alright before he moves to the other side of his head. “So, I guess Koda isn’t that fun to be around. Can’t pull anything over on that guy.”

Shinsou tilts his head to the side before he touches him, then shakes his head and moves back before Yamada can ask if he’s alright. ‘ Cold. K-O-D-A fine. ’ He takes a smaller section anyway, as gently as he can. ‘ Quirk similar. ’

Yamada nods, wondering if those two little signs could mean so much more for the teenager sitting in front of him. “Yeah, it’s pretty cool though! If Shou ever let me get a cat again, I’d definitely invite him over for extra credit. Make sure that Mr. Whiskers is happy with us.”

Shinsou's mouth barely twitches into a smile at the mention of a cat, and Yamada pulls his hand away.

"Doing alright?" Yamada asks, and Shinsou quickly signs that he's fine. Yamada knows he seems fine, he's been surprisingly relaxed through this entire process. It honestly feels like he's connecting with Shinsou better than he ever has before, to be let in to a place that he knows is so vulnerable.

And that's why he risks it.

"I, uh, hated my quirk once," Yamada says, so quietly that he barely hears himself, while he smears a bit more of the gel on his fingers before he rubs his thumb over it to warm it up. "And I stopped talking for a few months because of that."

Shinsou stiffens before he looks at him, his eyes too wide, and Yamada knows it's not from the hair treatment only because he's kept his hands to himself.

"It's, um, quirk rejection. Voice types get it a lot, but people with eye quirks like Shou can convince themselves that they're blind. Quirks can be powerful in a lot of ways, but they can also be a lot of trouble," Yamada doesn't know what to do with his hands, and risks picking at another lock on Shinsou's head, breathing a sigh of relief that he doesn't react like he expects, but instead relaxes. "I didn't want to have my quirk so bad that I couldn't even talk, and since my quirk is all vocal cords, which are pretty important for talking... Pretty much every time I'd open my mouth, I'd remember that and just...stop."

He'd freeze up, thinking that he'd slip. That he'd scream and not even hear it, his hearing aids wouldn't tell him the difference. That he wouldn't feel the difference either, wouldn't know until someone covered their ears but by then, it would be too late. He would have deafened them too.

"I tried talking to myself when I was alone, and it kind of helped. My voice sounded so weird to me at first, but I got used to it and... it helped." Yamada couldn't help but smile, remembering his mother and his mom bringing in all that recording equipment to start his podcast. "You've got a voice made for radio, doll! Don'tcha keep that locked away in your room!" "Does it kind of feel that way for you?"

Shinsou stares at his hands for a while, long enough that Yamada starts to pull away, before he signs. 'Like mask. Opens sometimes. I don't know why.'

Yamada busies himself with smearing the rest of his mask on his hands, rubbing them afterwards to fight off the chill. Anything to keep him from remembering that picture, from looking at those scars. "Well, I'm glad it opens. And I hope it does it a lot more, because you," Yamada trails off, cheating a bit when he brushes both hands over Shinsou's hair and barely touches the back. "Have a voice for radio, kid!"

Shinsou rolls his eyes. 'Still do. Just play music.'

Yamada can't help but roll his eyes back. "Trust me, if it was that easy, my job would be a breeze."

Yamada doesn't even notice it until Shinsou gets up to wash the hair mask off, only to return with a pointed glare. 'Purple Mic.'

And true enough, Yamada had been sitting in the same room with Shinsou, trying not to die of cuteness overdose while they both tried to teach Eri how to whistle, for half an hour and hadn't realized it.

That his final touches on that treatment had left a bit of a style in place.

Shinsou sees it before Yamada even manages to pull out his phone, and nearly runs back to the bathroom before he can even snag one picture. “Wait, Shinsou, just one-”

It’s almost like he knew that Yamada needed a new lockscreen.

27 has been watching Eri work on her headbands for a while, unable to find the energy to work on any of the tests that he has in his bag. Including the one that his owner gave him, the one that he’s avoiding the most.

“It can be therapeutic to write out what you experienced. In your own time. You’re free to bring the laptop with you, to class or to the dorm.”

27 stares back at a blank screen when it looks like his owner is going to turn around, and types nonsense that he erases.

‘ In your own time. ’ 27 has never had his own time. He trained on The Miasma’s time, he went on jobs and was pulled back on Boss’ time. He operated on Chisaki’s time, trying to keep track of it with meals that he sometimes didn’t eat, with visits from Hari that were hard to predict. He tried to feel every second while he was under Hari’s quirk, tried to know what an hour felt like by feeling it so that he could remember it.

He doesn’t want to have his own time. If it’s therapy, it’s related to training, and he wants to be done with it quickly. He wants to have control over himself with it.

But every time he tries, when he thinks about where to begin, the words catch in the palms of his hands like they do in his mouth. He doesn’t know where to start, what experiences he needs to type to make him better.

“Tell me about your childhood.” He doesn’t remember enough of it. He doesn’t know if what he remembers is real, if it’s even useful. If he types out a lie and claims it as his own, if that will make him slip even more often.

“Twenny, can you make Ugo’s headband?” Eri asks, kicking her feet above her, her tiny golden halo slipping off again. “I don’t know what he likes.”

27 can’t help a vicious smirk when he sets the laptop aside, lowering himself to the floor with her. He takes a black crayon and finds the perfect space for it. “He definitely likes this face.”

27 makes the line before he realizes that he wasn’t trying to make it straight. It just came out straight.

He holds the crayon up, closer to him so he can look at his hand. He doesn’t feel it shaking, but he feels it, and he doesn’t see it shaking even when he adjusts his grip. “Eri, do you...” 27 clenches his teeth, and picks up a headband that’s left blank. “I can have this.”

Eri nods, and he tests it. The words come too easy, they flow out of him in a way that makes him doubt that it was ever difficult at all. ‘Shinsou Hitoshi.’ The name he has here, with all of its tiny strokes, stares back at him.

Shinsou Hitoshi had a perfectly normal hand. He was never Unmade, that word means nothing to him. He’s never even met Chisaki.

Eri cocks her head at him, and he remembers that she's never noticed. She doesn't understand why he's smiling. It doesn't matter, now that she never has to know.

"I can make his headband for you," 27 offers, and can't help the grin that pulls differently when she nods, though he tries to cover it with his hand.

He has a lot of blank space to fill, and it comes even easier to fill it.

Bakugo nearly explodes the headband when Eri presents it to him, but his owner turns his quirk on him to stop it. That only pulls the grin wider on 27's face, and Bakugo looks like he wants to explode that too.

27 stands behind Eri throughout this little ceremony, ready to catch her if she falls off the back of the sofa she's standing on. The heroes are particularly enthralled by her outfit, and several beg for pictures with nearly the same enthusiasm that Yamada had. 27 doesn't see the difference between this costume and any other outfit that she's worn, but it seems to make the heroes realize how adorable Eri innately is.

He can't say he hates it.

Provost Piston maintains an orderly line in alphabetical order by pacing up and down, scolding anyone who tries to cut closer to the front, but jumps into place readily to accept his headband with a sharp bow. "I will do my best, Eri!"

Sparky ties it on immediately, and pumps his arms a few times. "YES! Midterms can't hurt me now!"

Once Sticky receives his headband, held between his hands while he vocalizes an odd tune, his owner does hurt them. "Kaminari, Kirishima, and Sero. Copy this four times over by hand. Ashido, copy it twice."

All four of them look in horror as his owner drops a thick, heavy book on the coffee table. 27 spares a glance at the title, 'The Penal Code of Japan.'

"It would be beneficial for you to each have a copy, for this exercise and for your own benefit," his owner says, glaring at each of them. "You will be expelled if you fail to complete this before the end of the year."

27 turns back to see the Masked One standing in front of Eri, his gaze averted though it's not to watch the bizarrely kind punishment being doled out. Eri shifts her feet, and 27 steps closer with his arms ready to catch her, but she steadies herself. "Um, Plus Ultra, Mr. Shoji! I hope you like it."

The Masked One opens his hands for her gift, staring at it for too long afterwards. "Thank you, Eri."

The sound of the front door opening and new voices seems to startle Eri, who wobbles forward before 27 can reach out to catch her. He feels himself going numb with the sight of her falling, with her going limp and hitting the floor and being hurt on his watch, but he sees The Masked One catch her, putting his too many arms to good use.

"Are you alright, Eri?" The Masked One asks, sounding a little worried as he rights her to standing, hands lingering around her arms longer than 27 wants them to.

Eri nods, then turns and bounds off the couch to greet the new visitor that they were already warned about.

“Eri! You look so cute!” Izuku gushes, dropping to his knees for a hug that Eri enthusiastically gives him. “Mom, this is Eri, and Shinsou is over there, and you know everyone else-”

27 knew he was allowed to leave, and he wants to as soon as he sees her. It doesn’t make sense, but as soon as he realizes that the heroes have been distracted, cheering the new visitor’s name, he wants to run. He wants to take advantage and slip away.

That’s what a mother looked like.

Mrs. Midoriya

Chapter Summary

27 has never seen a mother before, and he needs to know how it's different. Aizawa tries to prepare for the fallout of Chisaki's death in terms of the investigation, but thankfully the keylogger on Shinsou's laptop finally makes itself useful.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Food issues

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou's right hand has been shaking when he tries to use it, but that stopped recently, because his hand tremor is the result of trauma after it was unmade by Chisaki in front of Eri. Shinsou had a severe panic attack and dissociative spell after Yamada told him that his mother knew French to explain why Shinsou also knew a few words from that language. Aizawa told Shinsou that it can be therapeutic to write about his experiences, but had not-entirely pure intentions about that by prompting him to use the laptop with the keylogger on it. Shinsou said 'Don't leave, 50' while he was asleep, and Yamada overheard it. Chisaki asked Shinsou what his number was, and Shinsou answered that it was 2495. Shinsou knows that Ashido knew him when they were four years old, before Shinsou was sold to The Miasma. Eri made headbands for Class 1-A with their favorite things on them, except for Bakugo's, which Shinsou made and decorated with the ':---)' emoji that Bakugo hates. Shinsou knows that he used his quirk on Ashido when they were children, and has been concerned that his quirk can cause Mental Quirk Abuse. Todoroki shared his father's credit card information on the Class 1-A chat to order pizza, but invited anyone who saw it to #treat #yourself.

27 doesn't remember enough of his mother to imitate her, and in some ways, he needs to. Not the parts that he knows are real, not her cold and distant stare or the memory of her getting out of the car and leaving him. There are things he needs to do, things he needs to give Eri.

He needs to learn how to be a good mother, and Mrs. Midoriya is apparently a good one.

She knows every student, asks direct questions about how they are, what they're doing in their studies and their personal life. Mothers know their children, and at least he knows Eri. He knows her better than anyone else.

Mothers scold and swat children like Bakugo, especially when they're insistent about helping after being told not to. Mothers tell their children to relax while they work, and children know to expect good food in return. A meal made by a mother is different from any other, if the excited grins he sees are any indication. It's powerful.

He doesn't remember what his mother cooked for him, if she cooked for him at all. Logically, she had to. But maybe she did it less after he got his quirk.

He doesn't cook for Eri, but he wants to. And he tries to find a place to stand that allows him to watch Mrs. Midoriya without hovering, because he doesn't want to be scolded like Bakugo. He wants to see if she does something different, if there is a difference in the way she cooks and Yamada cooks.

But every time she looks at him, in just that glance she finds the difference between him and the hero students. She looks at the scars before she turns away.

Icyhot looks at him, but he doesn't know what he sees. Ashi hovers beside him sometimes, just threading her fingers between his before she pulls away, all the while talking to someone else. His owner keeps looking at him, and every look is a reminder that he can leave. It's starting to feel like he wants him to leave.

But he won't. He has to do this for Eri.

"Hey, Shinsou!" Izuku says, Eri trailing at his heels. She's taking advantage of Izuku's presence in this room to latch onto him, knowing that he won't be able to leave for several hours. "My mom is making pork cutlet bowls. Have you had that before?"

27 shakes his head, ignoring that he has the phone. He doesn't want to talk, he doesn't want to be distracted.

The heroes are distracting. "It's really good! It's my favorite, but it's also a really good study meal." There's a pause, as though 27 should say something. He doesn't know what to say, and doesn't want to say it either. Mrs. Midoriya is putting the meat into a sauce pan with hot oil, something that he doesn't see Yamada do. It might be the difference between a mother's cooking and Yamada's. "Do you want to learn how to make it?"

27 spares a glance at Izuku, and has to remind himself that Izuku doesn't have a mind reading quirk. He realizes that he must have been obvious with his staring, even when he tried to glance away. He risks it with a nod, wondering if Izuku would find amusement in his interest. If he would laugh and say that he can't, and that his owner would find that as a reason to make him return to the Safe Room.

"Mom! Shinsou wants to learn how to make pork cutlet- Hey, Koda, is it okay if-" Izuku seems to be torn in too many directions at once, but they come together without his clear intentions. The Fluent One places his rabbit in Floaty's lap, who seems pleased with the action, and Mrs. Midoriya turns with wide eyes before she smiles.

He hates that smile. It's fake. "It's nice to meet you, Shinsou! Izuku told me a little bit about you." She looks at the scars, he hates it. "So! Pork cutlet bowls are a little bit of work, but the first part is easy. Just make some rice, and then the sauce can be pre-made but I always add a little-"

"Are you Izuku's real mom?" Eri asks, staring up at Mrs. Midoriya from behind 27's leg. 27 feels the irrational impulse to use his quirk to stop her before he bites down on it, before he hopes she just doesn't say it. "Or a TV mom?"

27 breathes a little easier, knowing how easy that is to misinterpret. Even if he's never heard her say 'TV mom,' he imagines that he already knows what she means. That he's a TV mom, not a real one. Not one that gives their child to their mob boss father, or sells them for 112,000 yen.

He imagines that Mrs. Midoriya is a real mom, she couldn't be anything else when Izuku resembles her so strongly. But she's a different real mom. She's a real mom.

One that's so real that she doesn't understand the difference, struggling to break into a smile. "Yes, I'm Izuku's real mom. I definitely remember becoming his mom, and I'm sure if he got switched out at the hospital, it's a little too late to switch him back."

He sees Eri's mouth open before he puts a hand on her head, shaking his. She twists her mouth in a pout, but agrees before he has to sign 'Danger' at her. He doesn't want the Fluent One to see it. ' Sauce secret. '

"Shinsou wants to know if there's a secret ingredient in the sauce," the Fluent One translates, which makes Mrs. Midoriya break into a real smile, a proud one. There is. "Or if the sauce recipe is a secret?"

' First. ' 27 corrects. He doesn't care if Mrs. Midoriya doesn't want to give that information away, he needs to get it, and he refuses to give her an easy out.

"Yes, there is," Mrs. Midoriya says, hiding her mouth with the side of her head conspiratorially. "Don't tell Izuku, but I put a little more black pepper than the recipe calls for. He used to hate it on scrambled eggs, but it gives it a better flavor."

Bakugo stretches an arm over the counter to grab at the pepper, before Mrs. Midoriya swats at him, though she doesn't make contact. "Oi, I'm just adding seasoning-"

"Katsuki, sit down and relax! You have a hard week ahead of you," Mrs. Midoriya scolds, and 27 has never scolded Eri the right way. Even if she's never as obstinate as Bakugo, he's never told her to relax. He's never told her what to expect in the future, not when he couldn't know it himself.

Mrs. Midoriya tells him about all the parts that he missed in her cooking process, and many that he just observed. Other than frying, which is a normal cooking technique, there's nothing special. There's nothing secret about it.

She arranges the food like Yamada, taking care that the egg is on top of a nest of breaded pork strips. That there's not too much sauce, not too little. It almost looks the same for every bowl, but when he counts, he realizes there's too many of them. He realizes that one is smaller than the others.

She hands one to him.

He doesn't want it. He saw how much work went into it, he knows that these are for the hero students. They have midterms and he doesn't, he has nothing expected of him beyond the investigation and she doesn't know about that. He doesn't need a mother's cooking, he hasn't since he was 4 years old.

He places the bowl on the counter, refusing to be mute about this. ' Not student. Sorry. '

Mrs. Midoriya isn't allowed to protest. "Oi, eat Auntie's cooking and don't fucking whine about it!" Bakugo demands, pressing the bowl into his chest with the expectation that his hands will take it. "You don't eat for shit anyway, and this shit will stick better than whatever they're not feeding you."

Bakugo draws his owner's attention, and 27 hopes that his owner will tell him not to eat it. That he's not allowed. But he just nods, offers nothing else to interpret from that, and takes the bowl that Mrs. Midoriya has set out for him, watching Eri carry hers to the dining table.

He doesn't want it.

But he does what's expected of him. He sits next to Eri, which puts him beside the Fluent One. There's a short speech about midterms that his owner gives, how they need to give it their all, and Mrs. Midoriya chimes in by saying she believes in them, that they should eat and gather their strength. The heroes cheer and eat eagerly, enthusiastically, and Eri does too.

Eri thinks it's tasty. A mother's cooking is tasty.

He doesn't want to remember if it is. But he has to.

The shaking is back, so he switches his hand and hopes that no one notices. He wishes that he didn't notice either, that it didn't happen. He stares at the food that looks dangerous in a new way, in a worse way. He wishes that it was poisoned, but he knows that Mrs. Midoriya doesn't know to do that. Probably doesn't know how.

He only takes a bit of rice, but the sauce is unavoidable. He knows that's the most powerful part, where most of the mother's influence is because that's what she changed the most from the recipe.

He can't swallow it, and that makes it worse, the flavor sits on his tongue and soaks in. It's warm, too warm, he's stealing this. He's stealing this memory and taking as his own, when it's Izuku's. Izuku remembers this flavor, he ate it as a child, and he didn't.

His mother didn't cook for him. She didn't. He doesn't know this flavor, and he has no right to know it. He only needs to know how to make it, he doesn't need to eat it himself. He doesn't need to cry.

He forces himself to swallow, forces himself to stare at the table and not the food beside it. He tries to convince himself that it's not there, it's not his and there's no expectation for him to eat it. He can't leave, the heroes will notice, they won't allow it, they'll see it if they look.

He stares, long enough that he thinks they might leave soon, they might finish their meal and hopefully be distracted enough not to notice that he doesn't eat his. He doesn't know how to leave, he doesn't know how to escape. He wants to close his eyes and let someone else deal with this, but he can't. He's trapped in an impossible situation and he can't even close his eyes or they'll see it.

There's something small and thin pressing gently on his shoulder, and he turns to see his owner's white scarf pulling back to fall behind his chair. His owner's hands are in his lap, but his eyes are on the food in front of him. 'You can leave,' he sign whispers, and 27 has never been more grateful.

He does so, as quietly as he can, lifting the chair so that it doesn't make a sound. He keeps his eyes on the ground, even if he knows better, he ignores the training that Bug gave him to make him fit for bodyguard jobs. He just doesn't want to know if they see, what they see, what they'll do when they see that he hasn't eaten any of it.

The silence of the stairway shakes him, it loosens something that needed to stay in place. He clenches his teeth, he tightens his hold on the hand rail and tries to climb the stairs anyway. Even if they're blurry.

It was warm, too warm. It had a flavor that he remembered, that he shouldn't. He stole it, he's stolen too much already but that was the worst thing he's stolen.

He tries to make a mask with his hand, but he doesn't remember it right. He can't make it right either, with his hand too warm and too small.

He can only remember being too small, and trying not to make a sound while he cries.

Midoriya is the only one that asks, and for that, Aizawa is grateful. He's more grateful that he does it at the door, after the rest of Class 1-A has already said their goodbyes.

"Is Shinsou okay?"

Aizawa told him that he's fine, and left it at that. The thought of a half-lie that Shinsou doesn't like social situations like that rose in him, but he was honestly too exhausted to offer it. While he walks Mrs. Midoriya to the front gate, a necessity due to security regulations for people completely unlike her, he imagines that he needs to come up with new lies.

"Izuku told me that Eri and Shinsou came from a difficult situation," Mrs. Midoriya says, pulling her scarf a bit tighter but her eyes focused ahead. "I'm sorry if I aggravated that in some way."

For anyone else, he might have kept silent, but Mrs. Midoriya had made herself into a bit of a dorm mother from a distance. She sends care packages on a monthly basis, and he knows that she has given her phone number to every student in the class.

He knows that several of his students had reached out to her with issues that they didn't bring to him, and he doesn't want this to be one of them.

"I doubt it was an aggravation," Aizawa says, tucking his chin into the folds of his capture scarf. "A new experience for Eri, but it might have been familiar to Shinsou. Neither would be harmful to them in the long run."

He had no idea what kind of family would take the two wards in. He doesn't like thinking about it, but he imagines that they would be separated when that time came. Eri would find someone else to call 'Mom,' apart from Shinsou, and if her wide-eyed curiosity was any indication, she could adapt to it easily.

But Shinsou remembered his mother. What he remembered was likely painful, if his reaction to learning that she knew French was any indication. If he were placed in a home that had a female guardian who expected to eventually fill that role, he imagines that it would be a difficult process for him to accept that.

Aizawa knows almost nothing about Shinsou Ui, but it's clear to see that she left her own scars on Shinsou. And he hopes to learn more about her soon, now that Interpol has picked up a trail. It couldn't have come at a better time, with Chisaki dead and The Commission likely wringing their hands to find a new source of information, seeming to give up on gaining it from Shinsou honestly.

He hopes that the keylogger gives him something to justify using it in a way he's half-disgusted by. Something he has to remind himself is the rational course of action, a helpful one for Shinsou.

He waits at the gate after he and Mrs. Midoriya exchange farewells, to make sure that she gets into her car safely. The dorm is calmer than he expected, with several students still in the common area to watch a movie. When he notices that Eri is among them, glued to Midoriya's side, he realizes that he can text Toshinori and tell him that he can afford to be an hour or two late to his shift.

He should have expected that Shinsou would still be in the Safe Room, but the possibility completely slipped his mind. Shinsou was lying on his side on the cot, staring at the blank screen of the laptop, but sits up as soon as he realizes the door was opened. His eyes are widened for a moment, and it's enough to see that they're still bloodshot and irritated. Much like Aizawa expected them to be.

It doesn't make it any easier to anticipate it. Aizawa nods and closes the door behind him, unwilling to try to address it. He won't pick at a vulnerability that Shinsou can't hide, especially when he has nothing to soothe it with. No words that could bring any comfort to him.

He sends a text to Toshinori and then he sees it. ' Pick a number. '

"Why?" Aizawa asks, before he can convince himself not to. He knows that he needs this information, that if he convinces Shinsou to also describe the person that they could get somewhere on the investigation. But he also knows that this is a trade, and that he's never done anything worth the exchange for it.

' Didn't eat. Le... ' Shinsou half-signs it, but Aizawa knows what he means. Before he can try to convince Shinsou that he was always allowed to, that he shouldn't feel pressured to repay that, Shinsou signs again. ' I want to. '

"You don't have to answer either," Aizawa says, wavering before he says it. He needs this information too much to deny it, especially when it was volunteered. "50, or 2495."

He knows almost nothing about 50, only her autopsy report and those words that Shinsou muttered in his sleep. He knows it wouldn't be useful to the investigation to know about her, that Shinsou has no reason to fight it. That it might even be kinder for him to remember that than the number that Chisaki mentioned.

He wants Shinsou to explain that number, now that Chisaki can't answer for him. Whether Shinsou was lying about the jobs he performed for the Nomu Organization, whether that startlingly high number was related to a crime that he was used to perform. Rationally, he knows that it couldn't be murder, but something irrational in his mind wonders.

Shinsou takes a long time to decide, and Aizawa expects him to. He nearly repeats himself that Shinsou can choose to end this trade, or that he can choose another number. ' 2495. C-H-I-S-A-K-I game. Fights won. '

2495 fights. Won.

Aizawa knows that Shinsou has been in more fights than he should have, that he's experienced enough violence in his short life to rival some pro heroes. But to have a number for it, to have a number that he knows is only a fraction of the whole, is overwhelming.

He knows that Shinsou lost far more often than he won.

' Rewards stopped after 2000. C-H-I-S-A-K-I angry. Didn't take last two. '

"Rewards?" Aizawa forces himself to ask. He glances away from Shinsou's hands instinctively, he already knows he doesn't want to know the answer. He knows that he probably already knows it.

' 49 for food. 100 for new book. 200 for C-O-M-B-I-N-I. 500 for outside. 1000 for room. 2000 and C-H-I-S-A-K-I for mask off. '

Aizawa takes a breath to steady himself before he slips. Before he tells Shinsou that the sick bastard who made a game out of forcing a starved boy into a fighting pit was dead, that he bled out in a stairwell either alone and terrified, or mocked and taunted. As much as he imagines that Shinsou could find some relief in that, to know that he had beaten Chisaki by outliving him, he knows that the reality would come to him swiftly.

The Nomu Organization could silence anyone, even someone at a checkpoint outside of Tartarus. That made the walls of UA just a bit shorter, even if the heroes inside were no less ready to defend him.

“You don’t owe me anything, Shinsou,” Aizawa says, even if he has to weigh the likelihood of Shinsou Ui’s capture and the keylogger’s usefulness to do it. He only wishes that this was easier, that this investigation could be a typical one. “Whatever you tell me can be on your own time. If it’s not, I’ll let you know. But I’d rather fight with you than against you.”

He imagines that’s a new concept for Shinsou. That every fight he’s fought has been alone. That the teenager looking at him with wide eyes, still red from crying, has been fighting alone all of his life, and fighting too long like that.

Aizawa refuses to let that happen again.

Eri falls asleep on his owner on the couch after they return to their dorm, and they put her in her own room for the night. Yamada looked like he wanted to ask if that would affect 27’s ability to sleep, but he would have lied if he asked.

He did sleep, to his own surprise, but he wishes that he didn’t.

He dreamed he was sitting at that table again, with that same bowl in front of him. No one else was sitting with him, and only Mrs. Midoriya was there, smiling that fake smile. Telling him to eat that fake food with it.

But when he tried, it disappeared, and he looked up to see it in her hands. She set it down in front of him again.

Again. Again. Again. Every time he tried to do what the dream told him to, he couldn’t. Even when the dream told him to want it, to get angry that he couldn’t have it, he couldn’t.

Mrs. Midoriya’s smile grew less fake, it grew twisted and dark before it changed again, but worse. She stole the hair that she shouldn’t have, she grew taller than she should be. Her hands were scarred the last time she set the bowl down, and he wouldn’t let himself look up from it. He wouldn’t even raise his chopsticks to try to eat from it.

Even if he didn’t look up, he knew who it was. And when he did, when he looked up and desperately wanted to see her, to know if he remembered her right.

He woke up.

And he knew why he couldn’t eat the food in that dream. He knew the person who never gave it to him, knew the reason why she didn’t.

He won’t sleep until he knows how bad it was. If his mother was even alive now, or if his quirk had killed her even after she escaped it. If he knew, he wouldn’t have dreams about food she never made him. Even when he slept, he’d never forget the reason why.

27 stares at his phone for too long, the laptop’s screen even brighter. He won’t sleep, not again, but he doesn’t know if that means the hero that he wants to contact is still awake.

SHINNYYY: @Ashido, are you awake

Shinny: I'm really glad.

'I really hope my mom doesn't either.'

27 erases that message before he can forget himself, and gets to work.

Shouta's phone chimes, and he immediately grabs it, leaning out of his embrace as he does. He knows just by the way that Shouta's eyebrows are drawn together and he brushes his hair out of his face that it's a work message. Which means it's related to Shinsou.

Yamada sighs. "What does Naomasa want?"

"It's the keylogger," Shouta replies, his eyes darting across the screen as he reads, then tilts the screen and leans closer so that Yamada can read it too.

Shinsou was searching for his mother.

Yamada feels the guilt swelling inside him. He had the option not to go on that call, to stay home with the wards so that they wouldn't be there for Mrs. Midoriya's visit. He knew, he knew it would drag something painful out of Shinsou.

He hopes that he never meets Shinsou Ui. He knows it's too much to hope he never learns what she did to Shinsou, he knows that it's part of his job to find out, but he doesn't trust himself to be in the same room with her. Not after what he knows she did, and even worse if she did half of what he suspects.

Shouta thinks the Nomu Organization was the first to use a muzzle, but he's being a bit too kind to think that. Though they both know a bit too well what can happen when a parent wants to control their child's quirk, Yamada is more familiar with a child-sized muzzle. He knows how easy they are to find, that even now there are kiosks in the mall that have brightly colored muzzles decorated with flowers and cartoon characters. For tantrums, they say, as though that makes it any better.

Yamada pulls out his phone, because they can only see what Shinsou types, but not what he sees. And he's been looking at the results for 'Shinsou Ui' for a while now. When he googles the same term, there's a few Facebook profiles that pop up, but he imagines that's not what catches his eye.

There's a French news article about her disappearance, a plea from Interpol for any information related to her whereabouts. Her passport photo is clearer than the street camera shot, but her hair is much shorter for her passport. That's the only thing he can really see about the picture, and with how short the article is and how unlikely Shinsou would know how to translate the page, he goes back and looks for another link Shinsou might have found.

He hopes it's not this one. The news article about Shinsou's disappearance.

It was a big story in that small town. After the image of the missing child flier, the article repeats the description of Shinsou's attire the day he went missing. The author uses the Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats lunchbox to jump off into a more personal telling of the story, stating that Shinsou was a fan of the show according to his mother.

His elementary school teacher says he was a very bright, but shy child, and is dearly missed by his classmates. That she encourages children to stick to groups when they venture out of the house, and be aware of stranger danger. The principal talks about new policies to keep latchkey kids from walking home alone and the police chief talks about new curfews and community search efforts.

Shinsou's mother pleads for her son to come home. That she misses him, misses hearing his voice most of all, and Yamada nearly cracks the screen reading that. She tells the reporter that Shinsou is the only family that she has now that her husband has passed, and she would do anything to have him returned safely. The journalist notes that she was distraught, as any mother should be, and lists all the ways to give information over to the authorities.

Yamada wonders how much of that is remorse, and how much for show when Shinsou searches something else. 'How to find someone.' Period and all. Even in the comfort of his room, in what he thinks is complete privacy, the kid avoids asking a question.

Yamada taps the first result that comes up, and follows what Shinsou is doing. Name 'Shinsou, Ui,' hair color 'Purple,' eye color 'Purple.' He imagines that he selected 'Female,' but there are several more dialogue boxes that need to be filled out before the search can go through. He doesn't seem to know her age, or quirk. If this website was legitimate, the quirk would be one of the most important criteria for the search, sometimes more important than the full name.

He starts to think that Shinsou has given up, before he types again. 'Green.' Green eyes?

'Gray.' 50.

Yamada deletes Shinsou Ui's information, putting in 50's. He knows it's her, because who else would it be? Who else but the woman that Shinsou had muttered about in his sleep that first night, pleading "Don't leave, 50," before he jolted, startling Eri and Yamada both.

50 was estimated to be in her early thirties when she died, but Shinsou corrects that to '26' He doesn't know her name, unsurprisingly, but he knows her quirk. 'Shadow Projection.' Area of effect '10 meters.'

Yamada hits the search button, and probably sees the same thing Shinsou does, a pay wall. But while Yamada knows that's a good sign the site isn't a legitimate one, Shinsou doesn't. The poor kid hardly knows how to use half the apps on his phone, there's no way he could know the nuances of internet research.

But then, he finds himself surprised.

'Todoroki Enji, 12224332495 12/19 983'

Yamada takes a moment to gawk, to wonder how on Earth Shinsou stole the credit card information of the Number One Hero, before he notices that Shouta takes a screenshot.

"We need to do Christmas shopping before Naomasa reports that," Yamada mutters, already seeing a solid gold Sailor Moon statue and a personal cat cafe in his wards' futures. But when he types in those credit card details, unwilling to risk his own on such a shady site, he sees another paywall, confirming that this was not going to give Shinsou the answers he wanted.

"I can connect to the database through the laptop," Shouta says, already rising to make his way over there, sleep and everything else falling to the wayside now that they finally have a lead. It'll be hard work to keep him from harassing 50's living relatives in the wee hours of the morning at this rate.

They both make their way to their office as quietly as they can. Shouta can be silent when he wants to be, and despite every effort he's made to share that skill with Yamada, he'll just never be great at it.

But there's no sign that either ward is disturbed, and that's good enough. Yamada waits anxiously behind Shouta as they watch the computer start up, Shouta's own nerves betraying him with his finger tapping on the desk while they wait for the database to return a result.

The first attempt returns nothing, but Shouta deletes the age and uses just her hair color, eye color, quirk description and height for the next one. 50's autopsy report remains open on the desk, and Yamada can't help but stare at the picture.

Autopsy reports are nothing like funeral portraits, there's no attempt to hide the blue tint of her skin or the bruising around her eyes. For too long, this was 50's only memento mori, as she waited to be mourned, waiting for the 8 digit number that marked her file to be replaced by her name. They're lucky that green hair is rare, and so is her quirk. Only 13 results pop up, but it's clear to see who 50 is.

Furokage Mizuki.

"It's nice to meet you, 50," Yamada mutters, leaning his arms on the back of Shouta's chair as he takes a better look. The Nomu organization hadn't been kind to her, if not for that vibrant shade of sea foam green hair, he probably wouldn't have recognized her so easily.

Even though it's just a photograph taken for her ID, and she was probably told not to, there's a hint of a smile on her face. He thinks it would have been a kind one. She's young, probably late teens, hardly older than his students.

Shouta scrolls down, confirming what Yamada was already thinking. She went missing soon after this picture was taken. Only 19 years old. A college freshman at Todai, starting out her adult life with the same wide-eyed optimism that every kid deserves to fumble through.

Instead, she was taken by the Nomu Organization. Since her quirk wasn't compatible with what they've seen from the Nomus so far, much like Shinsou's, she was probably trained and utilized in their other criminal activities. She had met Shinsou that way, and must have been someone important to him if he remembered her seven years after she died.

He hopes he's not wrong about what he thinks of her smile, he hopes that there was someone out there who had been kind to the kid.

50's body had been recovered from a drug bust gone wrong seven years ago. Only one year after Furokage Mizuki had been presumed dead, her file moving to the cold cases, the investigating officer now left blank. Her family never knew, never had the opportunity to mourn.

But they were alive. Two parents and a younger brother, not just alive and well, but in the next prefecture.

And they might know how she had gotten into the hands of the Nomu Organization.

27 won't sleep. Won't let himself. Missing, he knew what that meant. Even if he tried to convince himself otherwise.

His mother lived longer than he expected. Especially now that he knows that what he did to her set in. It took. The sickness that he worked into her mind through that abuse set in.

She wanted him to come home, because she was delusional at the time. She was insane, he had made her insane. She said that he wanted to hear his voice, and he knows that's not her. She didn't want to hear him speak, she learned not to trust it. He had to be quiet.

He wonders if she would be happy if she knew that he was. He learned to be quiet.

He felt numb while he let himself cry. He knew. He knew what he did, and now he knew it in a way he couldn't ignore. He could never use his quirk again, could never do that to someone else. 50 told him not to-

He holds his breath until he can control it, until he can make the gasp silent. He can be silent, he will be silent. They don't need to use another mask.

He'll never use his quirk again.

Chapter Summary

Midterm week begins at UA, and 27 has to deal with some very odd rituals that take place during this week. Some of these rituals are more enjoyable than others.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: None!

Previously on Wards of UA: The mask that Shinsou wore at the 8 Precepts would automatically lock at night and open in the morning, and Shinsou had to wake up for the click when it opened. Yamada said he was buying a tooth box for Eri after she lost her first tooth. When Shinsou met Ms. Joke, she gave him a shirt that Shinsou put in his stash. Bakugo hates the ":---)" emoji. Shinsou received a giant Gengar plushie from Mirio. Shinsou stayed home from school Wednesday and Thursday, then only went to homeroom on Friday, which Monoma noticed.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

27 hears a knock on the door. He knows it's too early for Yamada, knows that Yamada honestly doesn't have to do this. They could just give him an alarm clock, and it would be a kinder one than the 8 Precepts mask. At least they know they don't need to give him a mask.

He remembers the rule about clapping after Yamada takes too long to open the door, and does it too quickly. Too quickly for him to remember that he should be in bed, he shouldn't be staring at his laptop and the laptop should be closed, but Yamada just smiles at him when he opens the door. It might be allowed.

"Hey, I had a feeling you might be up, little listener," Yamada says, not yet in his hero costume. 27 can't understand why he changes into it so early when his sleepwear looks so much more comfortable. "So, I was doing a little online shopping, and I wanted to see if I could get you in on the action. And I wanted to see what you think about this."

It's a box.

An incredibly creepy box.

There's a child's face drawn on the top of the lid, and the inside has holes for teeth to be placed in, labeled and organized to keep track of which tooth was lost from what location. That much is fine, it's a little clever, but the two holes in the middle are disturbing.

There's a place for hair, which shouldn't be disturbing, but 27 has read enough plays where trading locks of hair was some important gesture, enough to be disturbed that it could be stolen from an unsuspecting child. But the umbilical cord was also meant to be kept. Kept in that box. Human tissue kept in a box.

27's horror must have been obvious, because Yamada quietly laughs.

"That's exactly the same face Shou made," Yamada shakes his head. "I mean, the umbilical cord thing is a little weird, but we don't have it anyway. We could just cross it out and put something else there, like a little trinket or- Oh, they have little kits to make handprints! I almost forgot about that."

Yamada starts searching for those kits, and 27 can't help the smile, despite the bitterness in his chest. Her hands used to be smaller, and he wishes that he could have kept proof of that. But he knows that they'll grow bigger, and he wants to have some way to remember how small they are now.

When Yamada adds a kit to his cart, 27 sees that he's picked out several items related to growing children. A milestone book, completely different from the margins of his books that he used to use. A measuring stick with a stand and a cartoon flower at the top, a far brighter image than the numbers from the reports that he had to copy, typing so fast that he often forgot to remember them. A scrapbook with the title 'The Sweetest Girl in My World.'

27 has cried too much, and asked too much from Yamada already. But he wants to help him fill out that blank scrapbook so much that he can't consider the possibility that he's unwanted from that. He's too selfish, it should be enough to know that Yamada is convinced, that he would make this effort. That he would be such a good father for Eri.

"Do you like it? I know I might be going a little overboard, and I'm probably overstepping, maybe I'm just going nuts so just tell me if-"

'Like,' 27 signs, even if he has to run a hand through his hair and turn away for a moment, he doesn't allow himself enough pause to let his fingers find his nape. 'Thank you.'

He sees that honest twitch at the corner of Yamada's mouth, that tell that means he's genuine and surprised. That he's reassured in some way that he didn't expect. "Thanks, Shinsou. I-you know. I wanted you to weigh in on it too." Yamada huffs a laugh. "Definitely another tooth box, though. Two strikes, so it's out."

27 shakes his head. 'Picture. Less creepy.'

Yamada's mouth twists at that, his head tips back while he stares at the ceiling. "Shinsou. This is why I need you, I didn't even think- that would be absolutely perfect, we're definitely doing that."

Yamada goes back to the creepy box and puts it into his cart, and hesitates with his thumb circling in the air before he confirms the purchase. 27 feels himself relax when he does, knowing that this gesture is completed. This overwhelming step was taken, and he feels too grateful to be able to witness it.

"Alright, so. Let's get you set up on here. Is it okay if I use your laptop for a minute?" 27 nods, and Yamada goes to a website and starts filling out a username and password. "I doubt that you're going to go hog-wild, so I'll let you do the shopping. But pick out anything you like, anything that catches your fancy. You can pick out some decorations, or some new clothes, or...."

27 has no idea what Yamada is doing, what he's telling him to do. There's a car for sale on this website, the sheer numbers of numbers below the picture is frightening. He wants 27 to do this on his own, he trusts that 27 won't be reckless, but 27 has no idea what reckless is. This has to be a test, and he doesn't want it to be, he knows that he'll fail. They want him to fail, to get too much and have to pay it back with information about The Miasma.

“Or, how about I give you a budget?” Yamada says sheepishly, rubbing the back of his neck. “I-yeah, I’d be pretty scared too if someone just gave me their credit card with no rules to go with it. Let’s start out with 10,000 yen, it’s okay if you go under or if you want to go over, and you can talk to me first if that’s easier. I can’t imagine I’d say no, even if you just wanted to get a box of knock off Present Mic merch.”

‘ Already have. ’ 27 signs, trying to tell Yamada that he doesn’t want anything , but Yamada just raises an eyebrow at him.

“You do? How di- Joke. Of course she did, I should have figured,” Yamada shakes his head.

“Please tell me it’s not ‘Now Music.’ I know that’s your favorite but I’m completely okay with that just being your little thing.”

‘ E-X-I-S-T-I-N-G Amplifier, ’ 27 signs, with a half-grin he can’t quite hide. ‘ I like it. ’

Yamada rolls his eyes before he sighs. “I can’t believe I’m saying this... but you can wear it. Or have it out, I don’t- Whatever it is, if you like it, you don’t have to hide it.” Yamada taps him with his elbow, so gently that he barely even feels it. “But maybe you can wear my real merch too? Rep my show a little bit? Convince me that you don’t absolutely hate Present Mic, because he’s kind of me, you know? I’m a little attached to me.”

27 shakes his head, feels too light for some reason. Too comfortable, even when he knows better in the back of his mind. ‘ Like you better. ’

He doesn’t look, he doesn’t want to know if Yamada thinks that’s ridiculous, or if he’s insulted by it. If he’s angry that 27 is acting too familiar with him. But he hears a sniff before Yamada puts a hand on his shoulder, and 27 tries to ignore how warm and large it is. “Thanks, Shinsou. I, uh. I think that makes you one of my best fans.”

27 turns to look, to try and piece out what Yamada means by that, but Yamada just straightens with a pat on his shoulder before he pulls his hand away.

“So, yeah! Pick out some neat stuff, mess around on it for a bit. There’s a lot of cool things online, and... I can’t wait to see what you like.” Yamada says, his voice getting a little strained for some odd reason. “Other than me , I guess.”

27 doesn’t know if what he said was wrong, he can’t ask Yamada if it was. If he should have signed that, if he should even feel that way. That he likes Yamada, likes that he’s easy to read. That he teaches him things, and smiles so much. Talks to him.

27 turns back to the laptop, trying to distract himself with the task at hand. 10,000 yen, he can remember that number. He can make sure to stay under it, and he can ask Yamada to review his items before they’re purchased.

He stares for too long and has no idea what he wants , what he’s supposed to want. He hasn’t even read most of the books on his shelf, he has more soaps than he would ever need in his life. He has clothes, he has food, he even has a bed that’s comfortable to sleep on. He has a phone and a laptop, things that he’s never even imagined wanting , nevermind having .

He knows there’s nothing he could get for Eri that she could possibly want. She wants for absolutely nothing here, and between the hero students and Mirio and Yamada, she’ll never want for anything a day in her life.

And that’s all he’s ever wanted.

He thinks about wearing the shirt, digging it out from the box that Yamada gave him stored underneath his bed, before he decides against it. He lets Eri pick his clothes and comb his hair, before he gives her a braid that doesn't look terrible. He eats his breakfast and takes his supplement before he tells Yamada what he wants, and for once, he's not surprised that he gives it to him.

"Don't tell snitch me out to Recovery Girl," Yamada whispers, and 27 doesn't even try to hide his smile behind the coffee mug.

Aizawa can't say he's surprised, but he still finds himself a bit shocked.

They can't even use the door that leads to the front of the classroom, because it's blocked by a mountain of offerings. Coloring books, stickers, children's games, candy, stuffed animals - and he shouldn't be surprised that Eri already has most of them, but he is. He has absolutely no idea what they should do with it, with any of it, but when he opens the other door to try to ignore that problem, he's faced with another.

Two more mountains, carefully arranged on the corresponding desks. And those eager, grinning faces don't look ashamed of it at all.

Shinsou looks confused, but Eri looks worryingly unconcerned. Nemuri might have had a point that eventually, Eri might get a little too used to being pampered and showered with gifts.

But if her eager attempts to smile at and thank every single member of Class 1-A are any indication, he doesn't have to worry about that anytime soon.

Not that he thinks he could put a stop to it, even if he tried.

Shinsou still looks wary as he approaches his desk, eventually sitting down and taking a very familiar strategy, right out of Aizawa's own handbook. He stares straight ahead and ignores it, but unfortunately, it won't work well for him.

"Shinny!" Ashido calls, sprinting to Shinsou's desk to offer her hand, which Shinsou surprisingly takes. "Bakugo made the troll doll, so you need to curse him on his midterms."

"He already fucking did," Bakugo hisses, but still bristles when Shinsou pulls his phone out, inspired.

"Colon da-ash da-ash da-ash-"

When Jirou starts beatboxing and Kaminari starts chanting "Dab," Aizawa picks up the lectern and drops it with a loud thunk. He takes a moment to brace his elbows on top of the lectern, his fingers steepled with the tips pressed to the bridge of his nose, and breathes. Before he expels every last one of them.

He remembers himself when he glances at his wards, Eri finishing up her show of appreciation to Yaoyorozu completely nonplussed. But the guilt that pulls when he sees Shinsou's wide-eyed terror makes him quickly sign, 'Not you.'

They'll have plenty of time for a proper conversation after this.

"Midterms," Aizawa reminds, and blames the pause he takes entirely on reading every scrap of information available to him about the Furokages instead of sleeping last night. "I shouldn't have to remind you, but today you will take your Literature exam. If that's news to you, please show yourself out."

Hizashi didn't make a strong enough brew this morning on purpose .

"Tomorrow is Art History, Wednesday is Math, Thursday is Hero Ethics, Friday is English. Saturday is your Heroics Midterm," Aizawa makes a point to look at every single one of his students before he speaks again. "I suggest that every free moment that you have apart from your other studies be dedicated to training. Take care that you are uninjured, well-rested, and ready for each one of your tests, and especially for Heroics."

If Kan shows him up after last year, Aizawa will resign. He won't face the consequences, he will run like a coward, and no one, not even Principal Nezu himself, will convince him otherwise.

"Now, are there any questions?" There better not be.

Uraraka raises her hand. He runs through all the reasons that he can't expel her, of which he finds there are many, before he nods. "Aizawa-sensei, do you have plans to take Eri to Shichi-Go-San?"

21 expectant stares bore into him, and though they shouldn't, they make him feel smaller . He hadn't even remembered it. "That's irrelevant to your studies."

Several pairs of eyes narrow at him. They know . He shouldn't care if they know, they have no right to comment on his ability to be a caretaker or guardian for Eri, and they honestly had far greater concerns to worry about. If the weekend at the dorm has proven anything, it's that his students aren't taking their Midterms seriously, at all.

But he can fix that. Efficiently, and rationally, all in one fell swoop. "None of you will lay eyes on the pictures unless you pass your fundamental Midterms with an 80% average, and pass your Heroics Midterm with exceptional marks."

He sees the flicker of fear and despair, before it soars into a fighting spirit. The room erupts in cheers and chants of the school's motto. Satisfied, he nods at his wards, reminding Shinsou that both homeroom and school was going to be a short venture today. Shinsou takes a long pause to stare at the gifts on his desk, before he starts placing them in his bag one by one, and Eri follows suit much less carefully.

"Cementoss will be here shortly to begin your exam," Aizawa says, noting that the robot deployed to supervise the students for a short and necessary break was having issues with the blocked door. "Do your best."

He shuts the door behind his wards and sees that there were actually several robots deployed to the door situation, and all but one of them was gathering up the offerings in their arms. Now faced with the reality that Principal Nezu knew , and that he would have access to his wards in just a few minutes, Aizawa takes a steadying breath, and prepares himself.

' I am sorry. Distraction. Sorry. '

Aizawa turns his head, barely catching Shinsou's signing out of the corner of his eye. "No, it wasn't your fault. I'm the one who should apologize, I overreacted a bit." He can hear Nemuri's voice in his ear, They'll find reasons to explain your behavior if you don't offer them yourself. "I didn't sleep well last night, and I'm more than a little concerned about how my students will perform this week. What you did was fine, but how they reacted..."

Was fine. They were children who were having a bit of fun with a new friend, and he overreacted in that regard as well.

“Zawa just has to be kinda mean sometimes, ‘cause he’s a teacher,” Eri says, an explanation that on its face is correct, but he can’t help but feel a sting hearing those words from Eri. “It’s hard being a teacher, and Class A makes it harder sometimes.”

He knows that he’s probably said those exact words to Eri before, or at least said them around her, but at the moment he doesn’t feel like they’re accurate at all. “My behavior was very uncalled for, and I’m sorry that you had to see that. That’s neither the person that I want to be, nor the teacher that I should be. Lashing out in irritation like that is very juvenile.”

When he turns his head, Shinsou looks visibly confused, his eyebrows knitted together. When he catches his stare, he looks straight ahead of him, but signs, ‘ Not bad. I’m. Fine. ’

It’s the hesitation that makes Aizawa want to retreat to the office or the station as soon as they return to the dorm. He knows he’s not in a good mood, that he’s being unreasonably irritable, and he knows better than to let Shinsou see that side of him. While Eri seemed to be oblivious to his less than becoming antics, Shinsou learned to pick up on them. Shinsou learned to read a threat before it came to fruition.

He’s going to go to sleep as soon as they return, and force himself to wake up before he rebounds from exhaustion to grogginess, because Shinsou does not deserve to see threats from him. Not when he’s lived in fear long enough, and not when he’s barely proven himself to be different from Chisaki.

When he notices that they’re among the last to file in to the gathering, the entire staff of UA circled around Principal Nezu in a predetermined hallway, he notices that Principal Nezu’s gaze falls to his wards before he gives a cold, barely perceptible smile. He knows.

“We find ourselves together again, with a trying week ahead of us,” Principal Nezu says, and when Nemuri hands him his pre-filled sake cup, he wants to ask for another. “As trying as it might be for our students, we all know what to expect as seasoned members of staff. Well, most of us.”

Toshinori doesn’t look nearly as frightened as he should be, but he would learn. The Spring Midterms were a cake walk with the first years, but after they had gotten a bit of confidence after proving themselves thus far, this week would be very different. There might be a scientific explanation, colder temperatures and impending holidays combining to make the students act more rambunctiously than they normally did.

“I believe that each and every one of you will rise to the occasion regardless, and should you falter,” Principal Nezu’s eyes seem to deaden more every year before he says it. “Remember our motto. Go Beyond. Plus Ultra.”

It’s easy to know who was evaluating their retirement fund, and who was anticipating a drop in their roster in the answering cheer. Aizawa forces himself to meet Kan’s eyes before he says it, knowing that will give him the energy he needs to mask it. “Plus Ultra.”

The sake tastes especially bitter this year, and he wonders if that’s a sign of Principal Nezu’s feelings towards being upstaged by the wards in regards to the offerings. As he expected, his boss gives him no indication whether that’s the case, and his focused stare means that the escape he wanted to take after handing off the cup is no longer a viable one.

Aizawa distracts himself with another pointed glare to Kan, who answers with a smug grin. He won’t win again, not this year. Not with his students.

“It’s nice to see that flame hasn’t died out just yet,” Principal Nezu comments, hands clasped behind his back as the rest of the staff either take their positions for the first year’s exams, or retreat to the dorms until their designated block. “I noticed that you hadn’t submitted a time-off request, but seeing as it’s such a rare occurrence, I made sure that it wouldn’t be an issue for tomorrow.”

He knew . Principal Nezu didn’t have to say anything, but those eyes told him that he knew. He knew that he had forgotten about it completely.

“Oh? What’s happening tomorrow?” Hizashi asks, and he hopes that Principal Nezu will make an assumption that serves him well.

He doesn’t. Aizawa sees his ear flick , and he’s only heard about that from former members of staff. Aizawa thinks that he might be joining them soon. “I see.”

Very soon.

“November 15th, a particular holiday falls on that day,” Principal Nezu says as though he’s musing about it, as though he doesn’t know exactly what he’s doing. “Shichi-Go-San, I believe?”

Aizawa looks at his husband, and sees him freeze. He can practically hear the oncoming panic, the phone calls he’ll make and the frustrated whining of Why didn’t YOU remember, Shou?! We have to-

“I suppose it’s a happy coincidence that a number of child-size kimonos were incorrectly addressed to me, and are currently being delivered to your dorm along with the gifts that I noticed this morning,” Principal Nezu says with that cold chuckle. “Quite an astounding sight.”

Aizawa is aware that this could be another one of his boss’ machinations, a psychological test of will and a maze that Principal Nezu makes sure he gets lost in. But he’s too deliriously exhausted and appreciative to offer anything but gratitude. “Thank you for that. I’m deeply grateful.”

Hizashi turns to gape at him, and he can see the panic rising in his eyes. They should have known, they should have been prepared, and he knows that this is a more painful reminder for Hizashi than for him. And it still stings.

Principal Nezu tilts to the side to offer a wave to the wards, who have kept to the wall to stay away from the odd gathering. Eri waves back and starts to step forward before Shinsou’s hand on her head stops her, but he also waves back. Principal Nezu straightens and fixes Aizawa with a cold stare. “I know you have other obligations, but would you mind stepping into my office for a moment?”

It takes all of Aizawa’s resolve not to look away, to nod rather than swallow. Principal Nezu knows far too much. “Hizashi?”

Hizashi nearly rolls his eyes before he forgets himself, running a hand over his hair. “Yeah, just-you know. Don’t give the boss any trouble.”

He knows that Hizashi wants to get started on the tizzy that he’s probably already worked himself into, and as hesitant as Aizawa was to bear witness to it, he couldn’t say he was relieved now.

He followed Principal Nezu, and knew the silence was only more telling of the threat to come.

Yamada and the wards made their way home with one less member to the expected party, and Yamada couldn't help but be distracted by all the preparations he should have made weeks ago. He thought he marked it on his calendar as soon as they got what little paperwork there was from Eri's wardship, an estimated age that doesn't have a birth certificate to prove it, but there honestly didn't have to be one. Yamada didn't care if Eri was technically 31 years old, they had to go to Shichi-Go-San, and they had to do it right.

‘ Principal Rat Bear. Boss. ’

Yamada found himself frowning to himself, noticing that Shinsou was back to asking a question without asking it. And that little furrow between his eyebrows was a bit worrying as well. “Oh yeah, Principal Nezu is me and Shou's boss for our jobs here at UA. He's not the only boss we have, or I have, I guess. Shou gets to kind of do his own thing as an underground hero, while I get to make sure my station manager and hero manager don't gang up on me.”

Both are absolute pains in his ass most of the time, but he's going to call down a few favors to see if he can swing some weight around, flash a little celebrity to make sure everything goes smoothly.

It's honestly a miracle that Principal Nezu was taking care of one of the most important aspects, but photographers were usually booked months in advance. Then there was a dinner to plan, and he hated to imagine making it himself. Something this big deserved a nice dinner at a four star restaurant at least. That meant making sure that Shouta's suit was cleaned, and they honestly needed to pick up a new set of traditional clothes for themselves, and he knows Shouta will fight him every step of the way but he just doesn't understand how big this is.

‘ A-I-Z-A-W-A superior or you. ’

Yamada took a second to think about what Shinsou was asking, finding himself a little puzzled by the line of questioning. That worried furrow was gone, but now Shinsou's eyes were just a bit wider, his eyebrows just a little higher, curious about the answer. “Well, we work in different departments, but we're basically the same. I'm in charge of English for the Heroics courses, and I do the first year Gen-Ed as a favor that honestly I should have called quits on years ago. Shou is in charge of Hero Ethics and he's a homeroom teacher too, which means he guides a group of little herolets through their first year. Homeroom teachers get a little more slack on some things, but it's not like he's more important than me because of that.”

He sees that flash of a furrow again, Shinsou staring at his hands as though he doesn't know how exactly to ask what he's oddly been avoiding asking.

“This morning's meeting was a little weird, I guess, but it's a little bit of a tradition that got started-”

‘ Not weird. S-A-K-A-Z-U-K-I. I know. ’ Shinsou looks just a bit more reassured, but Yamada is decidedly not.

He feels his mouth drop open as he tries to find a way to argue against that, while still processing the fact that Shinsou thought the UA staff were a mafia. “Uh, no, no that- I guess it looked like that, but it's really not, it's just a dumb- teachers need to drink, alright? The students are going to drive us completely bonkers before the end of this week, so we just get together for a little toast and liquid courage. It's- it's really not that.”

Shinsou nods, looking ahead. ‘ Did wrong, anyway. ’

Yamada finds himself nodding a little too much in response, tucking his hands in his pockets.

“Yeah, I mean. Principal Nezu is our boss, but not our boss- boss. Like that.... Did you think that Shou would be my superior or...?”

Shinsou tilts his head, considering, and Yamada finds himself grateful for the pause. That there even was a pause, because far too often people take Shou’s outwardly calm demeanor to mean that he’s a bit more put together than Yamada. ‘ At first. You’re superior hero. A-I-Z-A-W-A superior investigation. Equal under rat bear. ’

As much as Yamada was tempted to say his little listener had finally come around to Present Mic, he imagined that the difference in name recognition made Shinsou think that Present Mic was just a better hero than Eraserhead. And Shouta’s lack of patrols probably compounded that.

But as much as he wanted to argue that he was supposed to be the superior in the investigation, he knew it was useless. Shouta decided, and Yamada warily agreed, that Shouta should be the face of that until Shinsou got a little more comfortable. Right now, he only had Yamada to trust, and Yamada wouldn’t risk leaving Shinsou without an anchor.

“Yeah, that’s kind of how it is. But no mafia business, right? Definitely none of that,” Yamada says, trying to laugh it off while he tries not to wonder how long Shinsou had been under the impression that the staff of UA were just another mafia. He knows Shouta wears long-sleeves almost constantly, enough to give the impression that he might have tattoos, but who could ever believe that Yamada could pull it off?

Yamada thought that the robots must be taking their time to bring all the wards’ offerings when he notices the door isn’t blocked, but when he opens it, Eri lets out a gasp.

Apparently, robots can open doors. Locked doors.

The barren living room that’s been bugging him for weeks definitely doesn’t look empty now. There’s a pyramid of three neatly packaged boxes, each almost as tall as Eri, and Yamada wonders exactly how many kimonos Principal Nezu thought were necessary. As much as he wants to be horrified that they could dress every single girl in Mustafu for Shichi-Go-San, he’s far more relieved that one of them could possibly be the one. The perfect outfit for Eri to wear for her first Shichi-Go-San festival.

There are also several mounds of gifts, neatly organized by type. The stuffed animals frankly dwarf all the others, then there’s a stack of coloring books taller than Eri, then candy and toys and boxed games. Shinsou’s pile doesn’t seem to be organized, and it would look even smaller if it was, but Shinsou doesn’t even seem to notice that it’s there. He just smiles as Eri stretches her arms out and looks like she wants to jump right into her little mountain of plushies, ignoring that the hoodies that Yamada can see definitely wouldn’t fit Eri.

“Well, it looks like you guys have a lot to go through here,” Yamada says, his hand already itching towards his phone. “I’ll be in my room if you need me, but I definitely don’t think you’ll be bored for a while.”

He does get his phone out just in time to recognize that crouch, and snaps several pictures of Eri jumping right into the mountain of plushies, giggling all the while. And he’s not at all surprised that he finally gets a picture of Shinsou smiling like he means it.

UA definitely wasn’t anything like the mafia.

27 found himself counting, but for a different reason, and he kept smiling to himself while he did. 43 stuffed animals of various sizes, some half as big as the Gengar, some as small as Eri's hand. 143 books - children's books, coloring books, and sticker books. Enough bags of candy and candy apples to rot out every last one of Eri's teeth, and enough toys and games to make up for the years she didn't have any.

Eri was ecstatic, rolling around on her plushies and running her hands across all of the books and toys, and he couldn't scold her for it at all. Even when her voice started getting louder and probably disturbed Yamada's phone calls, he just didn't have the heart to stop her.

But Eri's wide eyes turned to panic when she turned to look at him. "Twenny, I can't make headbands for all the heroes! You have to help me!"

He still couldn't stop smiling, running a hand over her head. "It's fine, Eri. The heroes want a picture anyway. I can take it and send it to them now, if you want."

Eri nodded, determined to pay the heroes back as soon as possible. She plead for him to wait while she picked out a stuffed animal to pose with, and ran back with one of the largest unicorns held tight in her arms.

27 pulled up the same app that he noticed Yamada using, and angled the phone so that it looked like it would take a good picture. He didn't even have to tell Eri to smile, she was used to these modeling sessions, and took several pictures to make sure they could pick the best one.

But when he pulled up the one he liked the most, Eri frowned. "I'm not smiling right."

27 wrapped an arm around her, already knowing that this was an insecurity for Eri. "A lot of people smile like that, Eri. See?" 27 gives her a toothy grin, his lips pulled back but not up. It would be a grimace if not for the happiness clear in her eyes, and he didn't doubt that she could see it in his, too. "You can tell that I'm smiling."

Eri pulled her lips to one side, probably thinking about pouting, before she nodded. "Yeah, I guess that's okay. If the heroes can tell too."

"They can," 27 says, and pulls up LNE. He found a few new things he can do with his phone while he was avoiding the chats, while he was trying to distract himself from crying or sleeping.

He scrolls through the Class 1-A chat to find a point where Bakugo's username isn't visible, and points out to Eri that they've all changed their usernames to the pictures that she drew on their headbands. She presses her hands to her blushing cheeks, and finds herself distracted enough to drop her unicorn plushie, which inspires her to return to the pile of plushies to make sure they're all named and hugged afterwards.

Before he can send the picture, the door behind him opens, and he turns to see his owner returning. That pinched glare and frown seems to be worse than this morning. Before 27 can think of a way to hide Eri's gifts, to make sure they're not taken from her, he hears the bedroom door open and Yamada's voice carry down the hall, getting louder as he walks closer.

"-Tear it up, I hope you do it. You said it yourself, I got a bump in rank with half of my regular patrols, so do you think I'll have any problems getting another manager? ...Oh, of course that's what you meant, and I completely agree, and if I hear anything but a 'Yes' in the next five seconds, I'm going down to your office to tear up my contract for you.... That's all I needed, enjoy the sponsorship money," Yamada growls in English after he hangs up. "' Prick.' "

Yamada's eyes focus on his owner, who seems to curl himself forward out of exhaustion. "Hizashi. Don't tell me that was-"

"I broke top 100, it's fine," Yamada says, with a hand wave and a grin that becomes strained, his green eyes sparkling with a nervous energy he's seemed to carry all morning since that odd meeting. "So, I'm pulling some serious weight on the photography business, my station manager will either kill me or I'll kill him, I haven't decided yet, but that should take care of dinner plans, which leaves all of the clothing operations to my dear, sweet, ever so forgetful."

"Hizashi," his owner sighs, and for some reason almost staggers. He's been acting like he's exhausted all day, but 27 knows that he shouldn't be. It doesn't serve a purpose to show irritation with a weakness like that. "I understand that this is important to you, and it's important to me too. I'm more than willing to help, but I need to sleep. Then I'll help you."

Yamada stares for a moment, that manic energy draining out of him, before he sighs. "Yeah, I know, I know. We should have been way more prepared, and I'm working myself up too much, but take yourself a little nappy-poo. We'll touch base after that."

His owner doesn't even glare at the insult, making his way to his bedroom with only a brush of his hand over Eri's head. It definitely seemed like he was tired.

It made sense that he would be. His owner didn't seem to sleep while they were at the students' dorm, and only took a nap when they returned to this one. If he hadn't slept well last night, that meant that he hadn't fully rested in 3 days. 27 knows exactly what that can do to a person, even if he's never seen it worn so plainly on someone else.

He hopes that Aizawa recovers after some sleep. As irritating as it was to be around a man with so few tells, it was unsettling to see him so oddly vulnerable.

"I'm not sure what we should do with all of this," Yamada mutters, looking again at Eri's gifts. "Did you have a chance to go through your new stuff, Shinsou?"

27 follows the direction that Yamada is pointing into to a pile that he assumed was for gifts that needed to be cursed, with how ill-fitting they were to Eri's tastes. But they must be for him.

He has no idea why he was given these things. He doesn't even know most of the students at the school, and he was already unsettled by the things on his desk from Class 1-A. He doesn't need anything, he doesn't want anything, and he has no idea what any of these things intend to buy for the students. He has no idea what they want from him.

They couldn't all know about The Miasma. His owner seemed to want to keep the investigation secure, and it wouldn't make sense to enlist students that he couldn't keep a close eye on. They could be informants for The Miasma. There could be a message within those gifts to tell him that his luck was running short. That it would be better to slip outside the walls of this compound rather than force The Miasma to infiltrate it, because even if death came to him either way, one would be more pleasant than the other.

"It's kind of another one of those weird things that happen at UA," Yamada says, crouching to sit next to the pile. "Usually, the students leave little gifts for Principal Nezu for good luck on their tests, but since you and Eri are becoming little mascots for the hero course, they must have changed their plans. Of course, Eri has a running start on winning the hearts of our little herolets, but it looks like some thought went into these."

Yamada picks up a headband with purple cat ears on it and goes still. 27 sees him turning to look at him, and he recognizes that look in his eye. Even if he doesn't know what anyone else wants, he knows what Yamada wants right now. 'Eri only.' Even if that angers Yamada, he refuses to have a picture taken with him wearing that. He can die with pride.

Yamada pouts, his shoulders dropping in defeat, but he tucks the headband into the pile of toys for Eri with a pleased grin. "Let's see, let's see. Hoodies, definitely your style. I see some cute little cat keyrings-"

27 tries not to roll his eyes while he joins Yamada. Apparently, this was important to him, even if 27 couldn't care less. Unless there was some threat hidden in this pile, some message that Yamada hopefully wouldn't find, he would rather ignore that the students did this to him. He had no idea how to respond to it, what they wanted from it.

There are a few hoodies, and gloves. There's a box with a note in a messy scrawl that Yamada places to the side, nudging it behind himself, and explains that it should be looked at later. There are several cat keychains or cat themed notebooks and pens, and though he tries not to give any indication of it, they are cute. But underneath one of the hoodies, he finds what he was looking for.

A threat. An incredibly odd one.

Yamada seems likewise confused. "Huh. That's, uh...."

It was a set of sleeves and leggings that supposedly had pain-relieving qualities, through some odd use of copper threading and an essential oil kit. It was odd, so odd that he doubted that The Miasma was behind it. It must be from a student, but he had no idea which one. Or why there was only one. 'I'm being threatened.'

Yamada looks shocked, waving his hands to argue against the reality of it. "No, no, no! I don't think that's what's going on, let me..." Yamada trailed off, taking the box into his hand as he looked it over, and when he flipped it over, he found the note.

'Someone such as I has no need for superstitions, but they make this far easier to get to you. I've noticed that you haven't attended school for a few days, and though Kendo is lacking in a great many redeeming qualities, she is somewhat knowledgeable about homeotherapy and pain relief.'

Several lines of black paint were underneath that message, as though scratching out whatever words were decided against wouldn't be enough to hide them, before the identity of this person was revealed. 'Monoma Neito.'

'Crazy English guy threatening me,' 27 signed, hoping that Yamada knew the reason. He hadn't hurt his hand too badly when he tried to stop the Quirk Thief from touching him, but if he knew what he was trying to do at the time, he would have given him a reason to threaten him. A very good reason.

"Uh, no, I think Monoma... he's trying to help, but he's...." Yamada pulled a grimace, shaking his hand back and forth in 'So-so.' But that really didn't explain anything. "He's trying! He wants to be friends with you, but he's.... Really bad with people. And it comes off as a little-"

'Threatening.' 27 didn't understand why Yamada was trying to convince him that the Crazy Quirk Thief wanted to be friends with him, but he knew it wasn't the case. He must have some idea of what his quirk was, and wanted to steal it. Possibly to use it to kill members of Class 1-A, and frame 27 for it.

Despite himself, 27 was a bit impressed by that strategy. "I know he's not, he's just... so bad at this,” Yamada said, wincing before he sighed, placing the box back down before he picked up the other one that he had set aside. “Okay, so Hatsume Mei is a very smart girl, but she’s just a little cuckoo in the cranium. Don’t judge her, just accept it. And please don’t use this before I try it out.”

The top of this box also had a note. ‘CHERISH MY BABY!!! He’s very young and easily startled, but he’s very smart! He can translate multiple sign languages and speak through the speakers attached to the choker! PLEASE LOVE HIM AS MUCH AS I DO!!!!’

27 found himself curious and more than a little disturbed by the implication that there was a baby in this box, before he opened it to find a mess of wiring with thin pieces of metal attached. “That’s...promising,” Yamada said, though he looked more disturbed than 27 felt just a moment ago. “Lot of electrical stuff... easily startled ... I’m wondering if I should ask Powerloader to take a look at how well she covered the wiring, that kind of sounds like there’s a live one in there.”

As if on cue, Yamada’s nervous poke was answered by a sputter of sparks.

“Okay, let’s hold off on that one! That was a very thoughtful idea, though!” Yamada says, folding the flaps over before he shoves the box next to the couch, close to the wall.

Yamada instructs them to take inventory of their new possessions, and organize them in their rooms. He also offers to set some aside to be donated if they have no use for them, but those comments seem to be directed more towards Eri than 27. Though 27 wants to argue against the idea, when he sees how little space there is in Eri’s room for all of her new gifts, and that she already has a great deal of them, he relents and goes to his room to sort through his items.

Yamada won’t let him touch the box from the Crazy Baby Lady, though.

10 cat keychains, now placed beside the lucky cat statues. Three new notebooks on top of the stack that he doesn’t use, that he can at least enjoy looking at. Five new pens, and he can’t help but smile at the one that has a figure of a cat at the end. The clothing is sorted away, and the box from the Quirk Bandit sits on top of his bookshelf. He can see it as soon as he wakes up in the morning, and remember to answer to it the next time he sees him.

The troll doll is the first thing he grabs from his bag, and puts in a place of honor, centered in front of the cat figures. The doll’s purple hair was gelled to resemble his, the skin painted white and dark circles added beneath the eyes. The scars were missing, but it was clear that Bakugo took his time to alter the doll to resemble him, which was amusing to imagine.

There are a few books from the hero students. A couple are just pictures of cats, meant to be either funny or inspiring. One is a book of jokes in JSL, and another is a guide to meditation and yoga. There are several cards with notes to use the card to buy food from different restaurants, on the student’s recommendation. Ashi wants him to get an incredibly detailed order from a Boba shop, and he makes sure that one is on top of the stack that he hides in his desk drawer. He’s not sure if he will get an opportunity to use any of them, but if he does, that’s the one he wants to use first.

There’s a lot of assorted candy packages that he’ll probably never eat, and a pair of noise cancelling headphones that seems like an attack on Yamada disguised as a gift. Then there’s a stack of papers stapled together that he didn’t look at before putting in his bag, and after he reads the note, he has no idea what he wants to do with it.

‘My mom sent me some of her favorite recipes! And if you need any help, she said you can text her anytime!’

He only glances at the first page, but sees that the instructions seem easy to follow. He already knows that he doesn't want to eat any of the food that would be made from it, but he wants to try it. To see if Eri would like these recipes too. If he can even make a mother's cooking just by following these recipes.

If he deserves to try, after what he did.

He puts them in the desk drawer, and refuses to think about it. He won't let this bone-deep ache take hold over him, he won't be able to mask it from Eri if he does.

He remembers what he promised her, and sits down to pull out his phone, noticing that a few of the students were already celebrating finishing their first test. He imagines that they'll be even happier after he sends this.

27 couldn't help but smirk when he noticed that his phone didn't have nearly as many chat notifications as it usually did afterwards. He knew that he couldn't inspire them to perform the same way that Eri could.

But if his owner wanted them to succeed so bad, he could ensure it in a different way.

Chapter Summary

Yamada finds out about a certain teapot game that the wards used to play while they lived at the 8 Precepts, and about something that Aizawa has been hiding from him. Shinsou and Eri find out about Shichi-Go-San, and a mean-spirited game that Eri doesn't want to play gets 'upcycled' for Aizawa and Yamada's uses.

Chapter Notes

Wow! I have several reasons to post a second chapter this weekend! 12K hits, over 1000 comments, breaking 300k words published! It's amazing to watch how this fic has grown and how the audience for it continues to amaze me!

Trigger Warnings: Mention of Bug and Bug's quirk.

Previously on Wards of UA: Class 1-A gave Shinsou a slice of pretty much every pizza known to man on Saturday. Shinsou can control Eri with his quirk without asking her a question, and last night decided that he would never use his quirk again. Aizawa received a box from Ms. Joke with his birthday present inside, and an angel costume for Eri.

Yamada takes advantage of Class 1-A's interest in knowing what pizza Shinsou likes and heats the leftovers up for lunch, taking care that every little plastic flag with a label on it doesn't wind up melting in the oven. And while he intended to make a few more phone calls and go through the boxes in the hopes of finding something better than Shouta's best yukata for Shinsou, he finds himself distracted.

"Chewy," Shinsou says, setting aside his slice of five cheese pizza to translate what he signs to Eri. "I don't know. If I like."

Eri copies him before she takes another bite of the sausage slice, which Shinsou didn't even have the chance to test before she claimed it. And despite Yamada's attempts to make sure Class 1-A's little experiment didn't go awry, Shinsou protested that he knew he didn't like it.

So far, Shinsou was ambivalent to most of the toppings, but he liked mushrooms and olives. He disliked pineapple and peas, and Yamada claimed the pineapple but shuddered when he remembered that Shouta would actually enjoy the peas. That topping had to be started as a gag, but Shouta swore that it was enjoyable. Like fish eggs on sushi, and Yamada shuddered again just remembering that description, knowing that was absolutely a real topping somewhere.

Shinsou eyed the bacon ranch buffalo chicken specialty slice warily before he took a bite, staring for a while afterwards to try to pick out all the different flavors. "Spicy. Tangy. Weird. A lot. But I like.”

Eri seemed to be getting a little bored of this game, frowning a bit while she chewed as she copied his signs. Yamada wasn't sure if he should like this game either.

Of course, he wanted Eri to learn JSL and he knew she wanted to learn too. And it was pretty adorable to watch Shinsou teach her. But Yamada also noticed that he wasn't really teaching her. He translated everything he said, but he didn't make sure that Eri copied the sign correctly.

He was just making sure that Eri understood the sign, and that was what worried Yamada.

He didn't know if Shinsou just wanted to make sure Eri didn't feel left out of any conversations, or if he was worried that his selective mutism might stop being so selective. Yamada couldn't imagine anything crueler than Shinsou not being able to talk to Eri, to lose his voice so completely like that. To lose more than his voice, honestly.

Yamada didn't know if maybe the gifts were bothering Shinsou more than he knew they did, that maybe that initial anxiety was swelling into something monstrous beneath the surface. But before he can ask, careful not to use any sign that Eri knows, Shinsou stifles another yawn, and this time, it's more noticeable than the others.

“You need a nap, Twenny?” Eri asks, and she seems a little enthusiastic about the prospect of it herself. While Yamada knows their growing little girl enjoys napping nearly as much as Shouta, he imagines that she might have missed out on sleeping next to Shinsou after waking up in her own bed this morning.

Shinsou shakes his head. “Tired. But can't sleep.” He glances at Yamada before he adds, “But will tonight.”

Before Yamada can reassure Shinsou that insomnia was a very common thing in their home, and that he shouldn't feel like he'll be in trouble for it, Eri pipes up again. “We can play Sakazuki! But we can play it-”

“No,” Shinsou sharply says, flinching at his own tone before he curls a hand behind his neck. “It's fine, I'll sleep tonight. It's fine.”

Eri doesn't look convinced, and whatever game they had named after a mafia ritual sounds like the funnest game in the world to her now. She kicks her legs and pouts at Shinsou, the one person who was trying to deny her of that joy. “Please, I wanna play it so-”

“I know this is really important to you, Eri,” Shinsou says, and Yamada can't help but raise an eyebrow. “But I don't want to play that game. We have a lot of other games that we can play, and I'm happy to do that with you.”

Shinsou. Copied Shouta. True, that was the point of modeling behavior. They changed the way they argue while they're around the wards to help the wards learn to communicate their needs more easily, and healthily. But Shinsou didn't just repeat what Shouta said, his voice seemed to get just a bit deeper, with just the slightest rasp. Just a slight difference, but it was noticeable. It was imitation.

And Yamada so hoped that Shinsou gets it down to an artform, and that by the time that Shinsou is comfortable around Shouta and overcomes what he knows is a temporary condition, that Shinsou uses it constantly. He can't even imagine the kind of sasses Shinsou can engineer with that, and he knows that Shouta would be too secretly flattered to stop him.

“But we can play it so you fall asleep!” Eri says, and Yamada can’t even enjoy the little whistle from her saying ‘sleep.’ Because now he’s very concerned about what ‘falling asleep’ while playing a game based off of trading alcohol really entails. “And I’ll-”

“Eri, ” Shinsou snaps, raising his hands before he folds them, his fingers threaded too tightly together as he tries to reign himself in.

“Eri, Shinsou doesn’t want to play that game,” Yamada says, watching the tension coil tighter in Shinsou’s clenched jaw and raised shoulders. “Why don’t we find a different game to play, out of that big stack you just got? I’m sure we’ll find something even more fun.”

Eri shakes her head. “It’s not that kind of game, Yama. It’s a teapot game where you-”

“You’re not playing it,” Shinsou says sternly, crossing his arms as he glares away from Eri. “You’re never playing that game again. Even if Yamada lets you, I won’t.”

Eri takes offense to that, turning to pout at Shinsou with her own glare. “Twenny, you’re being a mean mom! You can’t do that!”

“Because I’m not your real mom,” Shinsou argues back. “But you have to listen to me anyway. And I’m telling you that you’re never playing that game again.”

As much as Yamada wanted to sit back and appreciate Shinsou refusing Eri, something that he’s honestly seemed incapable of doing, this little argument was getting a little too twisted for that. “Eri, I’ve got a fun little project for us to start on, so why don’t we do that instead? Does that sound good?”

Eri opened her mouth, probably ready to tell Yamada that definitely did not sound good, but the sound of the bedroom door opening down the hall drew her to sprint towards it. “Zawa, Yama and Twenny are being mean! I wanna play Sakaz-”

Even if Eri was out of Yamada’s sight, Shinsou’s full body flinch and wide eyes told him what happened. His hands moved to cup around his mouth, and Yamada watched the tears start to gather before the panic set in. “Hey, Shinsou, it’s alright. You’re not in trouble. You’re fine. Do you need help or-”

Just the sight of Shouta walking in, calm as ever and ready to help Shinsou break the control if he needed it, seemed to startle Shinsou out of it. Eri paced back down the hall at a quick step, and Shinsou covered his face with his hands. “Twenny, you’re really scared,” Eri whined, her worries becoming apparent on her face when she noticed that Shinsou was visibly upset. “Twenny, it’s okay!”

Yamada pulled a grimace at Shouta, signing while both wards were distracted. ‘Separate. Bad argument.’ Shouta nodded, and Yamada already knew which position he’d take. “Shinsou, does your head hurt right now?”

Shinsou nodded, barely, and pressed his palms harder against his eyes. If Yamada didn’t know any better, he would chock it all up to a migraine, but he had already seen the tears, and noticed that Shinsou was holding his breath.

“Okay, let’s get you to your room to lie down for a bit, I’ll get some medicine for that. We’ll be right as rain in just a bit, alright,” Yamada said, as quietly as he could while he moved to grab the painkillers from the cabinet. It was a bit easier for Shouta to wrangle Eri into her own room, telling her that Yamada could take care of it, but a bit harder to convince Shinsou to get up and walk with him down the hall.

And as he suspected, his eyes were watery and irritated in the brief flash he saw before Shinsou ducked his head further and turned away.

Yamada closed the door behind him, handing Shinsou his glass of water. “Shou gets migraines a lot, I know they’re one of the worst pains in the world. Do you want me to turn all the lights off, or-”

Shinsou shook his head a bit too vigorously, wincing after he did. Yamada still turned them down a few notches, making sure that the lights hanging on the wall were on, then handed Shinsou two pills.

“Make sure to drink all that water, it’ll help. And, you know, it’s really okay,” Yamada said, torn between trying to get Shinsou to look at him and looking away so the kid wouldn’t feel so vulnerable. “Slips happen, and it’s fine. We’re not angry. You were getting upset, and I should have put a stop to it sooner-”

‘ Stupid. ’ Shinsou signed, betraying the tears with a sniff. ‘ Stupid. Game fine. Wouldn’t be same. Different here. Stupid. ’

Yamada took a seat in the chair, waiting for Shinsou to take the medicine and drink quite a bit of that water, wiping the tears from his eyes afterwards. “It’s not stupid. It’s fine if you don’t want to be reminded of that. And it’s fine for Eri to be fine with it. But she can’t make you do something that you’re not okay with, even if it’s Eri.”

Shinsou ran a hand through his hair, eyes still mostly closed and directed to the floor. ‘ C-H-I-S-A-K-I game. Worst one. I don’t know why. Not. Bad. ’ Shinsou hesitates, folding his hands for a moment before he signs again. ‘ D-R-U-G-G-E-D milk. Made Eri sleep. Gave. Promised things. Each round. I don’t know. Why. ’

Shinsou’s hands started shaking again, and he folded them tighter. Yamada tried not to imagine why, imagine how sadistic that little game was beneath the surface.

It was cold comfort to know that Shinsou didn’t know why it bothered him, that he didn’t know what Chisaki was trying to do. Forcing Eri to fall asleep while he promised things to her, likely veiled hopes of escape. All while she got more sluggish and tired, ending in sleep but likely a drugged sleep that was meant to call up another image.

Yamada had always known that if Shinsou had ever watched Eri die before she was resuscitated, he wouldn’t be the young man sitting in front of him. Shinsou might have chips, but he never shattered, and Yamada knew that there couldn’t be anything more devastating than seeing Eri’s body devoid of life. Even Yamada feels sick to think about it, but for Shinsou, he wouldn’t have been able to go on.

He would have buried it so deep inside himself that he forgot, repressing that image until he could go on living. He wouldn’t be able to live with himself if he didn’t.

“You wanted to protect her,” Yamada says, trying to at least soothe that trembling. Wanting to make sure Shinsou wouldn’t keep wondering, wouldn’t start digging now. “You wanted to get her out, and that sick bastard couldn’t have been any more twisted for making you do that.”

Yamada hopes Chisaki was afraid. That he had enough time to know fear, to know the cruelty of death before it took him. He hopes it hurt .

“Eri probably just liked listening to your promises. She didn’t know what it was doing to you. We...don’t have to let her know. She listens to Shou more than me, and if he says no, that’s the end of it. You can tell her on your own time, but,” Yamada can’t help that little grin, knowing how hard it was for Shinsou to do in the first place. “I’m proud of you for sticking up for yourself, you know? You’re allowed to say no, and to say what you want to do. To tell us what you want.”

He hears another barely audible sniff before Shinsou glances up, just a twitch of that little smirk betrays it. ‘ Can’t. I’m mute. ’

Yamada rolls his eyes at that old gag. “Yeah, yeah. You know what I mean.” He shakes his head as he gets up, and fights the urge to put his hand on Shinsou’s head, to try to reassure the kid a little more that he wasn’t in trouble. “Try to get a little sleep, because that’ll help too. And let me know if you need anything, alright?”

He gets a nod, still small but without the wince afterwards, and Yamada closes the door behind him after he leaves. Shouta gives him a look after he leaves Eri’s room, and they both meet in the office to talk.

But when Yamada notices the box from Ms. Joke is still in the corner, and he notices that it’s not empty, he realizes that they have a lot to talk about.

To his credit, Hizashi waited far longer than Principal Nezu did to bring it up. The conversations with their wards came first, reading each other in on what they learned. Aizawa thought that could be the end of it, that the wards came first in this regard as well, and that they shouldn’t take too long away from them, but then Hizashi mentioned using one of his yukatas for Shinsou to wear tomorrow.

“Hizashi,” Aizawa said, and he hated to be the one to say it. “Shinsou can’t go off campus without an escort, and that’s only to the station. He can’t go to a public place like-”

“He’s not not going, Shou,” Hizashi countered, eyes blazing while he crossed his arms. “This is an important day for Eri, and he deserves to be there. Probably more than we do, to be honest. And don’t worry about the safety issue,” Hizashi said, reaching down and tossing a face mask at Aizawa’s chest. “He can wear a disguise, right? That should do the trick right there! Wouldn’t it, Shou?”

Hizashi waited longer, but he conveyed a far deeper disappointment than even Principal Nezu could manage.

Principal Nezu clasped his hands behind his back, staring out the window for show. “Even though Shinsou isn’t a ward in the care of UA directly, I couldn’t help but be disturbed that a recommendation from Recovery Girl still hasn’t been attended to. It’s quite worrying, Aizawa.”

Aizawa knew exactly which one he meant. “We’ve taken other precautions-”

“But we both know that every precaution needs to be taken,” Principal Nezu says, turning to face Aizawa. “Allow me to be blunt, but you don’t want to give Shinsou a face mask because he wore a different mask before. And you’re concerned with the similarities.”

He was. Giving Shinsou a mask was one thing, a similarity he couldn’t stomach, a comparison he refused to offer, even if it couldn’t be more different. And there was Eri’s feelings to consider as well, how well she would react to seeing Shinsou’s face hidden again. “He’s stopped missing it, it seems. I don't want to set back his progress."

Principal Nezu took his time to reach his chair, and take a seat, settling his elbows on top of his desk before he deigned to answer that. "Would it shock you to know that I have a dog kennel in my home, when I don't own a dog?"

It did. It read deeper than shock, and Aizawa knew that it was visible. He only hoped that Principal Nezu didn't see what it really was. Horror.

"There are things we take with us. Like a collar embedded in the skin," Principal Nezu said, once again pulling on an even more horrifying image. "It's not progress if it only looks that way, and you know that. And I hope you'll take action to correct it."

Aizawa still didn't want to. It was too fresh, and this Sakazuki game had only made those wounds fresher. Chisaki was dead, and that bastard was still haunting them. Something as small as Shinsou yawning called out such a dark moment from their wards' pasts, and he knew the masks would be bigger.

Shinsou had stopped picking at scarves and collars of his shirts. Eri was clearly warming up to Shoji. They were moving on, and they didn't need a push backwards.

"Seriously, Shou, I really don't get this," Hizashi says, throwing a hand between the boxes and the mask he tossed at Aizawa. "You're hiding a present for Shinsou. Eri gets a little angel costume and Shinsou can't even have some face masks. I get that things are rough between you two, but, come on."

Aizawa shook his head, unwilling to believe that Hizashi would take it that way. "That has nothing to do with it. How do you think Eri will react?"

"Eri," Hizashi repeats, his hands falling to his sides. "We're not playing favorites here, Shou. Eri is your ward and Shinsou is mine, but they're both of our responsibilities."

And they shouldn't be. There was a reason that two wards shouldn't be living together. Wardships required a hero to care for a ward in whatever place they found them. They guided them to a better one, more often than not, and that required focus and patience.

Both wards needed their full and undivided attention, but giving something that might be helpful to Shinsou might also be harmful for Eri.

"He wouldn't wear it," Aizawa says, and clings to the image of Shinsou's panicked looks in Eri's direction while his fingers toyed with a scarf. "He knows what it would remind her of."

Hizashi shakes his head, but says nothing, knowing that he's right. As much as he had a right to argue that it was wrong to hide this from Shinsou, and Aizawa honestly couldn't argue against that, he knew the reality of the situation.

And Aizawa knew that it was still wrong. "When it's not as fresh, we can come back to this. But not now, not after Chisaki."

Hizashi stares at the box, and he knows that he still wants to argue. But he doesn't, he doesn't have the words to argue when he knows the truth of the matter. When they both know that there are wounds that they need to ignore for the time being. "Are you going to be there tomorrow, or are the Furokages eager to talk?"

Aizawa honestly doesn't know what he would have chosen, and finds himself relieved that it's not an option. “Naomasa reached out, but they didn’t respond. He’s working with the local police, someone will approach them tomorrow. It might be better to see a uniform than just a phone call.”

Hizashi nods, “Good. Because we’re all going, and we’re going to celebrate the darling little girl who is the joy of all of our lives, and we’re going to put aside all that nasty business for one day and just be... you know! Two pro heroes and two wards, out and about and having a fun time, right Shou?”

Aizawa ignores the sinking feeling in his gut. He knows Hizashi better than his weapons, and he knows how to read him better than any book. He knows what he was about to say, and knows that he’s trying to hide it after the fact.

But Aizawa ignores it.

“Shinsou does need a disguise of some sort. Naomasa will attempt to kill me if he finds out about this, as though having two pro heroes as escorts isn’t enough for a festival full of children. Hardly the best location for an assassination attempt,” Aizawa knows that he could handle whoever the Nomu Organization sends after Shinsou, and that he would enjoy it. He would never stoop to using Shinsou as bait, but capturing a live operative from that organization, catching a member who might know more due to the fact that Shinsou had been separated from it for four years would end the investigation much swifter.

Shinsou could find some semblance of peace after that, and maybe start to believe that he was safe.

“I have a few wigs-”

“I know,” Hizashi says with that shit eating grin, as though they haven’t had this conversation a million times before. It’s tactical, and instrumental on too many sting operations to consider not utilizing.

“Nemuri might have makeup. I imagine that the scars would be rather telling for the people who put them there,” Aizawa says, and again finds himself hoping that he has the opportunity to face down the Nomu Organization sooner rather than later. Despite what The Commission believed, his own fight with a Nomu hardly crosses his mind as motivation. Anymore.

“Too bad you don’t,” Hizashi teases, and Aizawa narrows his eyes. “Knowing her though, it’ll be a complete...surprise....” Hizashi’s green eyes widened, jaw dropping open a bit. “I haven’t told them. All day, I didn’t tell them-Shou! Come on!”

Aizawa imagined that Hizashi’s antics would cool or simply boil beneath the surface when they exited only to find that their wards were still cooling down from their argument, but he’s surprised to see Shinsou and Eri in the living room, picking through a few of her boxed games.

Eri had been more concerned than tearful when he spoke to her, explaining that she can sometimes feel what Shinsou feels while under his control. In the ‘Safe Place.’ And though he imagined that his request for her to remain in her own room until Shinsou was recovered would be ignored, he didn’t expect to see Shinsou recover so quickly.

“Zawa, Yama! We’re not keeping these games,” Eri decided, shaking her head vigorously. “They’re mean, and I don’t wanna be mean to Twenny.”

Hizashi shot him a look, first admiring how kindhearted Eri was to refuse to play a mean-spirited game, which then sharpened to imply that he had no such qualms concerning Aizawa. “That’s sweet, Eri! We’ll make sure those games go to evil little children who like playing mean games, but first, we wanted to talk about what's going on tomorrow.”

When Aizawa spotted the first game on the stack, taking a seat on the floor with his wards and his husband, and he knew exactly what evil child was going to stow it away in their closet.

“So, tomorrow is Shichi-Go-San, and there's a really fun festival that you can only go to if you're 3, 5, or 7 years old,” Hizashi says, his grin spreading as the realization becomes clear in each of their wards faces. “And since it's your first time going, we're going to work hard to make sure that it's the best day ever! There's going to be candy, and cute clothes- and that's what those boxes are for, we're going to be modeling for hours to find the right one- and you take a very important picture to remember it-”

Eri nodded vigorously, her fists knotted in determination in front of her chest. “Zawa said the heroes get to look at it if they do really good, so it's gotta be a really good picture, Yama!”

Hizashi raised an eyebrow at him, probably a bit insulted that he would use a part of a very special day for Eri as motivation for his class, but carried on. “Actually, this picture is so important that I'm not equipped to take it. It's gotta be perfect, which means bringing in a real professional to capture how cute my little bean is. It'll be the perfect thing to remind us how cute and perfect you are now, so that we can remember that seven years from now.”

Aizawa overlooks that implication, that agreement to take caution clearly fell on deaf ears. He finds himself more worried about a different implication, one that he doesn't want to imagine. A little girl who grew up with more teenagers than agemates would find herself very equipped for all the antics that teenage hormones would inspire her to perform. And Hizashi knew that.

“It's a very old tradition to go to a shrine on Shichi-Go-San, to celebrate a child's growth and well-being,” Aizawa adds, finding himself smiling. “And it couldn't have fallen at a better time.”

That first tooth. Eri's first Shichi-Go-San festival. Even though 5 wasn't an important age for girls, she had missed going to celebrate her 3 year old Shichi-Go-San, and Hizashi was determined to make up for that. And Aizawa found he had little protest, even for something so completely illogical.

While Eri seemed distracted by the boxes in the corner, likely excited about the modeling session more than the candy that she already had too much of, Shinsou seemed to be distracted by something else. He glanced at Eri with a bitter smile, before he looked at Hizashi. ‘ Thank you. I want copy of picture. If okay. ’

“Of course! Shou has a few traditional clothes in his closet for your own modeling session, I'm probably just a bit too tall for you to wear mine. Honestly, we should have gotten everything set up a while ago so you could have your own set-”

‘ Investi... ’ Shinsou stopped midsign, curling a hand around the back of his neck. But Aizawa didn't miss that his fingers brushed against a scar on his chin on the way there. ‘ It's fine. ’

It wasn't any comfort to know that Aizawa was right, and any teasing that their ward was more responsible than their appointed caretaker seemed hollow before he considered it. He could see that Shinsou was concerned, and likely for the same reason that Aizawa was. And that he likely felt that worry more keenly, all too aware that even guarded facilities weren't safe havens for him.

“Hizashi and I will be with you at all times,” Aizawa said, already making plans to hide his gear in his clothing, to look unguarded in the photographs but completely at the ready to defend his wards if necessary. “Naomasa's insistence on a police escort to the station is frankly unnecessary with two pro heroes like ourselves.”

“We’ve worked together a lot, too. Had quite a few team ups,” Hizashi says, nudging Aizawa’s shoulder with an elbow that digs a little too deep. “Shou knocks them down and I blow them away, we’ve pretty much got it down to an artform. And, you know. You really should be there. It’s a family thing, there’s a picture for that and everything. And I just really don’t see you not being there, kiddo.”

Hizashi probably shouldn’t leave his words so vague, to leave an implication that this ‘Mom’ relationship should be encouraged. Aizawa has never tried to convince himself that Eri and Shinsou’s bond isn’t somewhat familial in nature, perhaps even deeper than that, but making it seem as though a teenager should be a parent to a child now that both were free from that twisted situation was irresponsible.

But it earns them a watery smile. Shinsou’s breath hitches after the sigh, smiling to himself in such an unguarded way that Aizawa finds himself shocked to see it. The teenager recovers himself quickly, his face blank but eyes still hopeful, still full of happiness. ‘Thank you.’

Aizawa finds that all his lingering concerns are swept away, even if he knows it’s irrational to ignore the threat of the situation.

He’s just never seen Shinsou look so happy.

4 hours. Hizashi ran out of storage on his phone and had to put everything on hold until he backed it up to his personal cloud before he could continue the modeling session. Eri stopped trying to smile after the second hour, but she still posed for every single picture.

The kimonos were expensive. Aizawa found himself incredibly concerned with how soft the silk of the first one was, how incredibly detailed the patterns were. A startling number of them were hand dyed rather than manufactured, and Aizawa wondered how even UA’s budget could have covered that.

There are two boxes for Eri, but the third is for Shinsou. Aizawa tries to encourage him to select which outfit to wear himself, but after two hours of consideration, he slips behind his back and asks for Hizashi’s opinion. And Aizawa tries to be proud of that little ‘betrayal’ more than the much larger one from his husband.

Once the selections are made, and Eri seems to be so exhausted from her 4 hour shoot that she can’t even attempt to match Hizashi’s excitement over ‘The One,’ they settle in for a quiet dinner. Aizawa isn’t sure who will fall asleep first, their exhausted 5 year old model, the sleep deprived teenager, or himself, still not fully recovered from three nights without sleep though more functional.

That damned loudmouth blonde he married completely ignores that. “You know, this game isn’t too mean,” Hizashi says, his eyes cutting to Aizawa to promise that it will be. “I think maybe me and Shou should show you how it’s done, just to test it out a bit!”

Eri didn’t have to nod to seal his fate, but she did. And now they had to play with an audience.

And Aizawa refused to lose in front of Eri.

“So, since it’s a competitive game, I think we should make it a little more interesting,” Hizashi says with that same cruel smirk he’s worn since opening up the game and finding the whipped cream. “If I win, you have to let me do whatever I want to your hair tomorrow.”

Aizawa knows that they’d never make it to the festival in time, that every single hair would have to be carefully arranged into at least four styles before Hizashi would be satisfied. “When I win, I get to do whatever I want to yours.”

Hizashi’s brief flash of horror draws a grin, before they both settle their chins on top of the stands and place their hands on the pedals. Eri counts them down, and then they’re off.

Hizashi is frantically trying to find a rhythm, and Aizawa knows that will be his undoing. There’s no rhythm, just desperation, letting the adrenaline take hold but managing it to make sure his mind doesn’t become too clouded. The fake hand loaded with whipped cream drifts ever closer to Hizashi’s side as he begins to whine.

“Go Zawa! Go Zawa!” Eri cheers, which draws a louder whine from Hizashi.

“No! Go Yama! Shinsou, help me with this!” Hizashi begs, but his pleading meets a cruel smirk.

‘ Can’t. I’m mute. ’

There’s a click when the hand falls into place, and though Hizashi jerks back, he still gets the bulk of the whipped cream on his face. Aizawa grins victoriously, watching Hizashi bow his head with his elbows braced on the counter, utterly defeated.

They play a few more rounds, trading chores done around the house and at UA. Aizawa wins more often than not, but when he has to both update Hizashi’s gradebook after the midterms and take care of the grocery shopping for a month, he performs a tactical retreat. “It’s late, and we have a busy day tomorrow.”

Hizashi begs for one more round, but a surprising challenge comes forth. ‘ I win. You wear E-X-I-S-T-I-N-G A-M-P-L-I-F-I-E-R shirt. To school. ’

Shinsou doesn’t smirk, but his eyes betray mischief, and Hizashi can’t help but rise to the challenge. “Oh, but when I win, you have to wear my merch! I’ll sign it and everything, so everyone knows you’re just Present Mic’s biggest fan!”

Aizawa watches, but can’t help but want Shinsou to beat his husband for several reasons. To encourage how antagonizing that little challenge was, to hope that the anxiety of that hand moving closer to Shinsou’s face wouldn’t be overwhelming.

And to see Hizashi wear his own knock off merch with a scowl, suffering more with every student who notices, though he’d never back out of an agreement with Shinsou.

“Go Twenny! Go Twenny!” Eri cheers, finding the energy to jump in excitement, though she tosses in another ‘Go Yama’ when Hizashi pouts.

But that pout does him no favors, and Hizashi squeals when he notices it. “No, no, no, no! Shinsou, don’t do-”

Splat.

Hizashi had tried to pull away, tried to keep even more whipped cream from finding itself in his hair, but it was no use. The arc was perfect, covering the glasses that Hizashi didn’t take off to further antagonize Shinsou about the impending victory. When Hizashi flicked the whipped cream off like a windshield wiper, that victorious little smirk broke into a snorting laugh.

One that Hizashi simply wasn't in the mood to tolerate. "Oh? Is that funny, huh?" Hizashi asked, gathering a bit of whipped cream from his cheek onto a finger. "Hey, Shinsou, buddy, friend, I think you've got something right-

Shinsou bolts, but the still lingering smile soothes Aizawa's worries. And Hizashi's game of chase is short lived when Shinsou gathers Eri in his arms, her own outstretched to protect him. "Yama, that's not fair! Twenny won, so he doesn't get whipped cream on his face!"

"Yeah, Hizashi, you're being a very sore loser," Aizawa says, drawing out that last word to remind him how very bad his husband is at this game. "You'll have to go to time out if you don't-

Hizashi grins at the feat, flicking that bit of whipped cream onto Aizawa's face from a meter away. "Oh, you're right, that was very immature of me. I think I'll feel better after a good night's sleep."

Aizawa works his hand, covered in the remnants of whipped cream from the game, just a little more into the hair at the back of his husband's hair. "I think that's a good idea. You should probably take a shower first, I think some of the whipped cream got into your hair."

Hizashi's withering glare makes Aizawa forget himself a bit, pressing a kiss to the corner of his mouth. He usually wasn't so demonstrative when they were around others, and not knowing how Eri would take that kind of affection meant that they were a bit more restrained than usual.

But Hizashi gives him a forgiving smile, before he grabs Aizawa's chin and smears whipped cream onto his cheek with his own. "Yep, you've got the right idea! Let's get to bed, kiddos! We've got a fun packed day ahead of us tomorrow!"

The wards look no worse for the wear to see that kiss, and the bedtime rituals go undisturbed. Eri trailing a blanket behind her as she makes her way to Shinsou's room is unsurprising, and Aizawa wouldn't fight it if he wanted to.

Both of the wards needed to sleep well before tomorrow, and they still knew peace to be something that they found in each other's company.

27 doesn't truly sleep, he couldn't even if he tried.

"It's a family thing."

"I just don't really see you not being there, kiddo."

Too much had changed in those words, and 27 hated that he had allowed himself to be distracted when they were said. That he didn't catch all of it, all of Yamada's tells, any of his owner's. He had no idea what that meant.

Family. Eri was family to him. She was family by that now-severed oath he swore to Chisaki, but she was family in a different way. A way he had been blind to, even though he was called her mother. Even though he tried to be a mother to her, had always tried, even in that room, he never let himself think of what that meant.

Family. He had a family. It was Eri.

He smiles every time he thinks of it that way. He has no idea what family is supposed to mean, what it means in this new place. The 8 Precepts were a different family, 127 called The Miasma a family, but family is meant to be something else. It's meant to be warm. It's meant to make someone smile.

He's never had a family like that. He doesn't remember everything, but he knows that his mother wasn't warm. That she made him cry instead of smile. That he made her feel nothing when he was slowly killing her, thoughtlessly working that abuse into her mind because his head itched.

He doesn't know if he deserves to be Eri's family, but he is. He can't fight that. He can only try to be better, to deserve it.

He takes a picture of her while she sleeps, only lit by the string of lights on his wall. He knows the stillness could call up the image, that he can use it for training. He can play Sakazuki with her if she wants to, and even if it reminds him of it, he'll be able to do it.

He knows it would be different here. The milk wouldn't be drugged. Maybe even the promises would be kept.

"I'll give you a beautiful pink dress, and it will be soft." She had several now.

"We'll go to a park that's full of flowers, and swing on the swingset." She's probably done that already, while he wasn't there.

"As long as we're good, Chisaki will allow us to be happy. To do things that make us happier."

Chisaki liked that one. As much as he stewed over some other lines, as many tests that 27 had to fail and suffer the consequences of after Eri passed out, he liked that one.

He would stand in the corner, silent, and would glare when 27 tried to read his reaction. It was the worst game, it was impossible. Chisaki told him to tell her stories, to promise her things, and he knew that those stories weren't supposed to be believed. They weren't supposed to be promised.

It was impossible. To tell Eri that they would escape when Chisaki was standing right there. He shook nearly every time, tried in vain to hide his stutter. That numb horror unlike any other as he watched Eri start to grow weak under the drug's influence, it helped hide it. Hide that half the things he promised were meant to be kept, even if he wasn't there to see them.

27 preferred to be Unmade. He'd rather let Bug devour him whole, to have Cherry and Blossom in his stomach again, even longer. He didn't know why, not when that game was all mind games and he shouldn't let those hurt him, but he hated even thinking of that game.

Yamada said it was fine. Bakugo said avoidance works.

27 doesn't know why they said those things, why they don't take the broken pieces and laugh. Why they would want to put them back together, but they do.

27 avoids. He doesn't look at Eri when she sleeps, when he can't help but remember. He tries not to sleep himself, but he does.

He doesn't remember the nightmare, even if he knows who was in it. He's just grateful that his panic is silent, that she taught him to be silent. That even if she was dead, she could still haunt him kindly.

Even if she wasn't kind.

He didn't give her a reason to be anyway. He shouldn't feel like there's an ache to think of that. He shouldn't compare Mrs. Midoriya to her, he knows he's different from Izuku. He's different from Eri. There are people who deserve warm mothers, and he isn't one of them.

He doesn't know what Yamada and Aizawa think he deserves, but he's grateful. Even if he feels crazy for thinking of it, for taking those words that way before he catches himself. He's not Eri, they took Eri in for a purpose that she's well suited for. She's a child who deserves to be happy, she's young enough to forget when she wasn't.

He's here for the investigation. That's all. Whatever happens at the end, he won't stay here. He was crazy to think that he could in the first place. He's a criminal, and they're heroes. They only overlook that because they need information.

But 27 gets crazy when he doesn't sleep, and he thinks things that are bizarre.

Shichi-Go-San

Chapter Summary

Aizawa, Yamada, Shinsou, and Eri go to Shichi-Go-San, a festival held to honor young children who are 3, 5, or 7 years old. After the festival ends, Eri is able to take home some new friends, and Aizawa receives a disturbing call from Naomasa.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: None!

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa told his class that none of them will see Eri's Shichi-Go-San portrait unless they pass all of their fundamental midterms with at least an 80% average. Bakugo gave Shinsou a purple haired troll doll for his 'Midterm Offering' for good luck. Ashido knew Shinsou before he was sold, when they were both four years old, and has a video of Shinsou holding his cat plushie Mocha. Aizawa explained that he doesn't want his students to know that he's married to Yamada, because there were some incidents of students taking that inappropriately. Ashido, and the rest of 1-A, refers to the organization that the investigation is focused on (The Miasma) as 'Villain school,' after Shinsou described it that way. Shinsou thinks that Yaoyorozu thinks that he's stupid, because Eri pointed out that he didn't know how to do basic division during homeroom a week ago. Shinsou's hair was bleached after Hari had tortured him by dunking him into a bathtub laced with the chemical while Shinsou was at the 8 Precepts of Death. The Furokages are 50's immediate family members, who Aizawa was able to identify by using the keylogger on Shinsou's laptop.

Hizashi has successfully worked himself up into one of the greatest panics Aizawa has ever seen. His hero manager is unresponsive to his calls, his hair is ‘ The oiliest thing ever, Shou! Why did you do this to me, I don't have time to fix it! ’, and he's not satisfied with any of their outfits. While Hizashi is occupied, Aizawa makes sure his wards are awake and fed, and occupied while he waits for Hizashi to realize that they're not going to be at the festival as early as they planned.

When he hears the knock, Aizawa answers the door prepared to glare down any of Nemuri's teasing, but instead finds himself glaring for a different reason. “ Study. ”

He doesn't spare a glance to Yaoyorozu, but Ashido withers before she hides behind her classmate. Yaoyorozu gives him a nervous smile, trying to ignore Ashido sinking lower and lower behind her. “I apologize for the intrusion, but Midnight-sensei asked us to come. She's... occupied... with the Art History Midterms...”

Aizawa doesn't know what feels worse, completely forgetting that Nemuri had to supervise her midterms or having to be reminded by his own student. A student clearly struggling to convey that reminder politely. “She asked both of you?” Aizawa asks, not shocked at all that Yaoyorozu finished her exam in two hours, but more than a little suspicious of the C- student cowering behind her.

“I can’t leave her,” Ashido protests, wrapping her arms around Yaoyorozu’s waist and arms. “She’s my study buddy! We’re basically handcuffed until I breathe enough YaoMomo air to improve my brain cells!”

Yaoyorozu tries to raise a hand to dispel that, jolting as she’s hugged even tighter. “Class 1-A has devised a new study system. Those of us with high marks are spending every available moment with those that may struggle in certain subjects. I believe it’s having a positive effect on Ashido. I quizzed her after the exam based on what I remembered from it and I’m sure that her exam will place her above the 80% threshold.”

When Ashido loosens her hold to grin at him, two fingers held up for the school’s signature or a peace sign, he narrows his eyes. “I’m impressed. By that system, and your cunning,” That grin and hand both deflate as she realizes the ruse has been discovered. “I can’t imagine I could keep you from seeing Eri, Yaoyorozu. And I’m sure that Shinsou will be glad to see you, Ashido.”

He earns a very weak pout, but he’s not lying about being impressed. It seems using Eri as motivation for his students has proven to be exceptionally effective, finally driving home that a bit of forethought could reap better rewards than a bold and outright attack.

And Ashido needs to understand that before the Heroics Midterm, which is why he doesn’t try to stop her from looking when he hears Eri’s voice. “Momo! Ashi!”

The kimono isn’t folded properly, and her hair hasn’t been attended to at all. The knot at the back is simply a knot, but Aizawa imagines that Shinsou couldn’t do much better after Eri demanded to be dressed in her new clothes.

It’s still very flattering for Eri. The deep red of her shoulder and right sleeve fades gradually to white, with a hand-painted cherry branch blossoming from the left hem to her chest. The sleeves have embroidered storks, and the sash is white with red and black cherry blossom emblems in a traditional pattern, but the maroon cord meant to go around it missing along with the sandals that still need to be tested.

Eri only holds out her arms and twirls, but that’s enough to draw a squeal from Ashido. “Eri! You’re an adorable little princess!” Ashido shouts as she jumps, before she crouches into a kneel, her voice dropping as well. “I pledge my life and my sword to you, by way of the samurai.”

Yaoyorozu stifles a giggle at Ashido’s incredibly odd perception of samurai code, and gives Eri a smile. “You do look like a traditional princess, Eri. It’s very cute.”

Eri’s eyes brighten at that. “Princesses have hairpins! Zawa, can Momo help me put a pin in my hair? Is that okay?”

Aizawa smiles and nods, knowing Hizashi might be initially miffed, but today wasn’t supposed to be about him. If Eri wanted one of her favorite hero students to do her hair, that was going to happen. “If that’s what Yaoyorozu wants to do-”

“Yes!” Yaoyorozu agrees, betraying another crack in her usually calm demeanor before she catches herself. “I mean, I’d be happy to help, Eri.”

Shinsou emerges from the hallway after Eri all but drags Yaoyorozu down it, making Aizawa suspicious that he was there the entire time, but avoiding the impromptu visit from the students. The way that Ashido nearly tackles him into a hug before she remembers herself makes Aizawa concerned it could be due to her, but Shinsou seems unconcerned by the odd handshake she offers instead.

He's not sure why that got started, but as long as Shinsou was comfortable with it, he wouldn't say anything. "Ashido and Yaoyorozu were asked to come in Midnight's place. If you'd rather have Hizashi try, we can wait until he's ready."

Shinsou shakes his head, staring at his occupied hand while Ashido seems oblivious, swinging it back and forth. When Shinsou looks up and glances down the hall, Aizawa nods, once again giving permission to something that didn't require it.

He knew it would be a process. And he knew that at times, familiar reassurance was a better option than a challenge. Shinsou was making progress in other areas, quite boldly if last night's game with Hizashi was any indication, and if reassurance was the foundation that allowed him to do it, Aizawa would give it.

But Aizawa finds himself doubting that Hizashi ever had to do that, and hates the reason for the difference all the more for it.

"Aw! All these cute little cats!" Ashi gushes, tapping one of the cat statues' waving paw with her finger, before she plucks the purple haired doll up by its hair. "You still need to curse him. Like, right before his math midterm, because Bakugo just thinks he's gonna ace it, but if I slip him just a little bit of Benadryl-"

27 shakes his head, unwilling to let a hero become a criminal for his sake. "It's fine."

27 said it just to test it, to make sure the mask was really open. And it was. Those words came out effortlessly.

He doesn't know why. If Ashido asks, he doesn't have a single reason to give her, but luckily she doesn't. She just smiles to herself, before she puts the doll back in its place. Her eyes catch on Mocha, still lying on the bed, but she doesn't mention him, and he's grateful.

"So, 'Hizashi', huh?" Ashido says, her eyebrows dancing suggestively as she leans to the side. "I mean, I guess they must be close, living together with two kids, Aizawa-sensei calling him his first name-"

"They're married," 27 says, utterly confused by how Ashido seems to be implying it rather than saying it outright. It shouldn't really be news to her, she's been at this place far longer than he has and there's no reason-

He forgot the reason. He remembers it when Ashido freezes, but his owner didn't want his students to know that. He guards their relationship, their closeness, because it's distracting to the students. And 27 shouldn't distract them, not during Midterms.

"Don't-"

"Oh my god," Ashido groans, hiding her face behind her hands. "Oh my god, I thought- Ms. Joke said! The forbidden, star crossed lovers separated by different schools! It was so tragic, but not as tragic as All Might's love story! Falling for a younger man, at the twilight of his career- 'A STAR IS BORN!'"

27 doesn't know what that English phrase is supposed to mean, but Ashido looks at him with such a desperate expression before she reaches out, almost grabbing his shoulders before she pulls her hands back in a huff.

“I can't-ugh, I can't believe it! But I have to! I have intel direct from the source! Aizawa-sensei and Mic-sensei...” Ashido trails off, collapsing on his desk chair. “I guess! I guess it works! It's just... they're so different, I thought Aizawa-sensei barely even liked Present Mic.”

“Yamada is different,” 27 says with a shrug. Ashido stares at him intently, narrowing her eyes after a while as a plea for more information, but 27 doesn't have it. He doesn't know how to put it into words, just that it is. That Yamada is different from Present Mic, and it's entirely intentional.

Ashido sighs and hangs her head, but as usual, her pouting doesn't last long. “So! Are we gonna do Eri's make-up? Midnight told YaoMomo to bring her stuff, but I have some really cute setting powder that works as a blush, since, you know,” Ashido trails off, pointing at her own pink face before she presses her hands to her cheeks. “Eri is just so cute! She's gonna be so cute, all dolled up for her first Shichi-Go-San! How do you even stand how cute she is?!”

27 shrugs, but he tries to fight a smile. “I'm used to it.” But while Ashido is distracted by her cooing, he remembers that the makeup isn't for Eri. They must not have been told the full plan. “And I need a disguise, so the makeup is for me.”

Rather than being slightly uncomfortable with that, like Yamada and his owner seemed to be, Ashido looks even more excited. “Really?! Man, the guys are always such wusses about makeup, Even Mr. Manly himself only lets me do face masks. Kaminari only let me do it that one time-Oh, this is going to be so much fun! I'm gonna make you look gorgeous, Shinny!”

With that, Ashido barrels out of the room, nearly knocking into Yamada before he jumps back. Yamada still has that unnerving strain in his smile, that same nervous energy he had this morning when he chugged a cup of coffee and quickly ran back to his room to get ready. At least he looks mostly ready now, dressed in the style of clothes that the festival requires even if his hair is still flat and slightly wet. “Looks like Alien Queen was called in at the last minute! Having fun though, little listener?”

The mask shut. 27 opens his mouth out of habit, and feels the words catch there. He looks away, wondering if Yamada would find some offense to it, if he heard those words come so easily with Ashido but not to him.

“It's okay, you know,” Yamada says, softer and more like himself. “I'm really happy for you.”

When 27 looks up, trying to catch whether Yamada means that, whether it's really not an insult or if his words are just words meant to disguise it, Ashido sprints back inside. “Okay, so YaoMomo doesn't have nearly enough cool tones, but this eyeshadow should really make your eyes pop! And this concealer- oh I can't believe I'm actually holding this. It's. So. Good.”

27 eyes the enormous bag and collection of items fisted in each of Ashido's hands, and Yamada laughs nervously from the doorway. “Well, I guess I should pull out Sho- uh, Eraserhead's wig collection to make sure everything pops, then! Just a little commercial break and we'll be back in no time!”

Ashido's tense smile and wide eyes builds up into a muted scream after Yamada leaves, and though she snaps back into her usual personality after he hands off a box full of wigs, she quickly closes the door behind him. “Oh god, it's real, I really can't- Shinny, I can't. ”

27 just shakes his head, her hysteria seems oddly misplaced. “It's not that weird.”

Ashido just rolls her eyes before she sits on the bed in front of him, picking at her tools before she sighs. “Like, yeah, it’s not weird , it’s just.... I literally had no idea.” Her eyes linger on the box of wigs for a while, before she catches herself and claps her hands. “Right! Makeover time! What look are you going for? Maybe bring out your eyes, bring more attention to your jawline-”

“Less,” 27 says, too quickly before he catches himself, pressing a fingertip to one of the twin scars on his jaw, where the underside of the mask would hold his jaw shut. “The...scars. I could be recognized.”

Memory and Bug only took the mask off once, but they wouldn’t have to remember where exactly those wounds were. It was easy to tell what made those scars. When he looked at them, he could see exactly which piece of metal dug into them. Could almost feel it there, sometimes.

Ashido’s enthusiasm has withered again, and this time it seems to be for a deeper reason. She picks at her tools, biting her lip, before she looks up and notices that he’s seen it. He doesn’t know what to say, to try and reassure her, but he hates that he does this. That he always seems to make her sad when she’s usually so happy.

But she looks at him and grins, even if it’s forced. “It’s fine! It’s just, I’m an airhead, so I kind of... forgot about that stuff. With the villain school, but.” She picks up that stick that she had stared at so reverently before, her hands almost seeming to shake before she holds it out for him. “This will peel those bad boys right off! We’ll get you looking like the pretty little Shinny you are on the inside!”

He can’t help but raise an eyebrow at that. The ‘Shinny’ he was on the inside couldn’t look different from how 27 looked. The scars, the circles under his eyes - that’s how 27 looked. He’s always looked that way underneath the mask.

But the ‘Shinny’ that Ashido saw was that boy that went missing 12 years ago. That boy that looks so different from himself that he doesn’t know if it really could be him. There were similarities, and they were uncanny. The hair, the eyes, the mother.

It would just be easier if he wasn’t that boy. If he could just stop wondering what that boy did, what he felt. If he could have behaved, if he could have been normal.

If he wouldn’t have been sold if he had just been quiet.

Ashido’s fingertip directs him to lift his head and turn towards her, and he looks to see that concentration she wears, tongue poking out and everything. “Must be hard to make me pretty,” 27 says, just to break that ridiculous concentration, and he does.

Ashido pulls away, rolling her eyes while she laughs under her breath. “Shinny , you’re like, stupidly pretty. Like, even the eye circles. I have to hide mine so I don’t look like a crazy person, but yours just make me want to tuck you into a little blanket burrito and make you take a nap. And your hair , I am so insanely jealous about how soft it is! I’m not leaving until I know your secrets.”

“Hair masks,” 27 answers, and doesn’t consider making that information into a trade.

He’s too curious to know if he would look as normal without the scars.

Yaoyorozu finds it hard to get Eri to sit still long enough to finish the intricate braid, and once again wishes that she had a little more experience with young children because of it.

With the pin secured in place, Yaoyorozu checks the braid one more time before deciding that it's perfect. Not a single strand out of place, the braid coiling around in a circle at the back of Eri's head, only a trailing whisp at the corner of her forehead is left out stylistically. Eri turns around, smiling just so with her gap tooth, and Yaoyorozu can't help it.

Eri looks adorable. There's a specific reason why humans tend to think of 'squishing' things that are aesthetically appealing in that way, but Yaoyorozu can't remember it at all right now. She takes care to keep her hands to herself, her smile reassuring and calm, but inside she's screaming to grab Eri in a tight embrace and shake her back and forth until something happens to stop her.

Ashido says 'until she pops,' and Yaoyorozu thinks that's a very apt turn of phrase.

"Do I look as pretty as you are, Momo?" Eri asks, her fingers pressed to her cheeks in a pose and Yaoyorozu wants to pop them specifically, but she doesn't. She remains calm.

"You look very beautiful, Eri. And I'm flattered that you think I'm pretty as well, but you're much cuter than I was at your age," Yaoyorozu says, trying in vain to not remember her own Shichi-Go-San portrait. "Do you want to show Aiz-"

"Twenny!" Eri says, eyes widening as though she had just remembered that Shinsou existed. "Momo, can you please be friends with Twenny? He needs girl friends and he needs friends that are smart. Ashi is really nice, and Ugo is kinda smart, but if you were friends with Twenny you could come over all the time and I'd be super happy! My quirk would work right in no time!"

Yaoyorozu tries to be the calm figure for Eri, to be reassuring even when it seemed that the excitement of the day was getting to her. "If Shinsou would like to be friends with me, I'd be happy to be friends with him. It just takes time for those relationships to grow."

Eri frowns a bit, a bit too disappointed for Yaoyorozu to overlook that their usual science study days have been a bit lacking between Shinsou arriving to UA and Midterms.

"But after this week, we'll be able to spend more time together. I know we haven't had a good experiment session for a while, but I have several ideas for one. And if Shinsou would like to join us, I've been trying to learn sign language to make it easier for him."

Yaoyorozu signs 'Good Morning,' one of the few signs she's actually confident enough to show Shinsou, and Eri's eyes widen again. "You should show him! Come on!"

Yaoyorozu tries not to laugh, dragged by the hand by a 5 year old who's far more excited to show off Yaoyorozu's attempts to learn JSL than her own incredibly adorable outfit. But when Eri opens the door and drags Yaoyorozu inside, she knows that she's probably invisible to Shinsou right now.

"Twenny! Momo did my hair to look like a princess! Does it look cute?" Eri says, spinning around once in a practiced manner, arms outstretched. While Ashido squeals, clutching the wig in her hand a bit too hard, Shinsou smiles before he ducks his head.

He wipes an eye with the back of his hand quickly before he turns back, but the emotion is still audible in the way his voice breaks. "Yea- Yeah, you really look beautiful, Eri."

Ashido seems to melt at that too, covering her eyes with her forearm. "Shinny, don't make me cry! I'm going to cry."

Shinsou huffs a laugh, swallowing before he wipes at his tears again, and Eri notices. "No! Don't cry, Twenny! I don't want to make you cry!"

Eri puts her hands on his knees, pleading with him not to be upset, but he gives her a watery smile before he smooths over the whisp of hair framing her face. “It’s not that I’m sad, you’re just...” Shinsou tries to hide his tears again before he breathes out. “I’m really happy. I’m really happy that we get this.”

Yaoyorozu has to bite her own lip, to try to fight the tears, but Ashido has no such qualms. She scrubs both hands over her eyes to try to hide it, but the pained twist of her mouth makes it clear how bitter that reminder is.

They get this. Eri gets to go to Shichi-Go-San, Shinsou gets to go with her. Those little moments after the rescue, because of it, that Yaoyorozu never considered before meeting Eri.

Whether it was a fight, or relief after a disaster, whatever impact a hero made on a civilian wasn’t always known about. If Yaoyorozu had been a part of the raid, and if Eri didn’t become a ward of UA, she probably wouldn’t have thought twice about the impact that her work would have made on Eri’s life.

It was the small things that mattered the most. Being able to live a better life after tragedy. It was easy to forget that so many years held nothing but tragedy for Eri, but it was a driving force for Yaoyorozu, and for many of her classmates, to make up for them regardless. To give Eri a better life, so that she could forget those dark years too.

And Yaoyorozu notices that Ashido has been hard at work to strip away those dark years for Shinsou too. “Twenny, your face is different,” Eri gasps, poking at Shinsou’s cheek where the scars have been artfully concealed, as though they weren’t there at all.

“Yeah, I’ve been peeled,” Shinsou says, and Ashido snorts a watery laugh. “Looks better.”

Shinsou’s voice becomes more even when he says that, and Eri quirks her lips to the side. “I like both, if that’s okay. I like you with the marks, but you look pretty like this too.”

Shinsou smiles at her, tugging on the end of her free lock. “Yeah, that’s okay.”

“But, the look isn’t complete!” Ashido says, sniffing hard before she holds up a white wig, haphazardly styled to look a bit more like Shinsou’s current hairstyle. “We’re gonna put this bad boy on him so...” Ashido’s voice catches, and she turns her head away and blinks hard, clearing her throat. “So Shinsou really looks like your older brother, Eri!”

Yaoyorozu nearly turns away at that, considering the odds that she would be noticed if she slipped away to take a few minutes in the bathroom to collect herself. But Eri gasps and looks to her, before she looks back at Shinsou. “Momo can do your hair! You gotta have a ponytail to wear a wig, and Zawa lets Yama do it, but Momo can-”

Shinsou shakes his head, clearing his throat. “I’d like it if you did that, Eri. If that’s okay.”

Eri nods, nearly getting tangled in her kimono when she tries to get onto the bed before Shinsou lifts her easily. “Tell me if it gets kinda pinchy, though!”

“I will,” Shinsou says with a nod, before Eri takes a brush and hairband from Ashido and sets to work.

Eri is occupied for all of 10 seconds before she looks up at Yaoyorozu, beckoning her to come closer. Yaoyorozu does, but she imagines that’s not all of what Eri wants her to do, and she fumbles to know how to do it. “I’ve been learning a little bit of sign language from Koda, but I’m still learning, so I apologize if I get a sign wrong.”

‘ Fine ,’ Shinsou signs, a bit slower than he usually does, and sets his phone beside him, possibly to message her if it’s necessary for their conversation.

But Yaoyorozu honestly doesn’t know how to start one. She tends to talk about classes and homework assignments more often than not, to make sure her classmates aren’t silently struggling for help. With the other girls, she can talk about makeup or fashion trends.

With Shinsou, she doesn’t know a single thing to say that wouldn’t bring up something painful for him. Except one thing.

“Eri told me that you read a lot of books,” Yaoyorozu offers, catching Eri’s brightened smile and nod, though Shinsou seems to stiffen. “And that you guided her education.” Yaoyorozu tries to smile more to hide how much she hates that she brought that up, bringing up something painful when she was trying to avoid doing that. “She’s one of the most educated and inquisitive 5 year olds I’ve ever met, and I’m sure that you were a guiding force behind that.”

She knows that Shinsou seems more open when talking about Eri, at least based off of his messages in the group chat. She had hoped it would be the same in real life, in person, but based on the way that Shinsou glances away, his hands folding in on themselves, that seems to not be the case.

Ashido seems oblivious to Yaoyorozu’s struggle, still combing that wig into a wild shape even when Yaoyorozu tries to stare harder to try to get her attention.

‘ You. Thank you. ’ Shinsou signs, and though he still signs slowly, she doesn’t know what the other signs that follow mean.

Her confusion must have been more apparent than she wanted it to be, but rather than turning to the phone, he uses fingerspelling.

Yaoyorozu finds that she can’t fight the tears anymore, especially in this. She smears her eyeliner when she catches the first that falls, and manages to choke out, “Thank you, Shinsou. Tha-at makes me r-really happy. I’m so-orry.”

She all but runs to the bathroom in the hallway, bracing her head with her elbows on the counter while she tries in vain to gather herself. She’s embarrassing herself in her own teacher’s home, crying in a bathroom when she should be helping, but she can’t .

She can’t believe she made a difference for Eri.

She’s wanted to, she’s always wanted to. She’s tried to be the steady reassurance, the outreached hand for everyone who needs it, and especially for Eri. Snacks and science lessons, tutoring for her classmates. She’s never wanted that kind of gratitude, that heartfelt smile that Shinsou gave her, but now that she has it.

It feels nice. It warms in her chest enough to make her ache, and it isn’t deserved, at all . She didn’t fight to free Eri, she hasn’t made nearly as much time as she’s wanted to for her. Too often she just brushes that pleading look from Eri aside, telling her that she’s busy, she’s studying, she’s so exhausted from training that she feels like she’ll collapse into a heap.

She just answers questions. She just guides Eri to know how to ask them. She wouldn't even call it tutoring, not with how unstructured it is, not with how little thought Yaoyorozu puts into it. She finds most of her child-friendly experiments online and copies them, and has never once thought that half-effort was meaningful.

It's so small, so small that it couldn't possibly be meaningful.

But it's the small things that make the difference. The way life goes on after the tragedy, that makes a hero's work worthwhile.

Yaoyorozu risks a look in the mirror after she steadies her breath, and frowns at what she sees, nearly stomping a foot in a way that would make her etiquette teacher bristle from miles away. Her makeup is ruined, her eyeliner can't possibly be salvaged when it's run completely down her face, but she sets to work with a bit of toilet paper to at least not appear too crazy.

Even if she feels crazy. She feels crazy and absolutely giddy to know that she's made a difference. Not heroic in the traditional sense, but heroic nonetheless.

She made a difference in someone's life. She fought the dark cloud hanging over someone in a different way, but in a useful way nonetheless. She undid Overhaul's work in a way that mattered a great deal to Eri, and to Shinsou, and when she looks in the mirror again, she swears to undo it even more.

She swears to be there in every way that Eri needs her, to remember that even their little science studies don't just bring out an interest in the subject for Eri. They rewrite her history, and Yaoyorozu can do that for her.

When she opens the door, Ashido and Eri are standing there, both concerned enough to make her laugh a bit in her own embarrassment. "Sorry, I just got a little emotional. Midterms and everything."

"It's okay, Momo! Twenny said he's sorry," Eri says, and Yaoyorozu can't find it in herself to keep from resting a hand on her head in reassurance.

"No, Shinsou said something that made me so happy I cried, so he shouldn't feel sorry for it," Yaoyorozu says, finding herself tearing up again at just the memory of it, but refusing to let the tears fall again. "I should probably apologize for running out like that-"

"Nah, I'll let him know, but we should blow this popsicle stand," Ashido says, a worrying strain in her smile before she takes Yaoyorozu by the arm and nearly drags her to the door. "Bye Eri! Have fun at Shichi-Go-San!"

"I hope you have a lovely time!" Yaoyorozu says, while Eri bids them farewell. When Ashido closes the door behind them, she finally breathes out, bracing her freehand on the door while the other holds Yaoyorozu's makeup caddy. "What's wrong?"

Ashido shakes her head before she pulls herself to standing. "Jeez, a lot ! So much! I just- they wouldn't have given us a sex wig if they didn't want us to use it, right?!"

Yaoyorozu can only hope that Ashido offers an explanation after she calms down.

Ashido takes another steadying breath, handing off the caddy just to shake out her hands, pulling a face of disgust. "Ugh, if I touched a sex wig I'm gonna need to wash my hands with my own acid, Momo! It's just- EW. Why?!"

“Ashido,” Yaoyorozu says, trying in vain not to betray the swirl of confusion and horror mixing inside her. “What are you talking about?”

Ashido sighs in exasperation, before she lifts her hand to count. “One, Mic-sensei and Aizawa-sensei are married. Two, that means they’re boning, and EW! I mean, okay, I get it, but it’s like... Not okay to think about that?! Like, I know them and I see them and it’s-”

“Not different from any other married couple,” Yaoyorozu reminds, though not as sternly as she should while her own mind is trying to process whether Ashido actually knows this to be fact or if this is another incorrect assumption of hers.

“Okay, right, it’s not because they’re gay or bi or, you know. It’s like finding out your parents have sex, right?!”

Yaoyorozu hopes that her own blank face doesn’t betray how much she agrees with Ashido. It would be hopelessly immature of her to think that way about her teachers, and somehow even worse due to her position as Vice President.

“Okay, so Mic-sensei gave us a box of wigs, and we picked that one, and I made it look cute and all, and I have a pic of Shinsou wearing it to prove it, but when Aizawa-sensei saw it I thought I was going to die. He looked like he was going to kill and then eat us,” Ashido says, counting down for ‘kill’ and ‘eat’ for unknown reasons. “But he said that Shinsou didn’t have to wear a wig, even though Mic-sensei said he did, so I think I picked a sex wig. And I was holding a sex wig in my hands. A sex wig that Aizawa-sensei and Mic- and just EW!”

Ashido shakes out her hands again, and Yaoyorozu struggles to find any other explanation. And hopes that there is one. “Or maybe Aizawa-sensei didn’t know that Mic-sensei wanted Shinsou to wear a wig? And he might have his own reasons for him not to?”

Ashido looks like she wants to protest, but a new look of horror crosses her face, before it falls. “Oh. It was white, so it... might have looked bleached.”

Yaoyorozu finds herself looking away from that, unsettled by the reminder. “That might have been the case. It’s good to know that Shinsou didn’t see it that way, but... You did a very good job styling it.”

Ashido offers her a grin that isn’t nearly as bright as it usually is, before she laces her arm around Yaoyorozu’s. “I mean, I was working with some really expensive stuff, so it was easy. And oh man, everyone is gonna be jealous that we saw Eri dolled up for Shichi-Go-San in the flesh! They have to make due with the picture, but we got the real deal, YaoMomo!”

Yaoyorozu finds herself smiling, even if it is a bit unfair. And she finds it even more unfair that Ashido can do that, to bring a smile to someone’s face even after such a dark reminder.

But even if she’s jealous, she knows that she can do the same for Eri, just differently.

Shinsou, as they expected, was visibly anxious at first. He nearly stumbled into Eri a few times, hovering close to her with his eyes constantly working the small crowd. They made sure to keep close as well, to pick a smaller shrine that would be even less populated than others when most families chose to celebrate on a weekend rather than a weekday.

Even when Shinsou did seem to relax, to take in the fact that the majority of the attendants were elementary school children, he kept close to Eri and close to Aizawa.

And Aizawa found himself wishing that he didn't.

He had no idea that they would pick that wig, that they would style it afterwards. It wasn't close, it shouldn't have been anything close, but the sight rattled him nonetheless. White hair, white pupils, the shape of that jaw. Even things that weren't present kept coming back to him, kept compounding a comparison he didn't want to make.

Hizashi seemed shocked when he asked, but confirmed it nonetheless. "Before the hair dye, it was... it was a little hard to look at. It's a little uncanny."

It was uncanny, and it shouldn't be. Shinsou shouldn't look anything like Shirakumo, Aizawa couldn't afford to look at him that way. It was unfair, it was unprofessional, it was disturbing.

Aizawa finds himself focusing on the differences instead, whenever he looks at Shinsou. The blank expression, the purple hair still tied back in a small ponytail. The scars hidden beneath makeup and beneath the black turtleneck he wears under the purple gradient kimono.

The purple cat ears.

Even if he knows it's just a headband, carefully and mostly obscured by the ponytail, it's...oddly well suited to his hair color. And as much as Shinsou looked like he wanted to complain when Hizashi proposed the idea, once he saw the headband in place, he seemed to lose that ability to fight. Especially when Eri screamed how cute it was at the top of her lungs, jumping with her enthusiasm.

Aizawa notices Shinsou's pointed stare at the vendor hosting a game of throwing darts at balloons, eyes narrowing when Eri says she wants to play that game. "He's cheating. It's not a fair game, Eri."

Aizawa finds himself knocked from his own thoughts by that statement. "How so?"

Shinsou glances at him, before he points at the vendor. ' Quirk. I don't know what kind. ' Shinsou pinches his forefinger to his thumb, then signs again. ' Does that. D-A-R-T drops. Not natural. '

Aizawa can't help but be impressed, nor can he help the vicious grin that pulls as an idea comes to mind. "Using his quirk illegally to scam children is textbook villainy. It would be a shame if two heroes happened to put a stop to it."

Hizashi rolls his eyes, but moves to tighten the half-bun Aizawa's hair is styled into regardless. "You know I can't hit those balloons even if you did get rid of his quirk. Unless I used mine, and then we'd have the police called out for a completely different act of villainy."

Shinsou points to his chin, and nearly matches Aizawa's sadistic smirk, before he tells Eri to start picking out prizes.

It works exceptionally well. Aizawa doesn't even feel the strain of using his quirk repeatedly, knowing that he only needs to cancel the quirk for a fraction of a second. Shinsou doesn't waste a single dart, and with the system that the vendor set in place to earn one more dart for every successful throw, they're able to earn the giant cat plushie with only 300 yen spent.

The vendor attempted to protest, to claim that Shinsou was using a quirk to win, but a flash of Hizashi's hero license made him pale long before the loud and well-deserved dressing down. The children who had been milling around the stall left only slightly before the vendor began disassembling his stall, grumbling all the while about lost revenue.

But while Eri and Hizashi step aside to pose inside a cartoon cut-out, Aizawa can't help but wonder how good Shinsou is at picking out quirks. It's an incredibly useful skill, and one that he wonders if Shinsou is better at than him. "What other quirks do you see?"

Shinsou scans the crowd again, before pointing at a family milling about close to the shrine's entrance. 'Father strength. Mother cat. Child tiger.'

Aizawa finds himself in agreement. Strength enhancement more often than not led to a larger body frame and muscle mass, and beneath the suit, that man had both. The thin woman beside him moved with almost unnatural fluidity, but the obvious tell was the cat ears poking out of her loose bun. The child had smaller ears, and though she was young and her kimono was loose, there was no denying the broadness of her shoulders.

It was a disturbing twist on 'people watching,' but one that he didn't mind playing at all. While Hizashi seemed to huff every time Aizawa instigated the game, he stopped once Shinsou pointed out a man who by all accounts seemed to have no obvious quirk. 'I don't know. E-M-I-T-T-E-R probably.'

Aizawa found himself at a loss as well, until he caught sight of the man's completely blackened eyes and had to look away. "Something to do with his eyes. It's almost certainly an emitter, but I wouldn't rule out transformation either."

He once captured an incredibly disturbing mugger who could project spear-like points from the tar-like substance in his eyes, and that fight was twice as harrowing as it should have been just from the color of it. He could almost hear his mother's scolding every time he focused his quirk on that villain.

Shinsou instigates a few more rounds, but more often than not is distracted when Eri pulls him towards a game or attraction. Aizawa still scans the crowds, still tracks a few challenging subjects to guess, until he realizes that the bags of chitose ame decorating Eri's arms are swelling in number at a disturbing pace.

He has a suspicion, but finds that he doesn't want to prove it, and simply makes a habit of putting money on the counter of every stall that sells that candy when they pass. It was probably Hizashi's fault for impressing upon Shinsou that the candy was meant to promise longevity, happiness, and health for the child that receives it.

Even if it is technically a petty crime, he's sure that it isn't targeting the other children at the shrine, as Shinsou has taken it upon himself to guide Eri away from them every time her eyes widen and stance changes. Shinsou explained it to Hizashi, who signed it to Aizawa after the first few near-misses, that Eri was incredibly fascinated by people or people-like objects that were her own size. She wanted to hug every one of them that she saw.

As much as it was a bitter reminder, of the raid in remembering that puppet that taunted them and the fact that Eri had never been able to socialize with children her own age, it was also a reminder to keep a close eye on her whenever she and Principal Nezu were in the same room. As much as his boss was incredibly generous in some areas, he knew that he was unlikely to be in that one.

Aizawa makes a note to make another call after he checks in with Naomasa, to see if he could call in a favor he honestly doesn't deserve to. And he wonders if it would have an effect on Shinsou as well.

Yamada was trying once again to get Eri to pick the last stall they would visit before going to the photographer, but it seemed that every time they did and started making their way back to the exit, her eyes would catch somewhere and he'd cave again. And make that offer again.

At least they were close enough to the exit that this one might actually be the last.

27 finds himself surprised by Eri's tugging on his sleeve, almost sure that she would have picked his owner to have the honor of playing the last game. "Twenny, we can catch a fish! Like a pokemon!"

27 finds himself smiling again, his cheeks sore with the effort of doing that nearly all day. "It's a little different," 27 says, eyes scanning the rule board to see if this was another stall where the fish were actually exchanged for prizes, but finds that both the board and the fish bowls for sale encourage keeping the fish as a pet. "If we catch it, that man wants us to keep it as a pet."

Yamada doesn't reject that responsibility, his hand falling on 27's shoulder slowly while he grins at Eri. "Well, you have proven that you're very responsible with Beanie. If you wanted to get a pet fish-

"Fishie!" Eri exclaims, already naming the prize that they haven't won. And that light dancing in her eyes, all of her plans already in the making to treasure this first pet, make it impossible to deny her.

He can't help the smile himself, even when it threatens to overwhelm him when he kneels down in front of the large basin with a flimsy paper net. He's cried from happiness too much, too easily, and it's embarrassing. But he's been entrusted with catching Eri's first pet.

A pet that they would never have at the 8 Precepts. A pet that he never had as a child. A pet that Eri deserves, to be happy and normal, and to have everything that a normal little girl wants.

He doesn't doubt that his owner and Yamada will give those things to her, not after today. They can deny her nothing, and he's so grateful for that, he nearly cries again.

But he steadies himself, keeping his attention divided between the others who are playing this game to try to find a strategy that works, and the fish that Eri selected. It's one of the wilder ones, its movement's quick, and its solid black coloring with only flecks of orange make it a prize for the other children.

27 lets the shadow cast in the water, careful not to wet the paper before its time. The game is challenging because of the flimsy material, because the timing has to be perfect. When the fish swims close enough, looks like it will slow, he dips the net in at an angle to scoop it up, and pulls it gently to the surface.

You need a good fishing arm.

27 watches numbly while the fish thrashes and breaks free, tearing a hole in the paper net. He barely hears Eri's disappointment, quickly soothed by the stall owner who offers her a pre-caught fish. It's the wrong color.

There's a game that they play at festivals. Usually in the summer, when everyone wears their yukata.

27 tries to hide it when he steps aside, letting his owner try his hand. His owner wins easily, taking two fish in one net in a feat that astounds even the stall owner.

I'm very good at that game, you know. It's very tricky, but I know all the tricks. I...I'll teach you. I'll teach you how to play, how to hold the net and move it. But you need a good arm for that. That's good, 27. We'll... we'll look ridiculous with all the fish we'll catch, all the colors of the festival. All those yukatas, the lights glowing at twilight. We'll see it all, you know. You'll see....

Yamada's hand is gentle on his shoulder, a barely-there touch that startles him enough to see that Eri wants to show her new pets to him, the bag resting in a fish bowl full of water. "Twenny! Zawa got me two fishies, so you can name the white one! What do you want to name him?"

"Te..." 27 swallows that name, even if he feels it should be given. That it could make it up to him in some way, playing that game without 10 by his side, without 10 teaching him how. "Fishio."

Eri beams at that, and hugs Fishie and Fishio to her chest tightly, making sure not to jostle them too much as they make their way back to the car. 27 finds himself unable to keep watch over their surroundings, even when they move from the relative safety of the festival to a quieter location, better suited for an attack.

27 was young, he was being a brat. 88 had been in a foul mood that day, but judging by the grin, felt better when he fell with his full weight on 27's outstretched arm, shattering it. 10 had spent too long trying to cajole him into letting him heal it, but 27 couldn't convince himself to, out of his mind with pain and convinced that this was the time that 10's touch would hurt him.

But instead of calling for Bug, 10 lied to him. He told him a story meant to soothe a child, even though he knew better than anyone that 27 was a Number, not a child. "You need a good fishing arm."

10 knew better than any Number that they wouldn't escape. That they wouldn't go to a festival. But it sounded nice at the time, just imagining the colors, the lights. Imagining what 10 would look like if he smiled like he meant it, if he was happy.

10 didn't go to a festival, but 27 did. 27 didn't escape, but.

It felt like he did.

"Well, it's not every day that I get to take pictures of a real life princess!" the bespectacled journalist says, reminding Aizawa that this 'freelance journalist' that visited the Class 1-A dorms was not at all the highly-sought after professional that Hizashi had been promised.

The thick smell of cigarette smoke in the cramped studio, hardly broken by all of the air fresheners at work, was another reminder of that.

While the man set to work adjusting his equipment, demonstrating and explaining every part for Eri's curiosity, Hizashi made another rejected call with a glare. His hero manager had clearly screwed them over on the photographer, but his radio station manager didn't seem to deign to fool them. While Aizawa was also in agreement that a 4 star restaurant wasn't at all suited to Eri's tastes, he would have appreciated being able to plan for dinner beforehand, knowing that Hizashi was going to be stewing about it all night.

When the photographer calls for Eri to take her place in front of the slate gray backdrop, the rest of them move behind the camera to keep out of the shot. But before the photographer finishes the countdown, she runs to Shinsou with her hands fisted in his robe. "Twenny, make sure I smile! I really have to take a good picture, so I need to smile right!"

Shinsou looks more disturbed by the implication of that than Aizawa is. Using Shinsou's quirk to make Eri smile for a picture. Aizawa doesn't have time to be disturbed to imagine the finished product, Eri's eyes blank and white and that smile hollow, before Shinsou nods shakily. "You will."

He shakes his head at Aizawa when Eri turns to get back into her place, but the determination set in his face means that he still has a plan to help Eri smile.

Aizawa is too focused on smiling for her, trying to encourage that twitching grin not quite as wide as it should be, to notice Shinsou's plan until it comes to fruition.

He ignores how badly Shinsou's hand shakes when it rests on his shoulder, the fear apparent in the strain of his smile when he glances at Shinsou. He ignores the implications of the gesture, the disturbing manipulation in which he is a pawn. How disturbing that it isn't entirely manipulation, that Shinsou thinks that a friendly gesture like that, despite how forced it is, would make Eri smile.

He ignores it, because it works.

Eri smiles widely, so happily, her missing tooth on full display with her red eyes nearly dancing with light. The photographer takes several pictures, and Hizashi takes several more on his phone, unwilling to wait for the photographs to develop.

It isn't until after their 'family shot,' Aizawa and Hizashi standing behind where Eri sits and Shinsou kneeling at her side, that they find half of those photographs are being developed from the journalist's chest. "I'll do a little color correction and editing on the final shots, but it looked like you guys were excited to see them."

There's more pictures in that stack than the photographer should have been able to take. Several of the pauses between sessions, where Hizashi knelt to encourage Eri or smooth over her kimono, where she ran to Shinsou for reassurance that the pictures were turning out well.

There's one of Shinsou taking his hand away after resting it on Aizawa's shoulder, and Aizawa finds himself surprised to see that the fear he saw wasn't always present. It isn't present at all in that shot.

Even though the bunny ears above his head are.

Aizawa keeps that one, despite Hizashi's protests that all of them need to go into the scrapbook. They can make a copy of it later, but Aizawa will keep it in the pocket sewn into his kimono, next to the capture scarf.

Despite whatever it means, despite knowing how fleeting that moment was, he wants to keep it.

Endeavor glares at his phone, ignoring Hawkes' loud chewing and rambling about the crispness of certain beer brands, willing an explanation to be delivered as promptly as it should be. He doesn't want to face the animal principal, not again, but this time it's for a different reason.

Me: SHOTO, ANSWER MY CALL. I WILL STOP PAYING FOR YOUR PHONE SERVICE IF IT IS NOT USED FOR ITS PURPOSE.

Me: EXPLAIN WHY THE EMERGENCY CREDIT CARD HAS REACHED ITS 2,000,000 YEN LIMIT IN THREE DAYS. HAS IT BEEN STOLEN?

Me: YOU SHOULD NOT HAVE ALLOWED IT TO BE STOLEN, OR AT LEAST REPORTED IT TO ME WHEN YOU NOTICED IT WAS MISSING.

Hawkes continues to irritate him, rambling on about the students at UA and even bragging about trying to steal Shoto for an internship that not even Endeavor was able to procure. Endeavor feels the rising urge to storm out from this waste of his time, but allows the young man in front of him one more chance to explain himself.

“Let’s get back to the main topic,” Endeavor growls, and once again has to convince himself that he has to work with this blaise, lazy hero glitizing for ‘selfies.’ “The modified human ‘Nomus.’ The League of Villains’ abomination.”

Endeavor wants to know whatever information Hawkes has, whatever use he can be made for. To destroy this threat that even All Might failed to, leaving the panic and fear and horror from the Nomus’ mere existence as Endeavor’s task.

Endeavor needs to know more about the Nomus to stop them, but the quickly approaching speck on the horizon intends to educate him in a different way.

Aizawa gets the call after he finally convinces Hizashi to settle for a nice family-style restaurant, but he ignores it. After they order, a far longer process for his wards and especially for Shinsou, he excuses himself to the bathroom, finding himself unnerved to see four missed calls.

“Did the Furokages talk?” Aizawa asks, caught between hope that they did and irritation that he wasn’t there to oversee it, that Naomasa wouldn’t have let him know that they had come to the station a day earlier than planned.

“Have you seen the news?” Naomasa asks, and Aizawa doesn’t like that small amount of panic threaded in the detective’s even voice. “Endeavor was almost defeated by a Nomu. On live television.”

Naomasa says more, but he doesn’t have to. Aizawa barely hears it under the swelling pressure, the boot he was waiting for dropping at last. Naomasa is in the middle of saying something, but Aizawa cuts him off. “Get the Furokages. We need them to talk.”

Todoroki lingers in the back of his mind, a decision already made to go to his dorm shift early to take over for Toshinori. But at the forefront is Shinsou, that trembling hand on his shoulder, that grateful yet watery smile, that smirk.

He knows Shinsou won’t talk, and he knows that he won’t force him. But he needs to protect him regardless.

Chapter Summary

27 uncovers some secrets that his owner and Yamada have been hiding from him, and finds a new level of cruelty to his mutism. Aizawa meets with the Furokages and tries to follow that lead as far as it will go.

Chapter Notes

We're close to 13k hits... On Friday the 13th... Wonder what happens if we reach it? ;)

Trigger Warnings: Insensitive comments relevant to context (Yamada states that there's no reason for a parent to give up their child, but that isn't meant to be taken outside of the specific context it was spoken. There certainly are real-world situations where a child would benefit from proper removal from their biological parents), a lot of 50 content, Bug's quirk

Previously on Wards of UA: Yamada and Aizawa created a system for Shinsou to clap to allow them into his room, since he can't tell them verbally. Shinsou believes that his quirk gave his mother Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome, and that because she is missing in France, she killed herself as a result of it. Shinsou went to school with Ashido before he was sold to The Miasma. Aizawa promised to work with Shinsou for the rest of the investigation and keep him informed if the circumstances changed so that more pressure is on the investigation. Chisaki is dead, but Shinsou does not know that. Shinsou's mother knows French, and taught Shinsou a few words before he was sold, which he remembers vaguely. Ms. Joke sent face masks for Shinsou in a box that had Aizawa's birthday present and an angel costume for Eri, but Aizawa didn't want to give the face masks to Shinsou as Shinsou had stopped picking at his clothes to imitate the mask he wore at the 8 Precepts. Shinsou refused to eat while he was living at the police station, to the point that he had to be force fed every three days. Aizawa mentally repeats his class roster when he needs to ground himself during moments of panic. When Yamada showed Shinsou a scrapbook page with Shirakumo and explained how he died, Shinsou signed 'I'm sorry for your loss,' and wondered what it would feel like if someone offered that sentiment to him when 50 died.

27 only risks it on the hope that Yamada won't tell his owner, because his owner isn't there like he should be and Yamada is angry about that. He waits until Eri is asleep, and doesn't have to wait long with how exhausted she is, before he gently pulls himself away from her to walk to his owner and Yamada's bedroom, waiting for a sign that Yamada might still be awake.

After he gets it, the sound of something being hung up by the sound of metal clicking against metal, he works up the courage to knock before he loses his nerve.

Yamada doesn't clap, has no need to, and simply opens the door with slightly widened eyes, concern still apparent in his smile. “Hey, Shinsou. Can’t sleep?”

There must be a way to tell when he doesn’t. He’s never paid attention to it but perhaps the rings under his eyes become more pronounced. 27 shakes his head. ‘ Nightmares. When I do. Can. ’ Despite himself, despite the fact that this was his plan, that he accepted not only being denied, but being ridiculed, being punished for being weak and daring to ask for help, he has to force himself to complete the sign. ‘ Can you help? ’

Yamada smiles, that soft reassuring smile, before he touches his shoulder as part of his new habit. “Sure, of course I can. Let’s make some tea first, that might help out a bit. There’s some medicine that Shou takes, but since we don’t know what dose you should be on… Not the best idea. Sleep aids help too, though.”

Yamada rambles, but goes silent when he prepares the tea, when he gives a cup to 27 and then to himself. 27 breathes in the muted floral scent, somehow similar to the lavender scent for Mocha, before he recognizes it. Chamomile tea. It’s recommended for traumatized children, it’s soothing. It is, 27 notes as he drinks it.

Yamada takes a sip himself before he runs a hand through his hair, sighing. “It can sometimes help to talk about it too, but I understand if you don’t want to. Shou… never really does either.”

27 can’t quite help himself, not when he knows that this is the only thing that can pull Yamada from that quiet, sullen mood. ‘ Can’t. I’m mute. ’ He only gets an eyeroll before Yamada takes another sip, and 27 finds himself falling into a similar quiet.

It would help. The Internet said that it would. He just doesn’t know how to explain it, how much of it to bare. Not everything, even if Yamada knows that he killed his mother, he won’t say it himself. He won’t make it that real.

‘ My mom, ’ 27 signs, refusing to look up from the tea. Even if he’s blind to what Yamada thinks of that, what he knows, he doesn’t want to know anyway. ‘ Rejecting me. I know why. I dream that. I don’t know. How to stop. ’

He doesn’t know if he should. If his selfishness would kill the last piece of her remaining in this world, if the last shred of her was clinging to his dreams and reminding him of what he did. If that’s what he deserves, if it’s kinder that he never forgets that way.

But he wants to sleep. He wants to sleep next to Eri like he used to, to find comfort in her warmth so bone-deep that it soothes every wound and worry. He hates the cloudiness of his thoughts, the ache in his limbs, how tired he is that he forgets it, that it feels like he’s getting used to not sleeping.

Yamada is staring at his tea when 27 looks up, his mouth opens and closes before he speaks. “I know you might not want to talk about it,” Yamada says, his voice low and quiet for Eri’s benefit. “But why do you think she’s ‘rejecting’ you in that dream?”

‘ Bad kid, ’ 27 signs, even if those words can’t possibly sum up his crimes. ‘ Wasn’t quiet. Used quirk. Should have learned not to talk. She would be happy now. She would. ’

She would have kept him if he was mute, like he is now. If he could have been born with the mask. If his words could have caught before they were ever spoken, if she never heard his voice at all.

He could have been a happy, normal child. He could have had a goldfish, he could have gone to festivals like Shichi-Go-San. He could have gone to school with Ashido for years, could have been a friend instead of the painful reminder that keeps taking her smile away.

Yamada clears his throat, his fingers catching on the corner of his eye before he picks up his mug of tea, though he doesn't drink it. "I, uh. I don't really think you were a bad kid, Shinsou. I really don't think you deserved that, I don't think there's anything that anyone could have done to..." Yamada takes a drink, blinking quickly when he sets it back down, before he looks 27 in the eye. 27 wants to look away from the irritation, the redness that he caused, but he won't. "I was born with my quirk, and when I was a baby, I used it for the first time. I let out a scream so loud that it blew out my parents' ear drums, and... They decided not to take me home from the hospital after that."

27 knew that happened. Children born with powerful quirks, abandoned because of them. The Miasma didn't want to waste the resources to care for an infant, but they kept informants in social services to pick out those who were older and more suited to training. He hated to think what would have happened if Yamada became one of them.

"It's pretty dumb, but I mean, I blamed myself for that for a long time. I knew that I couldn't have controlled it, I was an infant. I couldn't have controlled anything," Yamada says, shaking his head, seeming more shaken by his own words. "But I just kept thinking about how my life would have been different if that didn't happen. If my biological parents would have been different from my real ones. Honestly, I still thought about them before the wedding, wondering if they would even approve."

Yamada laughs, a bitter thing, as if he knows that if his parents didn't approve, they had no right to weigh in on it.

"Parents aren't supposed to abandon their kids. There's never a good reason to, and a kid especially couldn't give them a reason. I don't care if you used your quirk to rob a bank at the ripe old age of four, even if you committed the worst crime in history," Yamada trails off, shaking his head. "Shinsou, you deserved a mother who wouldn't give you away. And there's nothing that you could have done, no reason for her to have done that. There's nothing that you should feel guilty for, especially not for your quirk, or for talking. That's... that's so normal for a kid, it's not even funny."

Yamada's anger, so bizarre and misplaced, is clear in his tone and the way that his fingers tighten on the mug. 27 should take note of that, take caution for it, but the numb shock stops him from doing that. ' Gave. '

Yamada's eyes widen a bit, and he glances to the side before he looks back. "Eri...told Shou that. We had suspicions about something else. The police found the missing child report, and.... We weren't really sold on kidnapping."

Gave. Gave for free.

They thought that he was worthless.

This entire time, they thought his mother just gave him away. The usefulness of his quirk, the potential of his training, they thought all of that was equal to the relief that his mother felt to get rid of him. That she wanted to be rid of him so badly that she wouldn't try to leverage his value to get anything else out of it.

But he wasn't worthless. She had gotten something out of it. He didn't know how much, 1,120 goldfish and almost 400 darts couldn't tell him what he was really worth.

But he could know. It could soothe this odd irritation, this anger bubbling where it shouldn't, where it had no right to reside. They really thought that he was worthless?

“Shinsou, we don't have to talk about it-”

‘ Sleep medicine ,’ 27 signs, desperate to get away from this conversation, regretting that he ever instigated it. What was Yamada's plan, what did he see in him, why was he treating him like this when he thought that he was worthless?

Yamada gives him the medicine, encouraging him to finish his tea, and 27 does it quick enough to nearly scald his tongue. He washes the mug afterwards, copying what his owner does, anything to avoid looking at Yamada again and to slip out of his gaze without insult. Worthless.

He fights to keep it from his signing, to hold himself so tight that he doesn't look as enraged as he is. ‘ Good night. Thank you. ’

“Good night, Shinsou. If you want to talk,” Yamada pauses, but 27 doesn't look to see why, doesn't think he can look at him again without betraying it. “I'll be up for a while. Just so you know.”

27 nods, and makes his way to his room, barely able to make sure that Eri is still peacefully asleep, and remembers to turn his laptop away from her.

He finds what he's looking for quickly.

Aizawa returns home from the dorm to grab a change of clothes and a thermos of coffee, intent to track down the Furokages and drag them to the station himself if Naomasa has no luck. He knows they have no time, The Commission won't hold anything back now that the Number One hero has been hospitalized by a Nomu, on live television no less.

They probably have a day, two if they're lucky, before Mind Slice would be called in. And as much as he wants to believe that the Furokages can tell them something, a name or a description or a place that caused a young woman to slip into darkness, he knows not to trust in hope.

And he remembers to keep a promise.

When he opens the door to Shinsou's room, he's surprised to see the teenager rising groggily from sleeping at his desk, the laptop open and facing him. Hizashi told him that Shinsou had complained about nightmares last night, had discussed his mother briefly before requesting a sleep aid, shutting down that conversation before it could be made useful.

Aizawa can't quite blame the glare and slow clap on the grogginess from the medication, but he ignores it regardless. Casting a glance at Eri to find her stirring, not awake but not sleeping as deeply as he'd like, he turns to Shinsou. “Come to the kitchen. There's something we need to discuss.”

This time, there's no lightness to Shinsou's footsteps as he follows, and whether the effect of the medication is lingering or if he fought sleep enough to render it almost useless. Aizawa finds himself offering a cup of coffee regardless. He sits down with his own cup, trading a look with Hizashi to offer him the chance to escape this conversation, only for Hizashi to wordlessly deny it.

Aizawa waits until Shinsou takes a sip, his head still propped up by an elbow braced on the table, before he begins. “The Number One hero was attacked by a Nomu yesterday,” Aizawa says, waiting for recognition in Shinsou's gaze before he realizes that the drug's effect must be heavy enough to prevent it. "The investigation has a higher priority because of it. I will be pursuing another lead today, but I'd like you to keep in mind that anything we can offer The Commission could be critical to preventing another tragedy. And I don't want something like Chisaki to happen again."

Shinsou stares into nothing, the clench of his jaw the only indication that Shinsou is listening. That whatever caused the teenager's foul mood couldn't have been more poorly timed. There's a flash of a frown and glare, before Shinsou signs, 'C-H-I-S-A-K-I again. I don't care.'

Aizawa glances at Hizashi, to make sure that he won't say it, and sees that he clearly wants to. Aizawa sighs, hoping that with some sleep, Shinsou will be in a more cooperative mood if the Furokages are indeed useless. "Let Hizashi know if that changes."

There's another twitch of a frown, before Shinsou rises from the table, leaving the coffee hardly touched. Hizashi sighs, a bit lighter than the situation calls for. "Well, we finally have a teenager living with us."

Aizawa takes another drink, trying to settle the irrational irritation that rises at that. "He needs to--"

"I know, Shou," Hizashi snaps, before he settles his hands on Aizawa's shoulders, squeezing before he speaks again. "He's going through enough. Just... don't put more on him. More than he can handle."

Aizawa nods, and hopes to keep The Commission from giving Shinsou more than he could handle.

Yamada was trying to remember that this was a good thing. That Shinsou being a sullen teenager, locking himself in his room and only casting glares at any offer of food or fun, was a good thing.

It was just a little hard to remember that when Eri herself seemed a little sullen because of it.

Eri traces her finger around Fishio from the outside of the fish bowl and sighs again, despondent that Shinsou would rather sleep than feed their new pets. And she seemed as convinced as Yamada was that he was sleeping, looking down the hallway with her mind working to find a new plan of action after the first ten had failed.

Yamada slips into the office to grab Shouta's gradebook, sure that the excitement of sticker arrangement wouldn't fail him, but as soon as he locks the door he hears a knock on another.

And finds himself staring at the herolet that he half-blames for Shinsou's new attitude. "Oi, your unpaid math tutor needs to do some work on Shitsou. Let me in."

Yamada doesn't consider whether Shinsou is in a conversational mood before he decides to keep his arms bracing the doorway for a different reason. "It's nice of you to make the time, listener, but today isn't the best for that, so I think we'll get a raincheck. And don't you have some stu--"

"Ah, le brouyant!" Aoyama calls, waving his arm as he sprints towards them. "You musn't forget that not all of us have your priviledges, oui?"

The flinch and clenched jaw seemed to make it clear that Bakugo hadn't forgotten that at all, and that perhaps the reason for this impromptu math lesson wasn't entirely selfless.

Aoyama must be Bakugo's assigned 'study buddy' for Midterms, and Bakugo must be so enthused about that, that he'd use his access to the staff dorm to try to escape him. And while Yamada was sure that Shinsou would enjoy having such a friendly and happy-go-lucky person like Aoyama in his life, his habit of dropping into French was a problem. Especially today of all days.

While Bakugo was glaring harder, the pleading clear to see behind the obvious threat, Aoyama was in fact the threat to Shinsou. And while Yamada could pull a page out of Shouta's book and threaten to expel both of them if they don't leave, there was a far more subtle and tasteful approach to this.

After all, there was something to be said for turning threats into opportunities.

"Well, I suppose if Aoyama agrees to keep you out of trouble, I can ask Shinsou if he's down for a little study sesh," Yamada says, feeling a bit sadistic to enjoy watching the life fade from Bakugo's eyes at the offer.

"Ah! Visiting le petit violette, oui?" Aoyama says, resting a hand on Bakugo's shoulder only for Bakugo to jerk himself away from it. "You two do seem very close, oui?"

Bakugo hisses at the wink and implication from it, hands curling at his sides in warning. "Fuck. Off. With that fucking 'oui' shit! Before I oui the fuck out of you until you're oui'ing dead!"

Aoyama's eyes narrowed ever so slightly, his smile pulling a bit higher. "Oui-"

"Twenny says he wants to!" Eri called, standing in the hallway after slipping away while Yamada was distracted. "And he said he'll help you with the scrapbook, Yama, 'cause he's feeling better now."

Shinsou himself comes into view before Yamada could begin to take back that offer. But while the circles under his eyes are still darker than usual, the glare is replaced with something almost fearful in regret. ' Sorry. I don't know why. I am sorry. '

"It's alright Shinsou," Yamada reassures, and finds himself even less willing to let Bakugo and Aoyama in now that his favorite listener seems to be in a mood to talk. But Bakugo takes advantage of his distraction to slip under his arm, inviting himself in to gawk at the goldfish on top of the kotatsu until Eri introduces them.

' Study. For a little. If okay ,' Shinsou signs, asking without asking, with his eyes still not meeting Yamada's, and Yamada still can't say no. While it wasn't that fun to see those flashes of anger from Shinsou, this meekness was even more unbearable.

"For a bit, yeah! That's fine," Yamada caves, and Bakugo invites himself to Shinsou's room with a pat on Eri's head and a slap on Shinsou's shoulder. Yamada waves off Shinsou's thanks, but before he lets Aoyama follow Shinsou down the hall, he takes his arm. "Hey listener, let me just take a minute from ya!"

Aoyama's tilted head and wide eyes, perhaps a bit excited to spend some time with Shinsou, only made Yamada's request even harder to ask.

"So, I get that it's pretty hard for you to not slip into French, and it's such a beautiful language, I'd love for UA to offer a course to learn it," Yamada says, trying not to ramble yet still finding himself doing so. "But, I'd really appreciate it if you really, really tried not to do it around Shinsou."

"Por quoi?" Aoyama asks, head tilting to the other side. "Shinsou does know some, I- well, I have heard from others, but do not know this myself, of course!" The forced laugh makes it all the more obvious that Aoyama must have learned that about Shinsou from the ever-so-secret group chat, but Yamada ignores that for now. For whatever reason, the little herolets had decided to keep it a secret, and he'd let them have their fun.

"He does, but it's..." Yamada trails off, juggling the words with his hands before he decides to speak them. "Touchy. Some days it's fine, and others, it's not. It could remind him of something that would be better not to think about. You know?"

That smile falling from Aoyama's face certainly answered that question, and whatever conclusions the student was drawing himself wouldn't need to be corrected. "Oh, of course. I did not know this but... I will do my best!"

Yamada nods, happy to know that even if the language barrier put a little damper on that potential friendship, that Shinsou could still see that not every teenage boy in his little circle had to be so angry and sullen. "That's good! Now, go have fun, I'll bring some snacks by in a bit!"

It isn't until Yamada is halfway through the snack preparations that he realizes that if Shinsou did make friends with Aoyama easily, that it might be an indication that he has a certain preference in his social group.

One that Yamada himself falls into.

27 doesn't let Bakugo preen about the troll doll for long. As soon as French Shine enters and 27 can close the door, he begins his plans to make these two useful to him. 'I am going to be taken away. I need you to distract-'

"Phone it in, Shitface," Bakugo grumbles, tossing the doll in one hand just to catch it. "You're talking too fast and I haven't had the fucking time to learn more shit."

'Not going to,' 27 signs, completely to himself, before he side-steps French Smile to grab a notebook and pen. His hand shakes, but he doesn't care. 'They're going to take me away. Distract Yamada.'

Bakugo misses the catch on the troll doll, glaring at the words on the paper. "The fuck do you mean, take you away?! After Trash Bird ate shit, your ass needs to be on lockdown. Fucking..." 27 must have let the mask fall completely, when he notices Bakugo's stare, too calm and too unnatural, he feels how wide his eyes are, his eyebrows raised. "Chisaki got shanked on transit to Tartarus. They didn't tell you that shit?"

No. No no no no, Chisaki said nothing and The Miasma found him. Chisaki was bound for Tartarus, the most secure prison in Japan. UA has one of the most advanced security systems...

Chisaki said nothing, and he was killed. 27 already said too much, he told them about Numbers, he told them specific things about Numbers, he told them about 127.

It was already only a matter of time. His owner had another lead, a lead that wasn't 27. 27's time was already short, he was already useless, worthless, and now The Miasma was coming to dispose of him before his owner made the time.

27 shakes his head from the fog, he knows there are better ways to do that, but he's too numb, he's too focused from all of them, he just tries to breathe so that the voices that he hears can become words again, but he doesn't care what they're saying. He has something that he needs to say, and he needs them to listen.

He underlines 'Distract Yamada' twice, before he adds, 'Office door locked. Investigation behind door. Need in. Need in need in'

Bakugo has a hold in his shirt, pulling him away from the desk, and he lets him, he counts how many ways he could stab Bakugo with the pen while he allows himself to be manhandled to the bed, forced to sit on it. Bakugo waves his arms up and down, and he knows this trick. Bakugo just looks more ridiculous doing it than Rikiya or his owner does.

"This...is not what I had imagined," French mutters, his arms crossed over his chest tightly while he keeps his distance. He doesn't like how fragile 27 is, how easily broken, and it's fine. He won't have to deal with it long, not before someone kills him. His owner or The Miasma, he doesn't have any time .

"Fuck off," Bakugo hisses, and 27 watches the veins rise from his neck at some strain, some anger. Bakugo is an odd friend, the way he crouches in front of 27 is almost making a shield for him without 27 forcing him to. Maybe he forced him to without realizing it, he needs to stop. Bakugo is a good friend, he shouldn't use him as a shield, not with this. Not when someone is going to kill 27. "Back in fucking orbit, Shitsou?"

27 nods, he feels for tears with shaking fingers but finds none, finds himself relieved at that. 'Need in. Need help. '

Bakugo still doesn't know enough sign to be useful, rolling his eyes before he runs his hands through his hair. "Fuck it, fuck. You can pick the fucking lock?"

27 nods, and if he didn't feel so exhausted, would roll his eyes too. He already has a disassembled pen for the job.

"Great. Baguette bitch, talk French or cheese at Micsei or some shit, make yourself fucking useful," Bakugo orders French, who takes a moment to consider the situation before nodding and leaving, still avoiding looking at 27. Bakugo looks back at him, slapping his arm before he finds the computer chair and sinks into it, rubbing his forehead oddly. "I can't leave you alone for one fucking day, apparently. You're the neediest fucking goldfish in the world, fucking hell."

27 listens to the conversation down the hall, trying to work the tremors from his hands. He can't hear the words, but the voices are still too quiet, too stilted. The conversation isn't as engaging as it should be. When he does hear Yamada's voice pick up, a bit louder and a bit more enthused, he hears French Fuck go too quiet.

Before he hears the door open and close, and Yamada says something as though he's confused, to Eri's loud reassurance.

Bakugo pulls out his phone, glaring before he throws it on the floor. 27 doesn't have time to raise an eyebrow at that. If his phone was worth as much as the one that Mirio gave him, he should treat it far better. It was worth more than a 4 year old child.

"Fucking useless, just fucking left , fucking," Bakugo takes a deep breath, sighing loudly. "This is why I have fucking minions, and they better lose their fucking detail," Bakugo mutters, picking up the phone to start typing on it.

Whatever Bakugo plans to do, whoever he plans to call, it needed to happen quickly. 27 just tries to hold himself into his body, tries to breathe the shaking out of his hands while he ran through the plan, how to pick that specific type of lock.

27 was worthless to his owner, and a liability to The Miasma. But he needed to know how little time he had.

He had to know when to tell Eri.

Yamada considers pretending he's not at home when he hears another knock on the door, before he remembers that Aoyama did leave in a hurry. After just a little exchange in French, one where he knew his accent was a bit slap-shod on some words, Aoyama seemed to wilt before he bid his adieu. But that adieu might have been bid without a book bag or something that Yamada hadn't noticed quite yet.

Instead of Aoyama, though, he sees another blonde herolet and a certain musically inclined student that he certainly didn't expect to see knocking on his door. "Is there a party at my dorm that I wasn't told about?" Yamada asks, hoping that Bakugo wasn't taking some absurd liberties from behind Shinsou's closed door.

Kaminari shakes his head, arms raised in a 'T-pose' behind Jirou. "We're here to teach you a lesson, old man."

While Yamada wasn't too stubborn to be pleased that Kaminari's accent improved dramatically by watching American meme videos, he didn't exactly ask for a demonstration to be delivered to his door. "I'm your teacher, and if there's any teaching or lessons to be had here, it will be from me. And today is my half day off, so please leave."

Jirou huffed, so quickly that if Yamada didn't know any better from her grades, he'd think that she didn't understand him, before she turned back to glare at him. "Your radio show sucks, and you should feel bad."

Yamada refused to let that sting. He definitely didn't care about what Jirou, a child who hadn't even been weaned at the primordial beginnings of his radio show host career, thought about it. He absolutely, couldn't possibly give a shit what Jirou, a mere child who wore the T-shirts but was barely a twinkle in her father's eye during the tour, could possibly think about his radio show.

And since Yamada didn't care, at all, he was simply fighting an odd bit of lockjaw when he tried to answer that.

"Oh? And why is that, little listener?" Yamada asks, before he cocks his head, trying not to laugh when he feels so vicious. "I mean, I didn't really peg you for a fan or anything, but it's nice to know you tune in so much to listen, listener."

Jirou's lip curls, and he knows that this verbal spar has only begun when her eyes begin to darken. "No one can tell you what to play, right? Well, how come the majority of your playlists come from Sony contracts? Your Indie hour is so 'underground' that not a single featured band doesn't have a contract pending, and your Up and Comings? Have up and come. They're old news. You don't have anything new to add, so if an old man like you can't bring anything new to the table, just stick to the 80's thrash scene and stop pretending that's not your wheelhouse."

His lockjaw is just acting up so bad Yamada can practically hear his dentist whining in duet with the creak of his molars. At the very least, Kaminari looks like he regrets coming with Jirou, but Jirou doesn't look nearly as full of regret as she should. "Oh-ho! Well, you certainly caught my preference, little listener, but there is a little thing called 'investment,' and I can't really throw my voice behind three guys pounding it out in their mom's garage when there's nothing but shoddy soundcloud and cell phone recordings to back them up! All the talent in the world is useless if I can't direct my listeners to listen to something. But, since you're new to the music biz, I'll let you in on a little secret - Sony owns everything, and if I even paid attention to who's contract is where, I'd drive myself insane trying to find an Indie label with a lawyer that could spell 'right to broadcast,' nonetheless sign an agreement for it."

He knows he's lying, he's lying very poorly and hates his manager all the more for it, but he's determined to not let Jirou know that. Because then, she'd win.

"But since you have such strong opinions about my show, I'd love to hear them! Maybe I could even get you another internship offer, that way you can really see how my show goes on! You'd learn a whole lot from the experience, I'm sure, like how the best speakers in the world can't really help you if the input is hard to reach!"

Yamada knows that's a bit below the belt, especially coming from a guy who had speakers on his hands until his third year. This whole argument has been below the belt and he's supposed to be the adult in this situation, but Jirou narrows her eyes and utters something that seals both of their fates. "You play Morrissey."

Yamada hears a distinct popping sound before his eye starts twitching. "Listen. Before the dementia set in, that man was a-"

Eri looks up at him, finding it odd that he's kneeling in front of the office door with bits of a disassembled pen, but 27 shakes his head and signs 'Danger,' and hopes that she listens to him this time. And thankfully, she does, turning her attention back to the sticker books with a disappointed kick.

He'll explain it later, he'll force the smallest wedge between her and her new fathers if he has to, and he has to do it. This is too important, he has to know what they know.

There's a chance that there's something they don't know, something his owner's lead can't tell them. He knows he's desperate at this point, he knows there's barely a chance, but if he tells them something they don't know, that they want to know, they might keep him. He might make the smallest place for himself here, just enough to deserve their protection. 127 already inspires an odd bit of sadism in his owner, but he can't trust it, can't know it's enough unless he has something to offer to prove it. Unless he earns it.

The lock clicks open, and 27 pulls the bits of pen out, before he opens the door and pulls himself inside. He stands only after he turns on the light, after he checks again and again that there's no one else in the room. This unnamed, unknown 'lead' isn't standing there to taunt him that his place is no place at all, that it's already been filled.

27's eyes fall on an open closet, full of Present Mic and Eraserhead's hero costumes, before he sees the box open in front of it. And though he knows that the information he wants is probably on their desks, or more likely on the laptop, he can't help but check every aspect of this room that they wanted to keep hidden.

And he finds himself swimming in ill-fitting irritation to see what's inside.

'To my sweet cat son! I will steal you again soon, but keep Sushi company until then! -Auntie Emi'

Underneath that note were face masks. Dozens of cotton face masks like the one that Bakugo made him, dozens of face masks with designs and words and cats and whiskers. Face masks that would hide the scars, would hide a crack in his mask, would make it easier to make plays, would hide how his face wasn't natural, wasn't meant to be seen.

Face masks. That were meant for him.

Yamada tried to make him buy something online, to taunt him knowing that he'd never ask for what he really wanted. And what he really wanted was already his, just hidden from him behind this locked door. Already given to him by Emi, but they kept it from him, and even if it was their right as his owner and his owner's husband.

It was wrong.

27 grabs a handful and puts them in the front pocket of his hoodie, then takes the note and carefully folds it to put in his pants' pocket. The note is reckless, the face masks might have already been counted and noticed anyway, but it doesn't matter. They were supposed to be his.

27 remembers himself when Yamada's voice picks up in irritation, and moves to look at Yamada's desk. There's school work, graded assignments and answer keys that Sparky keeps asking for, but 27 won't risk stealing them now. There are more tests meant for 27, for 'Shinsou Hitoshi,' but 27 doesn't care about Shinsou Hitoshi. Shinsou Hitoshi was never born, never able to live the way he should have. Shinsou Hitoshi doesn't have to worry about dying because of that.

His owner's desk probably has what he's looking for, but 27 can't see it.

Not when he sees her.

50.

Her hair is wrong, wet and pulled behind her head. Her eyes are closed, her skin is wrong, and he knows why it's all wrong, he knows when this picture was taken and where.

But her scars are right. They're right, he remembered them right, and when he picks up the folder he doesn't dare think of putting it down. He knows that they'll know, but that thought is just a buzz in the back of his skull, and he's too close to drowning in too much, the happiness of seeing her, having her, this odd sadness that swells because he still can't tell her-

They can't have her.

27 feels every thought, every swell of every other useless fucking thought and feeling become muted in that. They can't have her, they can't have 50, they can't have a single fucking thing about her, not her Number and not her scars and not this picture.

He's sloppy, and he knows it in the back of his mind. He can't stop to hide the folder inside his hoodie, he barely remembers to turn off the light and lock the doorknob from the inside. He moves quick, too quick to be completely silent, but the distraction has nearly devolved into screaming.

When he gets back to his room, he remembers that he shouldn't have used the heroes, they're distracting but they exact a price, and Bakugo wants to know but he can't. 27 won't give him anything about her. "Oi, why the fuck would you take-"

'Leave,' 27 signs, then just gestures for Bakugo to leave, swinging his hand from him to the door. He needs him to leave, he needs to put 50 where she's safe, and Bakugo has already made his other places unsafe, enough that he has a new one.

Bakugo stands up, glaring at him. “Fat fucking chance, asshole, I got your distraction, so tell me what the fuck you- the fuck?! ”

27 should have taken the knife out earlier, shouldn't have let Bakugo touch her, but he has it now, he has it pressed against Bakugo's throat. It wouldn't be easy to kill him, the blade's not sharp enough and he doesn't have much leverage, but it's a threat that he knows Bakugo won't test. He knows he won't, knows that 27 won't use it either, and even if he doesn't, 27 can't. Can't break that promise, not to 50, not in front of her. “Leave.”

Bakugo's eyes are too wide, too wide before they narrow, before he shoves 27's hand with a muted explosion that barely sings with the sparks dancing on his skin. “Fuck you.” Bakugo's expression darkens before he turns, before he finally leaves, and 27 can't bring himself to listen to his exit, to make sure he doesn't say anything. 27 should, because Bakugo knows, he knows that he has 50, but 27 doesn't care.

He has 50. He has 50, and he can keep her safe.

He pulls out and unlocks the box, knows that he needs to move it to the vents now, but he can do that later. He puts the note and the face masks inside first, before the folder. There's papers along with the picture, an Autopsy Report. He'll only read it when the picture stops being enough, but right now, it's too much. He holds it in his hands and lets it become blurry, he knows he can't stop from crying now.

He has 50. He could tell her now. He knows she'd hear it, she'd be able to hear it now.

But when he opens his mouth, the words still catch.

And only the tears come easily.

Mrs. Furokage and Furokage Itsuki acted more like strangers than mother and son, and that invisible divide between them only worsened after they confirmed Furokage Mizuki's identity.

Itsuki doesn't look at it, hands resting on his forehead while he curls into himself a bit more, shielding himself from the sight, but Mrs. Furokage stares. Her mouth opens long before she wills the words to come forth. “I don't like that picture. I know it's-records. And all. But I want you to replace it. With a better one.”

Naomasa nods, folding the manilla folder over to obscure the autopsy picture from view for both of them. “We can absolutely do that. Again, I am so sorry for your loss.”

Aizawa finds himself pacing in front of the window into the interrogation room. He's not allowed inside, he has no reason to betray how important 50 is to the investigation, that there even is an investigation beyond whatever muted truth Naomasa tells. But he wants to make sure that Naomasa remembers every weakness that Aizawa pieced out. Itsuki's criminal record, Mr. Furokage's absence likely due to the embezzling scheme that he's likely running again from a new company. Mrs. Furokage herself is clean, but that prim demeanor has a porcelain sheen, and if Itsuki doesn't crack, she needs to.

Naomasa starts slowly, like he always does. “We want to know what happened to cause the tragic loss of Furokage Mizuki's life. Anything that you can tell us leading up to her disappearance would be instrumental for our investigation. We want to make sure that the people responsible are held accountable for their actions.”

Mrs. Furokage sends a chilling look to Itsuki, but it isn't needed. It's hard to believe that his last arrest was 5 years ago, 5 years presumably spent sober, when he's nearly rocking back and forth now. He's to blame, Aizawa suspected it, but now he knows.

And that's all the better. He's a living attachment to the Nomu Organization, and one that Aizawa will make sure talks.

"Zuki," Itsuki says, clearing his throat before he starts again, pulling his hands down to the table only to wring them. "Mizuki was a good person- an amazing person. She-she shouldn't have..."

Itsuki winces, covers his eyes this time so that the pained grimace is all on display. It hides nothing, not when he pulls his hands away with a shaky breath, the tears still building in his eyes, thickening his voice.

"I-I was stupid, when I was younger. I had a drug problem, 5 years sober now, I... I got better, smarter, I finally fucking..." Itsuki breathes again, shakier, and Mrs. Furokage has retreated back to acting like a stranger. She stares blankly ahead, arms folded, as though she's just an inconvenienced passenger on a bus who has to listen to her son's breakdown. "I got sober, because it's what she would have wanted, but it was too late. I ran up a debt and she paid it, and she shouldn't have-"

"She shouldn't have," Mrs. Furokage repeats, but the coldness of her tone nearly chills Aizawa just to hear it. From the wince, the forced steadiness that follows after, Itsuki feels all of it.

"My dealer said there were people who were going to front me the money to pay him back, and I just had to do jobs for them. I knew it wasn't going to be good, I just wanted 'Zuki to give me another loan, just a little time to cut back and get clean, start paying him back honestly, but she said," Itsuki winces again, shaking his head but the tears still fall harder, despite how hard he's squeezing his hands together. "She said she'd talk to them. Take care of it. But this time had to be the last time, that I really needed to get it together and clean up my act, and I promised - I swore it was the last fucking time, I'd make it up to her and she..."

Itsuki shakes his head, pushes back his chair before he remembers the implication that he shouldn't leave. That they need whatever information he can offer, and he seems to be the only one who can offer it.

"She didn't come back. No one knew, not my hook up. He-he said that he couldn't talk about it, or they'd kill him, and it... it wasn't supposed to be that serious." Itsuki keeps staring at the folder, the shaking of his head becoming more and more muted as the silence drags on. He's losing himself in regret, and Naomasa shouldn't let him simmer too long.

"Do you know anything else about the people who were going to cover the debt?" Naomasa asks, writing a few small notes before he looks up, pressuring Itsuki to continue.

Itsuki swallows, shaking his head, "N-no, just that they had jobs. It was... He was talking like it was going to be out of town or something, like I needed to...to say goodbye. To my family."

Naomasa nods, taking down another note. "Do you recall how large your debt was? How much was owed?"

Itsuki bites his lip, looking away. "Um, no, I... I asked for 100,000 yen, I remember that, I... I knew 'Zuki wouldn't have it though, I-"

"865,000 yen," Mrs. Furokage says, the chill in her tone going brittle as her folded hands clench tighter for a moment. She doesn't say it, but there's no need to, not with that clear and angry regret.

As much as Mrs. Furokage blamed Itsuki, she blamed herself. Mizuki, a college student working part time at a yakitori stand, had paid her brother's debt. A debt that the Furokages could have paid without missing a single meal, and because they didn't, they were missing their daughter.

In the end, all that comes of the meeting is another lead - 'Chilly' Nisa, Itsuki's former drug dealer. While Aizawa hovers over Sansa's desk, waiting for the database to return a result for that handle, he can't help but turn that number over in his head. 865,000 yen.

He hasn't dealt with a great deal of human trafficking cases, but enough to know that number is small. Not even a year's worth of rent for the worst apartment he's ever lived in, and yet it was enough to claim a young woman's life.

Yet, from the other side of the coin, he knows that it's an oddly high price for Itsuki. The jobs that he imagined took place, the few that Shinsou told him about, were ill-suited for a 16 year old boy with a drug habit and a quirk that only emits light from his body. He knows from Itsuki's quirk registration file that it's not dangerous, there's no risk of blindness. There's not a single criminal activity that would benefit from that quirk, and there are far easier targets for trainable adolescents that wouldn't suffer through withdrawals the first few weeks.

Though drug addicts weren't easily missed, they were hard to control. Mizuki was an adult woman with connections, with friends and family who would have been able to help her escape. These jobs - kidnapping, murder, theft, distraction - they took place in cities and on streets. Outside of a compound where Aizawa imagines the Nomu Organization keeps their 'Numbers.' There are people who aren't a part of the organization willingly, and have chances of escape when they perform their jobs. While the evidence of torture is plain to see in the scars on their collected bodies, on Shinsou, it's not enough to keep this organization hidden for so long. Aizawa knows there's a piece still missing.

Aizawa knows there's a reason that Mizuki wasn't able to escape, but he knows the reason Shinsou didn't. He's never forgotten that impossibly small number - 4 years old. That gap toothed grin from the missing child poster, the tooth probably hadn't fully grown in before Shinsou was given to the Nomu Organization. Shinsou was raised by the organization, knew no escape until it presented itself in a sale to Chisaki.

4 years old, with a quirk that was undeniably useful for criminal intentions.

Not for the first time, Aizawa wonders whether Shinsou Ui truly 'gave' away her son. Aizawa knows enough to know that trafficking prices for children can vary wildly, but knowing that the Nomu Organization was willing to take Itsuki for 865,000 yen, he can imagine they were willing to pay far more for Shinsou.

Sansa sighs heavily, dropping his head to his open palm. Aizawa looks up, and isn't surprised by what he sees. 'Chilly' Nisa was found dead three years ago, autopsy results indicate that he ingested poison with a meal that wasn't fully digested before death. It acted quickly.

Aizawa doesn't need the reminder, but he's standing in it right now. Shinsou's steadfast reluctance to eat was founded, was proven before Aizawa gained this sliver of evidence to support it.

He doesn't think to mention that to Sansa, to make sure it's noted before he realizes that he knows the area that 'Chilly' Nisa was found dead in. "Glitzy," is all Aizawa has to say, and Sansa looks between the screen and Aizawa before he finds the humor to chuckle.

“Better you than me, Eraser!”

Eri is knocking again. He knows that he promised, he knows that he needs to reassure her, he knows that he’s being selfish.

But he fucked up.

He doesn’t know how much time he has. He only knows that they found her, and that doesn’t tell him anything. He doesn’t know who the other lead is, he doesn’t know what they know or what he could offer them.

He doesn’t know if he can care. If he can move.

He still can’t tell her.

When he hears the doorknob twist, he tucks 50 under his pillow and sits up, he knows that he needs to hide her from Eri for so many reasons. Some of them are selfish, some of them are not. She just shouldn’t see 50, not like this.

Eri hovers in the doorway, not even fidgeting, and he forces himself to wave her in with an apology that’s dearly owed. “Sorry, I just. I’m acting really weird. I’m sorry.”

Eri pulls herself into his lap, into his arms, and he doesn’t hesitate to give her the embrace that doesn’t make up for half of his antics today. He allowed himself to be reckless, to be taken with that irritation and paralyzing fear, to worry her for it. To almost reject her for it.

He knows that he should, it would make it easier for her. But he can’t bring himself to do it, when her warmth is the only thing that starts to settle the ache in his chest and soothe the stinging in his eyes.

“It’s okay, Twenny,” Eri says, but her shuffling kicks betray how not ‘okay’ it is to her. She shouldn’t be old enough to lie, to hide what she feels, but she feels like she needs to lie to him so he won’t draw away again. And he hates it. “Yama said you’re not feeling good, ‘cause you’re not sleeping good. I just...kinda miss you.”

He pulls her tighter to his chest, running a hand up and down her arm. “I miss you too. I just...don’t want to make you deal with me when I’m acting weird. But I’m fine now. I promise.”

“You can be grumpy with me, Twenny,” Eri mutters, picking at the string of his hoodie. “You have to deal with me being grumpy a lot, so now I can deal with you being grumpy. So it’s fair.”

27 can’t fight the half smile, how ridiculous Eri is being. She shouldn’t have to deal with him, and it wouldn’t be fair to make her.

But she’s so kind, despite everything, and he has no idea where she gets it from. But he hopes she never loses it.

“I’m better now, so we should play whatever game you want, so I can make it up to you. And maybe Yamada will let me help him cook, so I can make it up to him too,” 27 says, even if just saying that exhausts him. He doesn’t want to leave, he would rather stay in this room with 50, to try to work the words past his teeth.

But he knows he can’t. He’s been reckless enough, and now he needs to hide it. He can’t let them suspect, and he can't let Eri down.

And he needs to find something he can give to his owner, better than the lead can, but not dangerous enough that Bug finds him inside his own skin.

Aizawa has gathered dozens of informants over his career. There are those who respond better to a firm tone and unspoken threats, and those that have looser lips when they think they're the ones in control.

Glitzy can go either way, but he could already tell by the way she grins and pulls a bottle of champagne for his tab, that she's having a good shift. She'll probably want to have the upper hand, and he honestly prefers that to her pouting.

As soon as they settle into the cramped space set aside for private lapdances, she shakes out her hair just for show, and just because she's well aware of her reputation. He could cancel her quirk just to save himself the trouble of scrubbing his boots with a toothbrush to get rid of the glitter, but he doesn't. He lets her have her fun, lets her have a long pull from the champagne, before he starts.

"'Chilly' Nisa, died three years ago just a few blocks away," Aizawa says, showing her the most recent mugshot on his phone. He doesn't miss the eye roll, and not for the first time he's glad that criminals are often poor tipplers or poor customers. Memorable in Glitzy's profession either way. "Tell me about him."

Glitzy stretches her legs, balancing her stilettos on his knee as though the sharpness of those points could really threaten him, before she sighs. "Foot guy. I don't know what it is with baby pushers like that, but they're all into feet. He was trying to talk like he was a big one, but he was still licking toes, so you know it was all talk."

Aizawa nods, humming like he hasn't heard that before. Like Glitzy hasn't told him what nearly every type of criminal tends to prefer in terms of fetishes, to the point that he catches himself wondering during a few arrests.

"I remember that one, though. It happened here, but, you know. It didn't," Glitzy says, tone becoming firm with her head tipping towards the door. He can ignore the interference in the investigation of Nisa's death, especially if there's more to it that Glitzy can tell. "So, he definitely wasn't talking about these big shadowy goons that owed him for something, some big deal that he pulled off for them. And he wasn't pulling top shelf shit and swearing that I just had to dip my toes in it to make it worth his time."

Aizawa tilts his head, urging her to continue while she takes another pull from the bottle just to build anticipation.

"So, I was working for that big tip, you know, but this lady that was just supposed to be a customer starts eyeing him. And, you know, skimpy little shrimp like him decided he'd rather stick to his budget after that. They haul off to a room for a bit, she leaves first, but when his time is up, we find out his time is up," Glitzy says, waving a hand with an eye roll, and that lets him know that she was part of the clean up detail. "Whoever she was, she knew exactly what he liked. And if she knows what cuts through the cheese smell, I'd love to know."

"Tell me about her," Aizawa says, and he lets her pretend that she's wringing him for more money than he intended to give her, rolling his eyes when he doubles the cash in his hand twice over.

She plucks the money from him and tucks it into her bra with a self-satisfied smirk, before she leans back again, crossing and uncrossing her ankles. “Mm, looked like a Dominatrix. Black hair, real short. Not too old.” Glitzy shrugs, raising her arms above her head before she eyes the door, and Aizawa knows that’s all she has. “I know you’re a freak about quirks and all, but I don’t have a clue. That’s all I’ve got.”

It’s not worth 29,000 yen, not when it’s barely more than a dead end, but Aizawa tries to convince himself that it’s not. The Nomu Organization has more than one hitman, and this one wasn’t invisible.

And he hopes that Shinsou being familiar with this woman’s method means that he’s familiar with her name as well.

27 tries to hide it. He wants to go back to his room, he wants to curl himself around that picture to make sure it isn’t taken from him, but he knows that will only draw more attention to it.

He plays several board games with Eri, making sure to let her win each round, even though he has to lie about the rules a few times to his own disadvantage. Yamada knows, and shoots him a sly grin each time, but Eri doesn’t catch it, still pumping her hands victoriously with each win.

When Yamada slips into the kitchen to start making lunch, 27 makes sure that one of Eri’s favorite cartoons is on to entertain her. Yamada seems a bit too enthusiastic for the offer of help, but that wide grin falls in shades as 27 sets to work cutting vegetables, and 27 can’t help but wonder if he notices that he doesn’t twirl the knife like he usually does. He doesn’t feel the need to anymore, not when he has her in a different way.

“So, Bakugo,” Yamada says, oddly quiet for his usual way of speaking. “Everything good with him or...?”

27 forced himself to shrug, but still couldn’t look at Yamada to fully convince him. ‘Told him to study. Didn’t like. Got mad. He’s like that.’

Yamada tilts his head, sighing. “Yeah, I guess he’s getting a little Midterm crazy too. I’m not looking forward to my dorm shift tonight, even if I should be grateful that Principal Nezu is giving us a pretty light week.” Yamada takes the cut vegetables to start searing them in a pan, drizzling a sauce over them with a spoon while 27 watches. “But, you like Bakugo, right? He’s a pretty good friend?”

27 nods, even if he’s not sure whether Blasty will see it that way anymore. Now that he looks back on it, the knife might have been a bit too much. But Blasty just doesn’t listen. ‘Good. Annoying, but good.’

Yamada laughs quietly to himself, shaking his head. “I wonder how much Shou thought that about me.”

Yamada still seems worried about something, something that 27 can’t piece out, can only try not to reflect. He finds himself leaning on the counter as he watches Yamada cook, still not able to say what he wants to say. He wonders if Yamada would give him a clue to what his owner wants to know, other than what he already knows. His owner wants The Miasma’s name, Boss’ name, or the location of the main compound. He can only give one of those pieces of information away, and after that, he might lose his only piece of worth here. If it hasn’t been taken away already.

But he finds himself distracted with other thoughts. If there's a trick to talking alone in his room, like Yamada said he did. Yamada said it helped him when he couldn't speak, and 27 doesn't want to do it to speak. He just wants to talk to her.

He wants the mask to open now that it's gone. He wants to tell the picture what he should have told 50 before, what he wishes he could have told her with his hands or his mind, with a quirk that he wanted instead of the one he has.

To tell her he's grateful, he's never stopped thinking about her. She was the only one who smiled at him like that and he's never forgotten that smile. That he wants her to be here, that she deserves to be here more than he does. That she would have done better by Eri, but he did his best, because she showed him how.

Even if Yamada knew that she was here, even if Yamada had hidden her too, he's glad that he has her now. He still won't tell them anything about her, he has no reason to. But he can have this, this small part of her, and it feels too large because of that.

When his owner returns, he has a thick file in his hand that he pulls behind his back when he greets Eri. While Eri tells him about all the games she 'won,' and how Fishie and Fishio are doing, 27 tries to find a place to look where he can keep track of his owner but not invite his attention.

That file was large, and he knows it's full of information about The Miasma. It's a stack of papers that only makes him more worthless, his place more fragile. But the way his owner's eyes focus on him when he nods to Yamada, and tells him he'll be ready for lunch soon, seems to imply there's still a use for 27.

He tries to prepare for it. He knows he'll hear Bug's words, he'll feel that burn under his skin. He has to bear it, he has to beat it. Even if his time is short, he has to secure it.

But when his owner returns for lunch, that look has changed. There's still no tell that he can directly piece out, but his owner seems unsettled by something. Irritated, even. 27 finds himself more quiet because of it, finds it harder to eat when he doesn't feel like he can. He's not nauseous, but there's a heaviness in his hands every time he tries to lift them, and it carries in his mouth as he chews. He gives up when his owner finishes, and he knows Yamada worries because he doesn't hide it well when he gives him the supplement, but he tries to hide it too.

Yamada pulls Eri into a game before his owner turns to look at him, and that seems too convenient to be coincidence. But it doesn't matter, it won't matter if he doesn't do well by this. "Shinsou, come to the office with me. I need your help with something."

27 follows, and doesn't miss that the flaps of the box have been folded shut, but he keeps his attention from being noticeable. He sits in Yamada's desk chair after his owner directs him to with a wave of his hand, and tries to keep himself settled even after his owner sighs. Sighing has never meant anything good, not from Boss and not from Chisaki and not from Bug, but a sigh from this owner, in this moment, is even more frightening.

"I know that this is...frustrating," his owner says, a finger dipping into the folder still laying on the desk while his hand rests on top of it. "I hope that this will make it easier. There's several people that I want to talk about, people that I suspect are part of the organization that we're investigating. I want you to tell me more about them. Anything that you can."

His owner is odd, his tone so oddly soft yet tinged with irritation, with something close to exhaustion but not quite. When he pulls out the first piece of paper, 27 is almost sure it will be Boss again, but instead, it's blank except for a few words written on the top.

“A short woman with short black hair,” his owner reads, before he sets the paper back down, their eyes meeting for a moment before 27 looks away. “Suspected of using poison to kill someone. Is that someone you know?”

Memory. He knows about Memory, and that means he’s deep. It means he’s close to Boss, it means he’s close to finding all their connections. Memory handles everything, all the informants and leads for new Numbers. She proposes new business ventures and which competitors to silence. He knows that she uses poison, and that means.

It means he knows what to expect. If he wants to keep 27.

27 needs him to keep him. He needs to make himself nod, he needs to reach out for this chance and take it. But Memory is important, Memory isn’t just a right hand, she means so much to The Miasma that it would probably crumble without her. And if Memory knew, if she ever found out, she’d use that poison. The slow one, the expensive one, the one she only threatens to use but she never has because it makes her hands a bit too unclean for the mess it leaves. Skin falls away like tissue paper, and the victim just bleeds out slowly, just can’t hold themselves together when something as easily damaged as skin falls apart like that.

But he needs to be kept. He needs to nod, he needs to nod, he can’t lose Eri like this, he can’t lose 50-

“This woman-”

27 shakes his head before he looks away, he feels his fingernails in the scars and he just doesn’t want them to burn, he just wants it to stop when they eat into his skin but not when they’re inside it, tearing it apart, tearing him apart slowly when he feels them moving You won’t tell anyone anything about the Miasma 8 hours Cherry and Blossom Cherry and Blossom Cherry and Blossom

“-sou, Shinsou it’s alright. Stop-”

You won’t like it You won’t like it 12 hours Cherry and Blossom Little shit Stopped moving, they stopped moving he knows he shouldn’t move but they’re on something painful he can feel them swelling he tries not to, he knows not to, they started moving again eating him eating him eating him

The restraint is only on one wrist, he knows not to fight it, he knows to go limp, he knows she sees it when he flinches, when he tries to hold his skin together before they tear it apart

How long how long how long? In his head, they get to his head they eat him eat everything kill him die in the Red Room the Red Room Went too far this time, Bug. How long. Hours eight hours eight hours twelve hours hours Drag of paper towel, but the sting is wrong, the voice is wrong it’s wrong it’s.

His owner’s.

“-shido Mina, Asui Tsuyu, Bakugo Katsuki,” his owner mutters, listing the students in his class under his breath, staring at 27’s wrist, placing a cotton gauze over it. He dug too deep with his nails, he can see the blood still under them on his other hand, but that’s all the blood there is. He watches his owner’s hands move, his fingers, hears the muttering until he starts to feel the warmth from his hands too sharply, flinches back even if it’s not permitted.

His owner looks up, not angry but he should be, and 27 forces his hands to move even if they shake. ‘ Not fighting. Not. Not. ’

“I know,” his owner says, and he can’t possibly be this calm, he has to be angry. He has to be disturbed by what 27 did, he has to be angry that 27 would damage himself like that. “It’s fine. I won’t ask you about that person again.”

His owner just waits, just stares, and 27 tries to collect himself as much as he can. The pull of the gauze on his arm, his feet connected to the floor, the buzzing under his skin muted in this odd exhaustion that falls over him as heavily as a blanket.

He ignores it, only feels it to settle himself, to breathe. He needs to prove himself, he needs to offer something .

‘ Other. ’ 27 signs, refuses to look up from the floor. He focuses on his hands, lets everything else about him swim in that buzzing that grows even sharper. He tries to work against the shaking. ‘ M. E. ’

He curls a hand around his mouth when he feels it, when he feels them , he feels like he’ll vomit them out of his mouth but he can’t , not in front of his owner, he’ll die, he’ll kill him, he tries to breathe .

His owner says nothing, nothing for too long, watching, waiting, he needs to be useful, to say it.

“Shinsou, it’s fine,” too calm, it’s a lie . “You know her, that’s all that I needed to know. Just breathe.”

He knows it’s a lie, he knows it’s a lie . But he trusts it, he forces himself to believe it just to get them out of his stomach, just so he can breathe, just so he won’t vomit. Make a mess, a mess that they’ll make out of him in turn, rip him apart.

But his owner won’t. 27 doesn’t know how he’ll do it, but it won’t be like that. It won’t be the Red Room.

27 still can’t look up from the floor, but he breathes, he forces his hand down even if he wants the weight around his jaw. That only reminds him of the masks they hid, and he tries to ignore it, too raw to hide the flicker of anger that rises with that.

His owner stands from where he was kneeling in front of 27, returns to his chair. He’s not dismissed, but his owner is waiting for something, something that 27 knows and wants to give, but feels too exhausted to give it. He can’t even think about forcing his hands to move now, can barely imagine getting out of his chair and leaving when he’s allowed to. “There’s a picture that I know you have. I want you to exchange it for this one.”

But it’s wrong .

27 doesn’t have time to go numb, knowing that his owner caught him, that he was sloppy, he was caught, when he’s staring at a wrong 50. Her hair is short, she’s too young, she’s barely even smiling , the scars aren’t there . It’s not 50.

“I’m not angry that you took it. I understand why. But... this is a better way to remember her.”

His owner keeps holding out the picture of that wrong 50, but 27 isn’t going to take it. He’s not going to exchange it, trade the right 50 for the wrong one, he can’t make him do that.

“Her name is Furokage Mizuki. I’m not sure if you knew that-”

27 stands up, even if he feels the sting of it, even if that numbness sharpens with every step as he leaves. He knows it's wrong, he knows it's not allowed, he knows far better than to let the door slam closed behind him, but he can't.

He can't stand to listen to his owner talk about that wrong 50 anymore.

He's smart enough to block the door with his body, to sit in front of it with his arms curled around his knees. He hears talking, he hears it too clearly in the numbness, while he's shaking, while he throws his head back against the door because he's crying again.

It's messed up. He can't win like this. He's not supposed to.

The Miasma or his owner. Sometime, someday. Soon.

Soon, he'll be like 50.

Yamada was very rarely at a lost for words, but right now, pacing in front of Shinsou's door, he can't think of a single thing to say.

He knows he locked the office door, but Shouta thinks that Shinsou picked it anyway. That would explain the little distractions that the herolets had been providing, even if a murderous looking Bakugo storming out was still a mystery. And being 'told to study' seems even more ill-fitting as an explanation than it did in the first place.

Shouta doesn't think he'll be able to break through to Shinsou, and Eri just shouldn't be involved in this, at all. The poor kid has a picture of a dead woman in his room, a very clearly deceased woman, and while Yamada can accept a lot of things for the sake of keeping Shinsou a little closer to level, he doesn't think that's anywhere close to being okay.

Shouta said Shinsou looked absolutely furious when he saw the picture of Furokage Mizuki from her passport, and while that might be because Shinsou has an idea about the keylogger, he's hopeful it's just something about the picture that wasn't right for Shinsou. Yamada took his time going through Furokage Mizuki's memorialized Facebook profile, and the profiles of her friends to come up with some better ones.

Yamada knocks, loud enough for Shinsou to hear, but soft enough that hopefully Eri won't be distracted to come to his aid. He waits for a clap, even if his nerves grate knowing that there isn't likely to be one. The door intentionally doesn't have a locking mechanism, but Yamada isn't going to use that to his advantage. He's not going to barge in and take what little privacy Shinsou has.

Even if he wants to. "Shinsou, I want to talk to you, if that's alright. It's just me."

The silence drags on, and Yamada knows that he needs to be at his designated math block in less than an hour. Why Principal Nezu would assign him to supervise a math exam is completely beyond him, but he has far more reasons to hate it now than he did before.

Yamada bends down, hoping that maybe a little offering might sway his little listener into talking. He slides the stack of pictures under the door, and is surprised to hear them rustle against one another immediately. Shinsou must be sitting close to the door, or even in front of it to make himself into a lock. Yamada can't help but hope that it opens.

But it doesn't. The pictures are shoved back under the door, the ones in the middle sliding farther and scattering against the wall.

Yamada bites back a sigh, gathering up the pictures before Eri notices, and just wishes they could talk about this. Whatever is eating at Shinsou right now, it's killing Yamada not even see it. Shinsou just doesn't seem to get angry easily, but whatever has gotten under his skin has gotten in there deep. "Shinsou, we don't have to talk, but..."

Yamada still can't find the words to say, when anything that comes after that would be a lie, but he doesn't have to. He doesn't hear a clap, but the door creaks open, the knob only twisted so that the hinge could swing. Yamada steps inside, too quick to let Shinsou doubt his decision, and sees the kid half-hiding behind the door.

He knew whatever he was going to see, it wasn't going to be pretty, but the puffy red eyes that are so full of fear, and the slight tremble in the hand on the door isn't an easy sight to take in. But Yamada forces himself to smile, and only hopes it comes out reassuring. "Thank you, Shinsou. Let's...just sit for a minute, alright?"

Shinsou closes the door, and when Yamada sits near the middle of the bed, Shinsou takes the chair. He's visibly on edge, looking anywhere but at Yamada with his arms crossing and uncrossing in front of his chest, but Yamada waits. He tries to hope that the uncrossing means that Shinsou might want to talk.

When he finally gets a glance, finally sees Shinsou looking up at him with those clear violet eyes, Yamada takes it as a sign to risk it. "So, I know that you're really upset. And yeah, you've got a million reasons to be. But, I just want to help with that, and if talking's not on the table right now, that's fine. And it's cool if you want to hang out in your room for a bit, I just."

Yamada rubs the back of his neck, trying to think of some way to get this out of Shinsou. He can't look away, he can't let himself not see it like he didn't see 'Dog.' He still needs Shinsou to let him in, to let him help.

Yamada sighs. "Look, I'm just worried about you, kiddo. I know you're hurting, and I want to help. So, whatever way you want me to help, I want you to tell me. So I can make it right."

Shinsou looks at him and looks away, up and down before he finally untucks his hands from under his elbows. ' Five words. Will tell you everything about investigation. '

Yamada can see that Shinsou desperately wants to hear those words, as cool as he's trying to play it off, his eyes are practically pleading with him to figure it out. But Yamada isn't that good with riddles, especially with no clues. "The investigation is important, but I'm way more worried about you, Shinsou. I know that Shouta has been putting a lot of pressure on you, and I really don't agree with it. He's worried, but... he said he scared you pretty bad in there. And he didn't mean to do that, he didn't know-"

' Five words, ' Shinsou signs, his jaw clenching for a moment. He's getting frustrated, and honestly, Yamada is too.

"I...don't really have a clue, listener. Can you give me a hint?" Yamada asks, and Shinsou just shakes his head, eyes narrowing at his bookshelf. It might not be the investigation, since Shinsou didn't seem to react to his mention of it. It probably wasn't Bakugo, even though he's sure that Shinsou is a little worried about that as well. That can only mean that it's 50, something about her that has set Shinsou a little more on edge. And Yamada can only hope that it's not what he's beginning to worry about, beginning to doubt what he thought of her smile. "Is it about Furokage Mizuki? About 50?"

Shinsou doesn't nod, probably doesn't mean to confirm it, but the way his eyes dart to his before he looks back at the wall seems to mean Yamada is on the right track.

“She was someone important to you, right? I don’t really know her, or much about her, but... you talked about her in your sleep once. Was she-”

‘ Five words. ’ He can tell that Shinsou is getting angry, the signs quick and sharp. This riddle is just impossible, and no matter how badly Shinsou wants him to figure it out, he can’t.

“I don’t know what you want to hear, Shinsou,” Yamada admits, folding his hands. “Trust me, I’ve got a lot more than five words to say, but I just need a little input, kiddo. If you want to talk about it.”

Shinsou glares harder, his jaw clenching so tightly that Yamada can see the veins becoming more prominent, before he turns to glare at Yamada. ‘ I’m sorry for your loss. ’

It’s not the glare that hurts, it’s seeing those tears building back up. Yamada doesn’t even need to see that to feel like the biggest asshole in the world.

He knew, he doubted, but he knew that Shinsou was torn up about 50. He was mourning , whether 50’s death was news to him or not, it was tearing Shinsou up inside. The kid wanted consolation, just five fucking words. Words that he gave to Yamada as soon as he knew about Shirakumo, and didn’t know a thing about Shirakumo other than the fact that he was dead.

Yamada lifts his hand but Shinsou pushes the chair away from it, and if that’s not a clear rejection, Yamada doesn’t know what is. There’s not a thing he can say, not now, but he can try. “Shinsou, I’m sorry. I am sorry for your loss, and I’m sorry...that I didn’t really think about it like that. I really should have.”

Shinsou doesn’t look up, going so tense that he nearly shakes with it, and Yamada knows he’s not helping. He can’t help, not now. He had a chance and blew it , the Voice Hero himself couldn’t figure out those five words.

But there’s something else that he’s figuring out, and he can make that call on the way to his exam block.

Eri is knocking again.

27 lays on the floor, boneless. Exhausted, but not the right way. He knows Eri won’t help, that she needs to get used to this. The door held shut by the chair beneath the knob is a kinder separation than the one that will come between them.

He closes his eyes, even if the lights are still on, and pretends it’s darker. Pretends he can’t see, can’t hear. He remembers flashes of it, enough to know that the nothingness was close to it. He remembers the blink near the end of a bad quirk training session, that sudden realization and the numbness that comes with it, before it’s gone.

He lets himself drift in the memory of that nothingness, and knows that he doesn’t need to worry about his voice being stolen. He doesn’t need a voice anymore, they can have it.

He’s dead.

He’s dead, like 50. Like Chisaki. Like his mother. They could all be standing next to each other, or lying next to each other, and they wouldn’t know it. Wouldn’t feel, see, or hear it.

It should work, then. Even if she doesn't hear it. He lets his mouth fall open, and he wills the words to come out. To just say them, even if she doesn't hear them. He tries to imagine that she's next to him, with her eyes closed and hair wet, too far away to feel but close enough to know.

They still won't come out.

After three hours, Eri close to tears after five attempts to talk to Shinsou went unanswered, Aizawa pries the pins out of the door hinges and angles the door so that it comes free, regardless of the chair under the door knob.

And he finds Shinsou asleep. On the floor, oddly enough, but the steady rise and fall of his chest is enough to reassure Aizawa's darkest worries.

He knows the picture is in this room, and it's likely in the locked box that Hizashi bought for him. The box is likely under the bed, and the key for it is likely in this room as well.

But Aizawa doesn't move to confirm any of his suspicions, he doesn't need to find the picture. He knows that Shinsou is safe. Hurting, clearly, but safe.

Shinsou rolls over on his side, and for a moment, Aizawa thinks he'll wake up, likely confused then angry at the state of his door and Aizawa's presence. But Shinsou settles, his arms pulled tighter into himself. Whether it's a search merely for warmth, or habit from sleeping with Eri at his side, Aizawa doesn't know.

He knows it's reckless, but he lays the comforter from the bed over Shinsou, and only breathes when he doesn't stir. Shinsou will probably question it when he wakes up, but Aizawa won't leave any other evidence of his intrusion. He knows that Shinsou is safe, and that he isn't cold anymore.

"Not cold here," Shinsou mutters, startling Aizawa despite himself. It takes too long to convince himself that it's another sleep-talking spell. He spends too long watching Shinsou breathe slow and steady, remembering the flat tone of his voice with those words. "So stay...."

There are very few things that Aizawa knows about the Nomu Organization. That they kill, and have two members known to do so. That they buy some of their members, that they sell them as well. That whoever the woman is that tried to kill Shinsou at the hospital, whatever her number is, she did something to Shinsou that terrifies him to the very brink of what he can handle.

And now, he knows that it was cold. He could be wrong, his gut tells him that Shinsou is sleep talking about the Nomu Organization, but it could simply be the ramblings of an incoherent dream. But he knows it isn't, from an instinct that is very rarely wrong.

In terms of what he can offer The Commission, that piece of information is the most useless thing he's learned all day. But for Shinsou....

He'll never hesitate to put a blanket over him again.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: 50 content

Previously on Wards of UA: Eri calls Aizawa and Yamada 'Dad' sporadically. When Shinsou, Eri, and the Big Three were playing PokeGo, Shinsou signed 'Hero' to Mirio's turned back and Eri noticed. Shinsou wore the 'Lemillion' shirt because it was a short sleeved shirt that would show that the 'Dog' portion of his tattoo had been removed. Mirio gave Shinsou the phone that he received for his internship at Sir Nighteye's agency so that Shinsou could use a text-to-speech app to talk to people who didn't know JSL. Mirio was at the dinner in Chapter 27 where Yamada was showing Shinsou and Eri the scrapbook with Shirakumo's memorial pages. Eri's sign name for Shinsou is 'Mom Shi.' During the photography session for Shichi-Go-San, Shinsou held up 'bunny ears' over Aizawa's head and the photographer was able to get a picture of it. 50 gave Shinsou taiyaki once while he was at The Miasma, and he had to wait until the mask was opened for him to eat it.

Eri didn't sleep well. Even when Aizawa let her follow him to his own doorway, even when he wordlessly accepted her taking Hizashi's side of the bed. They both tossed and turned between fits of intermittent sleep, and he hated seeing it in Eri far more than feeling it himself.

Hizashi hasn't slept at all, but Aizawa knows him well enough to know that the weariness so clear on his face isn't from that. He doesn't ask outright when he hands Aizawa a thermos of coffee, but that glance down the hall is a question in itself. One that Aizawa answers with a shake of his head.

Shinsou hasn't come out of his room. He heard him moving around, pressing his ear to the door after he knocked to let him know that breakfast was ready, but he hasn't left.

Whatever comes of that, however it breaks, Aizawa won't be there to see it. He hopes that Hizashi can wear Shinsou down, he hopes that Eri's voice will eventually reach him. This stalemate can only last so long, and the concept of privacy has already become a very meaningless one in this situation.

He hopes that it won't come to it, but if Shinsou isn't out of his room by the end of the third year's exam block, he will resort to more drastic measures.

Yamada starts searching the cabinets, having already turned the couch inside out. He doesn't lose his phone often, but Shouta isn't even here to call it for him, since he has his Hero Ethics Midterms to supervise. The photographer should be sending him the finished pictures soon, and as soon as he does, Yamada needs to print them out and hope that plan works.

When the cabinets turn up empty, completely unsurprisingly, he casts a glance to the refrigerator before he shakes his head. He's not that sleep deprived. "Hey, little bean! Have you seen my phone hanging around somewhere?"

He hears a quick flurry of footsteps that he almost mistakes for a knock, before he sees Eri holding his phone up to him. And then he does hear a knock.

After taking his phone, Yamada tries to work a smile on his face that doesn't convey half of the irritation that he feels. Whichever little herolet has decided to drop by unannounced, uninvited, and completely unwanted will still get a verbal lashing, but he's finding it far too tempting to just let his quirk do the talking.

Until he opens the door and sees Mirio's cheerful wave. "Good morning! I'm not sure how much help I can be, but I'm definitely going to try...." Mirio trails off, probably noticing the confusion plain on Yamada's face.

But the explanation comes from Eri. "Dad, Mirio can help Twenny! Twenny called Mirio a hero, and Twenny needs a hero to help him stop feeling weird so he can come out of his room!"

Mirio looks down at his phone and starts rubbing the back of his neck, as Yamada pieces out that his phone hadn't really gone missing. And as much as the thought of it stings, the thought that Mirio could be the one to break through to Shinsou because he's a hero in Shinsou's eyes and Yamada isn't, he's desperate enough to only let it sting. "Well, I kinda would have liked to know the plan, little bean, but I do think it's a good one. If Mirio's up for it, we'll have a little 'heroes only' chat to read him into the mission."

Eri still doesn't look ashamed at all, and they definitely need to have a conversation about asking for permission rather than stealing phones to grant it, but Mirio looks no less determined. "I'll be following your lead, Present Mic."

That determination only wavers a bit when they do get into the mission briefing, kept away from Eri's ears in the office. "We don't know who this woman was to Shinsou, and he's not talking to us, but... If he asks you to say five words, they're 'I'm sorry for your loss.' He's just...."

Mirio looks at the door, that smile completely gone as his eyes seem to become a little more distant. "He's not talking about it, that's... really rough."

It's the hesitation that worries Yamada. He knows that Sir Nighteye is still a raw topic for Mirio, that as little as he's talked to Yamada about it, he's probably talked to his friends even less. And as much as that can help him connect with Shinsou, to understand exactly what he's going through by feeling it himself, he doesn't need two kids tangled up in their own pain so deep that they can't cope with it.

But Mirio pulls on a smile, one that almost laughs at his own pain still reflected in his eyes. But it's an honest one, and a promising sign. "I'll see what I can do. I'm not sure why Eri thinks I'm a hero to Shinsou--"

"He wore the shirt," Yamada says, scratching his head nervously when he remembers how embarrassed Mirio had been when he found out Yamada made it. "He was going to wear it to see Chisaki. It's probably not a 'fan thing,' considering, but... It's pretty easy to see why he thinks you're a hero, kiddo."

He does see that same embarrassed blush. As much as Mirio seemed to play it cool when it came to other aspects of his future hero career, fan culture and merchandising were easier to accept in theory instead of experiencing it. But Shinsou wasn't just a fan, and Mirio already knew that. Shinsou was someone that Mirio had already saved once before, and someone that needed to be pulled out a dark and painful place again.

He knows that Mirio can do that, as long as he's allowed in.

Mirio kind of figured that Shinsou could be a stubborn guy sometimes. He probably couldn't have made it through a lot of the awful situations he was put in if he didn't know how to dig his heels in when it counted.

But Mirio is kind of running out of ideas on how to convince him to give up.

Knocking didn't work, trying to talk to him through the door wasn't working, food and coffee didn't either. Mentioning Eri, Yamada, Aizawa, and even the friends Shinsou was making in Class 1-A wasn't working either.

Mirio scratched his head, frowning as yet another message to their chat went unread, before he realized that Shinsou might not even be checking his phone. "We could talk on the chat, if you want! It's probably easier for you, even though I do kind of want to just check on you. We all just want to see you for a second, just make sure that you're not hungry or thirsty or anything-"

Mirio almost falls backwards when the door opens, having sat against it for so long that he doubted it was going to open that quickly. He looks up to see Shinsou staring blankly down at him, but when Shinsou steps away, Mirio takes it as an invitation inside.

Shinsou doesn't look great, and Mirio didn't expect him to. He looks a little paler, his hair is messy and tangled, and he just looks exhausted. He takes a seat on his bed, leaning on his elbows on his thighs, and Mirio just takes a seat on the floor in front of him. Shinsou might have let him in, but he still looks like he wants a little space.

When Mirio raises his phone, waiting for Shinsou to take out his, Shinsou just shakes his head, before he tries to give his phone back to Mirio.

"It's okay, Shinsou, I still really don't need it," Mirio says, trying not to be hurt that Shinsou doesn't want it. Even if he's shutting people out right now, he shouldn't give away his voice like that. And judging from that 'five words' riddle that Yamada talked about, Shinsou's already making it harder for himself. "If you don't want to talk with the phone, we can try to use sign. I'm still just not that great at it, but... Maybe instead of talking, you'd rather listen?"

Shinsou doesn't nod or shake his head, doesn't answer that question at all. But after he puts his phone down on the bed, he glances at Mirio. And it looks like he's waiting for Mirio to start.

And it's hard to know where to start from. "You know, I... lost someone who was really important to me. So I kind of know what you're feeling right now. I didn't want to talk about it either, so I get it, but.... Talking really helped."

He started crying before he even wrote that first text message to Mic. He just kept thinking of the way Mic's eyes were so full of longing, the way his voice got so soft when he talked about Shirakumo. I really wish you guys could have met him. And it was selfish, because he just really wished that his father could have met Sir Nighteye.

It's almost childish in a way, like looking forward to a parent-teacher conference so that his mentor could tell his father about all of Mirio's accomplishments. That dead-serious way that Sir Nighteye would say embarrassing things like 'A bright and shining hero,' or 'A symbol for his time.' Mirio could barely stand it when Sir Nighteye dropped a line like that, especially when he knew that Sir Nighteye never said anything he didn't truly believe, but his father.

His father might have seen that. And his father would have had to believe him.

But Sir Nighteye will never get to meet his father, and never really see whatever hero Mirio becomes. "I... talk to him sometimes. I'm not really religious or anything, but I like to believe that he can still hear me. Just, about stupid stuff sometimes, the stuff I used to tell him anyway, like 'Tamaki and Neji really got into it again,' or 'Man, this essay is really killing me right now!'"

Sir Nighteye probably thought it was stupid to hear those kinds of things from him in the first place, but he never told Mirio to stop. If he was busy, sometimes he'd only hum to say he was listening, but sometimes he'd look up and offer his own advice. Tedious assignments like that can be overcome like any other stalemate. Try to look at it from another perspective.

Sometimes, just saying those things is enough to remember those words, and exactly the way that they were said. Like Sir Nighteye was still there to give him that advice.

Shinsou clenches and unclenches his hands, before he finally speaks. ' Tried. Can't. '

He doesn't need to see Shinsou blinking back the tears to know how bad that must hurt. How cruel it could be, for all that Shinsou had lost, to lose the ability to even talk to the person he had lost. In a way that was so similar, yet so different. "I'm sorry for that, Shinsou. I... It doesn't have to be talking, though. You could sign or just... think it to them. I do that too, sometimes."

Sometimes, when he doesn't want to look like a crazy person in front of his friends or classmates, he just takes a minute to think it to Sir Nighteye. Hey, the weather outside is so nice today! I'm going to get a treat from our usual shop, and I'll make sure to get your favorite too. It'll be right in front of your picture, tall black coffee with 5 sugar packets, barely mixed in. Just in case you wanted to stop by.

He probably is acting like a little bit of a crazy person, to find himself nearly crying when he realizes he has to throw away that day old coffee. That it was probably crazy to buy it in the first place.

But crazy things helped. And Mic said that whatever helps, helps, as long as it actually helps.

Shinsou takes a moment, long enough for Mirio to think he's thinking it, he's trying that tactic, before he raises his hands again. ' Thank you , ' Shinsou says, but his eyes are distant enough that Mirio knows he's not thanking him.

And it all crumbles after that. That shaky exhale, that twist of Shinsou's lips before he covers his face with his hands, breathes in but he holds it. Mirio knows that Shinsou is in a fragile place right now, and he's probably not supposed to be here to see it, but he can't just watch it happen.

Mirio pulls himself to kneeling, and puts a hand on Shinsou's back, rubbing those same circles that he's traced on Eri's back through so many of her teary fits. And when Shinsou doesn't freeze, doesn't try to pull away, he wraps the other arm around him, pulling him in to cry it out on his shoulder.

And if Mirio finds it a little harder to breathe easy, feels the tears catching in his eyes when Shinsou drops his hands and fists them in his shirt, when that tiny gasping sob breaks through, he doesn't let it shake him. Shinsou held out long enough, and he needs someone steady to hold him through the break.

Mirio can be the kind of hero that does that. He learned how from the best.

27 tried not to bother 50. He knew that she wasn't supposed to come to his room as often as she did, she didn't have to talk to him and she could always decide not to. But there was one time that he was too weak to hide it from her.

He was scared. He kept dreaming of Honzo, kept thinking about it. His bones shattered, that fever unbreaking, the flashes that he remembered of fists and grunts and that shattering pain, and when she came to his room, when her eyes locked on a bruise still lingering and started to water, he couldn't help it. He cried.

He remembers how loud his breathing was from behind the mask, that he was young enough to forget to not try to open his mouth because the metal would dig deeper. He remembers that there was enough blood from those wounds that it trickled down his neck, and that she tried to clean that off while she held him, while she rocked him back and forth I'm going to get you out, it's not going to happen again, I'm going to-

He remembers being small, and shaking, and crying like a little brat who didn't have a single reason to be so weak, so needy, but he remembers how nice that felt. That even when he trembled, she just held him tighter, and even when he forgot how to cry quietly, she just whispered It's okay.

He's not small, but Mirio is built enough to make it seem that way. The warmth of that large hand, the firmness from muscles that he knows could crush him, are close enough. He can close his eyes and imagine her hair, he can twist Mirio's voice into hers when the words are the same. "It's okay, just let it out."

He's wanted to feel her arms around him for so long, he's ached for it, and this is so close that it only breaks him more. He's falling apart the same way, just shaking and sobbing, clinging to someone who has no reason to hold him.

But Mirio just holds him, rubbing his back the same way he rubs Eri's. 27 taught her to soothe herself with that, breathe in at the top of the circle, breathe out at the bottom. Even if Mirio has been tracing circles on his back for a while, waiting for 27 to do that, he's selfish enough to ignore that.

But he does, to see if that trick even works on him. Because he's bothered Mirio with this, he's bothered him enough, and he hates it.

He tries to wipe the tears away, he feels disgusting. He only skipped last night's shower but he hasn't changed his clothes since yesterday morning. His nose is stopped up, mucus too thin and streaming over his top lip, but instead of checking his shirt for the mess, Mirio grabs a tissue from the box on his desk and holds it out for 27.

"It feels a lot better to let it out," Mirio says, and 27 would rather he look away when he tries to blow his nose, but he doesn't. "Having a good cry always helps."

It does. He feels tired in a different way, in a brighter way. His eyes still sting, enough that he just wants to close them and hope that he just stops crying. Even Eri has never cried this much, it's pathetic.

Mirio puts his hand on his back and sits down, close enough that 27 feels like pulling away, but he doesn't. That hand is still large enough to be similar. "She was a really important person to you, wasn't she? Maybe, she was kind of like a mom?"

27 shakes his head, has to keep from rolling his eyes. 50 wasn't the kind of person who could have a label like that, 'mom' or 'friend' or 'mentor.' She was so much more, so much more than meaningless words like that could say. ' More. Better. '

He throws the used tissue in the trashcan, and winces when he realizes he's gotten Mirio's shirt wet. His uniform for school, he probably has a Midterm today, 27 has distracted him and that's bad enough, but now he's ruined his shirt. "I'm going to wear my blazer anyway!" Mirio says with a wave, brushing a hand over the stain. "I just forgot to bring it when Mic- or I guess, when Eri texted me."

Eri. 27 feels that heaviness again, only worse. He's worried Eri over this, he's been so selfish. He didn't act like this at the 8 Precepts, he knew what was important and it was Eri, and even if Eri has other people to care for her, he shouldn't forget what he is to her. He's her mother , he's Mom Shi , and he's a better one than his mother. He won't lock himself away in a room and let her cry alone outside it.

That hand moves to his shoulder, and Mirio smiles at him. "It's okay, Shinsou. A lot of people are worried about you, but they understand. If you need some time to yourself, it's okay." That still doesn't make any sense, not with how often Yamada and Eri and even his owner have knocked at his door, trying to get him to come out. "But, just make sure to check in every once and a while. And eat something! Mic has some leftovers from breakfast waiting for you, but if you want to just eat in your room, I can--"

27 shakes his head, frowning when he runs a hand through his hair. He needs to leave, he needs to reassure Eri and face whatever punishment Yamada and his owner see fit to dole out. He's been acting like an idiot , and he needs to stop. To hold on to whatever energy he has left to leave this room before they simply drag him out of it.

50 is safe in the box, and the box is safe in the vent. He hates to think about it, but even if she wasn't, he still has her.

He remembers her now. He can remember every part that went blurry, the parts that he wasn't sure about. Her eyebrows, her unpierced ears. The scars that he remembers, and because he remembers, he can picture her smile. Her voice. You'll be what, 16? You'll be pretty cheap in 10 years, and if I can't buy you, I can just rent you out every day.

We'll get out. We'll get out, buddy. Don't give up, we're going to get out. We'll live somewhere where it's warm, we can have the heat on all the time and no one can say anything about it. We can just lay around all day. Me and you, and your buddy right here. We're all getting out.

He's out. As much as he'll ever be. The Miasma is still going to hunt him down, and the best chance he has of surviving that is with his owner hunting them down first.

It's insane, it's an impossible dream to think about, that his owner could dig out every place that The Miasma has hidden. That even with his quirk, with his training and with all the heroes in this place, that they could take down all of them. All the Numbers, all the informants, to take down Memory and Boss and Bug .

But 27 can dream. He feels like he can, in this place. He can close his eyes and feel how warm it is, and it can feel like another dream. One where 50 is there, just invisible. A ghost.

‘ S-H-O-W-E-R. E-R-I, ’ 27 signs, knowing that he definitely looks like a wreck. Even if he doesn’t feel like he’s dead anymore, he doesn’t feel like he can even pretend to be, he probably looks like it. And Eri shouldn’t see that from him.

Mirio nods, and smiles. “That sounds like a good idea. If you ever want to talk about it some more, just let me know. I’m here for you, you know. A lot of people are.”

27 won’t. He feels bad for not using the phone, but he can’t. He still can’t bring himself to touch it, knowing how much it costs. But he’s grateful for the offer, for everything that Mirio has done. ‘ Thank you. ’

Mirio takes a moment before he remembers the sign. ‘ You’re welcome. ’

Even if Mirio left after Shinsou hopped into the shower, Yamada didn’t have to worry about another retreat. Eri decided to sit right in front of the bathroom door to prevent that, and anything short of grabbing her under the arms and dragging her away wasn’t going to convince her to move.

Luckily, Shinsou seemed fine with that. He just picked her up into his arms, and they hugged it out for a while before he started apologizing, and Yamada didn’t have to be the one to tell him to stop. “It’s okay, Twenny!” Eri told him, and repeated it every time he tried to apologize again. Even when he tried to apologize to Yamada. Even when Shinsou sat down to eat a late breakfast that was nearly lunch, she refused to let go just in case.

With his two wards still clinging to each other, watching cartoons since board games were impossible to play unless Eri let go, Yamada slipped into the office to print off a few more pictures.

The ones from Shichi-Go-San had already been delivered in the mail, and they turned out wonderful. Yamada would like these to be printed out on the same kind of material at some point, but for now, plain printer paper would have to do.

They turned out great too. Things that he didn’t even think to mention are there, like her longer hair or a bit of adjustment to her jawline to make her seem a little older. Altering the pictures from before to match the details that came after, hopefully finding something that resembles that mysterious middle, only brighter.

Yamada won’t let himself doubt that smile, when he hopes that it didn’t change too much after this picture was taken.

Eri still clings to him, even when she falls asleep. It takes him too long to move to untangle her hands from his shirt, and even then, it takes too long to put her on the couch. He pulls a blanket over her, and lets her legs rest on top of his.

He missed her. He just didn’t realize it at the time.

She’s growing up so fast. Like that plant she keeps in her windowsill, she just needed a place where she would be watered, she needed sunlight and good soil. It's hard to remember how she looked at the 8 Precepts, she seems so much younger there, so distant.

She's still small now, but she'll grow fast. And even if he's not there to see it, he knows she'll grow up happy. She has fathers who take the time to treasure these moments, to want to remember them when she's older.

Yamada has been working on the scrapbook at the table, and 27 finds it easier to move when he remembers he hasn't seen those pictures from Shichi-Go-San. He wants to see what Yamada will do with them, how he'll arrange them. Even if he's not allowed to help anymore, he wants to watch.

But Yamada smiles at him when he approaches, and flips over to the first page. It's the family portrait, the one that the odd Shinsou is a part of. Shinsou Hitoshi doesn't have scars, which makes him look weird and unsettling, but he has cat ears. And 27 wants to be irritated that Yamada still got a picture of 27 wearing those cat ears, but he can't. Not when Eri looks so beautiful.

She looks beautiful in every picture. Even the candid ones, when she's not posing. When she's tugging on 27's clothes, or when Yamada is fussing over her while she pouts that he's taking too long. It's clear that Yamada cares a lot about pictures, cares a lot about the pictures that were being taken in the candid shots where they're all smiling at her to encourage her own smile.

He took a picture of that. That reckless moment, that stupid idea that 27 had, just too tempted to do it, to see how it would feel- has his owner seen this?

Yamada must have noticed it, noticed that 27 wanted nothing more than to rip that picture out and tear it up, hide the evidence even if Yamada would still tell him. "Shou really liked that picture," Yamada says, laughing to himself. "I had to steal it from him to put it in here. He doesn't get to see nearly enough of your attitude, so feel free to start laying some 'Delete Face' on him. He wouldn't even pretend he doesn't like it."

That's...confusing. That's the oddest thing about his odd owner, if it's true. But Yamada hasn't lied to him yet, has only hidden things that 27 still stole. He's not going to try it, but if his owner liked that picture.

He can keep it.

Yamada shows him the other pictures he hasn't put in the scrapbook yet. Pictures from the festival, pictures of Fishie and Fishio and Eri feeding them. Pictures that Yamada took long ago, when Eri still had that tooth now missing.

There's a picture of Eri sitting on a hospital bed, wearing the most adorable outfit 27 has ever seen. She looks somehow younger there, she looks more scared than she should, and the picture itself is a little blurry, like it wasn't taken by someone with a practiced hand like Yamada.

Yamada frowns at that picture. "Oh, that's hideous, isn't it? The one and only time I trusted Shou to go clothes shopping. Shinsou, I need you to settle this once and for all - is that the ugliest outfit you've ever seen?"

27 shakes his head, he has no idea what Yamada is looking at, but all he sees is an outfit that he wishes Eri could wear every day. ' Cute. Most cute. Perfect. I like. '

Yamada shakes his head before he sighs, head falling to the table in defeat. " No, Shinsou. You can't have his fashion sense too."

While Yamada is distracted, 27 tries to peek under the scrapbook to see if there are more pictures that Yamada is hiding. More pictures of Eri from that time he was missing, more pictures of her wearing adorable clothes like that. Yamada catches him, raising his head and putting a hand on the scrapbook.

But, he doesn't look angry that 27 tried to look. He looks worried about something. "So, I know you didn't like the other pictures. Of 50. And I...kind of think I know why."

27 pulls his hand away. If those are more pictures of the wrong 50, that young and unscarred 50, that Furokage Mizuki, he doesn't want to see them. 50 is 50, and even if he knows that she wasn't always 50, he doesn't want to see that. Doesn't want to know what The Miasma did to her. Doesn't want to imagine who she would be if he never met her.

"At Shirakumo's funeral, they used a picture of him that wasn't... wasn't him at all. I don't know how they even got a picture of him looking so serious, because he wasn't a serious guy. I hated looking at that picture," Yamada says, shaking his head. "If these pictures aren't... aren't right, if they're missing something, we can change them. There's ways to alter them and make it closer to what you remember. If you want them."

He does.

It's 50.

Her long hair, the right scars, and that smile. She's smiling so bright, so warmly, laughing at something and she rarely laughs like that, but she has a reason to.

She's outside, bathed in sunlight. There's a floppy, wide brimmed hat on her head and she's probably laughing at that, at whoever made her wear it. But she's not laughing because it's ridiculous, she's not laughing so hard at something that mundane.

She's laughing, so freely, because she escaped.

This is the 50 that got out with him.

27 doesn't even feel the tears stinging, they just feel like relief. Everything feels like relief, he only feels boneless and weak because he never even imagined. He's never even pictured her being this happy, even in their escape. Never thought of what she'd look like in the sun.

He picks up the other pictures, he wants to know how many things he's never imagined doing with her. Even if he looks ridiculous, wiping his eyes just to see them better, they're perfect. They're more than he ever imagined.

Her eyes lit up, reflections of the string lights that break up the darkness of the night, her grin sly as she watches something outside the frame. They're at a party, a quiet corner of it, where he can watch her watching happily, content to just be together even among all those people in the background.

Her arms are stretched between two faceless people, only their shoulders are in the frame. Her arms are thin, she would lose the muscle after she stopped training, stopped working jobs like that. She's facing the camera, posing in front of a brick wall, and maybe he's taking the picture. Maybe he's one of the people outside of the frame, and as soon as the picture's taken, she'll pull him in for a hug.

She's on a beach, a smear of sunscreen under each eye, wearing a loose white shirt over her bathing suit. She doesn't care about the scars on display, that look in her eye almost dares the person taking the picture to say something. She doesn't care, so he doesn't either. Eri has never been to a beach, never learned to swim, so they'll both wear bathing suits and teach her.

There's others, he knows there are more, but he can't look away from this picture. He's never been to a beach either, but with that much sunlight, how little clothing everyone else in the picture is wearing, he knows that it's warm. He knows that he'd feel that sunlight on scars and skin, he imagines the water would still be cold, but Eri's hand would still be warm when he holds her in the shallow water, when they both encourage her to kick. They could each hold Eri's hand, they could be there with all of their scars, all three of them.

It would be fine, because 50 would be there, daring anyone to stare. To stop them if they did. To hide them with her quirk if it was too much for Eri, for that sunlight to turn black if it needed to, to protect them both and 27 wants.

27 wants her to be here.

He's wanted so many impossible things, and even if some of them came true, this one won't. 50 is dead, she'll never be here, she'll never hold him again, she'll never even meet Eri.

But this is a 50 that Eri could meet. This is a 50 that she could see. This is a 50 alive in so many ways, alive with that smile and warm and happy and safe.

27 puts the pictures down, even if it hurts to pull his hands away from them, he has to. This is more than he imagined, this is too much, he doesn't know why or how Yamada did this, but he has to answer to it. 'Thank you.'

Yamada is crying, he doesn't know when he started crying, but he smiles like he wants to laugh. "Thanks, Shinsou, I...I'm really glad. They're good, right? I," Yamada does laugh then, probably catching on 27's concern. "I'm an idiot, I cry over anything. Now you know how lame I am."

27 shakes his head, trying to wipe away his tears. He doesn't think it's lame, it's just lame that 27 keeps crying. He's beyond tired of it, he's never cried so much in his life. 'Not lame. Thank you. Perfect.'

Better than perfect. This isn't just a picture of 50 as she was, her smile bright like a candle that refused to be put out. This is 50 as she could have been. More than what 27 remembers, but as he wanted her to be.

Yamada didn't even know who she was. He asked if she was important, and didn't even know. Whatever he did, he did too much for the sake of a stranger.

And he would have been there too, after they got out. They would have rescued Eri somehow, and somehow, Yamada would be there too. As embarrassing as he could be, as loud and enthusiastic as he almost always was, especially when he was playing the part of Present Mic. 50 would have liked him. She would have seen through it immediately, and pretended not to. She would have gotten loud with him, they would both have the other in fits with their jokes. She would probably smirk and juggle knives while they cooked, just for show. And he'd love it because he loves a good show. 50 probably knew more about music than 27 did, and they could talk about that far more than 27 could with Yamada.

'I wish you could meet her,' 27 signs, trying in vain to stop the tears from falling again. 'You would have liked her.'

Yamada nods, smiling in a way that almost becomes a grimace while he wipes away his tears.

“Yeah, I would have. She was a good person to you, wasn’t she?”

‘Good person’ doesn’t even begin to describe it, it’s the vaguest thing that could be said about 50. It’s almost insulting that Yamada would say that, but Yamada doesn’t really know 50. He knows Furokage Mizuki, but it seems like he barely knows her either.

27 wants someone to know 50 here. Yamada would probably be able to understand that more than anyone else.

‘ Only person who smiled. Only one who talked, ’ 27 sits down, legs shaking just at the memory of that, that flash that reminds him of being shoved in the hallways, those words thrown at him that he couldn’t answer. Creepy kid, look at him. Look at those eyes, he’s crazy. ‘ Talked to me. For me. Like you. Sometimes. ’

Yamada nods, but brings a hand over his mouth like he doesn’t want to let 27 know what he feels about that. He’s not smiling behind that hand, maybe he’s worried that 27 has always been like this. That he’s always been broken, unable to talk.

‘ Mask. Opened to eat. Closed. Couldn’t talk. 50 talked anyway. Couldn’t talk. Couldn’t tell. ’ 27 has to stop, has to bite his lip, he’s tired of crying. He breathes until he finds a place where he won’t cry when he finds the ground under his feet to tell him. ‘ Couldn’t tell her. Thank you. Died. Couldn’t escape. ’

He puts his fingers to that scar, the first session from Bug. The easiest one, probably because he was young. Too young for Cherry and Blossom.

It’s not a scar to remember her by, it’s not one that she gave him. He gave it to himself, he was acting stupid and reckless and paid the price for that. None of his escape attempts worked, they only ended in scars.

Until the raid. Until it was for Eri. And there was a time, between being handcuffed in the car and the police officer saying his name, that he really thought that he had gotten out. That even if he was in prison, The Miasma wouldn’t find him. That they forgot about him.

He knows better, but it feels too much like that sometimes. It feels better than that, it feels like a dream. ‘ I wish she was here. ’

Yamada sucks in a breath, the tears building again in his eyes, but he tries to blink them back. 27 hopes he does, he feels like crying just because Yamada is crying. “You know, my birthday is July 7th. There’s a festival that day, Tanabata. There’s a story behind it about two gods who can only meet on that day, if the weather is nice, but...” Yamada rubs his eyes with the back of his hand, grimacing before he laughs. “Maybe it’s the part about the weather, but I always think about meeting Shirakumo again like that. On a year that Orhime and Hikoboshi can’t meet because it’s cloudy, me and Shirakumo could meet on that Milky Way. There’s so much we didn’t get to talk about, so much I didn’t say. I can’t imagine never getting the chance to say it, but...”

Even if it only happened once. For one night.

“I don’t think the world is that cruel, for us to never get the chance to say it,” Yamada says, and 27 believes him.

Even if the world is cruel. Even if he has no reason to believe that it wouldn’t be, that everything he knows to be real would bend for that chance, he believes it. He doesn’t even think it would be at night, it wouldn’t be dark when The Miasma was dark enough.

They'd meet in the sunlight, and he'd see for himself the way the sun lights on her green hair. They'd both be warm, for once they'd both be warm, and when 50 smiles, he'd be able to smile back.

He'd tell her everything. Even if he's taller, he'd still feel small in her embrace. And even if it's only for one night, or one day, or even less than that, it would be enough.

They'd both be out, and safe. Together.

27 is worried, but he doesn't want Yamada to know that.

Yamada doesn't fry things often, but 27 knows he's a good cook. He should be able to fry this, Yamada said it was easy to make. It's easier to make the frozen ones, but he wants to do it right, he wants it to be exactly like the one that 27 had. That 50 gave him.

27 wants it to be too. And he's worried, because if it's not, if it's somehow worse than the four hour old bits of pastry and sweet bean paste that he remembers, he doesn't know how to hide that. It shouldn't be, he knows that it shouldn't be. Yamada is still a good cook, even if he doesn't fry things often, and Yamada doesn't look that worried about it.

But Yamada looks nervous. They used a mold to make the fish shape, but Yamada has never used that mold before. He's never actually made these before, they're probably not supposed to be homemade. The one that 50 stole from the street vendor was probably a fried frozen one, and it won't be the same, it might be horrible, and 27 doesn't know if he can lie to Yamada and tell him that it's good.

He knows it's already different because they're warm, so warm that he can see wisps of steam coming off of them. 50 said that they were supposed to be eaten warm, that they would eat them when they're fresh and warm and crispy when they get out. They look crispy.

He doesn't have to eat them like he ate the one 50 gave him, sneaking pinches of it quickly into his mouth when Bug was distracted. He was still young enough that she brought his food to his room and usually watched him eat it, barking at him to eat faster and stop wasting her time. But she had paperwork to go over that day, and he was able to eat all of it, he was able to feel full after eating for the first time in a long time. He was able to keep that flavor in his mouth afterwards, to taste something other than gruel.

Yamada said that it was probably red bean paste. It's the most popular filling, but Yamada likes custard. His owner likes chocolate. They don't have custard, and Yamada hasn't replaced the chocolate chips, but they have red bean paste. Yamada uses all of it, enough to make 10 fish pastries.

Eri stares at them, waiting for Yamada to say that they're cool enough to eat. When she woke up from her nap, she pulled herself into 27's lap, and they looked over all of the pictures. Even 50's.

Eri said she looked pretty. 27 told her that she was. She was a nice person, the only nice person in the Bad Place. He felt bad for lying about 10 when he said that, he knows 10 was a nice person too. But 10 was probably alive, should be hidden unless his owner asks about him. Until betraying him serves a purpose for 27.

27 told Eri that she would have liked her. Eri said that she already does. She likes her hair, and her smile, and 27 finds himself smiling instead of crying to think about that. To imagine 50 letting Eri braid her hair, how she'd insist that Eri do it and praise her all the while for doing a good job. That 50 and 27 could share a look, an understanding and appreciation that this was all Eri had to learn to do with her hands. That they'd never put a knife in them, that Eri wouldn't have to train. She'd never need to.

They'd all be safe.

"I think they're ready, but be careful! They get pretty hot in the middle," Yamada says, and even if he takes one after Eri and 27 do, he doesn't take a bite.

27 doesn't either, until Eri chimes in, her mouth still full. "Yummy!"

27 takes a bite, and he feels the same way.

It's crispy, it's hot. It's sweet, exactly as sweet as he remembers. It's not soggy, it's not cold, nothing else is the same but that only makes it better. It almost makes it too much, when he imagines the festival lights playing on 50's hair, imagines what kind of yukata she'd wear. Imagines that she'd hand him this pasty with a smile that said everything, that said We're out, and now we can eat them while they're hot.

He can imagine it's Tanabata, because it feels like it is.

Murder Trial

Chapter Summary

27 decides to tell Aizawa as much as he can about The Miasma, as much as is safe to, but a certain member of Class 1-A makes a move that dismantles that plan almost entirely.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Panic Attack

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou stole 50's autopsy report with a picture of her dead body before retreating to his room. The ventilation systems at UA have robots that patrol for security reasons and pest control, and Shinsou has talked to Principal Nezu unknowingly through that, and now believes that the robots are sentient. Shinsou was force fed when he was living at the police station because he refused to eat, and was sedated before the force feeding took place. Shinsou pretended to be dead last night to try to talk to 50. Bakugo saw that Shinsou stole the autopsy report because he was helping to distract Yamada while he did, and saw that it was an autopsy report before Shinsou put his knife to his throat to threaten him into leaving. Class 1-A refers to The Miasma as 'Villain School,' as Shinsou told Ashido and Kirishima that he went to 'Villain School' after he was kidnapped. Shinsou signed 'I'm weird. Are they weird?' after being drugged with Benadryl after hanging out with Bakusquad over the weekend. Kaminari has been convinced that Aizawa will have Shinsou fight Class 1-A for training purposes for a while. Shinsou sparred with Aizawa after the Chisaki interview. Yamada asked Aoyama to avoid speaking French around Shinsou, since Shinsou's mother spoke French. Todoroki has a cat named Soba that Shinsou doesn't like, and has said before that he and Shinsou are going to be friends but in accordance with the Sports Festival match he had with Midoriya, will have to fight to seal the deal.

Aizawa finds himself sighing in relief when Hizashi texts him to say that Shinsou was out of his room. That he was talking again.

But that relief is short lived when he knows that he needs Shinsou to talk about something else.

Naomasa said that they'll need to bring Shinsou to the station tomorrow. He doesn't know what that means, what The Commission has planned, and neither does Naomasa. Naomasa traded in a long string of favors just to confirm that Mind Slice wasn't involved. Not yet.

Not Mind Slice. Not Chisaki. But Aizawa doesn't doubt that whatever The Commission has planned, it won't be pleasant. Not with Endeavor leaving the hospital with that massive scar to show for it.

If Shinsou just gives him one thing, one actionable lead, they could avoid it.

M. E. Not 'Me,' and not a Number. Shinsou wanted to talk about the poisoner, had been fighting to talk before it became too much. Aizawa tried not to think about the reason why Shinsou dug his fingernails into that scar, why it was always a scar that he found when he began to shut down. And he didn't want to think of the hand fisted in front of his shirt, pressed against the other scars. The ones that Aizawa definitely didn't want to think about.

Aizawa tries not to think about it while he walks back to the dorm. He tries to work up the energy to dread grading his essays, tries to regret assigning so many to his Midterms when he already has too much on his plate. Tries to worry about his students, how well they'll do on the Heroics Midterm on Saturday when they already seem to suffer under the strain of their fundamentals. Todoroki, surprisingly, was doing well. In fact, he was one of the few students in his class that didn't seem to hesitate to meet his eyes, didn't seem to be distracted or anxious during the course of their exam.

He knows that something isn't right with his class. There's enough of a separation afforded by the Midterm exam schedule that he doesn't know when it set in, but something has rattled nearly all of them. His gut tells him it's not just Midterms, but he doesn't know what else it could be. He won't know until his dorm shift tonight gives him a better opportunity to investigate.

He hesitates before he opens the door. Hizashi said Shinsou was out of his room, that he was talking, but he doesn't know what else that could mean. Whether Shinsou was still signing in that stilted way, that fear barely hidden and his movements slowed with it. Anxious. Fearful. Or if Shinsou had gathered enough of himself to return to those flashes that Aizawa had seen the past few days, that wide and grateful smile, that openness.

He doesn't know what he prefers to see, what will make his necessary task easier. If Shinsou was waiting for more questioning, fearful but resigned, or if he had a flash of happiness that Aizawa had to rip away from him.

When he opens the door, he sees that it's worse. It's not just happiness, but contentment too.

Eri runs to him, and he forces a smile as he kneels, as he strokes a hand over her head and she tells him about all the things that he missed. That Mirio visited, that Twenny is feeling better, that they ate taiyaki and Twenny has pictures of a really nice lady named 50, and they're putting together pictures in a book just for her.

Shinsou looks wary, but resigned. He looks back at a framed picture in his hand, one still on the table in front of him. Aizawa knows that Hizashi made sure to clear out a frame for whichever picture from Shichi-Go-San that Shinsou wanted to keep, but the second frame is a mystery.

It is until he passes behind Shinsou to wash out his thermos, and he sees it's a picture of Furokage Mizuki.

He doesn't know how Hizashi did it, but he found and altered one that wasn't from her ID or passport. The young woman in the picture is smiling, despite the scars plain to see on her face. It's unsettling to think of that process, to think of putting scars on that face just so that it resembles a nightmare that happened after the fact.

But he hopes that having that picture means that Shinsou gave up the other one. The more unsettling one, the one that Mrs. Furokage herself didn't want to look at.

He won't ask, not when he has more important questions, but Shinsou doesn't allow him to ask him to go to the office to talk. He just stands up, taking the pictures, and leaves. To his room, judging by the footsteps, and Aizawa hopes this isn't another retreat. Another shut down.

He busies himself with the other dishes, with cleaning up the kitchen until Hizashi steps beside him, wrapping an arm around his shoulder to whisper low enough that Eri can't hear. "You're going to talk to him again?"

Aizawa nods, even if he doesn't want to. He doesn't want to hear that sigh, that disappointment never more ill-placed. Shinsou was close, if he could just give him another name and description. A member with a record, a name that they could find and the trail that could begin there. He needs to offer something to The Commission, and 'M.E.' wasn't enough.

"Be gentle, alright? He's...not there yet." Aizawa knows.

He knows, and that only makes it harder.

27 sets the pictures down on his desk. The other pictures of 50, the ones he doesn't have framed, go in his drawer, and he doesn't think he'll move them to the stash box. He needs to take the stash box down from the vents, before the robots think to pick the lock and open it, if they're capable of being that nosy.

He wants a copy of the picture of Eri in that outfit that Yamada hates, but for now he has the first picture of her smiling for her Shichi-Go-San portrait. He was terrified before that smile rose up, when he forced himself to smile and forced his hand on his owner's shoulder. He hoped that he hadn't read her wrong, that she wouldn't spin into a fit of jealousy like she had before, that she wanted to pretend that he and his owner could be friends. And it worked. She was so happy that she couldn't help but smile at that.

The other picture is of 50 wearing the wide brimmed hat. It's the one where she looks the most free, when that laugh is the loudest. He can almost hear it when he looks at the picture, he can hear her voice afterwards saying things that she was never able to say. Let's have a picnic! I got a whole load of apples for Eri in here or I look ridiculous with this hat. No, you have to wear it! Come on, 27!

He'd wear it. He'd look ridiculous too. 50 would laugh, but it would be a different kind of laugh. They could take the picture and remember that they can.

They can know that it's warm in the sunlight. They have a ridiculous hat, they can walk together in the sun. They're out, they're free enough to be out, to take pictures and have picnics.

27 is out, but not really. It's a ridiculous chance, a ridiculous idea, but he can try it.

Bug only told him not to tell anyone about The Miasma. Not to bark about it.

But he might be able to write it down.

It's not the police station. There's no one here to watch him. No one that holds down his arm to inject the sedative, and even the flash of that reminds him of another restraint. A flash of the Red Room.

He's alone, he can pretend he's free. When he starts forgetting that, he can look up and see 50. He can remember that they need to do this, he needs to do this for her. They can both be out, they can both be safe.

But when 27 sits down, when he opens the notebook and finds a pen, finds a place to start and it's Memory's name, he hears it.

The door opens behind him and closes. He knows that it must be Eri, she must be worried again, but when he looks, she's not there.

No one is.

But he knows that's not the case. He can feel someone in the room with him, even if he can't see them. It gets harder to breathe when he thinks about that, when he knows who it is if he can't see them. It shouldn't be so soon, they shouldn't have found him this easily, Chisaki shouldn't have told them because Chisaki shouldn't have known.

When he looks back at the paper, trying to convince himself that he's just going crazy, he hears it. A footstep.

Inside his room.

He takes a moment to breathe, to go numb. His nerves sharpen under his skin, but fade when he touches the handle of the knife. There are times that he doesn't have it, times that he puts it in the drawer of the desk, but he wanted to have 50 closer to him in that way.

And despite what he wanted last night, he doesn't want to be closer to her any other way. She'd understand. He knows she'd understand, if they're not taking another thing from him but he's trying to keep them from taking it from him.

He works the mask open, his nerves sharp and stinging, enough that his own voice startles him. "I know you're here."

He stands up, keeps the unsheathed knife close to his thigh. It's still sloppy, he's being sloppy, but 127 is being sloppier. A footstep, 127 knows how to move silently. He's taunting him, or he's sloppy, but neither will serve him well.

27 doesn't know exactly where to look, but he pretends he does. He doesn't care if that lets 127 know he still has the upper hand, but if 127 gets sloppier, if he reveals himself in another taunt, that's all 27 needs. He needs him to mess up, once. "Did Bug...."

They catch. Now, out of any time that it could have happened, the words catch in his throat. The mask is so tight, too tight, he can almost feel himself choking on the words. He can't ask, he can't ask a question, to cast a line and hope that 127 answers.

He's useless. Quirkless, and he never should have wished for that. He's toothless except for the knife, and he knows that 127 is better with knives. He's better at this, 127 has killed a lot of people.

And 27 will be one of them.

It's nearly impossible to fight an invisibility quirk. He fought only a few at the 8 Precepts, and they always had a catch. A time limit, holding their breath, closing their eyes. Inside that 15 meter radius, 127 is invisible, and there's no other catch. Even if he slips up again, makes another noise so 27 knows where he is, if 27 reaches out he's more likely to catch a blade in his hand than a grapple.

It's useless. He's been lying to himself, dreaming instead of living in reality. He's not out, he's never getting out, this was always going to happen.

If he tries to stab 127, 127 will get him first. He's probably moved closer already, the footstep was a taunt, a chance that he knows 27 can't take advantage of. Even if he could scream, could try to get his owner or Yamada's attention, it would be too late. It would only draw Eri's attention, and.

He doesn't want Eri to see it. That's the only thing he wants, the only thing he's ever wanted. He doesn't care what happens after, he can't let Eri see his blood.

"D-don't... let her see i-it," 27 whispers, swallowing, trying to swallow that stutter from his words without swallowing the words themselves. He hopes, he just hopes that 127 will listen. "The l-l-little girl. Please. B-brother. D-d-don't. L-let her. S-see the b-blood."

The door opens again, and 27 doesn't even see who opens it before the room becomes a blur, before he feels something tight wrapped around his arms and chest as an afterthought, after it's already wrapped around him. His shoulder hits the wall, he sees his owner step in front of him, his hair raises and then he hears a scream.

A scream from inside his room, but it's hard to remember that. He knows what Eri sounds like when she screams, and it's deeper-pitched than that, but it's definitely not how 127 would scream.

His owner half-closes the door, hand resting on the knob tightens before he speaks, voice low and more threatening than 27 has ever heard it. "Get dressed."

It's a female voice, slightly familiar and incredibly distressed that answers him. "Ye-es sir."

His owner shuts the door with far more force than necessary, the sound of it making 27 flinch, before he turns to look at him. The scarf pulls back around his neck fully, it had loosened from its hold around 27 at some point. His owner sounded angry, he had to be angry.

But he looks at 27 like he's concerned. His eyebrows are pulled together, raised, his eyes are a little wider. It's something so open, a break so unlike his calm owner, that it's startling.

"Are you alright, Shinsou?" his owner asks, hand raised but it stops. His owner doesn't seem to know what to do with it, and 27 finds himself staring at it before he finds himself able to nod.

He can still feel the ghost of that scarf wrapped around him. He's not sure if his shoulder hurts, he can't feel himself enough. He doesn't know what he feels, it's different from numb and it's different from too much.

He was sure he was going to die. That 127 was going to kill him.

He was going to die.

He feels his knees buckle for a moment, feels his legs shake as he catches himself, forces himself to keep upright even if he needs to lean against the wall. He was going to die.

He's shaking, everywhere. All over, trembling, it's cold, it's never this cold in this place, it's as cold as the water around the docks but it's not cold enough to make him go numb and stop shaking.

Warm. His owner's hand is blisteringly warm, it's hot to the touch on his shoulder, he's saying something and 27 barely even hears the noise of it. He hears Yamada's voice, he can hear the worry in it, and then he hears Eri's and he turns to look at her.

He can look at her. He's still alive.

He feels the trembling stop, he feels the sweat making his skin clammy. He runs a hand through his hair, there's sweat there too, but the feeling of his hair between his fingers is enough to settle him. That hand on his shoulder finally retreats when he works his mouth open to speak. "I-I'm okay. I'm s-sorry."

He doesn't even know why he's apologizing, and Eri doesn't like it either. Her worried expression pulls into a frown before she throws her arms around his leg. Even if his arms still feel weak, he picks her up into his arms, and he feels more settled with that.

He thought he was going to die, but he didn't. He's here. He's with Eri.

His owner protected him.

He hasn't given him the information he wants. He hasn't proved himself worthy of a place, worthy of protection.

He doesn't know if that's just because his owner hates 127 for some reason. If his owner won't let him die until he knows The Miasma's name. He doesn't even know why his owner wants to know so badly, why he's determined to take down The Miasma or what The Miasma has done to deserve it.

But his owner protected him.

The door opens, and his clothes walk out. The person wearing them is still invisible.

That invisible girl. She snuck into his room, she made him think he was going to die. She just stood there while he was pleading with 127, begging for his life. Why the fuck would she do that?

His owner is angry. He's furious with her, eyebrows drawn together and low, taking her by the shoulder to guide her out. "We're going to see Principal Nezu."

The door slams afterwards, and Yamada sighs, running a hand through his hair. "Well, that's one expulsion I'm not going to fight. Shou almost made it through a whole year, but that? Yeah, I'm not going to argue with that."

Yamada is angry too, and that makes it harder for him to stay calm for Eri. To ignore how angry he is too.

Don't let her see the blood.

Aizawa keeps a firm hand on Hagakure's shoulder, ignoring the sniffing. Shinsou thought he was going to die, accepted death and only begged for Eri not to see his blood.

"Why?" Aizawa forces himself to ask, even if it doesn't matter. The fact that Hagakure escaped his notice, had slipped into his dorm with two pro heroes and two other occupants completely undetected is a feat that he wishes he could be proud of. But he isn't in the slightest.

"H-he killed that la-ady," Hagakure chokes out, sleeve raising to wipe at her face. "What i-if he was planning on doing it again? He has a knife, what if he has a gun? What if he's going to shoot--"

"What are you talking about?" Aizawa demands, even if he has an idea. It's not a well-hidden fact that Shinsou carries a knife, not when he used it against Bakugo in that fight, but they shouldn't know about Furokage Mizuki.

"Bakugo said he took the evidence! The picture of that woman, h-he probably killed her--"

"Shinsou didn't kill her," Aizawa interrupts firmly. That's one thing he knows for certain, knows that the projectile spines that were found embedded in her body and noted in the autopsy report weren't from Shinsou. "Shinsou has never killed anyone."

That's something he doesn't know for certain.

Kidnapping. Distraction. Flashy quirk. 'Just a number.' Interrogation. Shinsou has admitted those things, shakily as they were. Vague as they were. But there's always the chance that isn't everything he's done.

But the doubt that he feels is enough to sway him into changing his course from Principal Nezu's office to the Class 1-A dorms. Hagakure is quiet now, crying more quietly, but he doesn't take his hand from her shoulder. He texts Iida to have his students gathered in the common room in five minutes.

He arrives to the dorm in four, but they're all gathered anyway. That palpable stress that he noticed is still apparent, and while he sees that many of them are staring at Hagakure, he can't tell how many are shocked that she's by his side, or shocked that she was caught. "How many of you were under the impression that Shinsou has killed someone?"

None of them are taken aback by the question, though some of them look furious at it. Some look to their peers that look guilty. Bakugo curls his lip and scowls. "He tried to slit my throat, Sensei. Don't tell me-"

"Explain. The circumstances. Behind that," Aizawa grounds out. Bakugo should know what murderous intent looks like, and he doubts that he truly saw it in Shinsou.

Bakugo scoffs. "He snuck into the fucking office and grabbed that picture of that dead broad, and then he put his fucking knife to my throat. He was going to use it if I didn't leave."

Aizawa feels the scarf move, and has to close his eyes to force it to settle. "I see. You were so convinced that your life was at risk, that you left Eri with an armed and agitated murderer. And you didn't think to warn me of this incident or report it at all."

Bakugo doesn't look cowed, but his fists clench at his sides as he glares at the ground. He doubted it then, even after having a knife at his throat, for a reason. One that he isn't sharing, unwilling to take responsibility for Hagakure's actions.

"Shinsou probably had to do some messed up things at villain school," Kirishima says, rubbing the back of his neck. "I mean, with his... you know-"

"Why did he take a picture of a dead woman?" Jirou asks, hardly able to meet his eyes. "Sensei, I know we can't know about the investigation, but that's really suspicious. There doesn't seem to really be another explanation-"

"The woman was someone who was important to Shinsou," Aizawa answers, that phrase 'Villain School' still dancing on his nerves. "She died when he was young, and he was never able to mourn her properly. He took that picture because he was never able to have a funeral portrait to remember her by."

There are some of his students who know that loss. Some in a vaguer way than others, distant relations or those closer who had passed. They're the ones that he hopes understand.

"Villain School seems to have given you the wrong impression about Shinsou's circumstances," Aizawa says, and he doesn't miss the way that Ashido and Kirishima flinch at his tone. "It seems to give you the impression that Shinsou has done unsavory things willingly. And there isn't a single thing that Shinsou did during that time that was done willingly."

There isn't a single student that he trusts would be able to understand that. He doesn't want to explain it to them, and they shouldn't be aware of the details of the investigation as much as they already are. But he's still shocked that out of 19 students, half of them believed that Shinsou killed someone, all of them were aware that it was a possibility, and none of them approached him with their concerns.

"I'll ask again. How many of you were concerned that someone with access to a weapon and a history of committing murder had access to a 5 year old child, and didn't think to report those concerns to an adult?"

Bakugo raises his hand first. Kirishima, Jirou, Sero, Aoyama, Sato, Ojiro, and Iida follow. Iida earns the most of his ire. While not excusable, the other students didn't have as much access to Aizawa outside of class. They also didn't have as much responsibility to let him know.

"And how many of you were aware that Hagakure was going to investigate for herself?"

Ojiro is the only one with a raised hand. "I didn't think-"

"You were aware, which is a failure to report breaking and entering," Aizawa interrupts. "All of you will face the consequences of your inaction, but Ojiro will be coming with me. This incident is out of my hands, and it's up to Principal Nezu to decide how to deal with it."

He's lying, but he wants to place it out of his hands anyway.

Principal Nezu not only ignores the tea cup in his hand, but his ear flicks twice while he recounts the incident for him. At the end, there's a pause before the animal principal speaks. "Regrettable. I suppose I'll need to take a moment to consider our options. I'll let you know if an escort back to the Class 1-A dorms is necessary for your...students."

He knows the pause is calculated. He can feel the anxiety rise to a fever pitch from Hagakure and Ojiro. As much as he feels a flicker of sympathy, he feels far more inspired in regards to his plans for the rest of his class.

On the way back to the staff dorm, he turns those plans over in his head. As much as Hizashi might appreciate being able to sleep in after putting every student in Class 1-A under house arrest to force them to fail their English Midterm, there's no procedure for grading their English class without the midterm. Forcing an entire class to fail a fundamental course isn't something that has protocols in place to deal with.

He could take this as an opportunity to cull a few that worry him for the Heroics Midterm, but Kan would see it for what it is. And he's not nearly as immature as Kan thinks he is, to end the career of a potentially great hero just to secure his own win in the Joint Training Exam.

Bakugo, Kirishima, and Sero worry him for different reasons.

'I'm weird. Are they weird?'

Aizawa isn't nearly as concerned with Shinsou's social skills as Hizashi is, but he's not cold-hearted enough to ignore how painful the revelation of their suspicion would be. Shinsou thinks that he and Bakugo are friends, that Bakugo's close friends are his as well. And apart from Kaminari and Ashido, each of them had turned to the suspicion that Shinsou was a murderer in the course of two days.

It's unfortunate that the procedures in place for wardships means that Shinsou has that proximity to his class, and that puts the confidentiality of the investigation in constant risk. But while Aizawa doesn't want to encourage his students' interest in Shinsou, he does need to assure that there can be peaceful coexistence in their shared spaces. He needs to divest them of any implication that 'Villain School' has placed on Shinsou.

Shinsou and Eri are still clinging to each other, a system of Shinsou answering a question on his exam and Eri immediately checking it before she places a sticker next to it playing out on top of the kotatsu. The reminder that Eri settles Shinsou like nothing else gives him pause, but not enough to keep from asking. "I'm going to be at the Class 1-A dorm tonight. Would you like to come or stay here with Hizashi and Eri?"

Shinsou takes a long pause himself, long enough for Aizawa to consider making that neutral question a bit less neutral to sway him. Long enough to remind himself that Shinsou taking time to answer is normal, and something that needs to be challenged slowly.

But Shinsou does answer, exactly how he wants him to.

'Go with you.'

With the pieces in place, Aizawa goes to the office to take advantage of the opportunity if it presents itself. He's not sure whether Shinsou will come out of his plan for Class 1-A in a mood suited to answering questions related to the investigation, but if he is, Aizawa can't afford to be ill-prepared.

An interview tomorrow, with the machinations of The Commission still hidden from him. His students' suspicion of Shinsou, their method of dealing with it almost convincing Shinsou that UA was not enough to keep him safe from '127.'

It's hard to remind himself that the Heroics Midterm, an unending fount of stress every year, was even a concern to him right now.

27 tries to remind himself of his task as they walk to the dorm, tries not to feel somehow smaller and more vulnerable at his owner's side without Eri next to him.

His owner was going to be at the dorm, and 27 needed to take advantage of that. Eri wasn't going to be at the dorm, and he needed to take advantage of that too. That turned the Safe Room into the office, turned it into a space for interrogations, and 27 needed to be ready to meet that expectation. To exceed it.

Memory's name, and anything else that his owner wanted to ask about. Not The Miasma's name, not yet. If it were too easy, he would be tossed away too quickly, but his owner had been in an oddly accepting mood. As long as he offered anything else, his owner would be pleased, but lack an excuse to dispose of him.

He could earn a place, and not lose it. Long enough for him to imagine 50 with him, beside him in this place. Their escape, but real. A dream, but one he could close his eyes and believe in.

His owner doesn't turn to go up the stairs, but instead leads him to the common room where almost all of the hero students are gathered. Tail Boy and InvisiBitch are missing, but it's unusual for so many of them to be in this room at the same time. Unless something draws them to gather here, like Mrs. Midoriya's visit.

“For the next two hours, Shinsou is in charge of all of you. And he’s free to do whatever he wants to you during that time, with no repercussions,” his owner says, and 27 doesn’t know who looks more confused, himself or the students. “There will be repercussions for you if you act inappropriately during that time.”

His owner leaves.

27 watches him leave, watches him turn and open the door to the stairwell. He watches the door close, and has to force himself to look back at the students, still confused and now wary.

What the fuck does that mean?

His owner has given him tests upon tests upon tests. He almost misses the way that Bug would hum or tut under her breath when she gave 27 a test, no matter which way he answered, because he learned to pick apart which hum or tut that sounded disapproving actually wasn’t. But his owner never gives him that, never gives him a single clue. And this isn’t just a test, this is a responsibility that has no restrictions and a million ways to fail at it.

He has no idea what he’s supposed to do, but Ashi seems confident.

“Movie night!” Ashi cheers, fists raised above her head. “We can make popcorn, and pick a trashy chick flick- pick one that Bakugo hates, ‘cause you know this is supposed to be-”

“Ashido, I don’t think that Aizawa-sensei intends for this to be an enjoyable exercise,” Provost Piston says, glancing at 27 but otherwise keeping his eyes lowered. “And whatever Shinsou instructs us to do, we should be aware that Aizawa-sensei expects us to comply.”

They’re all staring at him, even more warily. But while some are still confused, he’s not. If it’s not supposed to be enjoyable for them, he knows what to do.

He looks at the Fluent One before he signs. ‘ Villain training. You’re translating. Safe. ’

The Fluent One doesn’t seem to believe the ‘safe’ part, but he does know his task. “Shinsou says that we’re going to be training. Uh, villain...training.”

Sparky jumps on top of the sofa cushion he had been sitting on, fists raised in the air pumping with each word. “I! CALLED! IT!”

27 won’t be going any easier on him because of that. His owner wouldn’t want him to.

His owner had already measured his abilities with that sparring match, even if 27 hadn’t been able to demonstrate his true skill. His owner found him worthy enough to instruct the students, and had asked for his advice beforehand. Whatever challenge the Heroics Midterm held for the students, 27 imagined that his owner was worried about their skill in meeting it, and wanted 27 to take this opportunity to measure their weaknesses and try to correct them.

And 27 would do his best to meet that expectation.

Provost Piston makes it easier for him. Once 27 announced their task, he set out to lead them to an appropriate gym for the training to take place, to make the students’ hero costumes available once 27 approved of that decision. He also insisted that 27 change into a spare gym uniform, something that 27 wanted to decline but after a few minutes of Engine Man rambling about heat stroke and proper attire, he gave in just to make him stop talking.

The blue, red, and white uniform is too large, and he suspects that it isn't really a spare but instead Oil Change's. It also reveals too much of the scars, reveals the tattoo and the students stare at it. But 27 ignores their stares and slips into a mask that doesn't even have scars, trying to imitate that quiet and evaluative way that Bug would act before training really began. ' Fight me. One at a time. Alphabetical. '

Bakugo scowls after the Fluent One speaks for him. "Oi, you really want a rematch? If you're still not using your damn quirk, it's gonna be hell for you to keep up. These gauntlets are gonna have your ass smoked."

27 tries not to get too excited about it, but he can't help but smirk, can't help but pull out the knife and toss it spinning before he catches it. ' All I need. Try to keep up, Blast chan. '

The Fluent One doesn't translate the last part, but he doesn't have to. Bakugo screams behind clenched teeth, glaring at the French One until he enters the sparring ring.

27 had hoped that the gleaming dome in the middle of that belt allowed Shiney's laser to change directions, but it kept shooting out straight to the middle. It's powerful, he can tell that by the shower of debris from the wall it hits. It can widen to become larger, but it's a little disappointing.

27 should have more trouble than he does with a long-range attack like this, but it's easy enough to dodge the laser, to tell by Glitter's stance where it will be coming from. He slides low, grabs an ankle when he goes under French's legs, and pulls himself up while he pulls Shiney down, disappointed that he catches himself before his face meets the floor.

27 taps the knife's point to the ill-placed seam in the back of his armor, right above his spinal cord, before he drops his ankle and sheathes it. ' Dead. '

He waits for Glitter Knight to get up, irritated that he's too busy fixing his hair to look at his instructor. "Shinsou says that you need to keep the advantage of having distance in a fight with someone like him. And you need to be able to change up the direction of your quirk," Fluent One translates, then looks at Shiney in confusion. "But, you weren't using Naval Buffet, or trying to dodge backwards."

Glitter Brat just flicks his hair back, winking at 27. "That seemed too much for mon- for my friend! You seemed to be enjoying the fun!"

27 lets him have his fun for exactly 20 seconds, before he kicks his knee out, hand on his shoulder to force him to kneel. The other hand presses the back of the knife to his throat, making a point before he pulls himself away to address all of them. ' Training. Not fun. Be serious. '

Ashi doesn't seem to believe that at all, skipping into the ring to take her turn. She swings an impressive amount of acid at him, but it's too easy to catch a hand and press the tip of the knife to the back of it. He could take her down in a number of ways after that, but he wants her to take this lesson seriously. "Shinsou says you need to have some protection on your hands. If he stabbed you there, your own acid could really hurt you."

Ashi pouts, flexing her hand. She probably doesn't want to out of a childish dislike for wearing gloves, but he tries to give her another reason to do it. He draws the protective plate she should be wearing on his own hand, before he backhands an invisible opponent. And she grins at that, adding her own side effects when she imagines it herself. "Wa-poosh! Pah! Acid!"

He had high hopes for Amphibian Fibber, but he finds himself disappointed right off the bat. He can't catch her tongue, too slippery when it darts out towards him, but he slashes with the knife distant enough not to catch her, but close enough to catch his meaning.

She narrows her eyes, then uses that camouflage skill that she mentioned in the chat. He can still see the ghost of movement, and she doesn't hide her footsteps as well as she should. As well as 127.

She does utilize it well enough, leaping and sticking to walls to try to throw him off, but when he purposefully ignores her last leap to the wall behind him and lets her jump towards him, he cheats a bit at the restriction he put on himself and reaches out to grab her foot. It's easy enough to let her fall after that, and while he knows a few pressure points that could drill the point home, he doesn't use any of them, just puts the back of the knife against the back of her leg.

"Shinsou says he could still see you when you moved, and you need to move more quietly. And since you're reliant on your legs for a lot of moves, you need to protect the back. The...tendons specifically. If he cut them, you'd be in trouble," the Fluent One only half translates, until 27 glares and repeats himself. "You wouldn't have a leg to stand on."

Amphibian Fibber stares for a minute, before she stifles a laugh. "I'm glad I was right about your sense of humor, Shinny."

He hasn't really had time to look at that book of JSL jokes, but he is looking forward to it. Even if he knows who it's from now. Even if she's a liar, she does have good taste.

Bakugo seems a bit too confident for someone he's already beaten before. "Oi, you're not gonna be saying shit about my costume."

He sees one thing already, but he'll wait until Bakugo gives him the opportunity for a demonstration.

Bakugo is still a tough opponent, tougher with that scatter shot that's nearly impossible to dodge. Bakugo is also aggressive, his mobility still a challenge, but when 27 starts to smell the burnt sugar become more powerful, he guides Bakugo under the walkway by dodging back several times. Then, just when that menacing grin gets a little more irritating, he knocks the gauntlet down into position and tucks the knife into the little metal ring before he pulls. There's no pause before it fires, and Bakugo should really get that worked out too.

It sends him flying into the ceiling, much shorter under the walkway than out in the ring. There's no time for Bakugo to react, his back rattles a bit of dust loose and probably knocks the wind out of him, causing him to fall into a heap on the floor.

27 takes the opportunity to twirl the ring around twice before Bakugo recovers, a bit quicker than he expected, but more sloppily than he should. There's no explosion following that hand reaching out for him, and that only makes it easier to grab the gauntlet, the other hand on the back of Bakugo's neck when he forces him into a loose pin, standing behind him.

Bakugo tries to kick him, but that just makes it easier to shove him to the floor, a knee on top of his shoulderblade. There's a lot of protective plating, especially at the neck and he can congratulate Bakugo for that later. There's no clear strike that would kill him, and 27 twirls the knife before he stands up, releasing Bakugo.

He holds up the metal ring, the pull for the grenade that was Bakugo's undoing, before he tosses it to him. ' Awareness of situation. Explosion from sweat easy to guess. Endurance fight both good and bad. '

The Fluent One only translates half of it before Bakugo cuts him off. “What the fuck do you mean, ‘guess’?! You know my fucking quirk, shit face! You know everything about everyone’s fucking quirk, and we don’t know shit about yours!”

“Shinsou says he’s pretending he doesn’t,” the Fluent one translates. “Like a real villain fight, because he’s pretending to be a villain.”

That’s not what 27 signed, but the Fluent One likes taking the opportunity to censor him, for some reason.

Bakugo growls behind clenched teeth, probably wants to tell 27 to take this seriously. But 27 is, for the most part.

It’s still a lot of fun.

Provost Piston seems like he’s considering how to take advantage of that restriction that 27 put on himself, hand cupped to his chin while he stares. He’s not wearing the helmet, and while 27 would like to find out whether it decreases his range of vision, he’s not going to insist that Engine wears it. “Perhaps we should take a break before continuing, to rehydrate and-”

27 shakes his head. Bakugo in particular had drawn a lot out of him, enough to feel the stretch and burn in his limbs. But this isn’t anywhere close to his limit, and while he doesn’t mind Exhaust Pipe having the benefit of knowing that restriction, he’s not going to give him too much time to prepare for it. There’s little that he can do to take advantage of it, anyway.

Piston moves in straight lines, and still kicks too much. He’s trying to mix it up, to throw in more punches and jabs, and it seems to be difficult for him. 27 slashes with the knife close to his face, trying to rattle him into just letting loose, to stop thinking about it so much, and he scrambles back in a panic.

But he pulls a more determined face, and even if his movements don’t get more mixed, he can tell that he’s trying to hit him a bit harder.

It’s harder to take Exhausting down than the first time, but eventually he can duck under a high kick and topple Piston’s weight against him. He keeps the leg over his shoulder, knowing that Piston will feel the strain in his chest with his shoulders on the ground but his body held over him. He gives Piston the chance to activate his quirk, which would burn 27’s back pretty badly, but he doesn’t.

“Shinsou says you’re getting better, and your costume doesn’t have any weaknesses that he can see!” the Fluent One says proudly, and a few of the students clap as though he wasn’t still taken down.

Piston still has an odd flush on his face, rubbing the back of his neck. “This match was very enlightening for me, and I see where I need to improve in some areas that I hadn’t considered before. Thank you, Shinsou.”

He bows, and 27 finds it incredibly awkward, finding himself looking away until the next match begins.

Long Lobes has her hands tucked into her pockets, cocking her head before she asks. “If one of us beats you, does that mean we can get a free question or something?”

He knows why she asks, why she seems confident about her victory. 27 can already see where it comes from, and he knows that he’ll have to act quickly to prevent it. But he plays that off with a shrug. ‘ Fine. ’

He lets himself go loose, before he sprints forward. She’s a bit quicker than the training session he saw, and that was exactly what he was afraid of.

The sound is deafening, he can hear the vibrations of it in the air around him and feel how that shakes him. He almost raises a hand to cover his ears before he stops himself, before he forces himself forward with his eyes locked on his chance. The only mercy is that it’s a heartbeat, there’s a drop afterwards, and it’s easier to move forward in that pause.

He mutes her by cutting the cords in the front of her costume, though she tries to kick him with the weight of those heavy speakers behind it. He catches them on his arm, and it’s a throbbing bruise but not a break. He puts the tip of the knife close to her throat, and finds himself grinning at the points of those earlobes aiming for his eyes.

It’s hard to hear what the Fluent One says when he translates, since it sounds so muffled. “Shinsou says you have a good balance for long distance and short range, which is good because your heartbeat isn’t a sustained sound. You just need to have a better reaction time. And it’s kind of good that you didn’t take out his eyes too.”

Beat Dropper rubs at her ears after taking out her ear plugs, scoffing. But then, she looks at him with an odd concern. “You’re bleeding a little, it’s...I didn’t think it was going to get that loud. Sorry.”

27 shrugs again, putting his fingers into his ears to see if clearing away the blood would improve his hearing. It does, but he still feels like his bones are rattling. ‘ Fine. ’

Spark Rat tries to offer him a break to recover, but seems too excited when he declines to make him think that he meant it at all.

Zappy fires off the stun darts, and 27 puts plenty of distance between himself and the cables attached to them. He’s fought enough electricity quirks to know that more distance is better, and he’s proven right by the feeling of static on his arms even at 4 meters.

It’s risky to approach, knowing that Sparky can emit an even larger amount of electricity from his body. He considers throwing the knife to see if Battery can dodge, though there’s not much protection in his costume to keep from seriously injuring him if he doesn’t. But just the flash of the knife causes Sparky to panic.

And fry himself.

27 feels the static pops, relieved that it’s not enough for the burn or convulsions that he was expecting from that attack, and stares as that dopey look comes across Battery’s face. He sheathes the knife, wondering if there’s even a point to him offering a criticism when Sparky won’t remember it. And there isn’t one.

Kirimson Shark guides Zappy back to the others before he steps into the ring. 27 is disappointed that he hardens immediately, and that he seems to think that he’s won already.

A defensive quirk like that is always an endurance fight. And while the stretch and burn is growing to an ache, 27 still dodges and throws his own blows, careful not to blunt the knife but using it more often now that it won’t result in injury.

The endurance fight begins to wane like it usually does, the area that Kirimson Shark hardens is getting smaller. His blows become more fluid with that, the joints no longer locked and tense, and 27 will definitely point that out to him as something he should take advantage of from the beginning of the fight.

It's also easier to tell when he's going to harden, and when he doesn't do it in time to avoid 27 stabbing him in the throat, 27 pauses with the point still pressed to his skin. When he sheathes it, he and Kirimson seem to be the only ones who know that the match was lost.

' Breath in before quirk. Easy to spot. Stop doing that, ' 27 signs, before he explains the change in speed when he doesn't harden his joints, but adds that hardening them when someone tries to throw or joint lock him could be useful.

Kirimson seems wide eyed in awe, before he curls his fists in front of him with a grin. "That's so manly! You noticed stuff that I didn't even know I did! Man, how did you learn to do that? It's awesome!"

27 shrugs. Even if he didn't win that match, it's an easy enough question. ' Training. Fought a lot. Had to learn to win. '

It's a bone-deep habit now, to pick apart not just the fighting style but the opponent's quirk and its drawbacks. As often as he saw familiar faces in the ring at the 8 Precepts, he saw far more new ones. He had to pick apart their weaknesses before the advantage took him down.

He probably owes all of it to Chisaki for giving him a more varied fare than he encountered at The Miasma's training room.

The Fluent One looks a bit wary until 27 repeats that he's excused from this training exercise. Whether his owner will fault him for that or not should worry him more than it does. He doesn't want to fight the Fluent One, even if he's curious whether there's a slight strength enhancement in his large frame. But if the Fluent One tried to use his quirk to have an animal to fight for him, 27 isn't sure if he would be able to fight it.

Izuku tries to make him take a break, again. 27 is fine, he's gone far longer and far harder without a break. The only break he really got at the 8 Precepts was when Rikiya wanted to torment a quirked underling, or if he lost a match. And that was never pleasant to deal with.

Izuku is pretty fast with that glowing speed enhancement, and he can tell by the blows he has to block that the strength behind it is decent, even at only 20%. He can also see that there's a strategy at work when Izuku's eyes seem a little more distant, darting in the wrong places. 27 can't help but grin, excited for the challenge.

"Air force shoot style!" Izuku calls, and 27 has just enough time to remind himself to tell them not to call out their attacks before his legs are blown from under him.

He catches himself on his arm, rolls away from a heavy stomp that he's proud to see, but the speed enhancement and quick flurry of blows never allows him to recover his footing fully. When he tries to turn on his heel, to get just a few seconds to steady himself, Izuku grabs the front of his shirt and pulls him into his bent knee.

Izuku grabs the knife, protected by his gloves, and twists to throw 27 over his shoulder. After the stinging pain from his back fades to a throb, 27 opens his eyes to see Izuku standing over him, fist ready to strike. But that quickly fades into panicked concern. "Are you okay?! I didn't really- that probably hurt a lot-"

"Fine," 27 cuts off, surprising himself. He hadn't hit his head, hadn't felt the mask pry open either, but the word fell out of his mouth easy. He pulls himself to sitting, the ache in his legs troublesome enough to keep him from standing right now, and looks up at Izuku expectantly.

He seemed to have forgotten about his prize, until the other students start shouting to remind him of it. They throw in suggestions too, ranging from whether he liked the pizza to what he did at villain school. 27 can't help but laugh when Bakugo still demands to know what his quirk is. His interest in it seems to have been piqued by something.

Izuku looks pensive, fingers wrapped around his chin, before his mouth twists into a deeper frown, and he looks 27 in the eye. His eyes are startlingly green.

"It's okay if you don't want to answer this question, because it is kind of personal. But Kacchan told us about the picture that you took, and..." 27 finds himself looking away, teeth clenched tight. That was a question he didn't want to answer, and he wishes that he had gone a bit harder on Blasty during the match knowing what he knows now. "Some of us took it the wrong way. I think it would just be better to clear the air and-"

"Question," 27 cuts off. He's not in the mood for rambling, he just wants Izuku to ask it and get it over with.

"Who was that woman to you?" Izuku asks, his tone oddly softened. He looks like he regrets asking, maybe regrets asking the wrong question. 27 was sure that he was going to want to know how she died. Why she died. The gory details of it that even 27 doesn't know, even if he knows it's in the autopsy report. Even if he can imagine by remembering what 98 told him, friendly fire from her client when the drug deal was busted, when she startled them by doing her job to protect them.

27 flexes his hands, unwilling to try to speak it. He's not sure if he has the words. 'Good person. Kind. Not friend or mother. Better. Trained me. She was.'

He feels that scar sting. It's a reminder, a bitter one. A bitter hope that he gave up on after her, but one that almost came true anyway.

'Escape.'

He listens to the Fluent One's translation, but barely hears it, running a hand through the hair on the back of his head. He pulls it away with too much sweat, it's a fight to pull himself to standing but he does it. He just doesn't meet Izuku's eyes when he recognizes that pitying expression.

He calls for a break, but tells them to run laps while he's gone. He wants them distracted, and he wants to take his time to gather himself. He should be able to fight each of them in the time allotted, even if he doesn't have a way to know how much has passed already. He left the phone in his room, knowing that he wouldn't touch it.

The water fountain by the changing rooms makes the water ice cold, and he spends longer drinking from it just to enjoy it. He should stretch again, pull the stiffness out of his limbs while he has a chance. Stress Bake, Sticky, Mask, Evil Cat Owner, Bird Boy, Floaty, and Momo.

He's definitely not missing Tail Boy right now. Not after Izuku.

He feels halfway recovered when he does force himself to go back to the gym area to resume the matches, but the way that they stare with that same pitying look makes him want to retreat. He'll just have to wipe that look off their face, and replace it with fear that he's starting to miss.

Stress Bake has a strength enhancement, and he's fought so many of those that it's a match he could win in his sleep. Joint lock, joint lock, throw. He almost went in for a sleeper hold, but caught an elbow to his ribs for the brief hesitation. He mentions the lack of protection again, before he realizes that he didn't even try to use the knife to illustrate it.

Sticky improved a bit, and nearly caught him when he stuck the end of his tape on 27's arm while hanging from the ceiling from his other spool, trying to spin around to bind him. It becomes a waiting game when 27 pulls out the knife, considering throwing it to sever the tape that Sticky is hanging on, and Sticky gets scared of it enough to keep too much distance between them. The match takes too long because of that, but when Sticky tries to zip over his head to the walkway, he catches a foot and throws him on his back. Sticky argues when 27 mentions the distance fight, saying that he has reasons to be afraid of knives, but 27 hasn't given him any.

Mask has too many arms to lock, but only two legs. It's still difficult to get to them with that massive arm span and range. He looks a bit nervous when 27 asks if the webbing between his arms is more sensitive to pain, but there should be a way to protect it. Pain can be distracting, and with the mass of nerve endings he's sure are there to process the information from his quirk-produced sensory organs, it would be very distracting for Mask. Debilitating even.

27 doesn't feel like proving or testing it.

The students look a bit nervous when Polar Temperatures steps into the ring, and 27 can see why. His ice can immobilize at a distance, in seconds. It can be used for mobility, attack or defense. Fire is always dangerous to deal with on its own, even though 27 has gotten very good at dodging it.

"It's fine if you want to take things slow with Soba," Chilli says, before he bows for some reason. "But however this match turns out, we'll be friends at the end of it."

27 doesn't quite hide his disbelief, and considers throwing the knife in hopes that it doesn't miss. More than that self-assured way Halfsies says that, 'however it turns out' sounding more and more like 'when I win,' it's that irritating assumption that he can decide that they're friends 'when' he wins.

They're not friends. And that cat is still evil.

Todo is a distance fighter who knows how to use his quirk for it. He knows that 27 is short range with the knife and no quirk, and turns floes of ice into walls that 27 has to climb quickly before they trap him. But 27 isn't going to let him keep that distance, he fights tooth and nail to close it, and when another wall comes up, he digs the knife into it to pull himself over it, grinning when he sees that it becomes a half-dome.

That makes it all the easier to slip behind Chilly landing quiet enough for the sound to be covered when he shatters his own ice. 27 tests that guess, approaching from the left side, and is proven right when the back of the knife on his throat is what draws Todo to turn around and notice him, the flames flickering to life before he remembers that he already lost.

Chilly doesn't look like he likes losing, his eyes narrowed and frown firm.

"Why that side?" Todo asks, and 27 won't be cruel enough to say it. He holds the knife in front of his left eye, making Todo's widen before that frown turns to a near grimace.

That burn is odd, but 27 is sure that it was caused by some sort of heat. Todo can clearly see out of it, but probably not well. Eyes don't tend to deal well with heat that close to them.

But he offers up another explanation for the other students. "Shinsou says he was acting on the assumption that you could only create ice from your right side, since you didn't use fire. You used your quirk to your advantage, but should have noticed that he was climbing your ice walls and made a full dome to get more distance. And...”

27 glares, but the Fluent One shakes his head.

“Shinsou, Soba really is very nice! He was just really scared when you met him!” the Fluent One lies, and 27 knows not to believe him. That cat is a demon wearing plush fur, and he’s seen it for himself.

He can admire it, but from a distance.

He hates Darkness. Poe Fanatic uses his quirk the right way, and he hates that smack-talking quirk. It keeps goading him, trying to grab him while it wiggles its creepy little fingers, chanting ‘I’m gonna get you! I’m gonna get you!’

Even Bird Boy seems to be irritated with it.

27 throws the knife, and when he notices that Bird Boy hasn’t noticed it, he raises his hands and points it out. ‘ I didn’t miss. Distance fight, but you’re vulnerable. Pay attention. ’

Nevermore looks at the knife embedded in the wall behind him for a while, probably taking in that it should have been embedded in his chest. He nods, then turns back to 27. “It is difficult to control Dark Shadow, and I admit that I was focusing on that aspect of the fight. Thank you for your instruction.”

Darkness whines, but before he can say something that will make 27 want to test whether it can be killed, The Crow pulls it back under his cape.

Floaty looks too enthusiastic, and 27 can’t help but feel a little bit of it in turn.

He can tell that she’s avoiding her quirk to test her sparring skills, and he has to say that he sees a huge difference. She was scrappy before, but she’s fighting a bit smarter, a bit quicker, and a bit harder too. He’s enjoying it, despite the bruises from his blocks.

She’s trying to grapple him, and he can practically see her running down a list of targets she hasn’t tried. He’s pretty sure if he left an opening for her, he could end the fight by letting her think she can take it, but he won’t. He’s hoping she’ll get frustrated enough to start using her quirk.

She makes a grab for his shoulder from too far away, and then he sees it. He grabs her wrist, other hand around her elbow when he shoves her backwards onto the floor, but he can’t stop staring at them. How did he not see this before?

He knows he’s staring, and that it’s probably a little odd. He touches one of them, too curious if he’s right, and he is. It’s not much of a difference, but they’re a little squishier than they should be.

He hates his quirk.

This is unfair. She has toe beans. She doesn’t even need toe beans for her quirk. She probably doesn’t even appreciate them. She probably doesn’t squish them, even if she has the opportunity to do it any time she wants.

“Uh...Shinsou?” Floaty is staring at him. She probably wants him to let go of her hand.

He gives the toe bean one more squish before he does. ‘ Use quirk. Improving. ’

One more. Momo.

He toyed too much with Floaty. He feels the ache and strain, but it's deeper now. He only has one more match, but he knows that it will be a difficult one. Even if he's trying to ignore it, trying to expect nothing just like he said he would, to recreate a real and blind fight, he's worried. She can create anything.

And the first thing she creates is a smoke bomb.

He covers his mouth, knowing that the point of it isn't just to obscure his vision but to make him give away his position too. She's just as blind as he is, but she's not as talented at moving silently.

He sees her back come into focus from the haze, and wastes no time to grab her from behind in a choke hold. He finds himself grinning despite the end of a metal pipe digging into his stomach. He hadn't even considered that she'd project items for close range offense.
